This subtle distinction may savor of flippancy; it is rather a cry of justifiable impatience at Mr. Bischoff's simply inordinate, inexcusable, and defacing length. He has engorged his beautiful work till full seventy minutes are consumed in its playing. Schubert himself has seemed long and over-copious to his most passionate lovers in his fifty-minute Symphony in C, one of the mountain-tops of music. For perhaps thirty—to speak by the clock—Mr. Bischoff entranced his hearers yesterday afternoon, with some of the most spirited and ingenious orchestral writing that has been given us in these latter day times. Then he left them to recall that ancient Eastern potentate and his library of a thousand camel loads.

He was fond of good reading, was that ancient potentate, and he had provided himself with plenty of it. But he read and he read, and yet it seemed that the sands of his life would run out before he had finished his books. He hated to leave behind him so much unlearned wisdom, and he called his wise men and commanded them to condense the wit and learning of these over-many tomes into a space that he could finish in the time that was left him to live. They reduced the library to a hundred camel loads—and the potentate grew older. They brought it down to a hundred ass loads—to forty ass loads—and then to ten. And the potentate grew feeble. Finally they handed him his library, its philosophy, its teachings written in two sentences on a palm leaf fan.

It matters nothing what those two sentences were; but it does matter that Mr. Bischoff has missed setting to his name one of the remarkable achievements of these days by not following something of the same method with his symphony. Such fresh and vigorous themes—always charming scraps of melody—such ingenious invention, such sparkling, hearty, happy spirit do not speak from more than half a dozen modern works. The man who wrote this symphony had something to say, and he knows how to speak. Glittering episode he piles upon episode more glittering. He knows his orchestra. He treads not far in the rear of his acknowledged master, Strauss himself, in the cunning and audacity with which he mixes orchestral color. The stunning effects he obtains he sends out fairly blurring each other in the rapidity of their succession. His scherzo alone contains more cleverness than the complete works of many an honest and respected man. And there is Mr. Bischoff's fearful falling. His ingenuity will know no end. He has written not one symphony, but three. One heard his first half hour with excited surprise, at so much charm and high spirits and devilish cleverness; and heard his last half hour in impatience as fervid, that the maker of so much fine music had not saved half of it to furnish forth the remaining works of his life!

Dr. Muck did for Bischoff what he might and could. He might not, unsanctioned, perform the office of the wise men of the Eastern potentate. But he could and did lend to the music the gorgeous orchestral palette at his command. And they took Mr. Bischoff's periods, every one of them, and sounded each of the many as if it were the final gem upon which all the other thousand waited. It was a remarkable performance, that exhausted the orchestra's bursting treasury of excellences, that exhausted its conductor's skill and mastery with them—and that exhausted the patience of a pre-possessed audience with the gifted and far too generous Mr. Bischoff.

Dvorak's "Carneval" overture, brilliant as it is, and brimming with the wine of high spirits—and after a holding in all its compass hardly a tithe of Mr. Bischoff's first movement alone!—went far better, went all the better for what had preceded it. How grateful its crisp directness, its definite, secure, unfailing pursuit of the shortest turn of phrase and the courage of its abrupt end! The rehearsal audience declaimed itself, as usual, with withdrawal before the last number—and missed one of the most exciting bits of playing that the orchestra has done under Dr. Muck.

Mme. Carreño and MacDowell left but one vivid impression—that of great charm. MacDowell has not touched his uppermost levels in this, his second concerto. Not that his utterance droops in poetic purport; the fault is rather with its technical presentment. He has seemed over-anxious to make his pianoforte the head of his orchestral family. It speaks with mighty authority, grandly with the low me-

Soloist a Favorite Since Beginning of Her Musical Career

Teresa Carreño, who comes to Boston as soloist for the Symphony concerts on Jan. 3 and 4, has had an interesting and picturesque career. When she was very young she became an intimate friend of Carlotta Patti, a sister of the great singer, Adeline Patti, so intimate that the two were photographed together. Her musical career began before she was 20 and she has been a favorite ever since. She has been four times wedded, her present husband being Arthur Tagliepetra, a brother of her second husband.

Another stage favorite and one who, although she has been out of the public eye for some years, is still remembered, is Christine Nilsson, who created such a furore when she first appeared in Boston in the early 70s. During the very height of her fame she married Count De Miranda and retired to her native Sweden and left the stage for good. This was more than twenty years ago, but the older followers of the stage still have vivid memories of her as Marguerite in "Faust" and other roles. She is at present seriously ill at her home. Like Miss Carreño, Miss Nilsson made her debut when she was very young—barely 20 years of age. She made her first appearance in London in 1867 and from that memorable night her star was in the ascension. She was also married when young to a Frenchman, Auguste Rouzard, who died in 1882. Five years later she became the Countess de Miranda.

Kitty Blanchard, who in private life is Mrs. McKee Rankin, is another of the old favorites who will never be forgotten. She, too, is ill at her home in New York city, and a few days ago a number of her friends and former admirers turned out at a big benefit performance for her. Among the participants were Novelli, Viola Allen, Cecelia Loftus, Harry Dixey, Kyrle Bellew, Mme. Nazimora, David Warfield and others.

Mrs. Rankin was a member of the first complete American company to appear in London. This was in 1880, the play being the "Danites," by Joaquin Miller. Her two daughters, Gladys, who is the wife of Sidney Drew, and Phyllis, wife of Harry Davenport, have both achieved more or less fame in their mother's chosen profession.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Bischoff's Symphony the Novelty of the Programme, and a Very Extensive One It Was.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert at Carnegie Hall last night and Dr. Muck conducted. The audience was an enormous one and displayed a great deal of enthusiasm, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played like a virtuoso orchestra of virtuosos.

So much for very bald facts. But the details are far more interesting, for the programme contained, as a novelty, a symphony, op. 16, by Mr. Hermann Bischoff, which according to the cruel calculations of hour and minute hands took about one hour and a quarter to perform.

It is not just to measure music with the yardstick or according to the standards of time, but it is taxing the patience and good nature of a concert audience very severely to impose such a task upon its listening and staying powers. The chief sentiment that voices itself at the conclusion of the work is one of pity at its inordinate length, for the composition is unquestionably an interesting one. It has moments that are tremendous, and there are other episodes that show a great deal of lyric inspiration.

Throughout is the work scored with the knowledge that comes only of talent and of study, and of the modernity of the writing there can be no question at all. The first movement, with its spirited opening theme, and its graceful waltz rhythm is probably the best; although in the third movement there is a climax that reaches toward heaven in its ambitious heights, and that promises much for this composer. If a wholesale criticism be launched at the work it would be that of too free employment of climaxes and a too constant tendency toward brilliancy. But the symphony is, despite its length, a most interesting work and, in spots, a big one.

The evening soloist was Mme. Teresa Carreno, the pianist, who has been heard here once before this season. Last night she played Macdowell's Second Concerto, and she did it in a manner that more than justified the many recalls she received. In the first movement she made the work sound heroic in its gloom, and in the happy presto she played with charming delicacy and finesse. The whole reading was admirable and this "Valkyrie of the keyboard," as she has been christened in the past, proved that she had poetry as well as heroic force.

The concluding number was Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. Dr. Muck conducted the Bischoff Symphony with an enthusiasm that must have been prompted by something more than the mere introducing of a novelty, and his accompaniments in the Macdowell concerto were sympathetic. And the orchestra played, well, as it nearly always played, only it sounded more beautiful, just as it does almost every time they are heard anew.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 18, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

HAYDN,

SYMPHONY in G major, "The Surprise," (B. & H. No. 6.)

- I. Adagio cantabile: Vivace assai.
- II. Andante.
- III. Menuetto: Allegro molto; Trio.
- IV. Allegro di molto.

MOZART,

THREE GERMAN DANCES. (K. 605.)
(First time in Boston.)

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 4, in B flat major, op. 60.

- I. Adagio: Allegro vivace.
- II. Adagio.
- III. Allegro vivace: Trio, un poco meno allegro.
- IV. Finale: Allegro ma non troppo.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Bischoff's Symphony the Novelty
of the Programme, and a Very Extensive One It Was.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert at Carnegie Hall last night and Dr. Muck conducted. The audience was an enormous one and displayed a great deal of enthusiasm, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played like a virtuoso orchestra of virtuosos.

So much for very bald facts. But the details are far more interesting, for the programme contained, as a novelty, a symphony, op. 16, by Mr. Hermann Bischoff, which according to the cruel calculations of hour and minute hands took about one hour and a quarter to perform.

It is not just to measure music with the yardstick or according to the standards of time, but it is taxing the patience and good nature of a concert audience very severely to impose such a task upon its listening and staying powers. The chief sentiment that voices itself at the conclusion of the work is one of pity at its inordinate length, for the composition is unquestionably an interesting one. It has moments that are tremendous, and there are other episodes that show a great deal of lyric inspiration.

Throughout is the work scored with the knowledge that comes only of talent and of study, and of the modernity of the writing there can be no question at all. The first movement, with its spirited opening theme, and its graceful waltz rhythm is probably the best, although in the third movement there is a climax that reaches toward heaven in its ambitious heights, and that promises much for this composer. If a wholesale criticism be launched at the work it would be that of too free employment of climaxes and a too constant tendency toward brilliancy. But the symphony is, despite its length, a most interesting work and, in spots, a big one.

The evening soloist was Mme. Teresa Carreno, the pianist, who has been heard here once before this season. Last night she played Macdowell's Second Concerto, and she did it in a manner that more than justified the many recalls she received. In the first movement she made the work sound heroic in its gloom, and in the happy presto she played with charming delicacy and finesse. The whole reading was admirable and this "Valkyrie of the keyboard," as she has been christened in the past, proved that she had poetry as well as heroic force.

The concluding number was Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. Dr. Muck conducted the Bischoff Symphony with an enthusiasm that must have been prompted by something more than the mere introducing of a novelty, and his accompaniments in the Macdowell concerto were sympathetic. And the orchestra played, well, as it nearly always played, only it sounded more beautiful, just as it does almost every time they are heard anew.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 18, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

HAYDN,

SYMPHONY in G major, "The Surprise," (B. & H. No. 6.)

I. Adagio cantabile: Vivace assai.

II. Andante.

III. Menuetto: Allegro molto; Trio.

IV. Allegro di molto.

MOZART,

THREE GERMAN DANCES. (K. 605.)
(First time in Boston.)

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 4, in B flat major, op. 60.

I. Adagio: Allegro vivace.

II. Adagio.

III. Allegro vivace: Trio, un poco meno allegro.

IV. Finale: Allegro ma non troppo.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

adw, PROGRAMME. Jan 20 1908
 Haydn. "Surprise" Symphony.
 Mozart. "Three German Dances."
 Beethoven. Fourth Symphony.

At this concert Dr. Muck, as will be seen by the above programme, pushed back the hands of the musical clock at least a hundred years. There was not one mystical horror, not one unresolved dissonance, not one moment of sombre gloom. In Egypt, where the sky is eternally clear, travelers sometimes long for a rain-cloud. Before the end of the first part of this concert we found ourselves longing for a diminished seventh, for an augmented second, for just a little trouble of any kind.

In the second movement of the Haydn symphony the sudden stroke of a single kettle drum is no longer a "surprise"; the modern auditor would require at least a cannon or a dynamite bomb to astonish him. The sudden accent, however, is reckoned as one of the practical jokes of music. All the great composers have exhibited the element of humor at times. Beethoven's village band and broken-down bassoonist, in the Pastoral Symphony, Mozart's portrayal of an ignorant composer struggling to create a classical composition ("Ein Musikalischer Spass"), Mendelssohn's "Mayor" who sings on one note only, in "Son and Stranger," Bach's "Coffee Cantata," which we believe Mr. Dolmetsch is soon to produce in Boston, are but a few of the examples of composers at play. But Bach was ponderous even in his fun, while Haydn, Mozart and Mendelssohn were naturally playful and witty.

The reading and execution of the Haydn work were excellent. The Andante was given softer than we have heard it, but that was a merit. The real trouble was that there was too much of sameness in the first part of the programme. One would scarcely enjoy a dinner which began with four courses of soup. This musical banquet had practically four Minuets in its first seven movements, for the Mozart dances (although the figure would be executed in a totally different manner in the ballroom) had almost exactly the minuet swing. They were not waltzes in the modern sense, for the waltz, although always marked $\frac{3}{4}$, is in reality a 6-4 rhythm, while these dances were, like the Minuet, a true $\frac{3}{4}$ rhythm. The canonic work in the second dance was the best point in these pieces. As regards the last one, with its sleigh-bells and its post-horn calls, we can only say that our own Sousa does better in this kind of thing. The dances were given for the first—and only,—time in Boston.

At the end of the seven bright, melodic and innocuous movements the audience went out into the corridors and longed for Reger, D'Indy & Co., Dealers in cryptograms, musical puzzles and dissonances, Manufacturers of tonal mysteries and horrors. They had had a trifle too much of musical sunshine.

After this diaphanous part Beethoven's symphony seemed fiercely modern. When it was written the great Weber jumped upon it furiously, declaring it the work of a musical madman.

Dr. Muck did not spare a single repeat; exposition, Scherzo themes, everything that had a couple of dots attached to it was repeated. The work was exquisitely played. The canons and the ingenious development, in the first movement, the bold syncopations in the third, the brilliant violin figures echoed in all the strings, in the finale, all these were splendidly done.

This symphony has, like a wasp, its sting in its tail, for at the end the contra-basses have a figure that is ferociously difficult. The musicians of this part deserve especial praise for their execution of this trying Coda, which is very seldom clearly played. When this was first performed Weber wrote a most satirical article on this use of the contra-basses, in the "Cecilia," a musical journal of that day in which he pictured the contra-basses attempting to go on strike. Poor Beethoven could only swear at the author,—for he was a master of Billingsgate,—but he retorted with something more potent than words, for he wrote an equally difficult contra-bass passage, or series of passages, in his very next symphony,—see the Trio of the Scherzo of the fifth symphony.

If the reviewer confesses boredom at this concert, as a whole, it must speedily be added that the public did not seem to share this attitude, for there was considerable applause and there was no marked exodus until the very end.

At the next concert the pendulum is to swing in the opposite direction and every measure of the music will be in the most modern vein of French and German radicalism. Louis C. Elson.

12TH SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASES

Harold Jan 19.08
 Classical Programme and Fine Performance Before
 Large Audience.

MOZART DANCES PLAYED
 HERE FOR FIRST TIME

Include Post Horn and Sleigh Bells—"The Surprise," Symphony by Haydn.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra,
 Dr Karl Muck, conductor, gave its 12th concert last night in Symphony Hall.

The programme was as follows:

Symphony in G major, "The Surprise"....Haydn
Three German Dances (K. 605).....Mozart
Symphony No. 4, B flat major....Beethoven

There is little to be said at this late day about the character of these symphonies by Haydn and Beethoven and there is little to be said about the performance of them except that it was admirable and that it gave great pleasure to the audience. The symphony by Haydn has not been played at these concerts for several years and it was good to hear it.

It was a good thing to remind the younger generation that there were brave men before Agamemnon; that there were musicians 100 years ago, and over 100 years ago, who in their period were regarded as revolutionary and dangerous, who wrote music that still today is fresh and beautiful and in some instances wonderful. The symphony of Haydn, composed in 1791, pleased at once. The symphony of Beethoven, first performed in 1807, at first perplexed if it did not shock the hearers. Old as they are, they are more modern than many works written within the last 25 years, which had their little day of triumph, found prophets swearing immortality, and are now dead—dead as King Pandion whose bones centuries ago were lapped in lead, as the poet tells us.

On Plenary Inspiration.

No sane person today believes in plenary inspiration. There are hopelessly antiquated pages of Beethoven; there are pages by him and Mozart and Haydn that are tiresome jingle. To bow down before a platitude simply because it came from a great master is to indulge in fetishism. On the other hand, to decry all music that was written before the time of Berlioz or Wagner is equally foolish; it shows both a lack of discriminative appreciation and a pitiable ignorance.

These statements themselves would be platitudes in an ideal world, one in which music were really held to be an art and not a trade, an agreeable occupation. But these statements cannot be repeated too often, when partisanship runs high, when the hide-bound conservatives and the wild-eyed seekers after something new are alike intolerant and aggressive.

The dances composed by Mozart in the last year of his life for masked balls in Vienna were played here for the first time. They were interesting in two ways—first, as an illustration of the dance music of the period; also as a reminder of the social life of the Vienna populace. In the trio of the second dance are harmonic progressions that must have seemed strange at the time and are worthy of the great Mozart. The trio of the third waltz, with its posthorn and sleigh bells—for the trio is entitled "The Sleigh Ride"—is charming by reason of its quaint grace, and the Coda is even still more delightful.

As I have said, the performance throughout was masterly. Special praise might be given to the performance of the andante of Haydn's symphony, of the first movement and the adagio of Beethoven's.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Mozart Novelties at the Symphony.

"The Redemption" Tonight by People's Choral Union.

Concerts and Recitals of Current Interest.

Globe Jan. 19, 1908

Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, Mozart's three German dances and Beethoven's fourth symphony comprised the 12th Symphony program; three interesting numbers without a soloist, just pure, enjoyable orchestral music which gave Dr Muck's splendid band of instrumentalists the chance to win all the honors of the day and evening.

Three great names, two symphonies and one group of "novelties" written more than a century back surely formed a dignified and solid musical combination, yet there was melody a-plenty in the Mozart dances and the grand old-time symphonies fell pleasingly upon the ear, for many harmonies were woven by the masters through each of their compositions.

A novelty by Mozart seems strange nowadays, yet these three German dances, which were written in 1791, were new to the Symphony programs. They are dainty and quaint bits of musical pleasantry, varied in character to suit the styles of the dancing. The third one, called "The Sleighride," was particularly charming with its post horns and jangle of sleigh bells.

The Haydn symphony, so joyous and thematically prolific, was played with a finesse and smoothness that showed the ensemble work of the orchestra in fine form. In the performance the delightfully pastoral atmosphere of the andante and the menuetto of the third part were notable examples in shadings and changes of rhythms, probably as nearly perfect as one is likely to hear by any body of players.

The Beethoven number deserves equal commendation, for the interpretation was as impressive and appealing in its perfectness as the Haydn symphony. Generally delicate and happy in its makeup, the Beethoven work shows many vigorous moments. And in all the intricacies of the composition in the peculiar treatment of themes in the first part, in the odd phrasing of the scherzo, the blithesome finale and the unexpected fortissimos in the first movement, the orchestra met all requirements. Truly a splendid performance, not only of this, but of the three works.

This week's program will be made up of modern music, representative of modern Germany, modern America and modern France. The first work is Richard Strauss' rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The second number is a "Suite Fantastique," by Ernest Schelling. This is a work for piano and orchestra, and the composer will be the pianist. Chausson's symphonic poem, "Viviane," will close the program.

ORCHESTRA PRODUCES

117-YEAR OLD NOVELTY

A novelty no less than 117 years old, and by none other than Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart himself, was performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its regular concert Saturday night. Dr. Muck's caustic reflections on the clique or element that demands novelties only to snarl at them—a summary of these reflections was printed in Saturday's Journal—do not apply to this Mozart number. They apply rather to the output of the drawing-room composers whose technique is superior to their imagination. Yet it must be said that these "Three German Dances" by the composer of "Don Giovanni" proved interesting chiefly on the historic side. They were jolly, homely efforts intended to please, not the court, but the populace. Their form is old-fashioned. The waltzer in Mozart's day stamped, slapped his shoes, and was otherwise noisy.

The concert opened with a performance of Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony. The surprise—in the shape of a tutti thump—was not so marked as in the days of Jullien, who brought to town the biggest bass drum he could find. The last number on the program was Beethoven's fourth Symphony, the one with the adagio that, according to Berlioz, "seems to have been sighed by the Archangel Michael one day when, overcome by melancholy, he contemplated the worlds from the threshold of the empyrean." Both symphonies were played beautifully.

Next Saturday Ernest Schelling, the pianist, will play his Suite Fantastique for piano and orchestra. The other numbers on the program are Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and Chausson's symphonic poem, "Viviane."

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A PROGRAMME FROM THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

Light Symphonies Out of Haydn and Beethoven and Three Dances by Mozart

Hitherto Unheard Here—Mrs. Hall's Concert of Unfamiliar French Music—A New String Quartet to Appear—Other Announcements for Next Week and Weeks to Come

For the twelfth pair of concerts Dr. Muck has chosen a classic programme of almost unbroken cheerfulness and good humor, consisting of Haydn's symphony in G usually designated as "Surprise," or "with the drum stroke"; three German dances by Mozart and to conclude Beethoven's fourth symphony in B flat Op 60.

It was a matter of surprise to note the large and attentive audience, despite the absence of a soloist. Apparently a group of classics is of conspicuously greater interest than that for instance of some weeks ago, when a programme also without soloist, was noticeably less of a drawing card despite the fact that MacDowell's first suite had not been played here for some years, and that Goetz's fresh and piquant symphony and Bizet's dramatic overture, "Patrie" were even more in the nature of rarities. The familiar Haydn symphony was given with astonishing exuberance and spontaneity, with unusually precise phrasing and delicate accent; the famous drum stroke, which was a source of consternation and terror to audiences of a hundred years ago, was capitally prepared by the extreme pianissimo of the strings, so that those who were unprepared might easily have started in alarm.

It is undeniable that the German dances by Mozart fitted admirably into the scheme of programme prepared by Dr. Muck. Intrinsically they are not of absorbing musical interest. They are obviously written for an occasion, and as such served their purpose. In the third dance, "the sleigh ride" doubtless having in mind the popularity of sledge parties in Vienna, the introduction of two sets of bells carefully tuned, as well as the post horns, brought a welcome touch of quasi-realistic humor that was distinctly captivating.

It would be difficult to imagine a finer interpretation of the Beethoven symphony. Avoiding, on the one hand a lifeless and uninspired "classical" rendering, it was also far removed from an ultra modern reading, which too often assumes details contrary to the spirit of the composer. Nevertheless there was no lack of warmth and vital emotion: if there were modifications of tempo, they were such as would have doubtless been sanctioned by Beethoven. The brilliant vivacity, the poetry, the humor and the sad serenity of the slow movement were brought to a realization that is seldom to be equalled for perfection, sense of balance and proportion. Especially remarkable was the absolute pianissimo of the strings in the first movement before the return of the first theme; the poetic expressiveness of the clarinet solos in the slow movement; the exquisite grace of the wind instruments in the trio of the third movement, and finally the transparent velocity of the strings in the vivacious finale. Dr. Muck is heartily to be thanked for such a performance of a classic work in days when its outlines are too often distorted, and its sentiment wilfully misunderstood.

154

E. B. H.

155

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 25, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

R. STRAUSS,

"Till Eulenspiegel".

SCHELLING,

SUITE FANTASTIQUE for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA.

CHAUSSON,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "Viviane," op. 5.

Soloist:

Mr. ERNEST SCHELLING.

154
slow movement; the exquisite grace of the wind instruments in the trio of the third movement, and finally the transparent velocity of the strings in the vivacious finale. Dr. Muck is heartily to be thanked for such a performance of a classic work in days when its outlines are too often distorted, and its sentiment wilfully misunderstood.
E. B. H.

155 7
Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KAPL MUCK, Conductor.

XIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 25, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

R. STRAUSS,

"Till Eulenspiegel".

SCHELLING,

SUITE FANTASTIQUE for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA.

CHAUSSON,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "Viviane," op. 5.

Soloist:

Mr. ERNEST SCHELLING.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A PROGRAMME OF THREE TONE

Trans: POEMS Jan'y 25. 08

Chausson's "Viviane," Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel" and Schelling's New "Fantastic Suite"—"Til" at a Tremendous Pace and Mr. Schelling as a Composer—The Concerts of Next Week, with Miss Farrar, Mme. Gadski and Mr. Kreisler

The programme for the thirteenth pair of symphony concerts consisted of Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," op. 28; Fantastic Suite for piano and orchestra (first time in Boston); Chausson's symphonic poem, "Viviane." Mr. Ernest Schelling was the soloist.

The performance of the Strauss rondo was brilliant in the extreme; the audience applauded until Dr. Muck bade the orchestra arise and bow in acknowledgment. Yet it is perhaps open to question whether the tempo throughout were not pushed to such limits as to prevent a complete interpretation of the rakish humor, the human intensity, the many touches of poetry which characterize this music. It is indeed doubtful whether "Till Eulenspiegel" has ever been given with such breathless brilliancy, such apparent disregard of technical difficulties, with so splendid a climax. But assuredly there have been other readings in which the full force of the grotesque and often wanton humor has been more emphasized, in which the spirit of the German folk-song has seemed more to dominate the conception of the piece. In spite of a few passages of obvious realism, it would seem as if the essential qualities of "Till Eulenspiegel" were simplicity and logically coherent structure. The point of view of Claude Debussy becomes almost inconceivable (even taking into account the radical racial opposition of the two composers) when he wrote of "Till" as follows: "The piece is like an hour of new music at the madhouse—clarinets describe distracted trajectories, trumpets are always united, horns foresee a latent sneeze, and hurry to say politely, 'God bless you'; a big drum makes the boum-boum that italicizes the clown's kick and gesture; you burst with laughter or howl in agony, and you are surprised to find things in their usual place, for if the double-basses blew through their bows, if the trombones rubbed their tubes with an imaginary bow, and if Mr. Nikisch were found seated on the knees of an ouvreuse all this would not surprise. But in spite of all this, the piece is full of genius in certain ways, especially in the prodigious surety of the orchestration, and the mad spirit that sweeps one along from beginning to end." But this was twelve or more years ago, and much has happened within the interval.

Since the first performance of "Viviane" in Boston we have heard not a little of Chausson's music. We have become acquainted with his more mature idiom, with the "incomparable nobility" of his symphony, the grace and poetry of some of his songs, and more recently of the dramatic power and keen imaginativeness of his "Poem of Love and of the Sea," which was brought out in its orchestral version at Mrs. Hall's orchestral concert earlier in the week. In comparison with these later works, "Viviane" seems palpably an earlier work, as indeed it is, one in which construction, skill in orchestration, the capacity for poetic delineation is markedly inferior to his later manifestations of these same qualities. There is the distinct sense of the experimental, of a certain vagueness of conception, as well as imperfect realization of ideas. Notwithstanding this there is an immense amount of poetic charm in the work, many delightful and picturesque moments, notable the trumpet calls behind the scenes, that make it extremely grateful to listen to. It was capitally interpreted by Dr. Muck and his men.

Mr. Schelling has aroused much interest as a pianist in Boston; it was the more welcome to have an opportunity to listen to him as a composer. From many signs of the times it would appear that the reign of the piano concerto is well-nigh over. That is to say, the vein of combination of the piano as essentially a solo instrument with orchestra has virtually been exhausted. A more logical and natural employment of the piano with the modern orchestra is well demonstrated in such works as Converse's poems "Night" and "Day," and Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" where the piano is treated as a constituent of the orchestral forces rather than an independent power which dictates to the orchestra. In a sense, Mr. Schelling's suite does not acknowledge this indubitable step for the piano is nearly always in evidence, and even in the role of an accompanist, imposes by sheer color and brilliance. As a composition, Mr. Schelling's suite pleases by its striking themes, an unobtrusively skilful and resourceful treatment of them. The second movement, in the nature of a scherzo is a delicious tour de force, which charms from beginning to end. The slow movement is perhaps less happy in its sentiment, but the finale in the form of a Virginia reel exhibits a spontaneous and brilliant treatment of popular themes that is often extremely ingenious from the contrapuntal point of view. The orchestration is more than ordinarily brilliant and effective. The piano part is extremely pianistic, in an idiom which makes it an object of constant interest. There are no tricks of modern piano style which are not brought out with a verve that was almost dazzling. Mr. Schelling played not as a composer, but with the authority and persuasive eloquence of the virtuoso. The audience in its insistent and long-continued applause paid willing tribute to composer as well as to the brilliant pianist. All in all, an effective and extremely well-made piece which compels attention and admiration. E. B. H.

SCHELLING SCORES DISTINCT TRIUMPH

His "Fantastic Suite" Produced First Time in America at Symphony Concert.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place last evening in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" . . . Strauss
Fantastic suite for piano and orchestra . . . Schelling
"Viviane," symphonic poemChausson

This concert was one of much interest from the beginning to the end. "Till Eulenspiegel" disputes with "Don Juan" the first position among the symphonic poems of Strauss. The opening of "Thus Spake Zarathustra" is colossal in its elemental grandeur; the death music in "Don Quixote" is incomparably beautiful; there are a few pages in "The Life of a Hero" that remind one of Beethoven at his best; the love music in the "Domestic" symphony is memorable; but "Till Eulenspiegel" and "Don Juan" are continuously impressive, each in its way, and are free from the suspicion of effects made for the sake of effect, designed deliberately to make the bourgeois stare.

These two pieces differ necessarily in spirit. "Till Eulenspiegel" is a rondo of extravagant mirth, of Rabelaisian humor. "Don Juan" is defiantly sensuous with the tragic ending that is inevitable, the end of every man's desire. Yet each work is complete and rounded each symphonic poem is a continuous work of art without digressions that annoy; without panoramic detail that needs a lecturer with his pointer.

The performance of "Till Eulenspiegel" was elastic and brilliant. It was a virtuoso performance of a work that, while it is purposely extravagant, is not without emotion, not without the human appeal.

Composer Acted as Pianist.

Mr. Schelling's Suite, composed in 1905-6, and orchestrated in 1907, was performed for the first time at Amsterdam Oct 10 of last year. The composer was the pianist, as he was last night. The Suite was played again in Holland. I believe at Rotterdam. The performance last night was the first in the United States.

Mr. Schelling has characterized his music as "fantastic." In these days the word has lost somewhat its original significance, and in music it too often is without special meaning. A composer fancies that he is fantastic when he is only laborious in search of the bizarre. Mr. Schelling in this suite has true fancy.

The suite is in four movements. The first with its characteristically rhythmical chief motive, its melodic thought, its decided mood of peculiar melancholy is Celtic in spirit. The second movement is a graceful scherzo with a strongly contrasted trio. The third is a highly romantic adagio. The finale is in the form of a Virginia reel based on three themes: the most important of the three is "Dixie"; the second is original; the third is "Old Folks at Home."

This music of Mr. Schelling gave immediate pleasure, nor would this pleasure be abated by a second hearing, for the music has a marked physiognomy. It is modern in sentiment and in expression, but there is no attempt to anticipate the form and expression that may be modern a quarter of a century hence.

Mr. Schelling is Modern.

Mr. Schelling is a man of his generation not a forerunner, not one born too soon. He neither looks backward with slavish respect, nor does he turn his back on that which has already been done. It is not necessarily the mark of a genius to despise the work and spirit of one's own generation, for all contemporaries are not inevitably old fogies, dull eared, slow of appreciation unless they hear familiar sounds in familiar forms. If a man be really a genius, he cannot escape wholly the notice of some that live in his own period.

Mr. Schelling's music has true charm. Its emotional quality is neither super-refined nor obvious. His melodic thoughts in the first three movements have individuality, tenderness that is not flabby, grace that is not too carefully sought out. His harmonic progressions are interesting, at times singularly effective. His instrumentation is often ingenious and almost always euphonious.

For his finale Mr. Schelling chose two themes that are very familiar. "Dixie," originally a negro minstrel walk-around, composed by Dan Emmett before the civil war, became ironically the battle song of the South. It is a stirring tune, a tune that is eminently American in its recklessness, its defiant snapping of fingers at the universe. No one with blood in his veins can hear it without a thrill, no matter how or where it may be performed. The other melody, Stephen Foster's "Old Folks at Home," is the one great folk song of this country.

I am glad that Mr. Schelling had the courage in composing the finale of a serious work to choose these tunes for themes. He wished to give the finale an American flavor, and he took themes that are distinctively American. He treated these themes in admirable fashion, now exposing them, now suggesting them, always the musician.

An Envious Triumph.

Mr. Schelling's performance of the piano part revealed him as a pianist who has gained in breadth and authority, in emotional expression and elegance of bravura and in the repose that suggests mastery and reserve force. Thus as pianist and composer he won an indisputable and enviable triumph.

Chausson's "Viviane" has been played here before. It was worth the repetition and it is worthy of future hearings. It has been called a pastel, but it is more than that. While it is not so important a work as his symphony, it has a delicate sensuousness, a suggestion of forest atmosphere and woven spells, of unheeded calls to action, of the world well lost for love. Here and there are passages that show the influence of Wagner, but the best pages are those signed by Chausson. The performance was one of rare beauty.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Yesterday's Symphony
Concert.

Geraldine Farrar Sings in Boston
and Melrose This Week.

Recitals by Mme Gadski
and Fritz Kriesler.

The novelty on the 13th Symphony program was a fantastic suite for piano and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, the composer playing the solo part. "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," by Strauss, was the opening number, Chausson's symphonic poem, "Viviane," closing the program. Mr Schelling's work was given for the first time in Boston and it proved to be an ingenious and interesting composition in which the piano part was very prominent and indicated the professional preference of the artist.

It is in four movements, modern in style, in fact frankly American, and shows that Mr Schelling understands ways and means in instrumentation that are pleasing and decidedly original

at times. And in the last part he has combined "Dixie," "Old Folks at Home" and a bit of "Yankee Doodle" and used the resources of the big orchestra to work up a kind of patriotic climax. This certainly is inspiring without being in what might be called the "popular" vein of orchestration.

From the first there are fleeting suggestions of a familiar American tune, but of such a will-o'-the-wisp character that it is difficult to trace. The closing movement is so purely American that the suite might be titled so without being misnamed. There is a multitude of charming bits of melody skilfully juggled among the orchestral forces, with the more connected material allotted to the piano. The first part contains brilliant passage work for the solo instrument, the general "atmosphere" being one of rhythmic buoyancy.

The second movement has in it a duet for piano and horn that is rather odd in arrangement, and which was played excellently, and in the subsequent intermezzo some of the measure given to the wood-winds are delightfully quaint. Mr Schelling throughout the three movements gave plenty of evidence as to his skill as a pianist, and of course, as an interpreter.

The trio of American airs in symphonic guise made the last movement amusing as well as specially interesting, for the three were battling melodiously at frequent intervals. Orchestra and piano each had its chance and each did justice to the "Virginia Reel," as the finale is named by the composer. Mr Schelling's reception was very cordial.

Dr Muck guided his forces skilfully through the elfin-like measures of the Strauss "Merry Pranks," bringing out its weirdly humorous ideas vividly and characteristically. In the "Viviane" of Chausson the orchestra gave one of its splendid interpretations of a pathetic subject which impressively shown in composition finds sympathetic illustration by our band of players.

The orchestra will be away this week, giving the first concert of the tour at Buffalo Monday evening. The other cities to be visited are Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus and Cincinnati. The 14th program here will include the symphonic sketches by G. W. Chadwick and Goldmark's overture, "Im Fruhling."

and Hilla or whirling dance to deed during the afternoon by the Tara the solemnities of the night were pre-lay out of the dead.

his composition in the museum concerts at Frankfort later this month and will have many opportunities for presenting it here during his American tour. The four movements of the work are based on various national themes. In the "Allegro Martiale," for instance, the themes are Slavic. The "Scherzando" is Italian. The "Andante Simplice" is built on an Irish love song, and the finale, "Presto Confuoco," is written in the style of the Virginia reel.

brought out with a verve that was almost dazzling. Mr. Schelling played not as a composer, but with the authority and persuasive eloquence of the virtuoso. The audience in its insistent and long-continued applause paid willing tribute to composer as well as to the brilliant pianist. All in all, an effective and extremely well-made piece which compels attention and admiration. E. B. H.

SCHELLING SCORES DISTINCT TRIUMPH

His "Fantastic Suite" Produced First Time in America at Symphony Concert.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place last evening in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" . . . Strauss
Fantastic suite for piano and orchestra . . . Schelling
"Viviane," symphonic poem . . . Chausson

This concert was one of much interest from the beginning to the end. "Till Eulenspiegel" disputes with "Don Juan" the first position among the symphonic poems of Strauss. The opening of "Thus Spake Zarathustra" is colossal in its elemental grandeur; the death music in "Don Quixote" is incomparably beautiful; there are a few pages in "The Life of a Hero" that remind one of Beethoven at his best; the love music in the "Domestic" symphony is memorable; but "Till Eulenspiegel" and "Don Juan" are continuously impressive, each in its way, and are free from the suspicion of effects made for the sake of effect, designed deliberately to make the bourgeois stare.

These two pieces differ necessarily in spirit. "Till Eulenspiegel" is a rondo of extravagant mirth, of Rabelaisian humor. "Don Juan" is defiantly sensuous with the tragic ending that is inevitable, the end of every man's desire. Yet each work is complete and rounded each symphonic poem is a continuous work of art without digressions that annoy; without panoramic detail that needs a lecturer with his pointer.

The performance of "Till Eulenspiegel" was elastic and brilliant. It was a virtuoso performance of a work that, while it is purposely extravagant, is not without emotion, not without the human appeal.

Composer Acted as Pianist.

Mr. Schelling's Suite, composed in 1905-6, and orchestrated in 1907, was performed for the first time at Amsterdam Oct 10 of last year. The composer was the pianist, as he was last night. The Suite was played again in Holland, I believe at Rotterdam. The performance last night was the first in the United States.

Mr. Schelling has characterized his music as "fantastic." In these days the word has lost somewhat its original significance, and in music it too often is without special meaning. A composer fancies that he is fantastic when he is only laborious in search of the bizarre. Mr. Schelling in this suite has true fancy.

The suite is in four movements. The first with its characteristically rhythmical chief motive, its melodic thought, its decided mood of peculiar melancholy is Celtic in spirit. The second movement is a graceful scherzo with a strongly contrasted trio. The third is a highly romantic adagio. The finale is in the form of a Virginia reel based on three themes: the most important of the three is "Dixie"; the second is original; the third is "Old Folks at Home."

This music of Mr. Schelling gave immediate pleasure, nor would this pleasure be abated by a second hearing, for the music has a marked physiognomy. It is modern in sentiment and in expression, but there is no attempt to anticipate the form and expression that may be modern a quarter of a century hence.

Mr. Schelling Is Modern.

Mr. Schelling is a man of his generation not a forerunner, not one born too soon. He neither looks backward with slavish respect, nor does he turn his back on that which has already been done. It is not necessarily the mark of a genius to despise the work and spirit of one's own generation, for all contemporaries are not inevitably old fogies, dull eared, slow of appreciation unless they hear familiar sounds in familiar forms. If a man be really a genius, he cannot escape wholly the notice of some that live in his own period.

Mr. Schelling's music has true charm. Its emotional quality is neither super-refined nor obvious. His melodic thoughts in the first three movements have individuality, tenderness that is not flabby, grace that is not too carefully sought out. His harmonic progressions are interesting, at times singularly effective. His instrumentation is often ingenious and almost always euphonious.

For his finale Mr. Schelling chose two themes that are very familiar. "Dixie," originally a negro minstrel walk-around, composed by Dan Emmett before the civil war, became ironically the battle song of the South. It is a stirring tune, a tune that is eminently American in its recklessness, its defiant snapping of fingers at the universe. No one with blood in his veins can hear it without a thrill, no matter how or where it may be performed. The other melody, Stephen Foster's "Old Folks at Home," is the one great folk song of this country.

I am glad that Mr. Schelling had the courage in composing the finale of a serious work to choose these tunes for themes. He wished to give the finale an American flavor, and he took themes that are distinctively American. He treated these themes in admirable fashion, now exposing them, now suggesting them, always the musician.

An Envious Triumph.

Mr. Schelling's performance of the piano part revealed him as a pianist who has gained in breadth and authority, in emotional expression and elegance of bravura and in the repose that suggests mastery and reserve force. Thus as pianist and composer he won an indisputable and enviable triumph.

Chausson's "Viviane" has been played here before. It was worth the repetition and it is worthy of future hearings. It has been called a pastel, but it is more than that. While it is not so important a work as his symphony, it has a delicate sensuousness, a suggestion of forest atmosphere and woven spells, of unheeded calls to action, of the world well lost for love. Here and there are passages that show the influence of Wagner, but the best pages are those signed by Chausson. The performance was one of rare beauty.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Glabe Jan 26, 08
Yesterday's Symphony
Concert.

Geraldine Farrar Sings in Boston
and Melrose This Week.

Recitals by Mme Gadski
and Fritz Kriesler.

The novelty on the 13th Symphony program was a fantastic suite for piano and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, the composer playing the solo part. "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," by Strauss, was the opening number, Chausson's symphonic poem, "Viviane," closing the program. Mr Schelling's work was given for the first time in Boston and it proved to be an ingenious and interesting composition in which the piano part was very prominent and indicated the professional preference of the artist.

It is in four movements, modern in style, in fact frankly American, and shows that Mr Schelling understands ways and means in instrumentation that are pleasing and decidedly original

at times. And in the last part he has combined "Dixie," "Old Folks at Home" and a bit of "Yankee Doodle" and used the resources of the big orchestra to work up a kind of patriotic climax. This certainly is inspiring without being in what might be called the "popular" vein of orchestration.

From the first there are fleeting suggestions of a familiar American tune, but of such a will-o'-the-wisp character that it is difficult to trace. The closing movement is so purely American that the suite might be titled so without being misnamed. There is a multitude of charming bits of melody skilfully juggled among the orchestral forces, with the more connected material allotted to the piano. The first part contains brilliant passage work for the solo instrument, the general "atmosphere" being one of rhythmic buoyancy.

The second movement has in it a duet for piano and horn that is rather odd in arrangement, and which was played excellently, and in the subsequent intermezzo some of the measure given to the wood-winds are delightfully quaint. Mr Schelling throughout the three movements gave plenty of evidence as to his skill as a pianist, and of course, as an interpreter.

The trio of American airs in symphonic guise made the last movement amusing as well as specially interesting, for the three were battling melodiously at frequent intervals. Orchestra and piano each had its chance and each did justice to the "Virginia Reel," as the finale is named by the composer. Mr Schelling's reception was very cordial.

Dr Muck guided his forces skilfully through the elfin-like measures of the Strauss "Merry Pranks," bringing out its wondrously humorous ideas vividly and characteristically. In the "Viviane" of Chausson the orchestra gave one of its splendid interpretations of a pathetic subject which impressively shown in composition finds sympathetic illustration by our band of players.

The orchestra will be away this week, giving the first concert of the tour at Buffalo Monday evening. The other cities to be visited are Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus and Cincinnati. The 14th program here will include the symphonic sketches by G. W. Chadwick and Goldmark.

Messages received in this city during the week announce the successful first performance of Ernest Schelling's new composition, a fantastic suite for piano and orchestra, at the Concertgebouw concert in Amsterdam on October 10; William Mengelberg conducting and the composer at the piano. Schelling is to play his composition in the museum concerts at Frankfurt later this month and will have many opportunities for presenting it here during his American tour. The four movements of the work are based on various national themes. In the "Allegro Martiale," for instance, the themes are Slavic. The "Scherzando" is Italian. The "Andante Simplice" is built on an Irish love song, and the finale, "Presto Confuoco," is written in the style of the Virginia reel.

THIS DR MUCK'S LAST YEAR WITH SYMPHONY

Great Orchestra's Best Loved Leader Will Return To Berlin Opera at Command of Kaiser.

DR KARL MUCK.

Globe Jan. 23, 1908
C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston symphony orchestra, announced yesterday that there is no hope of retaining Dr Karl Muck as conductor for another season. No further extension of his leave of absence from the Imperial opera at Berlin can be obtained. No arrangements for his successor at the head of the symphony orchestra have been made.

This settles definitely a question which has been in the air for months. So far as could be in good taste and diplomacy, efforts to retain Dr Muck here for another season have been made. But when the emperor of Germany commands, Boston obeys, at least in such a case as this.

Dr Muck has conducted the orchestra for two seasons, and has won not only the entire enthusiasm of his hearers, but what is more rare, the absolute devotion of his players. There has been admiration by groups for Nikisch, for even iron-ruling Gericke, and for Paur; but nobody has so entirely won the hearts of the Symphony men as a body as the lean, ascetic and scholarly-looking Bavarian. The loss to the concert-going public of this city is at present inestimable, since nobody knows what the next comer will do.

Dr Muck, taking the perfectly-trained machine that Mr Gericke left, said in effect to the men: "If you are artists, you will know what to do with your individual parts; if you are here, it is sufficient evidence that you are artists." And he allowed much more latitude of expression to the players than they had been accustomed to have, with the consequence that the performances have been more highly colored, more vivid, more enjoyable than ever before. A perfect musical scholar, his readings have invariably nevertheless had a distinct individuality.

Dr Muck has conducted two seasons. Mr Ellis went abroad in April, 1906, to find a successor for Mr Gericke. He had a list of some 20 names, but was seriously considering only three men, of whom Dr Muck was one.

It was difficult to secure him; Dr Muck was not at all anxious to leave one of the two most desirable places in Europe to come to this country; money did not count in the problem. He finally said he would come for a year; then followed the difficult task of getting the emperor to grant a leave of absence. Dr Muck had twice before refused to come over.

His success in his first season was so great and so marked that an effort, finally successful only because the emperor was given to understand that the symphony orchestra was not run as a money making proposition, was made to have Dr Muck's leave extended for another year. This year is now nearly finished.

It is understood that the real reason for his recall is that the Berlin opera does not want to be without more than one first-class conductor; it has Richard Strauss, but no other man in Dr Muck's class.

Karl Muck was born in Darmstadt, Oct 22, 1859. After a course at the gymnasium and another at Heidelberg, he studied at Leipzig under Richter and Reinecke. In 1880 he appeared for the first time in public as a pianist at the Gewandhaus, Leipzig. He preferred conducting, in spite of his success as a virtuoso, and began his career at Zurich. He afterward conducted at the opera houses in Calsburg, Bruenn, Graz and in 1886 was appointed to the opera house at Prague. There he remained six years, conducting also the Philharmonic concerts.

He was the leader with Neumann's company in its Russian trip to give performances of the "Ring." In 1892 he was called to the Royal opera at Berlin.

NEGOTIATIONS FAIL TO RETAIN DR. MUCK Jan 23, 1908

Trans.
The Need of Him in Berlin—A Word as to His Work Here—A Canvass of the Field Whence a New Conductor for the Symphony Orchestra Will Be Chosen—Bernhardt as Prince Charming—The Ideal Critic Again—Minor News of the Day

Contrary to hope, and even expectation, the negotiations that were to secure the continuance of Dr. Muck as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra have failed, and late yesterday afternoon the formal announcement was made that he will leave his post at the end of the current season, early next May, and return to Berlin. The management of the orchestra has pursued these negotiations diligently and skillfully with the Intendant of the Royal Opera, but he has been as insistent upon the need of Dr. Muck there as were the spokesmen of the orchestra upon the need of him here. Twice the emperor, who keeps the last word in the important affairs of the State Theatres, has sanctioned Dr. Muck's leave of absence to conduct in Boston—once when Mr. Higginson first sought to engage him, and again in the arrangements for his return for the present musical year. It was a generous courtesy that testified alike to the emperor's regard for the art of music in America, to his pride in the distinguished share that a conductor of the Royal Opera was to have in it, and to his appreciation of the unique position and prestige of the Boston Orchestra. Fairly, after two years of such consideration, he may now weigh the needs of his own opera house. He has found them imperative; but that circumstance will not lessen grateful memory of the good will and interest that made possible Dr. Muck's two years of work in Boston. That Dr. Muck was willing to remain has been an open secret.

That work has long spoken for itself. No conductor that has led the orchestra since its beginnings, has devoted himself more diligently, conscientiously and unselfishly to his task. In all Dr. Muck's stay in Boston, his work has been the occupation and the preoccupation of his life. He has found little time for other interests, though his mind is alert and wide-ranging in many things outside music. He has given as little to diversion. By day and by night he has worked to bring the band and its performances to the standards that he sought. There have been just and reasonable differences of opinion over his choice and arrangement of the music that has made his programmes. There has been increasingly little over the quality of the performance of it.

The two particularly distinguishing traits of that performance have been its vitality of execution and its fullness of sympathetic understanding of the music in hand. Beyond dispute Dr. Muck has brought an elasticity of tone and rhythm, a clearness and vigor of accent, and a communicating ardor into the performances of the orchestra that have been novel and stirring to its audiences. They have raised high the pleasure and the emotion of music that suffices to itself as beautiful or exciting sound. They have carried as high the expression of the poetic and dramatic contents of music that seeks other and more varied ends. Side by side with this vitality that has reanimated many a classic piece and brought many a modern to new life, has stood Dr. Muck's preëminent personal trait—his ability to differentiate the music that he chooses, to give to it its peculiar individuality, to grasp its substance, to feel its spirit and to communicate both as clearly, persuasively and distinctively to his hearers. So he has ranged with unusually equal understanding, sympathy and imparting skill and power, from Mozart and Haydn, through Beethoven and Brahms, to Wagner, Strauss and Debussy. There will be ample opportunity before the end of Dr. Muck's stay here to write of his conducting in more detail. The moment demands, however, just noting of the two traits that have been his distinctions in our line of conductors—this vitality of performance and this imaginative and individualizing understanding.

Once more Mr. Higginson and the management of the orchestra are face to face with the choice and the securing of a new conductor. It may be that so long and steady a tenure as Mr. Gericke's is impossible in these days of the changeable goings and comings of "star conductors." It may even stimulate the interest of the Symphony Concerts and the zest of their audiences that a new conductor should come oftener than he did in the past. On the other hand, any succession of "star conductors", each for a few concerts, is impossible. The number of such conductors is soon exhausted; the appetite for a new sensation that they breed in their hearers soon becomes abnormal and unmusical. It substitutes personalities for music. As the quality and the position of the Boston Orchestra is today, as the standards of its audiences here and elsewhere are, it requires a conductor of signal and acknowledged abilities, in the first rank, or assuredly on the way to it. The number of such is few, and those who seem available are still fewer.

To run briefly, and doubtless with some omissions, through the list, Dr. Richter is firmly established in London and Manchester with concert and opera; and he is an elderly man with no liking for a new career in America. Mr. Wood has rebuilt his orchestra in London, won it a public and prestige, and is absorbed in the continuance of his task. He has the catholicity of view necessary to the conductor of our orchestra, but not quite the finesse of understanding and execution to which its audiences are accustomed. In Paris, Mr. Colonne is too old and too honored a man to begin new ventures; Mr. Marty is committed to the regeneration of the Conservatory Concerts; and Mr. Chevillard is making his place year by year. Moreover, no French conductor, however able, might quite meet the point of view, the standards and the tastes of our public. A Russian would be as doubtful an experiment, and what Russian conductors of fitness are there, except Mr. Safonoff established in New York, and the rising Mlynarski. In Holland, however, Amsterdam has William Mengelberg, the most promising of the younger generation of conductors in Europe and admittedly willing to work for a time in America.

Thus far our conductors have come from Germany or Austria, and from one or the other country the successor to Dr. Muck will probably come. Of the four men there of international celebrity, Mr. Weingartner has just undertaken the direction of the opera at Vienna, Mr. Nikisch goes to and fro in many orchestral concerts and has proposed impossible conditions to every suggestion from any quarter of a return to America; Richard Strauss is now a composer rather than a conductor of any music but his own, and Mr. Mottl is under long contract at the opera at Munich. For the rest, as cursory recollection summons them, Mr. Steinbach, Mr. Fiedler and two or three others are able conductors, but not quite of the distinction the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra should have. The routine of their profession is upon them. They have their pedagogic prepossessions. Of the younger men neither Schleevoigt nor Panzner have fulfilled their promise. Schalk and Schuch are operative conductors and little else, and Siegfried Ochs goes seldom outside choral music. Mahler belongs for three years to the Metropolitan Opera House and is hardly likely "to be subtle." Mr. Gericke has chosen retirement, and so forth and so on. But the resources of Germany, like the resources of diplomacy, are inexhaustible. In some of its cities there should still be, by all the signs of the past, a conductor worthy to follow Mr. Gericke and Dr. Muck or to repeat the youthful achievements of Mr. Nikisch. H. T. P.

ING. JANUARY 27.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

R. Strauss—"Till Eulenspiegel."
Schelling—Fantastic Suite for Piano and Orchestra.
Soloist, Mr. Ernest Schelling.
Chausson—"Viviane," Symphonic Poem.

This was decidedly different from the preceding programme. Everything was modern; after milk and gruel we had pepper and paprika. "Till Eulenspiegel" is in Strauss' best style, it is the quintessence of musical humor and causes the musical jokes of Beethoven (Scherzo of Pastoral Symphony), of Mozart ("A Musical Joke"), of Mendelssohn ("Son and Stranger") and "Midsummer-night's Dream" overture) and Bach ("Coffee Cantata") to pale. Richard Strauss is a humorist on a more gigantic scale. We sometimes think that his "Domestic Symphony" and his mystic utterances about the meaning of his works, are practical jokes played upon the general public.

The mediaeval humor, such as one finds in Rabelais or in Balzac's "Contes Drolatiques," is not always fit for the drawing-room, and we fancy that all of the pranks of the roguish Till could not be presented in Symphony Hall without causing many a blush upon the cheek of many a fair audientress. But the pursuit of the hero by his victims, the ponderous quality of the Philistines whom he mocks, the final capture and execution, can all be easily followed.

The performance was technically excellent. The reading was less equal. Dr. Muck laid especial emphasis upon the pursuit and capture of Till. The thundering accusations and the sneering replies, the final verdict of "Guilty," were dramatically portrayed. The ending was less graphic. Strauss deviates from the old German tale, which allows Till to escape from the hangman. Both Paur and Gericke used to make a very strong point of the final squeak of poor Till, which we missed in this interpretation. But there was enough of excellence in the reading to warrant the continuous applause which followed the close of the work. Especial praise must be given to the horn for the execution of its very difficult figures and also to the clarinette for the way in which the portrayal of Till was presented.

Now followed an American pianist with some striking American music. It is beginning to be demonstrated that America has a folk-song which can be drawn upon for classical composition. Mr. Chadwick showed this long ago (he was the first among the prominent composers to do this) in the Scherzo of his second symphony. Dvorak, of course, gave the chief impulse in this direction, in his "New World" symphony. Henry Schoenefeld, in his "Sunny South" overture (which we ought to have in these concerts) used plantation melodies; and Adolph M. Foerster in his "Dedication March," for orchestra, used "The Old Folks at Home," which

Mr. Schelling employs in the finale of this Suite.

All this is much better than the hopeless quest for a national music to be derived from the vague and totally unfamiliar tunes of the Indians. It is possible that even Puccini will give some surprise in the American folk-song matter, in his new opera, "The Girl of the Golden West," for inquiries were made of the present writer regarding the American music of fifty years ago, with reference to use in this opera. Unfortunately, however, the repertoire is but a small one and its classical use will soon be exhausted.

But one can give the spirit of the southern plantation music without copying absolute melodies, as may be seen in parts of Dvorak's symphony and in the first movement of this Suite by Schelling. The chief theme of this movement, with its many syncopations, was decidedly Southern and was very attractive. The piano was kept too constantly in the foreground, a fault which is not unusual when the composer is himself a solo pianist.

We liked the Scherzo with its trio "a la Musette" (bagpipe drone effects) and its piquancy evidently found favor with the audience. The English horn was prominent in many portions of the work, but never had so characteristic a melody as Dvorak gave to it in the slow movement of his American symphony.

The final movement began with grotesque effects. The nasal tones of the muted brasses (trumpets and horns) were a striking introduction. Then came a great deal of "Dixie," a little of "Old Folks at Home," and still less of "Yankee Doodle." The figure treatment of portions of "Dixie" was very ingenious, and the piquant movement was very exciting.

Since the work is entitled a "Suite" we may not judge it by symphonic or concerto standard. It was certainly clever ("Be good, sweet man, and let who will be clever") but it was not of the calibre of the best works of MacDowell, or Chadwick, or Hadley, or Kelley, or some other native composers whom we could name. We are grateful for the use of the national material, which is a move in the right direction, but we feel that the composition must always win more applause than many a more subtle and highly developed work simply because its appeal to the general public is too plain to be misunderstood.

The pianist played it "con amore," with a heartiness and abandon that was commendable, and he was splendidly seconded by Dr. Muck and the orchestra. It was small wonder that he was called out again and again at the close of his composition. It is certainly a worthy addition to the repertoire, particularly to the native list, but it is apt to be decidedly over-rated.

The concert closed with Chausson's "Viviane." Chausson was one of the modern Frenchmen who believed in musical beauty. Two of the best men of the modern French musical school died too young to exert their full influence in turning the tide from the bitterness of D'Indy and the vagueness of Debussy. Regarding Chausson and Bizet one can slightly alter the words of Wordsworth and say:—

"The good die first,
But they whose scores are dry as Summer's dust,
Burn to the socket."

Had these two men lived they might have made a real French school of composition that would have been less strained and eccentric than most of it is at present. There is a resemblance in "Viviane" to some of the Wagnerian scores. If we remove the hood of Viviane we find our charming but over-curious friend Elsa of Brabant. But the resemblance does not amount to anything like plagiarism; it is only a composer following the best model of his time instead of seeking out thorny and inaccessible paths on his own account. Chausson would have diverged from this high road had he lived, but it is safe to say that he would never have become ugly in his music. Louis C. Elson.

To the Listener—Do we who attend The Symphony really enjoy it?

With all honor to those who have given us Symphony Hall, may we not look forward to the day when for world weary people the Symphony Concert may not be another source of nervous strain.

We go on from the rush of modern life into a hall of ivory whiteness and gilt, all too generously illuminated by electricity. We crowd ourselves into stiff close seats, conscious that we must keep our elbows to ourselves, we gaze up through the glare at vibrating violin bows and glinting horns, and later listen through the rustle of early preparations for departure. And all of this comes between us and the precious music.

How good it will be, how beautiful when the day arrives in which we may listen to this great concert under better conditions. Seated in spacious chairs half or wholly reclining, under modulated lights, with an orchestra which after its welcome shall be concealed from view, and with an audience so devoted to music as to waste fifteen minutes after the music is quite finished in dressing for the street.

Then shall music have its unhindered appeal to the inner vision and consciousness, and fulfil its mission of recreation, culture, inspiration and joy. M. E. W.

EDITED BY OLIN DOWNES

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The programme of the thirteenth public rehearsal and concert of our Symphony orchestra was as follows: "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," R. Strauss; "Fantastic Suite" for piano and orchestra, Schelling; symphonic poem, "Viviane," Chausson. Mr. Ernest Schelling was pianist in the performance of his own suite, which was given for the first time in America on this occasion.

Many extensive and detailed explanations of Strauss' epoch-making rondo have been published by admiring commentators, a proceeding hardly essential, and, indeed, rather harmful than otherwise. Strauss deals with universal types, with basic truths. Let the music, with its laughter and tears, its pity and mockery, its passionate commentary on all things that are, speak for itself.

The "Till Eulenspiegel" is frequently spoken of as a masterpiece of rarest humor. It is all that, and more. The music does not arouse unadulterated merriment; there is more of the grave than the gay in these wanton measures; the note of destiny is sounded; with terrible persistency and ever growing menace it dodges the Rogue's footsteps to the end. Using marvellously subtle but strong touches, the composer tells the tale. As he proceeds you insensibly, but none the less deeply, become more and more impressed with the moral that underlies this diverting rillery. The epilogue, in almost Mozartean strains of infinite tenderness, says: "So it was, in the fable I have told you. My story is ended." Was this in earnest? You smile at the thought of some musical drollery, but the smile fades; you have been set a-thinking.

Now this the music means to me; it may suggest entirely different things to you, but at any rate let not a circumstantial programme come between the composer and those he endeavors to reach by his art. An immortal book should not be illustrated; it is sad that Strauss, a profound philosopher and generalizer, should be subjected to such injury.

The performance, finished to the utmost in every detail, was of unusual excellence in many ways. If memory serves, there was not, at least on Friday afternoon, the peppery vigor about the opening section that made the music so gripping when the composer directed it in this city in 1904. Dr. Muck conducted with a sure and dexterous hand, with a subtlety and finesse that came, at the beginning, dangerously near to dissection. By this means, however, every phrase became very significant and suggestive, no point was lost, the evolution of the musical thought became surpassingly clear and apparent, the fateful climax was extremely poignant and telling.

Mr. Schelling's suite was written in 1905-6, orchestrated in 1907 and given its first performance, the composer being pianist, under Mengelberg at the Konzerthof, Amsterdam, Oct. 10, 1907. Just why Mr. Schelling chose to call his composition a suite, for to all practical intents and purposes the work, in four movements, follows freely the classic sonata form, is rather a mystery, though we must take into consideration the fact that the mere title of "symphony" is considered a thing of contumely in these days. Did the character of his music influence Mr. Schelling? He has written strains that are, in places, of a poetic, fanciful—in a weird mood one might even say "fantastical"—nature, though to the cool-headed the title may seem unnecessary and far-fetched. But it is not forbidden a symphony to be fantastical.

We are not to forget that Mr. Schelling is an American. The finale of this suite is entitled "Virginia Reel," and the themes are "Dixie," "Old Folks at Home," "Yankee Doodle" and an original theme. It is not the first time that such fantasies have been committed. A very popular one of recent days was a combination "Yankee Doodle" and "The Star Spangled Banner," and this fantasia may still be heard, now and then, brilliantly performed at the vaudeville theatre.

The first movement of Mr. Schelling's suite has an opening theme of somewhat Hungarian character. The episodes and the second theme are duly stated. These themes are respectfully and fluently handled. The scoring is interesting and the piano has a very brilliant part throughout. The second section is graceful and pleasing in its rhythms and melodies, and there is a charming passage for the English horn in the trio. The intermezzo speaks in idyllic vein.

The composition is agreeably, often ingeniously instrumentated, and it is written throughout in a symphonic, orchestral style, despite a very brilliant and difficult piano part. At first hearing, Mr. Schelling appears to have written music which, while always refined and in some passages truly imaginative, is not remarkably potential or extremely individual. This composer is a young man, and he already expresses himself in an interesting way. Doubtless, in the course of his future development, he will give us many works of still more interest and durability than the "Fantastic Suite."

A man of dreams and introspection, Chausson could hardly have chosen a subject more likely to enkindle his imagination than the legend of Merlin and Vivian. "Vivian" was given its first and only other performance in Boston in 1902. It is to be hoped that such another long interval will not elapse before it is repeated. There is another world, a world into which Chausson readily and gladly escaped; and in the forest of Brocelande there was only bliss supreme and eternal. Hence this music of radiant visions and ineffable tenderness; music that is permeated in every measure with an essence as fragile, exquisite, completely conquering, as the compelling spells that Viviane wove over the enraptured Merlin, and these qualities in the music were enhanced by a performance of marvellous delicacy and tonal beauty.

There will be no rehearsal and concert next week.

Dr. Muck at the close of the Symphony season will return immediately to Berlin, there to resume his duties at the Royal Opera. In June the conductor will proceed to Bayreuth to conduct performances of "Parsifal."

The question of Dr. Muck's successor lays a difficult problem before the management of the Symphony orchestra, for the number of men among whom a choice may be made is not legion. Of the previous conductors that have served here there is only one, Mr. Gericke having gone into retirement, at all eligible for consideration. That is Nikisch, who was here from 1889 to 1893, and Mr. Nikisch is well known to be extremely kittenish on all matters relating to engagements. Moreover, he is a poor drillmaster, and it is remembered that the technical standard of the orchestra was materially lowered during his regime.

Under later conductors, especially Mr. Gericke, our orchestra developed that superb finish and virtuosity which placed it second to no other such organization in the world today. When Dr. Muck arrived in this city in 1906, he found, not an ensemble of some hundred musicians awaiting him, but a wonderfully sensitive and well-nigh perfect instrument to be played upon. As we all know, the doctor proved a very capable performer, the men, meanwhile, rejoicing in comparative immunity from the extra rehearsals which were the rule rather than the exception under Mr. Gericke. This year, however, in addition to materially altering the personnel of the band, Dr. Muck has become the most industrious and implacable of drillmasters. The proficiency of the orchestra is now at another high water mark.

Who can carry on the work? The rare man must be master of routine. Also, with the qualities of a hard and tireless worker, he must unite the broadest scholarship, the faculty of bringing himself into sympathy with music of all schools and periods, and a magnetic, inspiring personality. That is demanding a very great deal, out the Symphony audiences of today are not the audiences of 20 years ago, and they would hardly be satisfied with less. Our critical appreciation and wide acquaintance with every variety of orchestral literature has been the astonishment of every great musician who has visited us of late years. Dr. Muck has found it difficult to meet the widely inclusive demands of his auditors.

The field from which to choose is small. The majority of the great conductors of today, such as Dr. Hans Richter and Mr. Henry Wood in London, or Mr. Mottel in Vienna, are firmly established in European cities. They are practically out of the question. Dr. Richard Strauss, who made a furore when he conducted his own compositions in this city in 1904, is a law unto himself. He chiefly appears as a conductor of his own compositions, and it is a painful fact that he values America chiefly for its gold—that he does not especially relish our artistic atmosphere.

Felix Weingartner made a sensation in this city when he conducted a colossal performance of Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique" two years ago. He is a virtuoso conductor of the very highest rank, but is now engaged at the Vienna Opera, and it is questionable after all whether what we want is a "star" conductor.

There is Gustav Mahler, now of the Metropolitan grand opera company of New York. Mr. Mahler would be a treasure-trove. He expressed his artistic principles with commendable force and earnestness a short time ago, having been accused of nonconformance with tradition. "Tradition," said Mahler, "means sloth!"

a musical decoration of importance which will go down in the history of the art. That is the sort of man we need and desire, but Mr. Mahler, unfortunately, is likely to be engaged for some time to come with the opera company.

Mengelberg of Amsterdam, a young man, is making a stir in the musical world. He is reputed to be a leader of indisputable talent and industry, and a man of the highest ideals.

Steinbach of Cologne is said to have been once approached on the subject.

This may be so, but it is unlikely that Steinbach will be approached again. Schievoigt, if we may believe the musical journals, is a man of parts. There are a number of lesser lights who have displayed fine abilities, but whether they are of sufficient weight to take place at the head of our orchestra is very debatable. And all this amounts merely to discussion. The question is as yet entirely unsolved. Who will it be?

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XIV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 8, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

CHADWICK,

SYMPHONIC SKETCHES. SUITE for ORCHESTRA

I. Jubilee.

II. Noël.

III. Hobgoblin.

IV. A Vagrom Ballad.

(First time at these concerts.)

GLUCK,

RECITATIVE, "Wretched one, what have I done?" and ARIA, "I have lost my Eurydice." from "Orpheus and Eurydice."

SAINT-SAËNS,

"My Heart at thy Dear Voice," from "Samson and Delilah."

GOLDMARK,

OVERTURE, "In the Spring," op. 36.

Soloist:

Miss JEANNE GERVILLE-RÉACHE.

166
a musical Declaration of Independence which will go down in the history of the art. That is the sort of man we need and desire, but Mr. Mahler, unfortunately, is likely to be engaged for some time to come with the opera company.

Mengelberg of Amsterdam, a young man, is making a stir in the musical world. He is reputed to be a leader of indisputable talent and industry, and a man of the highest ideals.

Steinbach of Cologne is said to have been once approached on the subject.

This may be so, but it is unlikely that Steinbach will be approached again.

Schlevoight, if we may believe the musical journals, is a man of parts. There are a number of lesser lights who have displayed fine abilities, but whether they are of sufficient weight to take place at the head of our orchestra is very debatable. And all this amounts merely to discussion. The question is as yet entirely unsolved. Who will it be?

167
Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XIV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 8, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

CHADWICK,

SYMPHONIC SKETCHES. SUITE for ORCHESTRA

- I. Jubilee.
- II. Noël.
- III. Hobgoblin.
- IV. A Vagrom Ballad.

(First time at these concerts.)

GLUCK,

RECITATIVE, "Wretched one, what have I done?"
and ARIA, "I have lost my Eurydice." from "Orpheus and Eurydice."

SAINT-SAËNS,

"My Heart at thy Dear Voice," from "Samson and Delilah."

GOLDMARK,

OVERTURE, "In the Spring," op. 36.

Soloist:

Miss JEANNE GERVILLE-RÉACHE.

KARL MUCK BANQUET GUEST

KARL MUCK GUEST OF HARVARD MEN

Deutscher Verein Gives Dinner in His Honor—Prominent Men Speak.

Herald Feb. 4, 1908
Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was the guest of honor last night at a dinner given by the Deutscher Verein of Harvard in the trophy room of the Harvard Union. President Hanfstaengl of the Deutscher Verein presided.

The speakers were President Elliot, Prof. Muensterberg, Maj. Higginson and Prof. Spaulding.

Dr. Muck did not speak, but Maj. Higginson responded for him to the tribute paid by President Hanfstaengl as he arose and proposed his health.

Prof. Muensterberg said in part: "New England represents Puritan idealism, idealism with a little aestheticism. It is the object of the Germans in this country to introduce aestheticism, especially with harmony and music. Americans must be gratified by Dr. Muck's services in this respect."

Maj. Higginson in responding for Dr.

Muck said in part: "To me 'getting in with' a conductor of an orchestra is like finding the right road to heaven. The German Emperor has lent us this gentleman for a year. Last year I again asked for this favor and got a kind reply. This year I am ashamed to repeat the request. The Emperor of Germany has been very kind to him, and very kind to us. Neither he nor we feel it right to ask for more."

President Elliot was the last speaker.

Journal Feb. 4, 1908
As a tribute to his work in Boston, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was given a farewell dinner by the Deutscher Verein Society of Harvard last evening in the trophy room of the Harvard Union. The tribute was essentially a Harvard affair and was attended by seventy-five members and guests. After the dinner the Verein held a German "kneipe," to which all members of the university were invited.

The speakers were President Elliot, Dr. Muck, Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, Professor Muensterberg and Professor Spaulding. The speakers were introduced by E. F. Hanfstaengl, '09.

Prominent Guests.

Among the guests were: Walter Damrosch of New York, Arthur Foote, the noted composer; Professor Spaulding of the music department of Harvard University, Frederick Connors, the composer; the German Consul Reincke, Owen Wister and Messrs. Gebhard and Ganz, the well known pianists of this city.

Professor Hugo Munsterburg, in his address in German, said: "New England represents Puritan idealism—idealism with a little aestheticism. It is the object of the Germans in this country to introduce aestheticism, especially with harmony and music. Music in its deepest sense and truth, is truth, and truth must be alive. If it is the purpose of the Germans in this country to introduce aestheticism Americans must be gratified by Dr. Muck's services in this respect."

Higginson's Tribute.

Maj. Higginson in responding for Dr. Muck, said: "Four years ago I met Dr. Muck in Berlin playing 'The White Lady' before an audience which appreciated good old-fashioned music. Later he conducted 'Lohengrin' before a different class of men. To me 'getting in with' a conductor of an orchestra is like finding the right road to heaven. The German Emperor has lent us this gentleman for a year. Last year I again asked for this favor and got a kind reply. This year I am ashamed to repeat the request. The Emperor of Germany has been very kind to him, and very kind to us. Neither he nor we feel it right to ask for more."

"Dr. Muck has not only satisfied us here, but also educated us. We would like to be sure that this is not 'Lebe Vohl,' but 'Auf Wiedersehn.' We can only be grateful on our part as he has asked me to say that he is on his part."

Finest of Arts.

President Elliot was the last speaker, and he began very modestly. "I know nothing," he said, "about music. I am sorry to say that in this respect my education has been neglected. But music has this advantage that it speaks a universal language, it responds to the whole gamut of human affections. It excites the gayest of emotions with also the most pathetic. And the martial tones, how stimulating they are to our courage."

"Music is the finest of arts to me. Consider its range of expression. It needs also such adequate skill in the man who expresses the sentiments of the music. What a debt we owe to Germany in this respect. And no one has given us a more admirable expression of his native art than Dr. Muck. The highest reward to any profession is that which a great composer wins. There is nothing like it in the world. He has a line of great disciples and a line of great interpreters like Dr. Muck."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The programme of the 14th Symphony public rehearsal and concert was as follows: Feb. 7, 9, 10, 11

Symphonic Sketches: Suite for orchestra, George W. Chadwick; Recitative, "Wretched One, What Have I Done?" and Aria, "I have lost my Eurydice," from "Orpheus and Eurydice," Gluck; "My Heart at Thy Dear Voice," from "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; overture, "In the Spring," Goldmark.

Mr. Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches" are four in number. Each section has a motto, and bears a title: I. "Jubilee"; II. "Noel," III. "Hobgoblin," IV. "A Vagrom Ballad." The dates of the composition of the different numbers cover a period of nine years. The "Jubilee" and "Noel" were composed in 1895, "A Vagrom Ballad" in 1896; "Hobgoblin" was completed in 1904. These pieces are conceived in a manner which justifies the performance either of separate sections or the entire suite, and some of the movements have been performed a number of times in New England.

The "Noel" was given at the 46th Worcester festival; the "Jubilee" and "A Vagrom Ballad" were performed for the first time in Boston, the composer conducting, at a Chickering production concert in 1904. The "Jubilee," "Noel" and "Vagrom Ballad" have been given by the Boston Festival Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Emil Mollenhauer. The "Symphonic Sketches" were published in their present form in 1907, and they are dedicated to Frederick Shepard Converse.

The title, "Symphonic Sketches," is a happy one, for, while these pieces are written with a certain amount of freedom as regards formal structure, they are conceived in a symphonic style. Mr. Chadwick has in no wise set out to be "programmatical." He has adapted titles and mottoes for each of his four pieces which are suggestive and intended to awaken the imagination; which, however, while allowing free scope for the fantasy of composer and auditor, do not impose strict adherence to any fixed plot or plan. This, indeed, seems always to have been Mr. Chadwick's attitude. Himself a modern, well abreast of the times, and attentive to the tendencies of the day, he is nevertheless mindful of the fact that the potency of music must come from a source within, not outside, the art. It would require but a little stretching to change the titles of these pieces to "Allegro," "Andante," "Scherzo," "Finale."

The first sketch bears these lines as a motto: "No cool gray tones for me! Give me the warmest red and green, a cornet and a tambourine, to paint my jubilee! For, when pale flutes and oboes play, to sadness I become a prey; give me the violets and the May, but no gray skies for me!"

And yet, Mr. Chadwick has made very felicitous use of both the flute and oboe, to say nothing of the cornet and tambourine! As the title implies, the music of this movement is brilliant and festive, if not of the "warmest red and green." It is effective, and there are many beautiful pages. The lyric melody, which is contrasted with the strong opening phrases, is very pleasing. Possibly there are passages where one meets with more counterpoint than is actually required.

It is in the slow movement Noel: ("On such a night the virgin mother mild. In dreamless slumber wrapped the holy child. While angel hosts were listening.")

In the writer's estimation, that the composer has achieved his happiest expression. The musical thought is finely sustained; there is genuineness of sentiment, such as we too rarely feel in the music of today; the scoring is most felicitous and in happy accord with the spirit of the measures. A beautiful color, and true atmosphere are obtained in the opening pages of this movement, by giving the theme to the wind instruments over the sustained accompaniment of the strings. Especial mention should be made of the manner in which the wind players performed their grateful tasks, and the concertmeister's excellent playing of his solo later in the movement.

The "Hobgoblin" is a fine instance of the genial humor so characteristic of Mr. Chadwick as a man and composer, and this is a quality which composers of the land of Mark Twain, Josh Billings, Artemus Ward, and other of their ilk, should surely possess, though few, alas, appear to do so. A hint to the young American composers, the gentlemen who feel such deep apprehension concerning the musical future of our great and glorious country. Do not take yourselves too seriously. Let your wits flow, gentlemen! Write a "Hobgoblin" or two, if you can, and you will add inches to your artistic stature. There is real humor in this movement and parts of the succeeding "Vagrom Ballad," "a tale of tramps and railway ties, of old clay pipes and rum, of broken heads and blackened eyes and the '30 days' to come."

It is all very well to fire off this music, with its tramps' slogan, its trumpet fanfares, its tingling instrumental devices, and lay it to the account of the "Vagrom Ballad"; but, we strongly suspect, in view of that irreverent quotation, by the zylophone, from the Bach G minor organ fugue, and some other little touches, that Mr. Chadwick had also in mind certain escapades of the student days in Leipzig with Dr. Muck and other boon companions of the period. He certainly tells an exciting story in a breezy, pungent style. Toward the end there are pages of a graver character than what has gone before. Is this the thought of "the 30 days to come?" The concluding measures of outrageous exhilaration seem to scout the idea. Mr. Chadwick in this work has written music truly representative of himself, music that is infused with personality. There was high enthusiasm at the conclusion of the performance. The composer finally rose to his feet and bowed his acknowledgments.

Miss Gerville-Reache, who made her first appearance at these concerts, was a highly anticipated visitor. Her voice is a rich, heavy contralto, and its quality reminds somewhat of Mme. Louise Homer's, though her organ is not as well developed as the latter lady's. Miss Gerville-Reache, it appears, made her debut in "Orpheus and Eurydice" at the Opera Comique in Paris, 1899, yet she was hardly at her best on Friday afternoon in the sustained, classic style of the old aria, and she was far more successful in the singing of the familiar Saint-Saens aria, where her sumptuous voice and evident enthusiasm for the music won her several recalls.

Goldmark's overture retains its freshness and unfading charm, and the glowing beauty of the music causes the work to occupy a place entirely its own among the more exotic creations that one immediately associates with the name of the composer. It was given a lusty, though rather episodic, performance.

FOR SALE

ONE SYMPHONY CONCERT TICKET—Central. Address W.N.N., Boston Transcript. 5t(A): fe 15

A SYMPHONY REHEARSAL TICKET FOR SALE—Centre floor; price now $50. Address K.J.M., Boston Transcript. 5t(A): fe 15

SYMPHONY CONCERTS—For Sale two Season Tickets together, for nine remaining weekly concerts; floor; choicest location; each $24. Address D.R.H., Boston Transcript. 4t(A): fe 21

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS—For Sale, one Season Ticket for nine remaining Friday afternoons; choice location; $30. Address E.D.A., Boston Transcript. 4t(A): fe 21

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES 14TH CONCERT

"A Vagrom Ballad" of Chadwick's Suite Played for First Time in Boston.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, gave its 14th concert last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Symphonic Sketches, a suite.....Chadwick
"I Have Lost My Eurydice".....Gluck
"My Heart to Thy Dear Voice".....Saint-Saens
Overture—"In Spring".....Goldmark

Mr. Chadwick's suite, "Symphonic Sketches," is in four movements: "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin"—with reference to the mischievous Puck; "A Vagrom Ballad." The suite was played for the first time at these concerts. "Jubilee," "Noel" and "A Vagrom Ballad" were composed in 1895-6; "Hobgoblin" is of a later date—1904. At least three of these pieces have been played in Boston, and they were then applauded.

There were some that objected to the Finale of Mr. Schelling's Suite a fortnight ago because, forsooth, the chief motive of the finale, a Virginia reel, is "Dixie," and the Symphony orchestra should not play "Dixie," an undignified tune, at a symphony concert.

Rollicking finales with tunes more trivial by Haydn may be performed; little dances with sleigh bells and a posthorn by Mozart may be performed; for Haydn and Mozart are dead and reckoned among the great. Their unbuttoning may be excused or even praised. A contemporary composer must always be smug and dignified, with a double breasted frock coat, choker, chaste and approved cravat. He may have nothing to say but formulas and platitudes; he may not have a spark of originality; he may be ponderous and dull; all will be forgiven him, provided he be eminently respectable in symphony, suite, overture, sonata.

What will the stanch admirers of the conventional, the sticklers for "dignity," say to Mr. Chadwick's "Vagrom Ballad" with its motto:

A tale of tramps and railway ties,
Of old clay pipes and rum,
Of broken heads and blackened eyes,
And the "thirty days" to come:

What, pray, will they say to this?

I single out this ballad, for it is the most original, the strongest, the most imaginative and the most characteristic movement of the four.

Sentiment Pleases Many.

The "Jubilee" and the "Noel" have those qualities that make for immediate popularity. The former, with its pleasing suggestion of the double shuffle, its opening burst of joyous recklessness and "whoop-her-up-again-boys" spirit is marred, to my mind, by the length of a section that is sentimental in the male-quartet-on-the-old-plantation manner, yet it must be confessed that this sentiment pleases the many, and it no doubt has its place in a work that does not prescribe to itself too preposterously and is written frankly to entertain.

The "Noel" is a euphonious nocturne. The "Hobgoblin" scherzo is well made and it has a certain humor in keeping with the Shakespearian motto—the reference to Robin Goodfellow or Puck. But in the "Vagrom Ballad" there is the revelation of marked individuality. Here, the thought as well as the style is the man. There is a picturesque grimness in the music; there is the musical portraiture of a typical character.

Here is true imagination and of an uncommon quality. The movement is a capital musical jest, but it is much more than that: It is the work of a thoroughly equipped musician.

Neither the modern composer nor the modern hearer should wish always to be in "Ercles' vein," nor should either one long to associate, as far as musical enjoyment is concerned, only with Manfred and the melancholy husband of Mrs. Haller. Centuries ago Athenaeus suggested that the purpose of music, especially in banquet halls, is this: "It softens moroseness of temper; for it dissipates sadness and produces affability and a sort of gentlemanlike joy." We have all gone to the other extreme; to us music is now associated with the spread and enlargement of gloom and with the attempt to solve the problems of the universe.

It is a good thing to hear occasionally music that is entertaining; music that by frankness of melody, by force of rhythm, and by the expression of animal spirits cheers and enlivens. Nor should it be forgotten that in this same "Vagrom Ballad" there is a section near the close full of mystery and wailing. Whether this section had in the composer's mind a burlesque significance, whether it pictures the woe of the tramp sentenced to "30 days," is immaterial. The music is here highly original and effective.

The audience appreciated warmly the suite, and Mr. Chadwick was twice called on to bow in thanks. The performance was an excellent one, though there is a question whether the sentimental nature of a portion of the first movement was not overemphasized.

Manhattan Star Heard.

Miss Gerville-Reache of the Manhattan Opera House sang for the first time at these concerts. She sang here some weeks ago at one of Mrs. McAllister's morning concerts, and then made a favorable impression. It was her intention to sing last night the music of Dido's death scene in Berlioz's "Trojans at Carthage." Inability to procure the orchestral parts prevented the performance.

She gave a superb interpretation of Delilah's air of seduction. Her voice is unusual in color, richness, compass. It is a glorious organ for the display of passion, with tones of irresistible appeal. In this aria she sang with a fine appreciation of the melodic line; with phrases that were now as caressing velvet and now as a steady and consuming flame; with dignity in her sensuous entreaty, for the woman that dwelt in the valley of Sorek was no ordinary wanton.

172

Seldom if ever has this one great melody of Saint-Saëns been sung here with such beauty and wealth of tone, with such compelling charm of diction.

She was less successful in the song of Orpheus, which is largely dependent on the situation and the action for its due effect. Count the performances you have heard in concert: how many have moved you? Technically Miss Gerville-Reache's performance of this aria was inferior to that of Delilah's air.

The phrasing was too often broken without sufficient reason; the attack was not always precise. Furthermore, the opening section was taken at too slow a pace, and other passages were dragged. Nor was the diction always impressive. The first section gains when it is sung with suppressed agony, with the suggestion of Orpheus stunned and almost mute. As Miss Gerville-Reache conceived the aria, there was no one and great climax. Yet in this song there were thrilling moments, and there was the sight of a passionately eloquent singer, not a singing machine.

CHADWICK NIGHT AT REGULAR SYMPHONY

Boston furnished the most interesting feature of Saturday night's Symphony concert in the shape of George W. Chadwick's "Symphony Sketches," played here for the first time. The sketches are entitled "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin" and "A Vagrom Ballad." The first two were composed in 1895, "A Vagrom Ballad" the following year, and "Hobgoblin" in 1904. As a whole they show Mr. Chadwick at his best.

Except for "Noel," whose melancholy beauty might fit other scenes and seasons than those mentioned in the program, there was hardly any need of description, moods and adventures were so skilfully and happily reflected in the music. It was more than tunes cleverly prepared for orchestra; it was a fine expression of humanity in varying aspects. Dr. Muck and the orchestra entered admirably into the spirit of the little pieces and the effect was delightful. The audience applauded until Mr. Chadwick had twice bowed his acknowledgments.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Jeanne Gerville-Reache, one of the contraltos of the Manhattan Opera Company, who sang airs from Gluck's "Orpheus and Eurydice" and Saint-Saëns' "Samson and Delilah." There was also much applause over these numbers. The concert ended with a fine performance of Goldmark's beautiful "Spring" overture.

This week's program consists altogether of new works—Reger's "Variations on a Theme by J. A. Hiller," Schjelderups "Two Pieces for Orchestra," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice."

MUSICAL Globe 7-9-08 MATTERS

Chadwick Suite Played at the Symphony.

Pension Fund Concert Tonight of Much Interest.

Cecilia's Performance of "Job"—Other Concerts.

Prof G. W. Chadwick's suite for orchestra opened the 14th Symphony program, the work being played for the first time at these concerts. The soloist was Mrs Gerville-Reache, a young contralto from the Manhattan opera house in New York, who sang excerpts from Gluck's "Orpheus and Eurydice" and Saint-Saëns' opera "Samson and Delilah." Goldmark's "Spring" overture closed the program, which was unusually short.

The symphonic sketches by Prof Chadwick are in four parts, three of which have been played in this city by other orchestras, and the musical character of each movement was suggested by various sentiments expressed in verse. "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin" and "A Vagrom Ballad" are the titles, and each one is treated in a manner to illustrate in instrumentation the chosen subject. In every instance Prof Chadwick has developed his ideas skilfully, and although utilizing modern methods and expressing the motifs by a modern orchestra, he is lucid and melodic in his forms, and his music is good to hear, for it is music that the average ear finds pleasing.

Skilled in scoring for orchestra and naturally a musician of original ideas, he has composed four little works that are valuable additions to musical literature. There is a deal of the "American" in the "Jubilee" part, with its strong rhythms and real tunes. The theme upon which "Noel" is based is plaintive in character, effective and very cleverly worked out.

In the "Hobgoblin" section the composer fairly reveled in quaint, intermittent and oddity accentuated bits of orchestration, suggesting Strauss at times, yet keeping well within bounds and avoiding too much of the discordant. And in this will-o'-the-wisp music the orchestra appeared as effective as in the gentler and more connected score of the previous number.

The moanings of the clarinet and xylophone and the contrasts in a tramp's life on the road as set to music in "A Vagrom Ballad" were very amusing, the story being told in musical pictures that vividly exemplified the text. The suite is so thoroughly enjoyable that it should become one of the lighter "stand-bys" of the orchestra. The audience expressed great delight at the spirited performance of this admirable work.

Miss Gerville-Reache has an excellent contralto, sepulchral in its lower register and generally pleasing in quality, though somewhat unwieldy at present. Inclined to be dramatic, the singer was hardly at ease on the concert stage and she was inclined to exaggerate sentiment, to forget that she was for the time being merely the singer. As a whole her work was very satisfactory and liberal applause was her reward after each selection.

Goldmark's dainty "Spring" overture was given with all the requisite grace and beauty of contrasts.

There will be four novelties on this week's program. Max Reger's variations on a theme by J. A. Hiller opens the list, then comes two pieces by G. Schjelderup, a Scandinavian composer. The closing number is Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice," a work that roused Tschalkowsky's enthusiasm and which Dr Muck has said is one of the most wonderful pieces of orchestral work he knows anything about.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

An Unusually Interesting Afternoon with a Light Programme, Mme. Gerville-Reache for a Novel Singer, Goldmark's "Spring" Overture for Orchestral Virtuosity, and Mr. Chadwick at His Freest and Strongest in His "Symphonic Sketches"

Trans. Feb. 8, 1908
The singing of Miss Gerville-Reache of the Manhattan Opera House was the unusual incident of the Symphony Concert of yesterday; the playing of Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," brought one more proof of the high pitch of virtuosity, tonal brightness and expressive eloquence to which Dr. Muck has brought the orchestra; while the incisive and abiding impression of the afternoon lay in Mr. Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," performed as a whole for the first time hereabouts. As symphony concerts go, here and elsewhere, the programme was short and light, the music easy to understand and feel, and the singer novel. The audience took its pleasure accordingly, and testified to it with applause that recalled Dr. Muck and Miss Gerville-Reache impartially and that sought to discover Mr. Chadwick at the end of the "Sketches."

173
Miss Gerville-Reache is a singing actress, once of the Opéra Comique in Paris, again of La Monnaie at Brussels, and at present of Mr. Hammerstein's company in New York. By every sign of yesterday, she has sung but little outside the theatre, and, impulsively and almost unconsciously, she brought to the concert-room some of the methods and the means of opera. It is an old story that the custom of the concert-hall denies play of face and gesture to the operatic singer when she steps out of character and costume to stand before an orchestra or beside a piano. It is a custom, however, by which English-speaking audiences set more store than do the Latin publics to which Miss Gerville-Reache has oftenest sang. She had not gone far yesterday in Orpheus's "I Have Lost My Eurydice," out of Gluck's opera, before the histrionic impulse began to rise in her. Her hands began to stir; her face to darken and lighten. She could not, by temperament or by practice, act only with her tones in the restrained fashion of the concert-room. The singing-actress would out, and in the air from Saint-Saëns's "Samson and Delilah"—the familiar "My Heart at Thy Dear Voice"—she gave herself rein. Her arms rose and fell expressively with the long sweeps of the music; her hands clasped and unclasped with its changing moods, her body began to stir with its rapturous and beguiling ecstasy. There was, indeed, no other way. The sensuous glow, the sheer intoxication of the music had possessed the singer and was possessing her audience. Perforce she brought all her powers to it.

A penny for the purists that say these things are unseemly in the concert-room. It is not a dry place, a cold place, an un-human place. It ought to be very warm, very vital and very human, a place for emotion, expressive, responsive. It was so when Miss Gerville-Reache's voice was as the voice of Delilah and of Saint-Saëns's music charming Samson to her arms, and it was good to be within it. Yet, in a sense the singer little needed the aid of gesture and facial play. It is easy to quarrel with some of the vocal ways of Miss Gerville-Reache, with her insistent reaching for her higher tones in Orpheus's air, for example, and her occasional blurring of its pure and clear melodic line. So she has been taught, and so she practices, and the simplicity of Gluck's music and the loveliness of its edgeless phrases are evasive. They ask the eloquence of a perfect and serene vocal artist, and that comes not nowadays out of the Opéra-Comique. But in Delilah's air, the warmth, the richness, the dark and vibrating color, the expressive quality of the singer's voice had fuller and more certain play. She held the sustained and mounting curve of Saint-Saëns's music, and she gave each phrase its glowing and gathering en-ticement.

Goldmark's overture of the spring is almost twenty years old, but it bears time

lightly and remains even now a pretty piece of orchestral fancy and orchestral virtuosity. For once Goldmark has forgotten his Amazon queen, his Hindoo king, Briseis in Achilles's tent, old Merlin in young Vivien's clasping arms, his dreams of the Orient, his voices of legend. He has gone out into the hills and woods and valleys about Vienna, to see, hear and feel the spring. It is a mood that he courts seldom and a mood that curiously he tried to recall only two months ago—and at seventy-eight—in his music for Florizel and Perdita in his new opera of "The Winter's Tale." Yet the spring brought no such frank, pulsing and ecstatic song to Goldmark as it did to Schumann in his rich-voiced symphony of a new earth, air and life. Schumann was not an orchestral virtuoso, and it would have been better for the expression of his own imaginings and for the lasting effect of his symphonic music had he been a clearer and freer master of instrumental expression. Goldmark is an orchestral virtuoso, and by instinct and practice he cannot forget it. Thus his overture of springtime goes its twofold way. It is warm and bright with the moods and fancies that stirred in him, with the frank joy and the soft song to which they woke him. Idealized birds twitter, idealized leaves rustle, or the sky darkens and the wind turns cold, for spring in the Vienna woods is fitful. But the birds must twitter in virtuoso passages for the wood-winds, the joy of the spring must flash through changeable tonalities; the orchestra must be put to its mettle and lead to brilliant and sonorous climax. Such music easily invites the new voice of our orchestra. The overture went brightly, warmly, changeably, as a frank and joyous rhapsody of, and for, the spring; and it went as well as a nearly perfect piece of orchestral virtuosity in tonal beauty and balance, in clear rhythm and clear articulation, in flowing phrase on phrase and in the vital vigor to which Dr. Muck whipped the climax. Heretofore our audiences have hardly known this pitch of Goldmark's vernal eloquence.

Mr. Chadwick composes best when the end he is seeking sits not too heavily upon him. He spurs himself to the writing of a tone-poem about Cleopatra and her Antony, and there is no hiding his effort. He undertakes a choral ode for a Columbian exhibition, and he takes frequent thought of the magnitude of his purpose. The muses whom he would sing have not been always too quick to answer his call. In his symphonies, he is conscious of the weight of precedent and example behind. By many a sign he has taken the four "Symphonic Sketches" that really make an orchestral suite, less seriously and more lightly and come with them into his truest, most interesting and most stirring self. The Chadwick of the "Jubilee" that begins them

No cool gray tones for me!
Give me the warmest red and green,
A cornet and a tambourine,
To paint my jubilee!

is good to hear for the warmth of inven-

tion, the vigor of expression, the free air and quick spring, the sheer physical, mental and musical high spirits that pervade it. He shouts orchestrally because he cannot help it; he sings orchestrally because he help it, and the shout and the song are American through and through. Then—for he is following the formal moods of a symphony—he turns to the soft, caressing, longing nocturne of the cradle song that he calls "Noel," and that he points with a poet's verse about the Virgin Mother and her Holy Babe. But like many a modern in the arts—Dagnan-Bouveret in painting, for example—it is the everlasting human love and yearning of father and mother for their own child of earth that he is singing and idealizing as he sings.

And so to the bluff fancies of the scherzo of "Hobgoblin." He will have no pit-i-patting Puck out of Mendelssohn and no titillating fairy out of Berlioz. For him the big-eared, bleary-eyed, grotesque, overgrown boy-fairy of a Hobgoblin, who is always at his tricks and mischief and withal a little clumsily—not the Hobgoblin of poets, but of farm wenches in the old days by the kitchen fire when the corners of the room waver in the shadows. And the music is duly bluff, impish, masculine. Finally the sheer musical humor of the final movement—a tramps' song "of old clay pipes and rum." Bach travestied on the xylophone, fun fast and furious up and down the orchestra, with only a pause for the strange flash of quiet and half-mysterious song. The big, frank gambolling of the humor is very American. No less so is the sudden coming of the meditative song. It will be time on Monday to write of Mr. Chadwick as the most truly American of all our composers. For the moment there is only to rejoice in him—free, full and strong—a man writing for

"Symphonic Sketches."
... were an American, which makes his talk
... Vava speaks English as fluently as if he
... ing of a hospital for seamen. Count de
... countrymen, especially for the establish-
... tures he will devote them to his destitute
... if there are any proceeds from his lec-
... material welfare of his compatriots, and
... hand, but to take to the sea, to the ... abilities and results accrue. Especially
... was invisible but overwhelming. Dr.
... Muck has a suggestively Punch-like ... profile and abets it with a cuff-collar
... over which his war vessel stem chin
... projects in sharp outline, and if his ... nose was a steel one he could sell it
... fabulously to J. J. Hill for a North-
... west snow-plough or to the Manitoban
... farmers for breaking their state wheat
... fields. Dr. Karl materialized with his ... accustomed dignity and royally re-
... frained from even so much as a smile
... throughout the first two numbers and
... applause. Chicago, as usual, demon... strated its exuberant provincialism in ... expecting and attempting to swipe an
... encore or several—and this, too, of the ... holy Boston Symphony princes—what
... monstrous preposterousness! but Herr
... Muck was game—and so was Ganz.
... Fortified behind the uplifted grand
... piano top, however, Dr. Muck later dis-

MR. CHADWICK AS A TRUE AMERICAN COMPOSER

The American Mood and Spirit That Are in His "Symphonic Sketches" of Saturday's Symphony Concert, and in Other of His Music—Wagner, Dr. Muck and Mme. Schumann-Heink for the Pension Fund—The Wit of Walkley and Archer—News of the Opera Companies—Mr. Sothorn to Carry Dundreary to London—A Coming Change at the Globe

Trans. Feb. 10, 1908

Mr. Chadwick, as his "Symphonic Sketches" suggested once more at the Symphony Concert of Saturday, is the most American of our composers, because oftener than with the rest his music in mood and spirit sounds distinctively American. For a composer to live permanently and work steadily in America is not to write American music. Mr. Loeffler, for example, so lives and works, but there is not an American trait so far as we can recall in his music. To have been born in America is no title to the writing of American music as the compositions of Templeton Strong, Arthur Bird and sundry other Teutonized Americans readily proves. In fact and in suggestion it is "made in Germany" as truly as though it were so involved in some musical custom-house. To write music from the melodies of primitive peoples, like the Indians or the Negroes, who happen to live on American soil, is to write music that often is only geographically American. Dvorak was still a Czech when he wrote such a symphony and called it "From the New World"; Mr. Farwell and all his brethren are often only experimenting with an aboriginal music that has next to nothing to do with the American spirit of today. Mr. MacDowell was narrowly individual through and through, and he would have dreamed his dreams of Arthur's court, Celtic queens and Norse warriors anywhere, and shaped his "Woodland Sketches" or his sea-pieces as readily in Wiesbaden as in Boston.

And so forth and so on with other American composers. Russian music, with all allowance for its folk-tunes and its other palpable national idiosyncracies, is Russian because the mood and the spirit of it is clearly recognizable as such. The mood and spirit of Sibelius's symphonies and tone-poems, again, is unmistakably of the North. Smetana's music is Bohemian, not because Bohemian legends stirred his fancy or he utilized Bohemian tunes, but because in temper and atmosphere is clearly Czech. Massenet's smacks of Paris even when he imagines he is more German than Wagner or more Italian than Mascagni. Cho-Cho-San is a geisha of Japan, but her voice in Puccini's "Madame Butterfly" is Italianate with her passion. A score of other examples are as ready, to prove that the true test of nationality in music is not any comparatively extraneous circumstances, but its underlying, pervading and persuading spirit.

Mr. Chadwick's music seems so often American because it bears this test. Recall, for example, the scherzo of one of his symphonies—that in F, if we remember rightly—and its mood is altogether American. Black, "buck" roustabouts dance on the wharf; an American composer watches them and puts into his music their mood and his. Recall the "Columbian Ode" for the World's Fair at Chicago—American in each succeeding mood of pride in the past, exultation in the present, and confidence in the future. Recall a movement here and there in Mr. Chadwick's chamber music, and again comes memory of a distinctly American spirit. Turn, in particular, to the "Symphonic Sketches," as Dr. Muck and his men played them on Friday and Saturday. He is a German; they are of many nationalities, and, being foreigners, he and they perhaps sentimentalized the slow, contrasting passages of the first and the last "sketches" more than a sensitive American conductor and band would do. Allow for this; and grant, too, that the nocturne of parental affection and longing of the second "sketch" is universal and not particular in spirit. The three other "sketches" remain and in them the mood is vividly, stirringly, and, in two at least, irresistibly American. Americans "fool," Americans "jolly," and European observers are fane to lament these ingrained habits in us. Is Mr. Chadwick's final "sketch"—"The Vagrom Ballad" of "clay pipes and rum and broken heads and blackened eyes and thirty days to come"—anything else than musical "fooling" and musical "jolly" American in spirit and expression, and often at its loudest and most careless? Comes the slow, mysterious, sober song near the end. The inevitable "contrasting passage," the merely accademic might call it. As it seems to us, it is far more a just musical incarnation of the tendency in the American temperament to turn suddenly serious, and deeply and unaffectedly so, in the midst of its "fooling," to run away into sober fancies and moods, and then as quickly turn "jolly" again.

Return through the scherzo of "Hobgoblin," and it is bluff music with an unmistakable sturdy American tang. Mr. Chadwick has taken his boy-fairy out of English farm steads to set him in American farm houses. He is a Hobgoblin who must set his ten fingers to his nose like the American hobbledohoy that he is. Pass to the first "sketch" of "Jubilee." Here, as now and then elsewhere in Mr. Chadwick's later music, is the echo of Negro tunes; but the American quality of the music lies little in that. Rather it is in the high and volatile spirits of the music, the sheer rough-and-tumble of it at its fullest moments. As was said on Saturday, the music shouts because it cannot help it, and sings because it cannot help it, and each as lightly and remains even now a pretty piece of orchestral fancy and orchestral virtuosity. For once Goldmark has forgotten his Amazon queen, his Hindoo king, Briseis in Achilles's tent, old Merlin in young Vivien's clasping arms, his dreams of the Orient, his voices of legend. He has gone out into the hills and woods and valleys about Vienna, to see, hear and feel the spring. It is a mood that he courts seldom and a mood that curiously he tried to recall only two months ago—and at seventy-eight—in his music for Florizel and Perdita in his new opera of "The Winter's Tale." Yet the spring brought no such frank, pulsing and ecstatic song to Goldmark as it did to Schumann in his rich-voiced symphony of a new earth, air and life. Schumann was not an orchestral virtuoso, and it would have been better for the expression of his own imaginings and for the lasting effect of his symphonic music had he been a clearer and freer master of instrumental expression. Goldmark is an orchestral virtuoso, and by instinct and practice he cannot forget it. Thus his overture of springtime goes its twofold way. It is warm and bright with the moods and fancies that stirred in him, with the frank joy and the soft song to which they woke him. Idealized birds twitter, idealized leaves rustle, or the sky darkens and the wind turns cold, for spring in the Vienna woods is fitful. But the birds must twitter in virtuoso passages for the wood-winds, the joy of the spring must flash through changeable tonalities; the orchestra must be put to its mettle and lead to brilliant and sonorous climax. Such music easily invites the new voice of our orchestra. The overture went brightly, warmly, changeably, as a frank and joyous rhapsody of, and for, the spring; and it went as well as a nearly perfect piece of orchestral virtuosity in tonal beauty and balance, in clear rhythm and clear articulation, in flowing phrase on phrase and in the vital vigor to which Dr. Muck whipped the climax. Heretofore our audiences have hardly known this pitch of Goldmark's vernal eloquence.

Mr. Chadwick composes best when the end he is seeking sits not too heavily upon him. He spurs himself to the writing of a tone-poem about Cleopatra and her Antony, and there is no hiding his effort. He undertakes a choral ode for a Columbian exhibition, and he takes frequent thought of the magnitude of his purpose. The muses whom he would sing have not been always too quick to answer his call. In his symphonies, he is conscious of the weight of precedent and example behind. By many a sign he has taken the four "Symphonic Sketches" that really make an orchestral suite, less seriously and more lightly and come with them into his truest, most interesting and most stirring self. The Chadwick of the "Jubilee" that begins them

No cool gray tones for me!
Give me the warmest red and green,
A cornet and a tambourine,
To paint my jubilee!

is good to hear for the warmth of inven-

tion, the vigor of expression, the free air and quick spring, the sheer physical, mental and musical high spirits that pervade it. He shouts orchestrally because he cannot help it; he sings orchestrally because he help it, and the shout and the song are American through and through. Then—for he is following the formal moods of a symphony—he turns to the soft, caressing, longing nocturne of the cradle song that he calls "Noel," and that he points with a poet's verse about the Virgin Mother and her Holy Babe. But like many a modern in the arts—Dagnan-Bouveret in painting, for example—it is the everlasting human love and yearning of father and mother for their own child of earth that he is singing and idealizing as he sings.

And so to the bluff fancies of the scherzo of "Hobgoblin." He will have no pit-patting Puck out of Mendelssohn and no titillating fairy out of Berlioz. For him the big-eared, bleary-eyed, grotesque, overgrown boy-fairy of a Hobgoblin, who is always at his tricks and mischief and withal a little clumsily—not the Hobgoblin of poets, but of farm wenches in the old days by the kitchen fire when the corners of the room waver in the shadows. And the music is duly bluff, impish, masculine. Finally the sheer musical humor of the final movement—a tramps' song "of old clay pipes and rum." Bach travestied on the xylophone, fun fast and furious up and down the orchestra, with only a pause for the strange flash of quiet and half-

DR. MUCK IN CHICAGO.

The Saturday Evening Herald and the Four Hundred of Chicago of Feb. 9 published the following pen portrait of Dr. Muck on the stage of the Auditorium in Chicago:

"The personnel of Dr. Karl Muck—golly, what a paradoxical symphony conductorial cognomen—was secondary in interest only to the wizardic maestro's marvellous skill and stick. He is of ordinary build, slender, trim and graceful, dignified and assertive and yet absolutely devoid of affectation or contortion mannerisms. His baton has the gentleness of a fawn or a June zephyr and frequently alternates with mekest waves of the reticent left hand, but my—what wonderful possibilities and results accrue! The magic was invisible but overwhelming. Dr. Muck has a suggestively Punch-like profile and abets it with a cuff-collar over which his war vessel stem chin projects in sharp outline, and if his nose was a steel one he could sell it fabulously to J. J. Hill for a Northwest snow-plough or to the Manitoban farmers for breaking their state wheat fields. Dr. Karl materialized with his accustomed dignity and royally refrained from even so much as a smile throughout the first two numbers and applause, Chicago, as usual, demonstrated its exuberant provincialism in expecting and attempting to swipe an encore or several—and this, too, of the holy Boston Symphony princes—what monstrous preposterousness! but Herr Muck was game—and so was Ganz. Fortified behind the uplifted grand piano top, however, Dr. Muck later dis-

MR. CHADWICK AS A TRUE AMERICAN COMPOSER

The American Mood and Spirit That Are in His "Symphonic Sketches" of Saturday's Symphony Concert, and in Other of His Music—Wagner, Dr. Muck and Mme. Schumann-Heink for the Pension Fund—The Wit of Walkley and Archer—News of the Opera Companies—Mr. Sothern to Carry Dundreary to London—A Coming Change at the Globe

Trans. Feb. 10, 1908

Mr. Chadwick, as his "Symphonic Sketches" suggested once more at the Symphony Concert of Saturday, is the most American of our composers, because oftener than with the rest his music in mood and spirit sounds distinctively American. For a composer to live permanently and work steadily in America is not to write American music. Mr. Loeffler, for example, so lives and works, but there is not an American trait so far as we can recall in his music. To have been born in America is no title to the writing of American music as the compositions of Templeton Strong, Arthur Bird and sundry other Teutonized Americans readily proves. In fact and in suggestion it is "made in Germany" as truly as though it were so invoiced in some musical custom-house. To write music from the melodies of primitive peoples, like the Indians or the Negroes, who happen to live on American soil, is to write music that often is only geographically American. Dvorak was still a Czech when he wrote such a symphony and called it "From the New World"; Mr. Farwell and all his brethren are often only experimenting with an aboriginal music that has next to nothing to do with the American spirit of today. Mr. MacDowell was narrowly individual through and through, and he would have dreamed his dreams of Arthur's court, Celtic queens and Norse warriors anywhere, and shaped his "Woodland Sketches" or his sea-pieces as readily in Wiesbaden as in Boston.

And so forth and so on with other American composers. Russian music, with all allowance for its folk-tunes and its other palpable national idiosyncracies, is Russian because the mood and the spirit of it is clearly recognizable as such. The mood and spirit of Sibelius's symphonies and tone-poems, again, is unmistakably of the North. Smetana's music is Bohemian, not because Bohemian legends stirred his fancy or he utilized Bohemian tunes, but because in temper and atmosphere is clearly Czech. Massenet's smacks of Paris even when he imagines he is more German than Wagner or more Italian than Mascagni. Cho-Cho-San is a geisha of Japan, but her voice in Puccini's "Madame Butterfly" is Italianate with her passion. A score of other examples are as ready, to prove that the true test of nationality in music is not any comparatively extraneous circumstances, but its underlying, pervading and persuading spirit.

Mr. Chadwick's music seems so often American because it bears this test. Recall, for example, the scherzo of one of his symphonies—that in F, if we remember rightly—and its mood is altogether American. Black, "buck" roustabouts dance on the wharf; an American composer watches them and puts into his music their mood and his. Recall the "Columbian Ode" for the World's Fair at Chicago—American in each succeeding mood of pride in the past, exultation in the present, and confidence in the future. Recall a movement here and there in Mr. Chadwick's chamber music, and again comes memory of a distinctly American spirit. Turn, in particular, to the "Symphonic Sketches," as Dr. Muck and his men played them on Friday and Saturday. He is a German; they are of many nationalities, and, being foreigners, he and they perhaps sentimentalized the slow, contrasting passages of the first and the last "sketches" more than a sensitive American conductor and band would do. Allow for this; and grant, too, that the nocturne of parental affection and longing of the second "sketch" is universal and not particular in spirit. The three other "sketches" remain and in them the mood is vividly, stirringly, and, in two at least, irresistibly American. Americans "fool," Americans "jolly," and European observers are fane to lament these ingrained habits in us. Is Mr. Chadwick's final "sketch"—"The Vagrom Ballad" of "clay pipes and rum and broken heads and blackened eyes and thirty days to come"—anything else than musical "fooling" and musical "jollying," American in spirit and expression, and often at its loudest and most careless? Comes the slow, mysterious, sober song near the end. The inevitable "contrasting passage," the merely accademic might call it. As it seems to us, it is far more a just musical incarnation of the tendency in the American temperament to turn suddenly serious, and deeply and unaffectedly so, in the midst of its "fooling," to run away into sober fancies and moods, and then as quickly turn "jolly" again.

Return through the scherzo of "Hobgoblin," and it is bluff music with an unmistakable sturdy American tang. Mr. Chadwick has taken his boy-fairy out of English farm steads to set him in American farm houses. He is a Hobgoblin who musically sets his ten fingers to his nose like the American hobbledohoy that he is. Pass to the first "sketch" of "Jubilee." Here, as now and then elsewhere in Mr. Chadwick's later music, is the echo of Negro tunes; but the American quality of the music lies little in that. Rather it is in the high and volatile spirits of the music, the sheer rough-and-tumble of it at its fullest moments. As was said on Saturday, the music shouts because it cannot help it, and sings because it cannot help it, and each as only Americans would shout and sing. And the intervening suaver passage, as in the last movement, is only the other face of this American volatility. No, Mr. Chadwick does not write American music because he was born in Lowell or because he lives and works in Boston, or because he now and then recalls an American folk-tune. He writes it because it is often, and especially of late years, intrinsically American in mood, spirit, and appeal. H. T. P.

TWO SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

PROGRAMME. Feb. 10-18
Chadwick. Symphonic Sketches. Orchestral Suite.
Gluck. Aria. "Che Faro."
Saint Saens. Aria from "Samson and Delilah."
Soloist, Miss Jeanne Gerville-Réache.
Goldmark. "Spring" overture.

The above was the programme of the regular Saturday evening concert. It was a little briefer and somewhat more convivial than usual, the latter fact being due to Mr. Chadwick's touches of humor. Yet his set of four symphonic sketches had considerable subtlety and contained some tender poetic touches as well.

Mr. Chadwick was the first to sound a distinctively American note in good orchestral music. Long before Dvorak advised the classical employment of the American folk-song Mr. Chadwick had used it in the Scherzo of his second symphony, suggesting the southern plantation. The wide scope of this composer has scarcely yet received its meed of public recognition. A composer who can display the learning of the fugues in "Judith," the dignity of "A Ballad of Trees and the Master," the condensed power of "Allah," the lyric beauty of portions of his latest string quartette, the tragic intensity of his "Melpomene" overture, and then diverge into such a wild excursion as "A Vagrom Ballad,"—the finale of the present Suite,—may be considered very remarkable, the most versatile of our native composers.

The "Jubilee" which began the set had at times a musical frankness that was refreshing even when it began and ended "robustiously" with the blare of a circus band. But between this intentionally broad alpha and omega there were some effective contrasts and it by no means constantly suggested "A cornet and a tambourine," which its opening motto spoke of. The tenderness of the "Noël," which was the slow movement of the set, was especially effective with its heartier surroundings. The woodwind had here some charming passages. "Hobgoblin" was an American "Queen Mab," with some difficult horn work that was excellently executed.

But, after all, the "Vagrom Ballad" was the gem of the set. What a difficult thing it is to idealize the commonplace! Charles Dibdin did it with sailor music; Burns could glorify even the indigestible Haggis in poetry; but very few have succeeded in this difficult field. In "A Vagrom Ballad" Mr. Chadwick goes into the domain of Vagabondia, somewhat as Burns in "Willie brewed a peck o' maut." The American tramp has never appeared in the classical repertoire before this. The motto of the movement runs,—

"A tale of tramps and railway ties,
Of old clay pipes and rum,
Of broken heads and blackened eyes,
And the 'thirty days' to come."

It is an American "Till Eulenspiegel" in which not the hoboe but the bass clarinet and bassoons have work to do. Even that most trashy of instruments, the Xylophone, is introduced into the score.

We have a vivid recollection of Mr. Chadwick's conducting of this, in Chickering Hall a few years ago. If Dr. Muck did not quite get the effects which the composer-conductor drew out of the movement in a smaller hall, he yet did surprisingly well, and very little of the humor was allowed to escape him. He evidently fully comprehended that it was "Lumpael Vagabundus" in tones, and gave the picture with full emphasis. The result was that not only was the director recalled at the end, but Mr. Chadwick was obliged to bow his acknowledgments twice, from his seat in the audience, before the applause would cease.

Then came a jump to quite another school of music. The melodious rondo to which Gluck has set the sorrows of Orpheus is remarkable as being chiefly in a major key. The Frenchman who suggested that the words "I have lost my Euridice, all my life is filled with woe," could be changed into "I have found my Euridice, all my life is full of joy," was not altogether wrong. The work, however, affords splendid opportunities for the singer to display dramatic power, and there was a noble artist present to do this. Mlle. Gerville-Réache sang the number with a depth of feeling that carried it to fullest success. With a full recollection of Mme. Brandt and of Scalchi in this song, we must say that we have never heard this interpretation excelled upon the concert platform.

It was a lesson in that simple and grand school of dramatic work which seems to find its home in Paris rather than in Berlin. The enunciation was so clear that one could follow the French words easily, and the climaxes were made without straining, or pumping in exaggerated emotion.

Equally effective was this artist in the St. Saens aria—"Mon cœur s'ouvre à ta voix." Mlle. Gerville-Réache was recalled many times and the audience evidently appreciated the high standard that she attained. The rich fullness of her deep tones was indescribably effective, and (which is remarkable in a heavy voice) they were well united to the upper register.

Goldmark's "In the Spring" overture, with its bird carollings and its genial rustic touches, closed the concert. It was well played, although we have heard it still better in previous concerts. But we of New England know nothing of the Spring that is here represented. We desire a Spring overture to present a "chest-protector-motive," and a "Mustard-plaster figure," with the east wind roaring upon the trombones and the tuba. A pizzicato theme should recall the words of the poet—"Strike the light Catarrh!" Some native composer must yet write for us a "Boston Spring Overture."

Again Dr. Muck has put the music of an American composer on his programmes, and at the fourteenth pair of Symphony Concerts, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week at Symphony Hall, Mr. Chadwick's three "Symphonic Sketches" will be played, and hitherto only fragments of them have been heard here. They run in four parts, and each part has a motto that presumably hints at a programme. The first part is entitled "Jubilee," and in the score are found the following verses:

No cold gray tones for me!
Give me the warmest red and green,
A cornet and a tambourine,
To paint my jubilee.

For when pale flutes and oboes play
Of sadness, I beg and pray:
Give me the violets and the May,
But no gray skies for me!

D. R.

The second part is entitled "Noël," and it has the following motto:

Through the soft, calm moonlight comes the sound,
A mother lulls her baby; all round
The gentle snow lies glistening;
On such a night the Virgin mother mild
In dreamless slumber wrapped the Holy Child,
While angel-hosts were listening.
(Translation.)

The third part is entitled "Hobgoblin," and in it the composer has sought to express the feeling of the following line: "That Shrewd and Knavish Spirit Called Robin Goodfellow," and the fourth is called a "Vagrom Ballad," and is prefaced by this verse:

A tale of tramps and railway ties,
Of old clay pipes and rum,
Of broken heads and blackened eyes,
And the "thirty days" to come.

The other orchestral number is Goldmark's graceful overture for a band of virtuosi, "In Springtime." For the rest a distinguished singer from one or the other opera house in New York will appear, but complications over her engagement prevent for the moment the announcement of the name. May we wager a two-cent piece, if there are any, that it will be Miss Geraldine Farrar. Trans. Feb. 1, 1908

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice" is likewise to be played next week for the first times at the Symphony Concerts, though the piece itself is more than twenty years old, and has stood for long in the repertory of many orchestras. In fact it has gained a considerable note as a test of the virtuosity of a full modern orchestra, because the music is prodigious alike in its brilliancy and its intricacy—glowing, almost intoxicating to hear, seemingly written in the heat of spontaneous imagination and suggestion, yet taxing the resource and the skill of the players to the utmost. The wonder is that none of Dr. Muck's predecessors has added it to the repertory of our orchestra; now he has done so, and the music is precisely of the sort that suits the vitality and vivacity to which he has brought his men. The "Spanish Caprice" runs in five movements, bound together by related themes and played without pause. The first movement has the unique title, "Alborada," a Spanish word the conventional meaning of which is "dawn," and the musical significance of which is akin to the French "Aubade"—a "morning serenade" or music to be performed at daybreak. With life and clamor runs the composer's direction at the beginning. The second movement is a set of five light variations. The third—another "Alborada"—resembles the first in title, mood and contents; the fourth is a "gypsy scene and song" very floridly and brilliantly written; while the fifth is a whirling Fandango. The whole indeed is the music of an exuberant instrumental colorist, when the glow of the South has touched his impulsive Slav imagination.

Mr. Abbott is the president of the Old Algonquin Club tomorrow night. The annual meeting will be held at the Yacht Club. Gordon Abbott, it is understood, is slated for election as commodore of the Eastern

KAISER
Rec'd Feb. 10, 1908
Manager Ellis of the Symphony orchestra is to go abroad as special emissary for

DR. KARL MUCK.

Maj. Higginson in quest of a conductor to succeed Karl Muck.

only Americans would shout and sing. And the intervening suaver passage, as in the last movement, is only the other face of this American volatility. No, Mr. Chadwick does not writ American music because he was born in Lowell or because he lives and works in Boston, or because he now and then recalls an American folk-tune. He writes it because it is often, and especially of late years, intrinsically American in mood, spirit, and appeal. H. T. P.

TWO SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

PROGRAMME. July 10-18
Chadwick. Symphonic Sketches. Orchestral Suite.
Gluck.....Aria. "Che Faro."
Saint Saens....Aria from "Samson and Delilah."
Soloist, Miss Jeanne Gerville-Reache.
Goldmark....."Spring" overture.

The above was the programme of the regular Saturday evening concert. It was a little briefer and somewhat more convivial than usual, the latter fact being due to Mr. Chadwick's touches of humor. Yet his set of four symphonic sketches had considerable subtlety and contained some tender poetic touches as well.

Mr. Chadwick was the first to sound a distinctively American note in good orchestral music. Long before Dvorak advised the classical employment of the American folk-song Mr. Chadwick had used it in the Scherzo of his second symphony, suggesting the southern plantation. The wide scope of this composer has scarcely yet received its meed of public recognition. A composer who can display the learning of the fugues in "Judith," the dignity of "A Ballad of Trees and the Master," the condensed power of "Allah," the lyric beauty of portions of his latest string quartette, the tragic intensity of his "Melpomene" overture, and then diverge into such a wild excursion as "A Vagrom Ballad,"—the finale of the present Suite,—may be considered very remarkable, the most versatile of our native composers.

The "Jubilee" which began the set had at times a musical frankness that was refreshing even when it began and ended "robustly" with the blare of a circus band. But between this intentionally broad alpha and omega there were some effective contrasts and it by no means constantly suggested "A cornet and a tambourine," which its opening motto spoke of. The tenderness of the "Noel," which was the slow movement of the set, was especially effective with its heartier surroundings. The woodwind had here some charming passages. "Hobgoblin" was an American "Queen Mab," with some difficult horn work that was excellently executed.

But, after all, the "Vagrom Ballad" was the gem of the set. What a difficult thing it is to idealize the commonplace! Charles Dibdin did it with sailor music; Burns could glorify even the indigestible Haggis in poetry; but very few have succeeded in this difficult field. In "A Vagrom Ballad" Mr. Chadwick goes into the domain of Vagabondia, somewhat as Burns in "Willie brewed a peck o' maut." The American tramp has never appeared in the classical repertoire before this. The motto of the movement runs,—

"A tale of tramps and railway ties,
Of old clay pipes and rum,
Of broken heads and blackened eyes,
And the 'thirty days' to come."

It is an American "Till Eulenspiegel" in which not the hoboe but the bass clarinet and bassoons have work to do. Even that most trashy of instruments, the Xylophone, is introduced into the score.

We have a vivid recollection of Mr. Chadwick's conducting of this, in Chickering Hall a few years ago. If Dr. Muck did not quite get the effects which the composer-conductor drew out of the movement in a smaller hall, he yet did surprisingly well, and very little of the humor was allowed to escape him. He evidently fully comprehended that it was "Lumpael Vagabundus" in tones, and gave the picture with full emphasis. The result was that not only was the director recalled at the end, but Mr. Chadwick was obliged to bow his acknowledgments twice, from his seat in the audience, before the applause would cease.

Then came a jump to quite another school of music. The melodious rondo to which Gluck has set the sorrows of Orpheus is remarkable as being chiefly in a major key. The Frenchman who suggested that the words "I have lost my Euridice, all my life is filled with woe," could be changed into "I have found my Euridice, all my life is full of joy," was not altogether wrong. The work, however, affords splendid opportunities for the singer to display dramatic power, and there was a noble artist present to do this. Mlle. Gerville-Reache sang the number with a depth of feeling that carried it to fullest success. With a full recollection of Mme. Brandt and of Scalchi in this song, we must say that we have never heard this interpretation excelled upon the concert platform.

It was a lesson in that simple and grand school of dramatic work which seems to find its home in Paris rather than in Berlin. The enunciation was so clear that one could follow the French words easily, and the climaxes were made without straining, or pumping in exaggerated emotion.

Equally effective was this artist in the St. Saens aria—"Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix." Mlle. Gerville-Reache was recalled many times and the audience evidently appreciated the high standard that she attained. The rich fullness of her deep tones was indescribably effective, and (which is remarkable in a heavy voice) they were well united to the upper register.

Goldmark's "In the Spring" overture, with its bird carollings and its genial rustic touches, closed the concert. It was well played, although we have heard it still better in previous concerts. But we of New England know nothing of the Spring that is here represented. We desire a Spring overture to present a "chest-protector-motive," and a "Mustard-plaster figure," with the east wind roaring upon the trombones and the tuba. A pizzicato theme should recall the words of the poet,— "Strike the light Catarrh!" Some native composer must yet write for us a "Boston Spring Overture."

Again Dr. Muck has put the music of an American composer on his programmes, and at the fourteenth pair of Symphony Concerts, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week at Symphony Hall, Mr. Chadwick's three "Symphonic Sketches" will be played, and hitherto only fragments of them have been heard here. They run in four parts, and each part has a motto that presumably hints at a programme. The first part is entitled "Jubilee," and in the score are found the following verses:

No cold gray tones for me!
Give me the warmest red and green,
A cornet and a tambourine,
To paint my jubilee.

For when pale flutes and oboes play
Of sadness, I beg and pray:
Give me the violets and the May,
But no gray skies for me!

D. R.

The second part is entitled "Noël," and it has the following motto:

Through the soft, calm moonlight comes the sound,
A mother lulls her baby; all round
The gentle snow lies glistening;
On such a night the Virgin mother mild
In dreamless slumber wrapped the Holy Child,
While angel-hosts were listening.
(Translation.)

The third part is entitled "Hobgoblin," and in it the composer has sought to express the feeling of the following line: "That Shrewd and Knavish Spirit Called Robin Goodfellow," and the fourth is called a "Vagrom Ballad," and is prefaced by this verse:

A tale of tramps and railway ties,
Of old clay pipes and rum,
Of broken heads and blackened eyes,
And the "thirty days" to come.

The other orchestral number is Goldmark's graceful overture for a band of virtuosos, "In Springtime." For the rest a distinguished singer from one or the other opera house in New York will appear, but complications over her engagement prevent for the moment the announcement of the name. May we wager a two-cent piece, if there are any, that it will be Miss Geraldine Farrar. Trans. Feb. 1, 1908.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice" is likewise to be played next week for the first times at the Symphony Concerts, though the piece itself is more than twenty years old, and has stood for long in the repertory of many orchestras. In fact it has gained a considerable note as a test of the virtuosity of a full modern orchestra, because the music is prodigious alike in its brilliancy and its intricacy—glowing, almost intoxicating to hear, seemingly written in the heat of spontaneous imagination and suggestion, yet taxing the resource and the skill of the players to the utmost. The wonder is that none of Dr. Muck's predecessors has added it to the repertory of our orchestra; now he has done so, and the music is precisely of the sort that suits the vitality and vivacity to which he has brought his men. The "Spanish Caprice" runs in five movements, bound together by related themes and played without pause. The first movement has the unique title, "Alborada," a Spanish word the conventional meaning of which is "dawn," and the musical significance of which is akin to the French "Aubade"—a "morning serenade" or music to be performed at daybreak. With life and clamor runs the composer's direction at the beginning. The second movement is a set of five light variations. The third—another "Alborada"—resembles the first in title, mood and contents; the fourth is a "gypsy scene and song" very floridly and

AS MUCK ENVOY TO KAISER

Record Feb. 10, 1908

Manager Ellis of the Symphony orchestra is to go abroad as special emissary for

DR. KARL MUCK.

Maj. Higginson in quest of a conductor to succeed Karl Muck.

S Y M P H O N Y H A L L

Sunday Evening, February 9, 1908, at 8 o'clock

CONCERT

IN AID OF THE

PENSION FUND

OF THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

DR. KARL MUCK, CONDUCTOR

SOLOIST, MME. SCHUMANN-HEINK

Programme

Overture, "The Flying Dutchman"

Prelude, "Lohengrin"

Overture, "Tannhäuser"

Erda's Scene from "The Rhinegold"

Waltraute's Scene from "Dusk of the Gods"

Funeral Music from "Dusk of the Gods"

Prelude, "Parsifal"

"The Rhinegold," Scene 4

Wotan has refused to surrender to Fasolt and Fafner the magic Ring which he and Loge have obtained from Alberich by trickery, although it is needed to complete the hoard of the Nibelungs, which is the ransom demanded by the giants for Freia, the goddess of youth, whom Fafner and Fasolt carried away as payment for Walhalla. As Fasolt turns to take away the goddess again, a bluish light glows in a rocky cleft at the side, and suddenly in the glow Wotan perceives Erda, whose form is half revealed as she rises from the earth. Her bearing is stately, and she is enveloped in her long black tresses.

ERDA

(Stretching her hand toward Wotan as though warning him.)

Wisely, Wotan, wisely,
Flee the fateful ring!
Dark the doom,
Ruthless the ruin,
Soon the gold must bring.

WOTAN

Who art thou, warning of woe?

ERDA

Whate'er hath been, know I;
Whate'er can be,
What all must come to,
Clear I see:
The endless world's
All-wise One,
Erda, bids thee beware.
Three the daughters,
Ere the ages,
My womb did bear.
Norns in the night to thee whisper.
Thy danger and need
Bring me here
Now to thine aid.
Hear me! Hear me! Hear me!
All that now is, endeth!
A day of gloom dawns for our godhoods.
I warn thee, dread thou the ring.

(She sinks slowly till her breast is level with the ground, while the bluish glow grows dimmer.)

WOTAN

An awful knell
Rings in thy words.
Wait, for I need thy wisdom.

ERDA

(As she disappears.)

I warned thee well —
Thou'rt wise enow:
Ponder now and pause.

(She disappears.)

—Translated by Charles Henry Melizer

"Dusk of the Gods," Act I., Scene 3

Brünnhilde is waiting at the Valkyr Rock for the return of Siegfried, who has left her to go in quest of further adventures. Before parting he gave her the magic Ring of the Nibelungs to hold as a pledge of his love. While she waits, the sky grows dark with storm clouds, in which comes her sister Waltraute to entreat her to return the Ring to its lawful guardians, the Rhine-daughters, and thus lift the curse from the Æsir. She describes the state of Walhalla.

WALTRAUTE

Hearken with heed to what I tell thee!
Since from thee Wotan turned him,
To battle no more hath he sent us:
Dazed with fear, bewildered we rode to the field;
Walhall's heroes no more may meet War Father.
Lonely to horse, without pause or rest,
As Wand'rer he swept through the world.
Home came he at last;
In his hand holding the spear-shaft's splinters,
A hero had struck it asunder.
With silent sign, Walhall's heroes sent he
To hew the world ash-tree in pieces.

The sacred stem at his command
Was riven and raised in a heap
Round about the hall of the blest.
The holy host called he together,
The god on his throne took his place.
In dismay and in fear of his word they assembled;
Around him ranged, the hall was filled by his heroes.

So sits he, speaks no word;
On high enthroned, grave and mute;
The shattered spear-shaft fast in his grasp;
Holda's apples tastes he no more.
Awe-struck and shrinking, sit the gods in silence.

Forth on quest from Walhall sent he his ravens;
If with good tidings back the messengers come,
Then forever shall smiles of joy
Gladden the face of the god.

Round his knees entwining cower we Valkyries;
Naught recks he, nor knows our anguish:
We all are consumed by terror and ne'er-ending fear.
Upon his breast, weeping, I pressed me;
Then soft grew his look;
He remembered, Brünnhilde, thee!
He closed his eyes, deeply sighing,
And as in slumber spoke he the words:

"If e'er the river-maidens win from her hand again the Ring,
From the curse's load released were god and world."

—Translated by Frederick Jameson

SYMPHONY EXCELS ITSELF AT FUND CONCERT

Journal
Plays Wagner as Master's Works
Never Were Played Here Before.
Schumann-Heink Heard at Her Best.

Once or twice in the course of a season the music lover is thrilled to the marrow, lifted into the seventh heaven, delighted almost beyond expression. There were supreme moments of this description at last night's pension fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra, first when the orchestra played the "Tannhaeuser" overture, and later when Mrs. Schumann-Heink, accompanied by the orchestra, sang Waltraute's dramatic account of the return of the War Father to Walhalla, from "The Dusk of the Gods." They represented the acme of the interpretive art. They recalled what President Eliot of Harvard said at the reception given the other night in Dr. Muck's honor—that great is the sway of the interpreter of music, greatest of all the arts.

Dr. Muck is averse to playing Wagner in concerts. So to prove how unreasonable this view is he put on a Wagner program last night and gave an immense audience such pleasure as is seldom derived from Wagner, even by Wagnermaniacs who read all the books about the master and hammer out his preludes on the piano. The Wagner of last night's "Lohengrin" prelude, for instance, and of the funeral music from "The Dusk of the Gods," not to hark back to the first-mentioned numbers, is a musical demigod with whom the mere opera-goer has but a scraping acquaintance.

The orchestra last night sang the "Tannhaeuser" song as no tenor ever heard here has sung it—with a power and beauty nearly unearthly. So, too, division after division of the unsurpassed band achieved effects of action and melody that are not to be met in opera houses—at least, not on this side of the ocean. Nor is it believable that Mrs. Schumann-Heink's glorious voice and equally glorious art could be displayed in circumstances quite as favorable as were those of yesterday. Certainly in the nine years during which Bostonians have welcomed and honored her she has never excelled—if she has ever quite matched—her performance of this Sunday night. She sang Erda's scene from "The Rheingold" first; then the Waltraute music, and though she sang the former as perhaps no other contralto living today could sing it, she sang the latter even more superlatively well. After this she was recalled about a dozen times.

But the orchestra deservedly shared the honors of the occasion with her. After the "Tannhaeuser" number Dr. Muck bade the men stand up and receive their measure of the great applause. It was a handsome tribute, from conductor as well as audience, to their extraordinary skill and spirit.

The concert began with "The Flying Dutchman" overture and ended with the prelude to "Parsifal."

Herald
Second of Season Draws Large Crowd That Fills Standing Room.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave the second concert in aid of its pension fund last evening in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. There was a Wagner programme, including the overtures to "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhaeuser," the preludes to "Lohengrin" and "Parsifal," the funeral music from "Goetterdaemmerung," and Mme. Schumann-Heink sang Erda's scene from "Das Rheingold" and Waltraute's scene from "Goetterdaemmerung."

There was a large audience, every seat and all the standing space being filled.

The Symphony orchestra seems to have dropped into a habit—an excellent habit—of giving a Wagner programme every year at one of its concerts for the pension fund, and it is evident, by the size and enthusiasm of the audience that turns out each year for this programme, that the Wagner "cult" has justified itself by a test of time. Perhaps the Wagnerites of some years ago have been threshed out, and last night's audience was the pure wheat. It was at all events a deeply impressed, sincere and responsive audience.

Mme. Schumann-Heink had given her services, and in doing so had been at notable pains to fulfil a promise made some time ago. Her performance gave delight by the dramatic warmth of her voice and singing, but her success last evening was more than a merely professional success. The personality of the singer is potent, by its wholesome and direct appeal and the gracious attitude toward her hearers. Last evening there was the added element of voluntary service and this was warmly felt by both the audience and the orchestra. The enthusiasm after her two solos was extraordinary; the orchestra arose to express its indebtedness, and the audience recalled her again and again. The singer appeared much moved by the warmth and sincerity of the applause, as well she may have been, for the scene was a moving one to many beside.

Dr. Muck also was repeatedly recalled, especially after the brilliant performance of the "Tannhaeuser" overture, and he made the orchestra rise to respond to him.

The second orchestral concert took place in Symphony Hall last night. It was the Pension Fund Concert, to which Dr. Muck, the Symphony Orchestra and Mme. Schumann-Heink, all donated their services. The programme was devoted to Wagner, and as Dr. Muck has not given any Wagner operatic excerpts in the orchestral programmes (he evidently does not believe in their fitness for symphonic programmes) the whole concert had a certain novelty. That Dr. Muck is a superb Wagner conductor was evidenced from the very first number. The programme was made up in a progressive order, beginning with Wagner's early period and ending with his last work. It ran as follows:—

Overture, "Flying Dutchman." Vorspiel, "Lohengrin."
Overture, "Tannhaeuser."
Selections from "Rheingold" and "Goetterdaemmerung."

Mme. Schumann-Heink.
Funeral Music from "Goetterdaemmerung."
Vorspiel, "Parsifal."

Of course, at such a benefit concert, where all are volunteers, anything savoring of criticism is out of place. Yet it is no empty compliment to say that this was one of the grandest concerts of the season. A very large audience was in attendance and it was evident that all were "en rapport" with the occasion.

Mme. Schumann-Heink was here in her appropriate frame. She is a great artist anywhere, but the difference between Schumann-Heink in a vocal recital, with a piano, giving three or four different schools, and Schumann-Heink in Wagner selections, with a splendid orchestra behind her, was a very marked one. Here she was altogether triumphant. Her work was greeted with the greatest enthusiasm, and the recalls were many and imperative, the entire orchestra rising in compliment to her wonderful singing.

Dr. Muck too was heartily applauded (tremendously after the Tannhaeuser overture) and the occasion was not only an important one for the treasury of the fund which is to pension our veteran orchestral players but was in itself one of the most enjoyable concerts that we can remember.

Louis C. Elson.

Feb. 10, 08

SECOND CONCERT.

Last for Pension Fund to Be Given
Sunday, Feb. 9.

The second and last concert of the season for the benefit of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, Feb. 9. Mme. Schumann-Heink has kindly offered her services as soloist and Dr. Muck is arranging an interesting programme of excerpts from Wagner's music dramas. Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing the Erda scene from the first scene of "Rheingold" and the Waltraute scene from the prologue to "The Dusk of the Gods."

Hall.

907-08

NY ORCHESTRA.

Conductor.

CERT.

RY 29, AT 8 P.M.

me.

Byron's "Manfred."

CE for VIOLONCEDLO.
(time.)

C major.

WARNKE.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 15, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

REGER,

VARIATIONS and FUGUE on a MERRY THEME by
J. A. Hiller, (1770.) op. 100.
(First time in Boston.)

SCHJELDERUP,

TWO PIECES for ORCHESTRA.
a) "Summer Night on the Fiord."
b) "Sunrise over the Himalaya."
(First time in Boston.)

RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF, CAPRICCIO ON SPANISH AIRS, op. 34.

- I. Alborada.
- II. Variations.
- III. Alborada.
- IV. Scene and Gypsy Song.
- V. Fandango of the Asturias.
(First time in Boston.)

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

184
FEBRUARY 4, 1908

TO HONOR DR. KARL MUCK

Germans, Musicians and Harvard Men Represented at Dinner in the Harvard Union

Dr. Karl Muck, the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was the guest of honor at a dinner given by the Deutscher Verein of Harvard in the Harvard Union last night. About a hundred guests assembled to honor the great conductor, among whom were undergraduate and graduate members of the Verein, members of the Bostoner Deutscher Gesellschaft, men from the musical department of the University, and prominent musicians of Boston and New York. E. F. Hanfstaengl, '09, president of the Verein, presided; with him at the head table were Dr. Muck, Major Henry L. Higginson, President Charles W. Elliot, Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Professor W. R. Spaulding, Bernard Listemann, a former conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, and officers of the Verein. Edwin Ginn, Warren A. Locke, Arthur Foote, Walter Damsch, Consul Reincke and other well-known musicians or patrons of music were also present.

The first speaker introduced by President Hanfstaengl was Professor Münsterberg, who spoke in German. He said: "New England represents Puritan idealism—an idealism with little aestheticism. The mission of Germany in America is to add what is best there to what is best here, to form traditions for the future, not to create a present for the past. Music is not the black notes on the white page; music is alive, Dr. Muck has made the best in music alive, and though he returns, he will leave with us what he has brought."

Professor Spaulding of the music department made a plea for the broadening of the musician. He said, "There has always been a close relation between Harvard and the Symphony Orchestra. In music, as in medicine and the law, we need to vitalize theory by practice; in our aim to do this, we have used the virtuosi of the orchestra as the lawyers study cases, and the doctors learn from hospitals. Karl Muck is an example of our aims. He is a doctor of philosophy—a broad musician. The besetting sins of the average musician are narrowness and vanity. Too often they know nothing outside their music. We are aiming to teach more than music here; we want broad musicians like Dr. Muck."

Although Herr Muck's name appeared as one of the speakers on the printed list, as he had contracted a cold he begged to be excused. Major Higginson spoke for him, prefacing his remarks with a eulogy of the leader. "Finding a conductor is like finding the road to heaven," he said, "only it's harder. The German emperor had lent us this gentleman for a year. Last year I again asked for this favor and got a kind reply. This year I am ashamed to repeat the request. The emperor of Germany has been very kind to him, and very kind to us. Neither he nor we feel it right to ask for more. He wants to stay. He wanted to come. Needless to say that we wish that he could stay."

"It is a great tribute to his art that he can and will play music which he dislikes just as well as music which delights him. In this he is a remarkable man. I wish that he could stay. Dr. Muck has been in every sort of city, and has been welcomed enthusiastically wherever he went. Dr. Muck has not only satisfied us here, but also educated us. We would like to be sure that this is not 'Lebe wohl,' but 'Auf Wiedersehn.' We can only be grateful on our part as he has asked me to say that he is on his part."

President Elliot was the last speaker. Before he spoke, Mr. Hanfstaengl read a letter from Professor Kuno Francke, who was obliged to speak in Chicago last night, regretting his inability to be present at the dinner. He enclosed a poem to the Fatherland, which was received with applause. The assembly then rose to greet President Elliot. "I know nothing," he said, "about music. I am sorry to say that in this respect my education has been neglected. But music speaks a universal language. There is no feeling that cannot be delicately or forcibly expressed. Music is versatile; it excites the gayest emotions with also the most pathetic. And the martial tones, how stimulating they are to our courage."

"Music is the finest of arts. Consider its range of expression. It needs also such adequate skill in the man who expresses the sentiments of the music. What a debt we owe to Germany in this respect. And no one has given us a more admirable expression of his native art than Dr. Muck."

"Delight in artistic work is the greatest need of our country. The highest reward to any profession is that which a great composer wins. There is nothing like it in the world. He has a line of great disciples and a line of great interpreters like Dr. Muck. What the prophet, the seer and the teacher most desires, the composer sees in his ideas expressed to music, which go down through the centuries."

"Great music is great thought. No other thought has such perfect transmission. Who gets such perfect interpretation of his thoughts as the great composer? On this account I know of no other profession in the world which has so great a reward."

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

adv:

Programme.

Reger, Variations on a Merry Theme by Hiller, Schjelderup. "Summer night on the Fjord." "Sunrise over the Himalaya."

Rimsky-Korsakoff. Capriccio on Spanish Airs.

This programme was entirely orchestral and entirely new. One did not miss a soloist, for the interest was sustained throughout. Reger shone forth in a new light in this concert. If we have heretofore classed him with the modern experimentalists we must now make some reservations; he is a great and learned composer. Whatever we may think of some of his ascetic productions, he has, in the Variations on Hiller's theme, proved that he can, when he chooses, stand beside Brahms. The orchestral variations came as a revelation of latent powers that we had not suspected.

They are not variations in the usual sense; they are developments and fantasies of the most advanced character. In variation the composer decorates his house (the theme) in different ways, and re-paints and ornaments it, while keeping the original structure; in development he pulls his edifice to pieces and builds new structures out of the tonal material. One can however, still recognize the bricks, (the phrases and figures,) and enjoy, all the more, the ingenuity of derivation.

Hiller would scarcely have understood what was done with his innocent theme, for the old melody was modernized in a most decisive manner. Usually a set of variations affords an opportunity for a parade of orchestral forces, each group of instruments passing in review by itself. But Reger worked on much broader lines than these and treated each variation as if it had been a symphonic movement. We thought Nos. 7, 10 and 11 the best of the set, but all were interesting and remarkable.

But the crowning glory of the work came with the final fugue. This was the finest exhibition of modern counterpoint since Brahms wrote his German Requiem. It is the best modern orchestral fugue that we have yet heard. The surprise began with the first entrance of the subject.

Fugal subjects are hampered by so many restrictions that it is almost impossible to invent a new subject that is practicable. Borrowing of a fugal subject is as admissible as one clergyman taking the text of another for his sermon, and the subject is, in fact, merely a musical text. Handel uses the subject of Bach's fugue ("Well-tempered Clavichord" Book II., No. 20) in his "And with His stripes are we healed", and Mozart uses the same as his first subject in his double fugue "Kyrie Eleison" in his Requiem. Mozart uses the subject of the Bach fugue ("Well-tempered Clavichord" Book II., No. 7) in the fugal exposition of his "Magic Flute" overture, chief theme, and many other instances of borrowing fugal themes might be cited.

185
But Reger has managed to bring forth a fugal subject that is new. It is long but very clear and striking, and the strong accent of its opening phrase serves as easy identification through all the intricacies that follow. After a magnificent exposition there comes, not the usual modern desertion of the fugal form, but a clear and wonderful set of strettos, one after the other, in a manner that Bach himself would not have been ashamed of. A countersubject is worked up with the subject in a strict manner. Finally there comes an overwhelming Coda in which the trombones have passages that test the lungs of the players to the verge of bursting.

And the performance! It was another of Dr. Muck's triumphs, only to be compared with what he achieved some time ago with Brahms' first symphony. It again proved our conductor an absolute genius in his field.

Orchestra and conductor were compelled to bow to the great and long-continued applause, for the public sensed that the work and its interpretation were memorable. We may not always agree with the asceticism and the restless modulations of Reger, but we shall have a different opinion of his musical abilities henceforth.

Schjelderup suffered somewhat by juxtaposition with that overpowering Coda, but his work was in such a totally different school that it ought not to have been in competition with the preceding number. One could scarcely put oneself into the dreamy mood of a Summer evening on a Norwegian Fjord directly after the exciting intellectual flight with Reger. It was a beautiful composition which came in the wrong place. We should like to hear this delicate "Stimmungsbild" after a Mozart symphony or a Mendelssohn overture. We have sailed in the northern fjords and have sensed their wonderful beauty, their dreamy melancholy, and we feel that Schjelderup has caught the spirit of his theme in a manner that Grieg himself could not have excelled. The instrument that best pictures this pensive sadness is the English horn, and this was charmingly used and excellently played in the number. The excellent use of the horns must also be spoken of and commended. The number was heartily applauded and we hope that it may be heard again.

We were not so much in sympathy with the Himalayan picture. It reminded a little of Mascagni's "Hymn to the Sun" in its working up to a self-evident climax, and, equally of course, it began with a picture of the morning stillness of the "solitary mountain top." One might have expected some very "high passages" in this Himalayan sketch, but we did not find them.

From India Dr. Muck took his personally conducted party to Spain, and allowed them to dance the Fandango. We were scarcely in mood for the brilliant composition which ended the programme. It contained many strong points of orchestration, and, of course, the bold rhythms and synopses of Spanish dances were in the foreground. Dr. Muck at times handled the orchestra as if it were a mighty guitar, or a Bandurria, that larger guitar which is the national instrument of Spain.

186
There were fine obbligato passages for solo violin, clarinet and harp, and these were effectively performed. Many strong contrasts were in the work, but as a whole it was a glorification of the dance. We have had so much of this, even on the light opera stage, that the school is a trifle threadbare. It was performed with much spirit and was evidently appreciated, but, in this concert Max Reger overshadowed everything else. Louis C. Elson.

DR. MUCK'S TRIBUTE TO HIS ORCHESTRA

Journal

Audience Enthusiastic Over Saturday's Program of Novelties, Conductor Joins in Applause.

A program of novelties was offered at the Symphony concert Saturday night. The numbers were Reger's "Variations on a Merry Theme of J. A. Hiller," Schjelderup's "Summer Night on the Flord" and "Sunrise Over the Himalaya," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes."

Reger is a young Bavarian, some of whose admirers consider him the first composer of the day. In these variations he shows himself to be daring, imaginative, enthusiastic, an accomplished juggler of orchestral resources and effects. The work was splendidly performed; in fact, the orchestra was brought up by the applause, and the rare spectacle was seen of the conductor joining with the audience in a tribute to the band's great virtuosity.

Schjelderup's little tone pictures also made a very favorable impression. They are as beautiful, in a descriptive way, as the poetry of Wordsworth.

And in the climax of the second piece there was a suggestion of Kipling's famous line, in which the imperial bard tells of the sun coming up like thunder out of China 'cross the bay. Then the marvelously transporting power of music was shown again in the veteran Russian composer's Spanish dances.

Altogether it was one of the most enjoyable concerts of the season; and the enthusiasm must have pleased Dr. Muck, who has had some doubts about the popularity of novelties.

Still more novelties are announced for this week. Balakireff's symphony in C major and Dohnanyi's concert piece for cello, with Mr. Warnke as soloist, will be played here for the first time. The other number will be Schumann's "Manfred" overture.

DR. MUCK'S DEPARTURE.

Truth in the Stories of the Choice of His Successor.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra management sends the following, which is official: "From all sides are heard expressions of deepest regret that Dr. Muck is to sever his connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season; although the news came with little surprise to those who have been acquainted with the situation. Dr. Muck obtained his first leave of absence from Berlin for the season of 1906-07 only with the greatest difficulty and not until he had signed a new contract with the Royal Opera in Berlin for six years, dating from the autumn of 1907.

"When it became a question a year ago last December to have this leave of absence extended for another year it required all the influence that the Boston Symphony Orchestra could bring to bear to induce the Kaiser to grant the request. Dr. Muck refused absolutely to lift a finger in the cause, for while he was anxious to stay he justly said that as he had given the Kaiser a promise to stay here but one year he could not in good faith ask for an extension of that time.

"That the Kaiser finally and after much hesitation did give his consent to Dr. Muck coming to Boston for a second season was regarded in Berlin as a most unusual concession to American sentiment. During the early part of this season the management of the orchestra hoped that some way might be found to secure Dr. Muck's release from his Berlin contract, but the authorities there would not listen to any proposition to this end, saying that Berlin needed his services quite as much as Boston and could not spare him any longer.

"Dr. Muck will leave America early in May, his last concerts in Boston being on May 1 and 2. With Mrs. Muck he will go to Berlin, where he will stay until the middle of June. Then he goes to Bayreuth, where he will stay until the end of August, for he is again to be the conductor of the 'Parsifal' performances there.

"All reports regarding his successor in Boston may be considered as unfounded rumors. That a distinguished conductor will succeed him may be accepted as certain, for it has always been and is the policy of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be satisfied only with the best. But no one has been engaged as yet, and it is likely to be well into the spring before an authoritative announcement regarding the next conductor of the orchestra will be made."

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Programme of Music New to Boston, with a Set of Variations and a Fugue by Reger to Begin It, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Glorified Fandango to End It, and Two Pieces by the Norwegian, Schjelderup, Between—A Concert of Sharp Contrasts in the Feats of Reger and the Russian

trans. Feb. 15, 1908
When Weingartner writes his book about the mental processes of composers, conductors, virtuosi and musicians generally, he ought to put a chapter into it on the spur of the south to the imagination of the north. Tschalkovski wrote tone-poems of the Italian Francesca and Paolo and the semi-Italian Romeo and Juliet and amused himself with the making of an "Italian Caprice" and a "Florentine Serenade." Grieg saw Anitra dancing in the glare of the desert. Hugo Wolf, shivering in winter in Vienna, warmed himself with the writing of an Italian song-book and set his two operas in a Spain in which he had never put foot. As report runs, Grenada itself is as unknown to Debussy as Teheran, but he duly conjured his impressions of it by night into tones. And so forth with many other examples of this call of the south to northern composers, and two in particular from the Symphony Concert of yesterday. Gerhard Schjelderup is a Norwegian composer who lives and works in Dresden, and one of his two pieces for orchestra that Dr. Muck had on his programme was a "tone-picture" of sunrise over the Himalayas. Rimsky-Korsakoff is a Russian composer, and even those fanatic Slavs who call Tschalkovski German acknowledge him as such. And the concert ended with his "Caprice on Spanish Themes."

Orchestral sunrises are prone to be orchestral sunrises, whether Mascagni or Richard Strauss makes them or whether the sun mounts over Japanese rice fields like Mascagni's or over the summit of the Himalayas like Schjelderup's. The form and even the key of these pieces is almost a convention—the beginnings in faint tonal gleams and quivers, the orchestra becoming more and more firm and full-voiced, and the sun at last pouring forth its light in the full effulgence of C major. Schjelderup has both followed and varied the conventional pattern. He begins with the inevitable fitful tonal gleams, but with a true and expressive imagination they do suggest the glint of points of light, catching snow or rock. Individual vision is in the imagining of them and individual voice in the expression of them. The sun mounts more conventionally, but still with a persuasive breadth, as of great, empty, warming spaces, in the orchestral voices and then the light bursts in the unexpected tonality of E major—incidental music, it seems, for the theatre, but music that keeps its pictorial quality elsewhere. A similar sensitiveness to atmosphere runs through Schjelderup's other piece played yesterday. "A Summer Night on the Flord"—tone-picturing rather in the manner of Whistler's nocturnes with the orchestra weaving the background of still darkness, while the song of the English horn or of the solo violin makes the long dashes of bright or distant color. And here again imagination and a sense of suggestive tonal quality played in Schjelderup's music.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice" is anything but conventional, except as all Spanish dance rhythms have become through much repetition to have that quality. But Rimsky-Korsakoff is a Slav, a very full-blooded, ebullient, imaginative Slav, turned loose among them, and a Slav who is a master of imaginative and expressive instrumentation. Here was a new field to conquer and the lust and the passion of conquest, and the lust and the passion of instrumental color that are in Rimsky-Korsakoff have seemingly made the process as intoxicating to the composer as it is to his hearers. Away sweeps the orchestra in a tempestuous "daybreak," as the title runs, of tumultuous rhythms and clamorous orchestral voices. Clearly the composer is in the vein. He has mixed his instrumental palette with the highest and keenest orchestral tints; he has lifted his arm to fling them sharp and glowing on this tonal canvas; and he varies them at every stroke. Nay, his orchestral day must break twice with new modulations and new instrumental tints as the impressionist painters like to paint the same atmosphere about the same object at succeeding moments. Between is a pause for a set of five variations that are sheer orchestral bravura unable to contain itself in its rising rhapsody.

The foil seemingly stood at the beginning of the programme in Reger's eleven variations and fugue upon a light theme out of an eighteen century operetta by Hiller; but Reger, as well, is capable of rhapsodies, though they are of a very different sort than Rimsky-Korsakoff's. Reger has his passion for forms and patterns of sound for their own sake; he rhapsodizes, not in instrumental coloring, but in counterpoint. The fugue with which he ends the variations is as truly impassioned and rhapsodic sound as the Russian's fandango. It was as intoxicating to make and to hear, and it comes to as stirring climax. In a sense a composer may do what he will in a fandango that ends a "Spanish Caprice." Neither rule nor precedent besets him. A fugue, above almost any other musical form, is an established thing—a very wall against which the haters of academic method and tradition endlessly butt their angry heads. And lo! Reger has taken that form and written music in it that is alive with passion and fire. Moreover, it is the pure passion and fire of exciting, contending and marching sound that asks no aid from exotic dance rhythms, sensual tang and glowing atmosphere. Thus, of the two, perhaps Reger's fugue is a finer, fuller and more truly musical achievement than Rimsky-Korsakoff's fandango. Reger, above most other composers of our time, feels the power and the beauty of sound, not for what they may express, but for what they are in themselves. As the variations proved, he can be passionate, playful, contemplative, joyous—what he wills—with them. He comes seemingly to the writing of music with a zest for it and nothing else. He seeks the pleasures and the triumphs of sound with a kind of austerity that is rare and good in these days of tone-poems, tone-pictures and all the other forms of music with a mission. By so much, in spite of every limitation and every dryness, he is nearly unique.

188

H. T. P.

CONCERT PROGRAM LONG BUT PLEASING

Subm. Original 24.16.08
Music Lovers Hear Dr. Muck's
Symphony Players in Delightful Numbers.

Symphony Hall was filled with music lovers last night when Dr. Muck led his orchestra through one of the longest, yet most delightful programmes of the season. The opening number, Reger's Variations and Fugue, was forty-five minutes long, which fact caused considerable impatience among those who arrived after the doors were closed and were obliged to remain standing in the corridors until the first intermission.

Even those who were comfortably seated found this number rather long and tiresome and several grew restless and slipped quietly out to walk about until it was finished. Mrs. Gardner, who sat in her balcony seat, was among the restless ones and after about twenty-five minutes left her seat and went down stairs. The selection evidently made a favorable impression on the majority of the audience, however, as the applause was so great that the musicians were obliged to stand and bow their acknowledgement. It would be hard to imagine a more intelligent interpretation of this piece than that given by Dr. Muck and his orchestra.

The other composers represented were Schjelderup and Rimsky-Korsakoff, and the character of the works throughout was one of great brilliancy, giving ample opportunity for the exhibition of the superb playing of which this splendid orchestra is capable.

In Schjelderup's "Summer Night on the Flord" and "Sunrise Over the Himalaya" the composer shows great beauty of imagination and suggestiveness of the subject depicted. In the second movement the form is broad and full and the music may be supposed to portray the rising of the sun from the moment of dawn to its splendid appearance above the great mountain.

The Caprice in Spanish Themes was played with wonderful dash and brilliancy, and one could almost see the swaying dancers in their gay-colored Spanish dress, the willowy grace of the girls, the flashing dark eyes and the picturesquely garbed men—all in flutter and glitter, grace and animation—quivering, sonorous, passionate, seductive. Each movement was magnificently played.

As the orchestra goes on its fourth trip next week, there will be no concert. For Saturday evening, February 29, Schumann's Overture to Byron's "Manfred," Dohnanyi's concert piece for violin cello and Baladireff's Symphony in C major will be given. Heinrich Warnke will be the soloist.

Reger at the Symphony Concert

Reger's new set of variations, and most of all the concluding fugue, were heard as intently and applauded as heartily at the Symphony Concert of Saturday as they had been on Friday. Unmistakably they interested and stirred both audiences much more than did his "Serenade" of last spring, and the talk of the corridors ran more eagerly to them than to all the whirling brilliancy of Rimsky-Korsakoff's Spanish dances. True, the sheer vitality and vigor of the fugue, as so much puissant and conquering sound—and the more as Dr. Muck and his men played it—were irresistible, until it was not in flesh and blood to withstand such a sweeping and mounting orchestral flood. True, the reflective and moody charm of one or two of the variations and the sharp piquancy of one or two others were immediately and pleasantly beguiling, so that, Reger or no Reger, they would have pleased their hearers. Yet, with due allowance for all this, it is easy to believe that behind the interest and applause, especially on Saturday night, was quick and intelligent recognition of the composer's peculiar temperament and talent which almost set him at variance with his time. Music with a mission outside itself is the fashion of the hour. It may impart anything from Nietzsche's philosophy as Strauss reads it, to the glint of the sea as it shimmers before Debussy's eyes, or even to young Mr. Boeche's memories of his winter holiday at Taormina. But carry something outside itself, it must.

Reger, on the other hand, is all for music for its own sake. He seeks the emotions of his hearers by the beauty, the power, the piquancy, the fantasies, the contrasts, or any other intrinsic trait of ordered and imaginative sound. He kindles their interest by the line, the curve, the whole design of his tonal patterns as well by the fashion with which he shades and colors and decorates their contours. He is content to weave patterns and tapestries in tones, but at his best he also weaves them with an imagination and feeling, an eagerness for beauty, a zest for power, a fervor of invention and execution little less than that which fire the makers of tone-poems, tone-pictures, and tone-dramas. He sets sound singing for itself, battling with itself, playing with itself, and bids his hearers to the song, the contest, or the sport. The thought, the passion, the pleasure in the writing of music for its own sake suffice him. He would have the answering thought, emotion and delight of his hearers suffice them.

Reger has shortcomings, being young, queer, very self-sufficient, very scornful of his musical time and its ways. He can be dry with an insistent and aggressive dryness; he can write music that is now coarse and now acid to the ear; he can spin passages as though a contrapuntal loom were clicking, clicking, clicking in his own head and in his hearers' ears; and as yet he lacks sensitiveness and quick resource with orchestral timbres. He loves a kind of angry perversity of harmony or dissonance as though he were snapping and sneering at the expected. Writing endlessly, he inevitably writes much that is more fluent than significant, more facile than inventive. He even seems to set himself problems and puzzles, and then expect his hearers to watch his efforts and solutions with a joy like to his own. Yet when these and twenty other reserves have been made, he remains the apostle of music for its own sake, of the pleasures, intellectual and sensuous, of sound in the making and in the hearing, crying in a wilderness of "programme" pieces. And at its best and fullest, as in the fugue of the variations and in some of the bright or the deep song of the "Serenade," his listeners answer the cry—freshly and gladly.

Trans. 24.17.08 H. T. P.

At the Symphony concerts of next week Dr. Muck and his men are to play for the first time here Max Reger's newest orchestral piece, a set of variations and a fugue on a theme by Johann Adam Hiller, composer, teacher and musician generally of the eighteenth century. They stand as high as opus 100 in the numbering of the prolific Reger's pieces, they were originally performed at Cologne under Mr. Steinbach last October; while here in America only the Philadelphia Orchestra has preceded ours with them. Before Reger himself and with Nikisch conducting they were played last autumn in Leipzig, and here is a listener's brief impression of them: "Needless almost to say, the choice of variations for the matter and the manner of the piece accords with Reger's devotion to the most 'absolute' of 'absolute music' and gives him room for the endless fertility of invention in the development of his ideas which is his characteristic trait in his longer work. The new composition consists of the theme, ten variations and a fugue, and requires thirty-five minutes in performance. The general character of the music is so distinguished as to leave absolutely no room for doubt as to its value. The theme has the nature of one of the old-fashioned dances, probably the Cracovienne, or one of the forms of the polka. The earlier variations are liberally supplied with rhythms to give decided folk character, but wherever sustained or comparatively rhythmless episodes occur, these are also in the distinguished manner in which no one but Reger is now composing. In a thirty-five minutes long apiece there are inevitably episodes weaker than the rest, and the least interesting part of the music lies in the dreamy passages of the later variations, where the musical message, though beautiful, is slightly nearer the 'modern conventional.' The one place where Reger becomes very great is in the fugue, which should never be forgotten that Reger would remain a genius for rhythm whenever everything else should fail. His rhythmic gift is equally discernible when he composes and when he plays, so that he is able to bring unexpected beauty into the simple accompaniment of any one of his songs. The theme of this orchestral fugue is sufficient to bring conviction in the first two measures. Reger has then proceeded to develop his theme so thickly as to leave the lines not clearly drawn later in the movement, but it is a jolly cauldron that is boiling, and the last few pages clear up into a working-out that is truly monumental. Reger was present, sitting high up in the director's box at the farther end of the hall. The audience applauded liberally and wanted Reger on the platform. Nikisch waved his baton at the composer, but that gentleman was high and dry and would not come down."

SYMPHONY CONCERTS—For Sale two Season Tickets together, for nine remaining weekly concerts; floor; choicest location; each $24. Address D.R.H., Boston Transcript. 4t(A): fe 21

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS—For Sale, one Season Ticket for nine remaining Friday afternoons; choice location; $30. Address E.D.A., Boston Transcript. 4t(A): fe 21

FOR SALE
ONE SYMPHONY REHEARSAL TICKET at cost. Choice location. Address L.O.C., Boston Transcript. SMWFS(A): fe 8 list:

H. WARNKE.

The Symphony Orchestra Goes West

The Symphony Orchestra, eighty-two strong, left Boston last night on what bids fair to become its annual Western journey. It arrives in Buffalo this afternoon and gives a concert there this evening. Tuesday morning it will go on to Detroit, appearing there on Tuesday evening. Thence it travels to Indianapolis for a concert on Wednesday evening. Thursday morning it proceeds to Columbus to play there the same night. From Columbus it journeys to Cincinnati for two concerts—the first on Friday afternoon and the second on Saturday evening. On Sunday morning next it starts for Boston again, reaching here on Monday noon, or as soon thereafter as the Boston & Albany Railroad suffers it to do so. This year the orchestra does not visit Chicago, and Columbus replaces that city in the itinerary. The two concerts that it will give in Cincinnati are a part of the series arranged by the Cincinnati Musical Association to replace those of its own orchestra which the labor union compelled it to abandon. Western managers and Western audiences seemingly care little for "soloists," and in four of the six concerts there will be none. In the other two Mr. Wendling and Mr. Warnke, the first violinist and the first cellist, are respectively to play. With the series, moreover, Dr. Muck begins his last appearances in America. Here are the six programmes, taken, with the exception of the solo pieces, from music that the orchestra has played in Boston this season, and duly divided between the classic and the modern composers.

Monday evening in Buffalo—

Humperdinck: Overture, "The Forced Marriage."
Mozart: Concerto for Violin (Mr. Wendling).
Beethoven: Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral."

Tuesday evening in Detroit—

Beethoven: Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral."
Bizet: Overture, "Patrie."
Richard Strauss: "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."
Chabrier: Rhapsody, "España."

Wednesday evening in Indianapolis—

Brahms: Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73.
Dvorak: Overture, "Carneval."
Dohnanyi: Concertstuck for Violoncello (Mr. Warnke).
Richard Strauss: "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Thursday evening in Columbus—

D'Indy: "Wallenstein" Trilogy.
MacDowell: Suite in A minor, Op. 42.
Chabrier: Rhapsody, "España."

Friday afternoon in Cincinnati—

Händel: Concerto for Strings and Two Wind Orchestras.
Mozart: Three German Dances.
Schumann: Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral."

Saturday evening in Cincinnati—

Brahms: Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73.
Dvorak: Overture, "Carneval."
Richard Strauss: "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."
Chabrier: Rhapsody, "España."

MUSICAL MATTERS

Trio of Novelties at Symphony Concert.

Verdi's Requiem to be Sung by the Handel and Haydn.

Song Recital by Mme Calve —Other Announcements.

Globe Feb. 16, 1908.

There was nothing antique about the 15th Symphony program, for the three novelties were composed by men who are alive, and if examples of modern music were desired Dr Muck arranged an excellent combination to fill the bill. There were about a dozen variations by the Bavarian Reger on a merry theme by J. A. Hiller; Gerhard Schjelderup of Norway was represented by "Summer Night on the Flord" and "Sunrise Over the Himalaya," and a caprice on Spanish themes was the work of the Russian, Rimsky-Korsakoff.

In Reger and the Russian composer were shown the masterly skill in instrumentation achieved by men who understand the development of the present-day orchestra. Reger has taken a simple theme and worked up a dozen variations, and from his ability in this direction doubtless he could have evolved a dozen or more as striking as the first group.

It is wonderful what he has done in the way of combinations, as if the resources of the orchestra were about limitless and he able to manipulate all. The piece is formless, of course, but it is curiously interesting, and the performance certainly gave pleasure to the auditors.

In the pair of mosaics by Schjelderup the "Summer Night" proved to be a charmingly dainty little piece, with a delicate interchange of phrases twixt the solo, violin and horn, beautifully played, developing into a mildly strenuous crescendo. Then again all is peace, "moonlight and rippling waters" up to the pianissimo finale.

The grace and refinement of performance made this little work very effective. The next musical picture was agreeably outlined, but was not as impressive as Wagner's treatment of a similar idea in the second act of "Lohengrin."

The titles and subtitles give a faint clue to the scope of a work which is fairly bedlamatic in parts. There is a "morning" effect composed of a half dozen different incidents ranging from a peaceful dawn to a battle and military music.

Variations that vie with those by Reger, played earlier in the concert, are followed by a third movement that treats the first in a new and more abstruse manner. Then comes a whiff of musical chaos, a kind of gypsy scene, which is followed by the genuine fandango, colossal in instrumentation, inspiring and fairly bewildering in the multiplicity of variations in its instrumental associations, in pairs and groups.

In five parts is the caprice on Spanish themes divided, and the report that it is regarded as an extraordinarily brilliant piece of composition is correct. It is all of that. And probably the stupendous difficulties of the work accounts for its absence from the repertory of most of our orchestras. Dr. Muck seemed to thoroughly enjoy his work of conducting, and it was labor for him and his men, and the result justified the experiment of production. The performance was an "event" in the season.

This week the orchestra will make its fourth trip. The 16th program will have Mr. Heinrich Warnke as soloist in a cello concert piece by Dohnanyi, first time here. Schumann's "Manfred" overture and, for its first performance here, Balakireff's C-major symphony complete the selections.

CORDIAL WELCOME TO REGER'S MUSIC

His Extraordinary Variations Delight Audience at
Symphony Hall.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 15th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Variations and fugue on a merry theme by J. A. Hiller (1770).....Reger
Summer day on the Flord.....Schjelderup
Sunrise over the Himalaya.....Schjelderup
Spanish caprice.....Rimsky-Korsakoff

All these pieces were performed in Boston for the first time.

Max Reger chose for the theme of his opus 100 a little roguish tune sung by a country girl in Hiller's operetta, "The Harvest Wreath." On this theme he built 11 variations—one of them has nearly 200 measures—and a fugue. This set of variations is his third work for orchestra. His "Sinfonietta" provoked both hisses and applause in German concert halls. The composer was called by some an immortal; by others a madman throwing notes about. His "Serenade," which has been played here, also made enemies. The set of variations, first performed at Cologne Oct. 15 of last year, has been praised to the skies. We find Johannes Reichert of Dresden saying that each variation is a concise symphonic movement; that the variations are great because they are not variations. On the other hand, some say there never were such orchestral variations as these of Reger. There are others who are still noisier in their joy and characterize the work as "epoch making." Thus they indulge themselves in the hazardous pleasure of prophecy.

Is this set of variations a great work? Or does it remind the hearer of Mueller's translation from the Buddhist Gospels?

Hammer, hammer, tinkle, tinkle,
The shake, the shiver and the slumber,
The never-ending beginning,
The beginning that never ends.

Two sections of this work impress at once the average hearer: the second variation, by reason of its charm of mood and in consequence of a euphony that is seldom found in Reger's compositions, a euphony in this instance both harmonic and orchestral; then there is the fugue, which, built up with extraordinary skill, is colossal in structure, irresistible in its rhythmic sweep, rich in engrossing material and literally overpowering in the climax. These two sections at once excite interest and compel admiration. For in them is not only unusual technical skill displayed, but there is in the one case a direct emotional appeal, and in the other the hearer recognizes an expression of grandeur.

In the other variations there are emotional moments, but they are incidental, or they seem to be only digressions, as though the commentator of a serious and dry text should enliven a page by a display of fancy in a foot note. There is everywhere an exhibition of astonishing technique, a mastery over all sorts of harmonic complications, and as some one has said, Reger delights to wallow in counterpoint. Some of these exhibitions are dreary as far as any enjoyment outside of appreciation of the mastery is concerned.

There is much that is without aesthetic significance, nor can I agree with those who applaud Reger's use of the orchestra. He is not sensitive in his harmonic schemes; he is not a colorist; he has little sense of finesse; he does not care for nuances, demi-tints; he prefers to be rough and boisterous; and when he condescends to play with an emotion, he plays with it awkwardly. Worst of all, he knows not the value of reserve; he insists on hammering his knowledge into you; not for a moment would he allow you to infer that he is an uncommonly skillful musician. Nor will he spare you though you beg for mercy and show him your watch. Like the narrator in "The Thousand Nights and a Night," he says his allotted say. The work is very difficult and exhausting, but the performance was a superb one, in its elasticity and virility. Dr. Muck again showed a quality which he has in the highest degree: the ability to interpret a composition as the composer would probably have it interpreted, the ability to comprehend the composer's intentions, and also to infer from the "Milieu" of the composer that which vitalizes in the presentation of his thoughts. The audience received the work with unusual favor and Dr. Muck was more than once recalled.

Gerhard Schjelderup, a Norwegian now nearly 50 years old, studied at Paris and then went to Germany. Since 1896 he has dwelt in Dresden. He has known years of poverty and distress. He is described as a man of liberal education, a gentle, brave and independent soul, who is neglected by his colleagues because he will not ally himself to any musical party. Living in Dresden he remembers the friends of his native land, and he cannot forget them even when he sees in his mind's eye the sun rising over the colossal Himalaya.

The two pieces belong to the better class of pictorial music, which should never be confounded with that which is purely panoramic. Schjelderup gives his hearers credit for imagination. They must assist him, or, at least, step toward him. Whether the "local color" is pronounced, whether the title of the first piece might be applied to an inlet of another northern land, is immaterial. To him who has never seen a Norwegian fiord, the one portrayed by Schjelderup in tones is plausible; it is romantic, it is beautiful.

Whether Schjelderup's sun could not have risen with equal effect over a Norwegian mountain or one of the Alps is again immaterial. The music was written for a Norwegian drama performed in Dresden a few years ago. It may have more significance in the playhouse. As a concert piece it is interesting and effective. The two pieces are free flights of fancy. They are poetic and individual. Here is a Norwegian who does not dilute Grieg. While he is a modern in the use of the orchestra and in his harmonic scheme he is not bizarre or "precieux."

Rimsky-Korsakoff's Spanish Caprice was pronounced by no less a man than Tchaikowsky to be "a colossal masterpiece of instrumentation." This was said over 20 years ago. The praise may now seem extravagant, as far as the whole work is concerned, but the movement "Scene and Gypsy song" is certainly a marvel of instrumentation, though Berlioz preceded Rimsky-Korsakoff and orchestral miracles have been worked since Tchaikowsky praised. The caprice is entertaining, but there is more of Spain in Chabrier's Rhapsody or in Debussy's piano piece "Evening in Grenada." The performance was brilliant and the daring feats of the composer were rivalled by the orchestra.

WILL NOT LET DR. MUCK RETURN TO BOSTON

German Emperor Unwilling to Further Extend Absence From Berlin After This Season.

Dr. Karl Muck will not direct the Boston symphony orchestra after the present season, owing to the unwillingness of the German emperor to extend his absence from his Berlin duties.

Manager Ellis last night made this brief announcement:—

"Owing to its inability to secure for him

DR. KARL MUCK.

further leave of absence from his duties in Berlin, the management of the Boston Symphony orchestra, with much regret, announces that Dr. Karl Muck will sever his connection with the orchestra at the end of the present season. No arrangements for his successor have been made."

Dr. Muck is on his second year with the Boston Symphony orchestra. His original leave of absence from Berlin was for one year only, but at the end of the year the German emperor, after much urgent pleading on the part of the Boston management, consented to spare his services for another year.

Solci

Mr. HEINRICH

FOR SALE

ONE SYMPHONY REHEARSAL TICKET at cost. Choice location. Address L.O.C., Boston Transcript. SMWFS(A): fe 8

In the Musical World

Part

EDITED BY OLIN DOWNES July 16, 08

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The programme of the 15th Symphony rehearsal and concert was one of unusual interest, for it presented four compositions new to the public of this city, and these compositions were of unusual interest and merit.

Max Reger has been wildly heralded from abroad as the greatest composer of the period, a second Bach, etc. Such acclaim is always sufficient to prejudice unfavorably the thoughtful and discriminative. His serenade for orchestra, op. 25, was coldly received when given in this city last season, and an interesting violin and piano sonata fared but little better when given by Messrs. Marteau and Gollner in the spring of 1906. Was this the man who was to set his stamp upon the time?

The variations and fugue on a Merry Theme by J. A. Hiller for full orchestra, op. 100, were first given by Fritz Steinbach in Cologne last October; they were given their first performance in the United States by the Philadelphia Orchestra, Dec. 20, 1907; they were performed in Basle, Switzerland, some three or four weeks ago with marked success.

These variations may be ranked one of the greatest works that have been produced by any contemporaneous composer. It is true that they are thick with technical devices, that they cannot be enjoyed with an idle mind, that at first hearing certain places seemed prolix and overlaid with counterpoint. But the measures are rife with fantasy, with large imagination, and at the same time an extraordinary grip of the subject matter.

However intricate the writing may become, the listener rarely loses the thread of the theme, and one could speak endlessly of the masterly workmanship to be found on every page. The subject melody is worked out and metamorphosed through variations that express a whole gamut of thought and feeling. The fugue finale is colossal.

Counterpoint written by a master is not a science, but a glorification of music, and few passages in this creation fall in being direct and strongly impressive in hitting the mark. The composer who can conceive the second variation, with its fine countertheme, the strong fourth, the seventh, the mightily passionate 10th, is one to be reckoned with.

The subject of the fugue is wonderfully rhythmic, of a length and character that would bring many to grief, but this subject is freely wielded by Reger with a richness of conception and structural power that amount here and there to glorious excess. One pair of ears cannot assimilate all this. The final pages of the fugue, which is truly the flower and culmination of a tremendous achievement, are resounding and stupendous to the point of sublimity.

The work was received with great enthusiasm. Dr. Muck is to be heartily thanked, first, for producing it; secondly, for a tremendous virile and incisive performance of remarkable technical excellence.

Two orchestral pieces, by Schelderup, a Scandinavian now living in Dresden, were next on the programme: "Summer Night on the Flord" and "Sunrise Over the Himalayas," the latter being an excerpt from stage music composed for a drama, "Opferfeur," by Karl Gjellerup, which was produced in Dresden in 1903.

The pieces are hardly of permanent value. The "Summer Night on the Flord" is an agreeable nocturne, but little more. The piece that followed is a long, well-orchestrated crescendo that leads up to a scenic climax—the sunburst. It depends entirely for its effect upon just such a splendid building up as Dr. Muck achieved from a wonderfully pianissimo beginning, and would no doubt be a great deal more convincing as the accompaniment of a scene on the stage, for it is essentially a theatrical inspiration.

Few figures in modern music present a more remarkable personality than Rimsky-Korsakoff, a Slav to the backbone in his predominating instinct for color and rhythm, a philosopher, a scientist, and at one time, we are told, almost a pedant in his devotion to musical mathematics. How many contemporaneous Russians, save he, compose music that is vital, sincere or truly characteristic?

The "Spanish Caprice" is not the least characteristic product of his genius. With a technique for instrumentation that can only be called marvellous, and with a receptive imagination such as only a descendant of the East could possess, he has woven these Spanish tunes into a unit that is a whirlwind of color, of rhythm, of dazzling harmonic gorgeousness. Few men have understood as this Russian the magical souls of instruments; in listening one becomes obsessed and spellbound with their enchantment. A glowing performance brought a brilliant conclusion to the concert.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XVI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 29, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

SCHUMANN,

OVERTURE to Byron's "Manfred," op. 115.

DOHNÁNYI,

CONCERT PIECE in D major for ORCHESTRA, with VIOLONCELLO OBBLIGATO, op. 12.
(First time in Boston.)

BISCHOFF,

SYMPHONY in E major, op. 16.

- I. Sehr schnell und feurig.
- II. Sehr ruhig und getragen.
- III. Presto; Ruhig.
- IV. Allegro moderato.

Soloist:

Mr. HEINRICH WARNEKE.

In the Musical World

Part

EDITED BY OLIN DOWNES 24.16.08

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The programme of the 15th Symphony rehearsal and concert was one of unusual interest, for it presented four compositions new to the public of this city, and these compositions were of unusual interest and merit.

Max Reger has been wildly heralded from abroad as the greatest composer of the period, a second Bach, etc. Such acclaim is always sufficient to prejudice unfavorably the thoughtful and discriminative. His serenade for orchestra, op. 95, was coldly received when given in this city last season, and an interesting violin and piano sonata fared but little better when given by Messrs. Marteau and Gollner in the spring of 1906. Was this the man who was to set his stamp upon the time?

The variations and fugue on a Merry Theme by J. A. Hiller for full orchestra, op. 100, were first given by Fritz Steinbach in Cologne last October; they were given their first performance in the United States by the Philadelphia Orchestra, Dec. 20, 1907; they were performed in Basle, Switzerland, some three or four weeks ago with marked success.

These variations may be ranked one of the greatest works that have been produced by any contemporaneous composer. It is true that they are thick with technical devices, that they cannot be enjoyed with an idle mind, that at first hearing certain places seemed prolix and overlaid with counterpoint. But the measures are rife with fantasy, with large imagination, and at the same time an extraordinary grip of the subject matter.

However intricate the writing may become, the listener rarely loses the thread of the theme, and one could speak endlessly of the masterly workmanship to be found on every page. The subject melody is worked out and metamorphosed through variations that express a whole gamut of thought and feeling. The fugue finale is colossal.

Counterpoint written by a master is not a science, but a glorification of music, and few passages in this creation fail in being direct and strongly impressive in hitting the mark. The composer who can conceive the second variation, with its fine countertheme, the strong fourth, the seventh, the mightily passionate 10th, is one to be reckoned with.

The subject of the fugue is wonderfully rhythmic, of a length and character that would bring many to grief, but this subject is freely wielded by Reger with a richness of conception and structural power that amount here and there to glorious excess. One pair of ears cannot assimilate all this. The final pages of the fugue, which is truly the flower and culmination of a tremendous achievement, are resounding and stupendous to the point of sublimity.

The work was received with great enthusiasm. Dr. Muck is to be heartily thanked, first, for producing it; secondly, for a tremendous virile and incisive performance of remarkable technical excellence.

Two orchestral pieces, by Schelderup, a Scandinavian now living in Dresden, were next on the programme: "Summer Night on the Flord" and "Sunrise Over the Himalayas," the latter being an excerpt from stage music composed for a drama, "Opferfeur," by Karl Gjellerup, which was produced in Dresden in 1903.

The pieces are hardly of permanent value. The "Summer Night on the Flord" is an agreeable nocturne, but little more. The piece that followed is a long, well-orchestrated crescendo that leads up to a scenic climax—the sunburst. It depends entirely for its effect upon just such a splendid building up as Dr. Muck achieved from a wonderfully pianissimo beginning, and would no doubt be a great deal more convincing as the accompaniment of a scene on the stage, for it is essentially a theatrical inspiration.

Few figures in modern music present a more remarkable personality than Rimsky-Korsakoff, a Slav to the backbone in his predominating instinct for color and rhythm, a philosopher, a scientist, and at one time, we are told, almost a pedant in his devotion to musical mathematics. How many contemporaneous Russians, save he, compose music that is vital, sincere or truly characteristic?

The "Spanish Caprice" is not the least characteristic product of his genius. With a technique for instrumentation that can only be called marvellous, and with a receptive imagination such as only a descendant of the East could possess, he has woven these Spanish tunes into a unit that is a whirlwind of color, of rhythm, of dazzling harmonic gorgeousness. Few men have understood as this Russian the magical souls of instruments; in listening one becomes obsessed and spellbound with their enchantment. A glowing performance brought a brilliant conclusion to the concert.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XVI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 29, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

SCHUMANN,

OVERTURE to Byron's "Manfred," op. 115.

DOHNÁNYI,

CONCERT PIECE in D major for ORCHESTRA, with VIOLONCELLO OBBLIGATO, op. 12.
(First time in Boston.)

BISCHOFF,

SYMPHONY in E major, op. 16.
I. Sehr schnell und feurig.
II. Sehr ruhig und getragen.
III. Presto; Ruhig.
IV. Allegro moderato.

Soloist:

Mr. HEINRICH WARNKE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Programme of Romantic and Dramatic Music, with a Piece for 'Cello and Orchestra as an Intermezzo—Bischoff's New Symphony Repeated—Its Interesting Kinship in Design, Spirit and Expression to Berlioz's Music—Schumann's "Manfred" Overture Makes Another Instance of the Same Romantic Impulse

Trans. — July 29, 08

Mr. Dohnanyi's "Concert Piece" for orchestra and violoncello, in which Mr. Warnke played the solo part at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon, is of its own kind—a discreet medium for the display of the songful, and not, happily, the capering, qualities of the instrument. Otherwise Dr. Muck's programme was romantic and dramatic in high degree, and with a particular sort of romance and drama in music. True, Schumann wrote his overture to Byron's "Manfred" (with which the concert began) in 1849 and it is classic now; while Hermann Bischoff wrote his symphony (which ended it) in 1906, and it is a new piece struggling for reward and gaining at least, thanks to Dr. Muck's faith in it, a second hearing this season in Boston. The symphony is lengthy, and it made the programme two hours long; but, theoretically it was almost a pity that some characteristic piece by Berlioz and by Liszt did not stand also upon it. Then, we that listened might have had nearly complete the particular kind of romantic and dramatic music that Schumann and Bischoff, as far as they went, exemplified. It is a sort of romance that began in literature with Schiller and some of his fellow poets and dramatists in Germany a hundred years ago; that rushed to florid flower in France in Hugo's verse and in Théophile Gautier's scarlet waistcoat, and that turned moody, gloomy or satirical in Byron in England. In music Weber was the forerunner of this romance in Germany and Schumann in his turn was deeply impregnated with it. Berlioz was its effulgent apostle in France and after him and the rest in Germany came the Liszt of the symphonic poems. In the composers of our immediate time, there are frequent traces of it in Tchaikovsky, who knew and loved his Byron, and in other Russians looking westward. With all Richard Strauss's "modernity," he has been sometimes quite as clearly the musical heir of Berlioz and Liszt and the literary heir of Byron and Hugo, as he has been the twofold child of Wagner and Nietzsche. And now in Bischoff, intimate friend of Strauss, practitioner, even imitator, of some of his polyphonic and instrumental ways, this old romantic mood of the thirties, the forties and the fifties has flowered again in music until it seemed yesterday almost an instance of musical atavism.

Berlioz, in particular, of these "romantic-fes" in music, loved the huge orchestral canvas, and his "Fantastic Symphony" is almost as long as Bischoff's own. Berlioz marshalled to his service all the instrumental forces of his time and added to them. Bischoff, as the title of his symphony runs a bit old-fashionedly, has written it "for grand orchestra." Berlioz liked to conceive huge and rather grotesque designs for his music. Recall, for example, the course of the "Fantastic Symphony" from its "dreams and passions" at the beginning through its "march to the scaffold" and its shrieking Pandemonium. Bischoff has planned his symphony in similar romantic spirit. Hear his hero moving through the wild night revelry of the beginning, and there encountering in glimpse the high-souled woman who is to redeem him. Listen to his musings in the second movement, when he seeks a calm that will not come. Hear him pursued by the gibbering and skulking phantoms of his evil days through Bischoff's scherzo, and then on to the salvation and apotheosis through the woman's soul, of the finale. Surely this is an imaginative scheme like to those of Berlioz and worthy of him. As truly it is of the old romance of Byron and all the rest, and the Bischoff who shaped it still thinks and feels in such fashion of the thirties, if he does write in the fashion of Richard Strauss of 1908. Once Berlioz had schemed his design, it almost obsessed him, and similarly Bischoff seems possessed with his own. He takes no thought of time or of means, so long as he can bring it to larger and more puissant expression. It is steadily thrilling him, even if it does not always thrill his hearers. Liszt's imagination, in turn, inclined much more to the saving and purifying woman than did Berlioz's, and Bischoff with his stress upon such an idea, thus proves a further kinship with the exemplars of romantic music of his fashion.

Thus, in brief summary, Bischoff seems dramatically and psychologically akin to Berlioz and of similar romantic impulses, prepossessions and design. At a single hearing of the symphony, moreover, he seemed scarcely less akin in his expression of such moods and visions. The art of instrumentation has advanced since Berlioz's time and gained further resource and freedom. Bischoff, with Strauss as his exemplar and counsellor, inevitably writes in the full modern idiom. But he writes with a sense of instrumental incisiveness and color, with an instrumental sweep and glow, with a bold eagerness for general orchestral power and a keen ingenuity for particular instrumental accent that are worthy of Berlioz himself. He knows equally the telling phrase, the sonorous progression, the significant combination, the overwhelming mass of tone. Again like Berlioz, he can make his orchestra write the programme of his music. A hint from the printed page, and his orchestra discloses sufficiently the obscene and wriggling shapes of his scherzo, the redemption in his finale, the foul revels of his first movement. Bischoff has no need to spread the psychology of his hero on the printed page; he has written it in his symphony, and yet kept it formal music, as truly as has Berlioz until his own "Fantastic Symphony." Bischoff's musical imaginings gain little power and vividness from their melodic contents and outline. It is their instrumental dress and their harmonic variety and vividness that make them pulsant. Above all, Bischoff has essentially in his symphony the grandiose imagination that at its best gains truly grandiose expression. Of course, he has his moments of mere orchestral sound and fury; his passion to achieve all that he designs and all that he imagines, the suggestion of almost delirious eagerness as he composes, drive him to lengths upon lengths. None the less he has his moments of an almost magnificent power in the very vein of the romance that is in him; he keeps to his bigness of idea, emotion and expression; and he touches sometimes a Poe-like vividness in his tone-picturing. If Bischoff's romance is of an outworn musical fashion, he has made it alive again.

There has been no such performance here of such music since the unforgotten night when Weingartner led the New York Symphony Orchestra in Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," and the power and the vividness of this romantic music depend much upon the performance. It must sound as hugely or as grotesquely, as magnificently or as vividly, as the composer conceived it. The conductor must share for the moment the composer's monstrous or intense vision; the men of the orchestra must feel the impulse of the composer, who as writing, so to say, with their instruments. Seldom has Dr. Muck undertaken such music; but he caught the spirit and the substance of it with his familiar openness and responsiveness of imagination to the piece in hand. More than in the ordinary sense of the words, he and his men brought Bischoff's symphony to the life and heat that the composer sought in it. The passion of the performance matched the passionate eagerness of the music, and both had the old big romantic glow. Berlioz might have listened and applauded. Schumann's overture to "Manfred" is of this same romance on a smaller canvas, an episode not an epic, but of similar intensity of rich and gloomy imagination. Where Bischoff was lavish and insistent to perilous lengths, Schumann is economical and terse. Yet not Bischoff or often Berlioz has excelled the vividness of the "gaspings" chords of the beginning of the "Manfred" overture: the relentless power of the intruding trumpets (and they are only three), the gloomy contest in excited tones that fills the body of the piece, and the slow fading of it into the shadows of the end. Bischoff and Schumann are at work under fairly similar inspirations to fairly similar purpose. The modern achieves much with much; the classic much with little. Perhaps that is the reason that he is so.

H. T. P.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Schumann—"Manfred" Overture.
Dohnanyi—Concert-piece with Violoncello Obligato.

Soloist, Mr. Heinrich Warnke.

Bischoff—Symphony in E major.

The subject of "Manfred" as treated by Byron appealed with great force to Schumann. Once, while reading it aloud in Dusseldorf, his voice broke and he burst into tears. All through this overture one can easily feel how deeply the picture of human strife and torture, until its final cessation in death, appealed to the composer. The work shows that great musical thoughts can outweigh orchestral routine, for the overture seems to have very weak tints when compared with Bischoff's mastery of the various tone-colors, yet it is decidedly the greater work of the two.

The strong contrasts were made the most of. The character of Manfred is drawn in stormy syncopations full of restlessness and vehemence. Schumann was the master of syncopation, and not Beethoven, nor Chopin, nor the hiccoughy moderns can excel him in this field. Against this picture we have the tender sadness of Astarte, one of the most beautiful themes that the melodic Schumann ever invented. The soft call of the trumpets, like a warning from beyond the grave, the fierce combat that only ends with a picture of death, these are wonderful touches, and Dr. Muck brought them out wonderfully in his reading.

Manfred dies much more effectively in this overture than he does in the cantata that follows. In the vocal score Schumann brings in a Requiem, which is about as fit as it would be at the funeral of the Sultan. This Requiem is moreover as ugly as a pupil's exercise in advanced counterpoint. At its end Manfred dies,—killed by a double canon. We much prefer the suggestion of his death as given in this overture.

The Dohnanyi orchestral composition was the right thing in the wrong place. After the earnestness of the Schumann work one would have enjoyed some brilliant display of technique, some scintillating Violoncello Concerto. This Concerto Piece, however, was subdued, poetic and without attempts at display of virtuosity. It was not in any sense an exciting work. It was artistic abnegation in Mr. Warnke to choose this number, and he played it in a very expressive and praiseworthy manner.

The suavity and refinement of his legato work, the constant care of ensemble and avoidance of undue prominence, were points that the musician would appreciate more fully than the public. The Adagio part of the work was somewhat over-long and it was only near the end that a few martial touches gave brightness to the subdued picture. The cadenza had some harmonics which were beautifully done, and it must be remembered how much more difficult harmonics are upon the cello than upon the violin, because of the thicker strings.

We could have borne a little more breadth in the C string passages, but altogether Mr. Warnke's performance was that of a master. The final shading against the persistent strokes of the kettle-drum (an effect evidently borrowed from Tschalkowsky's Pathetic Symphony, second movement) was excellently done. Mr. Warnke was recalled thrice, yet we feel that if the work had come after, say the "Magic Flute" overture, it would have made a much stronger impression.

We also feel that Bischoff's symphony was not fully appreciated, coming as it did, at 9 o'clock, and lasting until after 10 p.m. We feel, however, that this work was worth repetition at some time or other.

Yet there are other works which might take precedence if such repetitions are in order. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," for example, well deserves a rehearing. Some but not all, of the public were aware of the absolutely great performance of the symphony that they were hearing. Dr. Muck was at his very greatest in the reading and the men played more brilliantly than we have ever heard them,—which is saying very much.

But the demon of length, which has seized upon all the modern composers, has Mr. Bischoff in thrall, and he has his say, in four very long movements, any one of which might be a Symphonic Poem by itself.

In fact the first movement might well be played alone, dropping the scheme of redemption by the love of a noble woman and taking it as a picture of Vagabondia, pure (or impure) and simple. It might be entitled "Dissipation"; but it is not the hot bird and cold bottle New York dissipation; it suggests Salamanders, Bier, Seidis, midnight Maennerchoere, the German student's idea of a high old time. That fiercely bacchanalian instrument, the Piccolo, is all the time shrieking; there are constant choruses of nocturnal revellers. The movement has a kinship to "Till Eulenspiegel," and it has a heartiness that would be inspiring enough if it were heard alone.

The composer says that the second movement suggests remorse. If we follow out the above idea it might also suggest Katzenjammer, Haarweh ("Hair-ache") das Graue Elend (Grey Misery), and that state of affairs when the victim desires only a Holland herring and a few kind words for breakfast.

Seriously, however, there is beauty in each movement, but there is also reiteration. The exodus of auditors began at the close of the first movement. It was larger at the end of the second. The third movement was superbly played, and it pictured the furies chasing their victim very much as the gnomes chased Peer Gynt, but with much better orchestral effect than Grieg could attain. But it was again long, long, long, as if the composer were loth to leave his subject. But if the composer could not leave it the auditors could, and there was a distinct pilgrimage outward at the end of this. Dr. Muck looked alternately at the backs of the departing Philistines and at his watch, evidently wishing to see how long the procession took in passing a given point.

At last the finale was begun and played brilliantly to the end. There were enough lovers of modern scoring, and of superb orchestral playing left in the hall to give some hearty applause. The symphony is certainly most strenuous music; it is melodious; it is a masterpiece of scoring; the composer is not a mollicoddle by any means. But if the South could send a few of its most powerful cotton compresses to Europe and have them used on the modern orchestral composers there it would be doing a good deed for the advancement of Art.

Louis C. Elson.

A NEW SORT OF PIECE FOR THE VIOLONCELLO

Mr. Dohnanyi's "Concert Piece" as Mr. Warnke and the Orchestra Played It at the Symphony Concerts—Bischoff's Symphony Again—A Play About New England by New Englanders Acted in London—Henry Thompson Once More—Josef Hofmann Plays a Concerto of His Own—Langdon Mitchell's New Comedy—Other News

Mr. Dohnanyi, who has gradually become more composer than pianist, is an ingenious and imaginative writer for stringed instruments. His "Serenade" that the Hoffmann Quartet played here early in the season, was a well-made and pleasantly fanciful piece with agreeable feeling for the timbres of the three instruments that he used. His sonata for piano and cello, played later at one of Mr. Fox's concerts, had more workmanship than imagination, but in one respect it was notable. Mr. Dohnanyi would have none of the cello as a capering instrument, pretending to trip through passages of bravura and keep its warmth and dignity of tone. The composer seemed to respect the instrument and to heed the modern view of it: too much to abase it so. In the same spirit, seemingly, he wrote the "Concert-Piece for Orchestra with Cello Obligato" which Mr. Warnke and the Symphony Orchestra played at the concerts of Friday and Saturday. It is long, as such pieces go, but throughout Mr. Dohnanyi steadily keeps the cello a songful instrument. He gives the virtuoso his cadenza—a composer could not do less—and a cadenza that contains some very difficult harmonics, but he does not set the instrument to lumbering runs and laborious prancing. By so much, the "Concert-Piece" was good to hear. The taste for the cello, toddling heavy-footed through bravura passages, has happily vanished, and it belonged to the days when purling concertos for the flute or gurgling pieces for horn had their place on serious programmes. To the modern audience, be it at orchestral or chamber concerts, the 'cello is primarily an instrument of deep, rich, warm and sustained song, and if it is to keep its precarious place as a solo instrument, the composers who write for it and the virtuosi who play what they have written, must hold to that quality. Recall, for example, the tedium of Dvorak's concerto, which neglects it.

Even so, the song of the 'cello, however felicitously invented, modulated and brought to voice, tends to become monotonous in a piece thirty minutes long, and the ear craves a lightness, brightness, and diversity that it may not give. Mr. Dohnanyi avoids this pitfall ingeniously and interestingly. Often his "Concert-Piece" is an adroit and persuasive exercise in the combination and the contrast of the tone of the 'cello with other orchestral timbres. Sometimes, as in his cadenza, he treats the 'cello as a solo instrument in more or less of the fashion of conventional pieces for it, but oftener it is genuinely "obligato" as it weaves the dominant strand in the whole instrumental tapestry. Moreover, since Mr. Dohnanyi keeps to the songful quality of the 'cello, these fusing or contrasting tonal colors are almost always subdued. The slow section of the "Concert Piece" seems, for example, at a first hearing, too long drawn and too little varied song. At a second the ear and the fancy answer to the delicate shadings of the tonal tints; the pensive, gently rapt mood of the music communicates itself; and for once a piece for 'cello and orchestra has a touch—and more—of poetry in it. Mr. Dohnanyi was writing with imagination, and the 'cello was the becoming voice of his fancies. Neither at the beginning nor at the end does he speak more vigorously, but he writes with the same subdued air, the same delicate feeling for shaded instrumental timbres in and against the voice of the 'cello. Again, the "Concert Piece" was good to hear, because it had found a new way in which to make the 'cello interesting. Moreover, music of such spirit asked the characteristic qualities of Mr. Warnke as a virtuoso. His tone has less largeness and depth than a soft, suave, fluent and adroitly refined quality. It has almost exactly the subdued and sensitive beauty, the sustained but delicately varied songful quality that gives sympathetic and pleasurable utterance to Mr. Dohnanyi's piece. The 'cellist's mastery of the technic of his instrument was elegant ease itself; his undulating tone kept the subdued life of the music, and his shadings of that tone were as interesting in themselves as it was in contrast or combination with the other instrumental voices. Mr. Warnke indeed played with no less imagination in these things than Mr. Dohnanyi wrote. The obligato—in spite of the modest title—dominated the song, and even the cadenza was subdued to its mood.

Again, Bischoff's symphony, in all its huge and intricate orchestral fabric and in all its huge and vivid imaginings, came to mighty performance. As a tour de force of hot-breathed and sonorous-voiced orchestral eloquence, Dr. Muck and the band have done nothing within memory to match it, unless it was their performance of Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," last year. There, moreover, even Strauss set himself bounds and kept within them. Bischoff, fairly reeling with the monstrous imaginative scheme that has obsessed him, would scale the heights of heaven and, oftener, plumb the depths of hell. Sometimes he attains neither, but halts in a kind of ecstatic limbo of orchestral sound, fury, outcry and even confusion. But when he does attain one of his goals, he can write such music as that of the scherzo with its gibbering voices of old sins and its snaky phantoms of old revels—music of a harrowing grotesquerie of imagination and expression such as no one seemingly has written since Berlioz's time. There is need to return to it, as well, to match the sheer luridness, emotional and musical, that fills the debauch, in more senses than one, of the first movement. In these two parts of the symphony it is easy to believe in Bischoff as a composer of strange and monstrous imagination, a belated Poe with music for his medium, already masterful in it, already bending it to imaginings and a temperament that are like no other of his time. He would scale heaven, as in his finale, with like huge strike, and like superhuman intensity, but as yet he hardly makes his music march and cry with him. H. T. P.

16TH CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Bischoff's Composition Given
Repetition by Dr. Muck's

Herald Orchestra, Feb. 11, 08

By PHILIP HALE.

The 16th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Overture to Byron's "Manfred".....Schumann Concert piece for orchestra with 'cello obligato.....Dohnanyi
(First time here.)

Symphony in E major.....Bischoff

Bischoff's symphony, which was played here for the first time early in January, was performed again last night. It was only meet and fitting that a symphony of so great dimensions and important contents should be heard again, and especially under the conductor who brought out the work with the most patient rehearsal and the keenest objective interest.

Unfortunately the symphony suffered last evening by coming after a long drawn out concert piece by Dohnanyi. The performance of this piece might well have been deferred. The concert would have been long enough without any middle piece between the overture and the symphony, and the mood of the "Manfred" overture is an excellent preparation for that of the first symphonic movement of Bischoff. The sweetness of Dohnanyi's music, too often cloying and stretched out as molasses candy may be pulled, was here incongruous. The symphony is defiantly long, but it is well worth hearing as a whole. To enjoy it, or to appreciate with only moderate rapture, the hearer should have heard little music and that should have been familiar.

Dohnanyi's music, by the way, is in the form of a concert piece with 'cello obbligato. The solo 'cello part was played by Mr. Warnke of the orchestra, and he displayed a fine tone and many niceties in phrasing. The music is out of the common. It is monotonously sweet in sentiment; the composer, enamoured of this or that thought, either for the 'cello or as an orchestral figure in accompaniment or in the background, is loath to let anything go. But there are interesting things in this concert piece.

There are novel and charming orchestral effects; there are one or two exquisite tone pictures in miniature; there are instances of the rhythmic monotony that is oriental and hypnotic; there is, above all, a brave departure from the conventional form of the 'cello concerto with its cantilena for the mistress' eyebrow and the irritating acrobatic feats, from the pursuit of unseen flies to the imitation of the pump-handle. The bravura passages are apparently not extraneous and aggressively ornamental. They come directly from the melodic thought and are as extensions of it. Soothing music, this, but too long spun out.

Now the overture to Byron's "Manfred" and the symphony would have gone well together. Schumann's overture is probably better known to concertgoers than the tragedy that inspired it. How many in the hall could have passed a rigid examination, could have answered satisfactorily a paper of "Manfred" questions? What were Astarte's feelings toward Manfred? Explain the difference between the various spirits invoked. What did the chamol's hunter think of Manfred? Whither did the latter go when he died? Was the abbot sure of Manfred's destination?

Perhaps Manfred was Byron himself, as Hazlitt insisted, with a drapery over him, but it is a pity that the poem is not studied in the schools, for at the time when it appeared and for some years afterward it had a great influence in Europe. Goethe, no honey dauber, thought highly of it. But it became the fashion to sneer at Byron, his misanthropy and his tragic lines. Some pooh-poohed him as though he were a Fitzball or Moncrieff of oriental melo-drama with: "Now let the Almahs, with their feat steps beguile awhile my soul from moody care." But they accepted the orientalism of Disraeli and later that of Mr. Kipling.

Surely any drama that moved Schumann and Tschalkowsky to musical sympathy and to intense expression deserves even in this commercial age respectful consideration, and after a course in "Manfred," "The Corsair" and the other plays with scowling heroes, there should be a course in "Beppo" and "Don Juan." The latter is much healthier reading for the young than much of that which now serves them as literary fodder.

According to Bischoff's argument prepared for the first performance, this symphony is written in Byronic spirit. A second hearing enlarged the respect felt for the composer after the first performance. The first movement throbs with the blood of extravagant youth. There is the riotous expression of delight in the cheap joys of life. The expression is perhaps at times frankly Asiatic, to use a term dear to the old rhetoricians. There is excess here as in other movements, but this excess is not a revelation of weakness; on the contrary, it is the excess that Samuel Palmer described as "the vivifying spirit of finest art."

The second movement was more impressive throughout than at the first performance. There are passages in it that recall certain moods of "Parsifal," but they are only faint echoes of determined voices. Bischoff follows neither Strauss nor Wagner blindly. As an intimate friend of the former he has contracted certain mannerisms of speech and gesture, the way of cocking his hat—his thoughts are his own, his speech is his own, and there are times when he goes beyond his master in imaginative flights. This second movement has noble and memorable pages. The third movement is remarkable in many ways. The finale still seems the least striking of the movements.

Although there were a few false attacks in the performance of the symphony, the interpretation as a whole was a superb one, full of the rush and roar of life and the splendor of the animal man exulting or downcast. The performance of the overture was stirring and the finale was singularly beautiful as read by Dr. Muck.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Pat Feb 11, 08
Mr. Warnke, 'Cellist, Plays New Work
by Dohnanyi

At the sixteenth public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra, Hermann Bischoff's symphony, which was given for the first time in this city three weeks ago, was repeated. Schumann's "Manfred" overture opened the programme, and between the two, Mr. Warnke, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, played, for the first time here, a "Concert piece in D major, for orchestra, with Violoncello obligato," by Ernst von Dohnanyi. In many respects Schumann could not have found a subject more in consonance with his introspective and brooding temperament than the hero of Byron's overwrought drama. It is not dif-difficult to understand the fascination that the tale must have exerted upon the imaginative and romantic German. Probably the latter never created music more dramatic, and, what does not necessarily follow, suitable for the theatre, than this overture, which surely ranks among his greatest orchestral achievements. Schumann was never more truly successful in writing strains to clothe poetry than in his incidental music to "Manfred," not even in the most remarkable of the settings of scenes from Goethe's "Faust."

This music tells in every measure. Recall the sharp opening chords of the overture, the portentous trumpet motive, and what is so endearingly Schumannish, the beautiful Astarte theme as it tosses and struggles in the strings. And the orchestration is often remarkably vivid and graphic. There are many places where the composer, for a very unusual thing, appears to have thought in the characteristic idiom of his instruments.

Yet, in spite of it all, one remembers that Schumann was but half a strong man. He rarely became fearsome in his wrath. Compare this very subjective music with Tchaikowsky's overwhelming work inspired by the same theme, and small it seems, remembered by the side of that terrible woe. It is also significant that Nietzsche, the philosopher, who possessed far greater creative abilities as a musician than he was credited with by contemporaries, wrote a "Meditation on Manfred," with which the writer has been privileged to make slight acquaintance; and in this piece, where the philosopher-composer has involuntarily been influenced by our very Robert Schumann, he has, nevertheless, in our estimation, shown a greater capacity for portraying the tortured soul that Byron conceived than the illustrious romanticist that he—Nietzsche—plagiarized. The performance of the overture was highly dramatic.

The concert piece by Dohnanyi is a recent composition by that composer, and it was played for the first time by Mr. Warnke at a concert given by the orchestra in Indianapolis a few days ago. It is hard to find justification for the title of the piece, for it is not by any means an orchestral composition, with an obligatory part for 'cello. It is very obviously a 'cello solo with an orchestral accompaniment, that is usually tasteful and properly subdued in color.

A number of Dohnanyi's compositions have been given here of late years, and in some cases it has been difficult to credit the same man with having written them all, for as a composer Dohnanyi has shown two different faces. He is now boreomely pedantic, but again imaginative to a surprising and far-reaching degree.

The concert piece given yesterday takes you by the hand through pleasingly fanciful vistas, but it is unfortunately flimsy in its length and proportions. Scored for small orchestra, the accompaniment is usually very pleasing, save where, possibly to redeem the promise of the title, the orchestra momentarily overpowers the solo instrument. A striking feature of the piece is the persistent, often reiterated rhythmic beats of the kettledrum on a certain note. The figure occurs significantly as a bridge between the divisions of the work, which is in one movement, and the same note becomes the foundation of a long "pedal-point" that brings the piece to its conclusion. The composition, notwithstanding its undue length and occasional inadequacy of structure, will probably become popular with 'cellists in the future. It is in many pages contagiously charming. Mr. Warnke played eloquently with a broad and warm tone. He was cordially received.

Then—the interminable symphony. But it was right that this monstrosity should be heard again, and at the second hearing, doubtless partly owing to a surpassing performance, many interesting details showed out. The first three movements rang truer than on the previous occasion. If this composer would but refrain from his eternal quibbling, from everlasting chewing over of every single phrase or figure that his tortuous brain evolves. It is impossible to deny that there is some meat and much sincerity in the symphony; it is equally impossible to accept it as a thing of any great or permanent value. Bischoff as yet has not found his own voice; his instrumentation, swollen and artificial to an exasperating degree, is no more his own. Your clothes are loud, sir! They are beyond your means, and they do not belong to you!

ORCHESTRA GIVES A RARE CONCERT

'Cellist Warnke, the Soloist, and
Dr. Muck Conducts With Superb Effect.

Heinrich Warnke, the leading 'cellist of the orchestra, was the soloist at the Symphony concert Saturday night. He chose to introduce to Boston Dohnanyi's new concert piece in D major, with 'cello obbligato. The work had its first performance in this country in Indianapolis on Jan. 28, when the orchestra was on its Western tour. It is not altogether impressive or even interesting, but it gave Mr. Warnke an opportunity to display his beautiful tone and equally beautiful artistry. Mr. Warnke is a thoroughbred artist, skilled in technique, and, what is far more to the point in these days of mechanical players, absolutely responsive to the spirit of the piece he plays. Feeling and intelligence combined with dexterity make him one of the most distinguished 'cellists of the day. So he proved himself to be on this occasion.

The orchestra itself was in rare fettle and gave a memorable performance of Bischoff's powerful symphony in E major, the much-discussed work that had its initial American performance at the first Symphony concert of the year. It is an epoch-marking work as regards both its artistic and its dramatic qualities. It is the highest praise to say that the orchestra, under the stimulating leadership of Dr. Muck, apparently did full justice to it. Equally effective was the performance of Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred," with which the concert began.

The soloist next Saturday night will be Mme. Katharine Goodson, who will play here for the first time the Hinton concerto for piano. The program also offers the Converse "Jeanne d'Arc" music and MacDowell's "Indian Suite."

WARNKE'S SOLOS STIR BIG AUDIENCE

Bas. am. — Mch. 2. 08
Round after round of enthusiastic applause greeted Heinrich Warnke, violincello soloist, at the Symphony concert last night, when he played with the orchestra Dohnanyi's concert piece in D major, heard for the first time in Boston.

The orchestra in this number showed in a striking manner the perfect ensemble, beauty of shading, fine attacks and splendid phrasing for which it is noted, while Mr. Warnke played with the finish, authority and tonal beauty which is so characteristic of him, and proved himself surely a genius in his art.

The other numbers on the programme were Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred" and Bischoff's Symphony in E major.

The overture was rendered in a broad, beautiful and noble style. In the three syncopated opening chords one is clearly reminded of the crime which hangs over Manfred with its oppressive weight, and quite as plainly the battle seen, beginning in the slow movement. The elements are all apparent—Manfred's wild, impetuous struggle for freedom, in the syncopated violin motives; the obstinate resistance of the dark spirits and Manfred's guilt in powerful chords; Astarte's image as the mild consoler in the sweeter motive and the passionate raging of the battle in the allegretto, and so on up to Manfred's death at the close. The whole was given with the greatest of beauty.

The four movements in Bischoff's Symphony were each given with a delicacy and charm that was irresistible. They were played with spirit and a fine feeling for the dainty and graceful charms in which the Symphony abounds, and told vividly the story of a young man who, living a wild life, becomes acquainted with happiness when he is no longer worthy of it, and therefore cannot possess it.

Katherine Goodson will be the soloist at next week's Symphony, when the following programme will be given: Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc," Dramatic Scene for Orchestra; Hinton's Concerto for piano-forte and McDowell's Indian Suite.

GLOBE—MARCH 1,

MUSICAL MATTERS

Repetition of Bischoff's Colossal Symphony.

The 16th Symphony program began with Schumann's overture to "Manfred," then followed for the first time here Dohnanyi's concert piece for 'cello and orchestra, Mr. Heinrich Warnke soloist, closing with a repetition of the colossal E major symphony by Bischoff, which made so profound an impression when played here early in January of this year. This is said to be the most difficult new work attempted by the orchestra under Dr. Muck, and a second hearing justifies the statement.

The symphony is rightly termed colossal, for the difficulties sprinkled through the score of each contingent are so numerous that many rehearsals were required before the present state of their standard in ensemble work was reached by the orchestra men. An hour of such music as this taxes not only the endurance of players and the conductor, but the auditor, if appreciative, feels there has been a test for him to stand which could not be called trivial.

The musical illustration of the adventures of a Don Juan was shown in all the vividness of tonal coloring that marked the earlier performances. An impressive interpretation of a big composition by a body of skilled players epitomizes the facts in this case. That Bischoff's work was better played than before may be true; at all events some of the heavier instrumentation sounded more euphonious and possibly on the second hearing the composition, like others of solid worth, "grew upon" the hearer. The audience evidently enjoyed the performance, for the applause was spontaneous and hearty.

The first 'cellist of the orchestra, Mr. Warnke, gave a fine performance of his part in the Dohnanyi concert piece. The 'cello score runs so largely to sustained passages of melody, the legato figures predominating, that the beauti-

204
The quality of Mr. Warnke's work made the piece specially interesting. Had there been lapses from the pitch in fingering or rough bowing the general suavity of the composition would have been cloying.

But there was nothing of the kind, and the refinement, expressive changes in phrasing and perfect tone production again gave evidences of the splendid abilities of the first cellist of the orchestra. The support of his fellow-players was all that could be desired and the approbation of the audience for Mr. Warnke's performance was generously expressed. The Schumann overture was given with fine effect.

In this week's program two of the three composers are American, and the third is English. For the first time the orchestra will play Mr. Converse's dramatic scenes for orchestra, entitled "Jeanne d'Arc." This was incidentally music written for the performances of a play which was presented last year by Mr. Sothorn and Miss Marlowe. At one of his concerts last season Mr. Goodrich played these scenes, but since then the composer has extensively revised them.

The Englishman is Mr. Hinton, the husband of Katharine Goodson, who will be the soloist and who will play for the first time in Boston Mr. Hinton's concerto for piano. The other number will be Edward MacDowell's "Indian Suite."

205
Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XVII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 7, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

CONVERSE,

DRAMATIC SCENES for ORCHESTRA, "Jeanne d'Arc."

(First time at these concerts.)

HINTON,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE.

(First time in Boston.)

MACDOWELL,

INDIAN SUITE.

Soloist:

Mme. KATHARINE GOODSON.

204
ful cantabel quality of Mr Warnke's work made the piece specially interesting. Had there been lapses from the pitch in fingering or rough bowing the general suavity of the composition would have been cloying.

But there was nothing of the kind, and the refinement, expressive changes in phrasing and perfect tone production again gave evidences of the splendid abilities of the first cellist of the orchestra. The support of his fellow-players was all that could be desired and the approbation of the audience for Mr Warnke's performance was generously expressed. The Schumann overture was given with fine effect.

In this week's program two of the three composers are American, and the third is English. For the first time the orchestra will play Mr Converse's dramatic scenes for orchestra, entitled "Jeanne d'Arc." This was incidentally music written for the performances of a play which was presented last year by Mr Sothern and Miss Marlowe. At one of his concerts last season Mr Goodrich played these scenes, but since then the composer has extensively revised them.

The Englishman is Mr Hinton, the husband of Katharine Goodson, who will be the soloist and who will play for the first time in Boston Mr Hinton's concerto for piano. The other number will be Edward MacDowell's "Indian Suite."

205
Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XVII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 7, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

CONVERSE,

DRAMATIC SCENES for ORCHESTRA, "Jeanne d'Arc."

(First time at these concerts.)

HINTON,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE.

(First time in Boston.)

MACDOWELL,

INDIAN SUITE.

Soloist:

Mme. KATHARINE GOODSON.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XVII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 7, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

CONVERSE,

DRAMATIC SCENES for Orchestra, op. 23. "Jeanne d'Arc."

- I. Im Domrémy.
- II. Pastoral Reverie.
- III. Battle Hymn.
- IV. Night Vision.
- V. The Maid of God.

(First time at these concerts.)

HINTON,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE & ORCHESTRA, op. 24.

- I. Allegro con spirito.
- II. Scherzo: Allegro; Tempodi valse.
- III. Andante con moto.
- IV. Moderato ma con spirito.

(First time in Boston.)

MACDOWELL,

ORCHESTRAL SUITE in E minor, No. 2, "Indian," Op. 48.

- I. Legend: Not fast; with much dignity and character.
Twice as fast; with decision.
- II. Love Song; Not fast; tenderly.
- III. In War Time: With rough vigor, almost savagely.
- IV. Dirge: Dirge-like, mournfully.
- V. Village Festival: Swift and light.

Soloist:

Mme. KATHARINE GOODSON.

The Pianoforte is a Mason and Ham

ENGLISH PIANIST STAR AT SYMPHONY

Boston — American
Playing of Husband's Concerto Greeted by Large and Appreciative Audience.

March 8, 1908

Mme. Katherine Goodson, the young English pianist, was the attraction at last night's Symphony concert, and was greeted by one of the largest and most appreciative audiences of the season. She made an attractive appearance in a clinging gown of pale pink liberty satin and lace, and played her English husband's Arthur Hinton's, concerto in D minor. Her playing was magnificent in mastery of technical difficulties and finish of style. Especially noteworthy was her rendering of the second movement, Scherzo, Allegro, Tempo di valse.

Possessing a beautiful tone and a brilliant technique, she plays with fine interpretative feeling and spirit, and the finish, authority and tonal beauty so characteristic of the artist, were especially notable in the second movement.

She showed a keen appreciation of all the agitated and tender, beautiful moods in the other movements, which she played with great beauty and depth of feeling, but at times agitato was somewhat over-emphasized.

The other two numbers on the program were Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc," played for the first time at these concerts, and MacDowell's Orchestral Suite in E minor.

"Jeanne d'Arc" was played with spirit and a fine feeling for the dainty and graceful charms in which it abounds. The first movement, "In Domremy," presents the light-hearted, idyllic atmosphere of the early scenes of Mackaye's drama, with suggestions of the distant war. It contains the vesper music and Jeanne's reverie, the airy music of the Ladies of Lorraine and the love song to Jeanne by her peasant lover. The second movement is a simple idyllic reverie in which the pastoral tones of the peasant pipe are heard.

The third, the "Battle Hymn," depicts the departure of the soldiers and friars for battle, the fourth, the "Night Vision," the sleeping of the wearied Jeanne in the moon lit woods; and the fifth movement, "The Maid of God," opens with the chant of the priests for the soul of the condemned Jeanne, after which comes an emotional resume of her whole career, beginning with a simple motive, which is gradually woven into more and more martial strains, leading up to the music of the pageant scene when the King marches to Rheims to be crowned, after which comes the chant of priests and the Kyrie Eleison.

Dr. Muck's reading of the whole was sympathetic, dignified and vigorous, and the performance was one of the best the orchestra has ever given under his direction.

The MacDowell suite consists of five movements, all long drawn out and on the whole somewhat tedious, but the orchestra's playing of it was spirited and masterly.

At next week's concert, Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" will be repeated and Mill Balakireff's symphony in C major and Chabrier's overture "Gwendoline" given.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

DR. MUCK PICKS ANGLO-AMERICAN

From: COMPOSERS March 7, 1908

Converse with His "Jeanne d'Arc" Music, Hinton with His Piano Concerto, and MacDowell with His "Indian" Suite—Music of the Theatre and Music of the Concert Room—The MacDowell of the Orchestra and the MacDowell of Other Fields and Means—Miss Goodson Reappears

Dr. Muck has invented a new sort of racial programme. Last winter, he had his all-Slav and all-Czech lists, and a fortnight hence in New York, he is to have his all-American. English orchestral composers, academic or unacademic, are too little known or too much neglected on this side of the Atlantic for an all-British list, but such programmes are common enough in London. An English pianist, Miss Goodson, happened to play her English husband's, Arthur Hinton's, concerto at the Symphony Concert yesterday. Before it stood the "Dramatic Scenes" that Mr. Converse has arranged from his music of last year to Percy MacKaye's poetic play, "Jeanne d'Arc." For the end of the concert came MacDowell's "Indian" suite, and thus Dr. Muck made the first Anglo-American programme that it is easy to recall here or anywhere else. Thus he "unified" it, as he seeks usually to do, in a kind of duality, and presumably he was content. Certainly it was no reproach to the Anglo-Saxon race of the three composers that the concert seemed less interesting than most of its recent predecessors. To count each movement of the three pieces separately, as the mathematically musical sometimes do, fourteen "numbers" stood upon the programme, made the concert more than two hours long, and provoked the usual intermezzi of the departing. Mr. Converse's "Dramatic Scenes" would have borne performance in concert no better had a Frenchman happened to sign them. Mr. Hinton's concerto would have been no less glittering tinsel had a Russian set his name to it, and the "Indian" suite would have seemed no less familiar and no less suggestive of the composer's orchestral limitations, had MacDowell lived all his life—and perhaps more happily in the end—at the Wiesbaden of his youth and become as thorough-going a German as Templeton Strong, Arthur Bird and other "American" musicians. None of the three pieces was quite satisfying or quite stimulating, and it was this circumstance rather than mere length that made the concert seem a little dull and kept the applause, except for Miss Goodson herself, rather scanty.

In spite of adaptation and revision for a large orchestra and the concert-room, Mr. Converse's music to "Jeanne d'Arc" remains the music of the theatre it was designed to be. Mr. Converse is still a young composer who takes his work with unobtrusive seriousness, especially when it is work for the theatre, toward which instinct and practice, talents and temperament, more and more prompt him. Your old musical and theatrical hand tosses off incidental and decorative music for what the eminent programmist love to call a "stage play," as easily as he can. Experience has taught him that actor-managers are prone to make havoc of it, and that audiences almost never listen to it. Therefore he approaches his "job" mechanically and accomplishes it no less so. Mr. Converse in the end had his full measure of the misfortunes that make incidental music a vain thing in the theatre, but he undertook and pursued his task as though they might never befall. He did not write music that merely filled the pauses and decorated the lyric movements of Mr. MacKaye's play and of Miss Marlowe's and Mr. Sothorn's acting of it. By genuinely sympathetic and recreating imagination, he made his music an integral part of the poetic and dramatic scheme and the poetic and dramatic expression of the piece. Imperfectly heard as it was in the theatre, played as it was by a small and clumsy band, it helped to link and lead the moods of the successive scenes, to compass the atmosphere that should surround them, to suggest and impart emotion, traits, spirit and circumstance. Intrinsically it was music of the theatre and of a particular piece in the theatre.

Mr. MacKaye's play has passed from the stage, and we fear Mr. Converse's music must soon pass with it. Heard independently in the concert-room, it loses in suggestive and imaginative quality more than it gains by favoring surroundings, and by so understanding and sympathetic a performance as Dr. Muck and his men gave of it. For example, the third of the "Dramatic Scenes" is a "Battle Hymn" in which, apparently, Mr. Converse imagines Jeanne's soldiery and their attendant monks, moving to battle and fighting and winning it to the frowning and striding, confident or exalted measures of the mediæval Latin hymn, "Veni, Creator." He works out his design with the music of the hymn leading to music of combat and finally rising triumphant through it—a conventional design, as it seemed yesterday, conventionally executed. Heard in the theatre, where the music followed Jeanne's bidding of her prince to war for France and preceded the camp and battle of the ensuing scene, it caught the listener's imagination at the fall of the curtain and held and moulded it until the curtain rose again. So, too, with the "Pastoral Reverie," as Mr. Converse now calls the second of the "Dramatic Scenes." Heard in the concert room, it is an agreeable idyl, a pensive vision adroitly and fancifully suggested in tones. Heard in the theatre, after the scene under the oak of Domrémy, where Jeanne's warrior saints and beckoning angels first call her to her task, it seemed the continuation of her visions as they led and upbore her to her prince's castle. Again the music was of a character, episodes and environment, of a particular dramatic narrative that no imagination in the devising and development, in the contrast or the combination, of melodies can summon.

The other three "scenes" are only in little better case. The shadowy and filmy tonal coloring and the mysterious harmonic suggestion of the "Night Vision" do give the music a delicate life and appeal of its own apart from its place in the original musico-dramatic narrative of Jeanne's troubled slumber, her longing comrade and her protecting archangel. It is hard indeed to recall any music by Mr. Converse, except here and there in "The Pipe of Desire," of such fine texture. The first of the "Dramatic Scenes"—the prelude to the play—half brings moods and pictures that nothing—in the concert room—completes and sharpens. The final "scene" is the epitome and the glorification of a tragedy that the unprepared listener of yesterday could know only in faint outline. Thus, Mr. Converse's music seemed not unlike a well-made garment that lacks the living and individual body upon which only it can fittingly and characteristically hang. Inevitably such an unfilled musical coat seemed of rather conventional cut and had a certain emptiness. Yet how full it is of suggestion, mood and character, how complete and individual it is in its place on the dramatic and poetic form for which it was woven. How imaginative it then seems, those who heard it, albeit imperfectly, in the theatre and with Mr. MacKaye's play can still and warmly recall. Because it is so fully and finely accomplished its purpose, it was a notable achievement in the music of the theatre, but by the same token it cannot be shifted to the concert room and keep all of its life and quality.

Thus far, Mr. Converse has been essentially a composer for orchestra and for the stage. His few songs leave no very keen or lasting impression; his string quartet is more suggestive of skilful and economical workmanship than of any instinctive or acquired aptitude for chamber music. By inner promptings and outward accomplishment he is most truly and fully himself in the larger forms and in dramatic mood and circumstance. So placed, he can make—as he often does in the "Dramatic Scenes"—a modicum of inspiration go a long way by the ingenuity, feeling and imagination with which he brings it to orchestral utterance. MacDowell on the other hand, had this instinctive aptitude and feeling for the smaller musical forms and for less dramatic and more lyric mood and circumstance. He is most natural, individual, and of his finest traits in his piano sonatas, his songs, and his short piano pieces. His orchestral pieces seem measurably tours-de-force. They are wrought with thoughtful labor oftener than they spring from decisive imagination and compelling inspiration. By common consent the "Indian" suite of yesterday's concert is the crown of MacDowell's orchestral work. In it he touches a vividness and freedom, a poetry and power that he gained nowhere else in his larger compositions. Yet as the "Indian" suite followed the "Dramatic Scenes" (with only the harmonic gimeracks and the tinsel brilliance of Mr. Hinton's concerto between), it was easy to feel that Mr. Converse had brought his imaginings to fuller orchestral expression than had MacDowell his. In the two particular instances, MacDowell had the more to say and was the more possessed by vivid imaginings and the mood that they awoke and sustained in him. Mr. Converse makes orchestrally much out of imaginatively and comparatively little. MacDowell, even in the relative maturity of the "Indian" suite cannot make the orchestra seem his full, submissive, resourceful, and characteristic medium. The feeling of an expressive tour-de-force will persist.

And to say this is not to abate one jot of admiration for the results that MacDowell, however out of his truer elements, has achieved in the suite. Again yesterday, the "Legend" was as the idealized voice of a wild, strong, ancient and passionate race, idealized in its turn by the poet in tones who was speaking for it. Again the love song haunted like a voice across a still lake through a still and shadowy forest. The savage feet heat; the savage song rose and died and rose again—and thrillingly at Dr. Muck's hands—when MacDowell set his Indians warring. The voice of wild lament that will not be comforted rose from a dark, empty and solitary place in the dirge; and at the end the village had its swift revel (be it Indian or no). Here once and again, perhaps, Dr. Muck, a little sentimentalized the music as he did Mr. Chadwick's very American piece a few weeks ago, but oftener he gave it a vividness that made it spring to life from the printed page. The sombre power, the wild poetry, the note of a high, strong, but primitive and solitary race, all spoke in the performance. And yet, and yet—the music did not bring the full and transporting pleasure, the fine æsthetic satisfactions, the recurring thrill, the sense of a unique and persuasive personality that come warmly and absorbingly from MacDowell's piano sonatas and from some of his "sketches" and "idylls" and songs. He could not make the many and obstinate voices of the orchestra serve him as he could compel the single voice of the piano. He plied them more by will and thought than by instinctive aptitude and feeling. He was no weaver of tonal tapestries, no painter of tonal frescoes. His were the smaller palette and the smaller canvas.

The big voice, even when he deliberately chose it, was not his voice. Groves stirred here more truly than forests, a tangled garden more than a prairie. A flash of lyric fancy, a moment of lyric melancholy, a vision of glorified legend, a dream haunted with mystery were more characteristic than savage dance and savage dirge. In matter and in manner the "Indian" suite is MacDowell's orchestral tour-de-force, but like all such feats, it is not quite complete, satisfying, and of the normal man that wrought it. He attempted it sincerely; he achieved it as sincerely and with what power and responsiveness of imagination. But—the listener goes home to open "The Woodland Sketches," or take down "The Four Little Poems." —H. T. P.

Dr. Muck Offers Fine Attractions

Frederick Converse and Katherine Goodson Attract Many to the Symphony Rehearsal.

Journal — March 7, 1908
Symphony Hall was crowded yesterday for the rehearsal because of the triple attractions offered by Dr. Muck. Frederick Converse was given a hearing of his "Jeanne d'Arc," and his wide popularity swelled the crowd. Katherine Goodson, who was a picture in white silk, with glistening gold embroidery, rendered a concerto written by her husband, Mr. Hinton, and MacDowell was honored.

Seen in the entrance crush were Mrs. Hollis Hunnewell, with Mrs. John L. Gardner; Mrs. James T. Bowlker, Mrs. Wirt Dexter, Mrs. Winthrop Sargent, Mary Ashton, Mrs. Oliver Crocker Stevens, Mrs. Walter Scott Fitz, Mrs. Lester Leland, Mrs. Frederick Ayer, Mrs. John C. Phillips, Mrs. George Lee, Miss Wainwright, Juliet Higginson, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Rosamond Dixey, Mrs. Karl Muck, Mrs. Richard Hamlin Jones, Marie Celeste Stranahan, Mr. and Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, Stewart Baird, Mrs. T. P. Gooding, Mrs. Benjamin F. Pitman, Mrs. James Lowell Putnam, Mrs. Edwin U. Curtis, Mrs. William Ames, Mrs. Gordon Abbott, Mrs. George Cushing, Mrs. E. F. Bates, Mrs. George C. Lee, Jr., Miss Hardy, Mrs. John Reece, Mrs. Nathan Matthews, Mrs. C. Dowse, Miss Eleanor Cotton, Miss Grace Edwards, Mrs. W. P. Shreve, Miss Stackpole and many more of the devotees.

'JEANNE D'ARC' AT SYMPHONY HALL

Converse's Suite of Dramatic Scenes Given at 17th
Concert.

ORCHESTRA EXCELLED
IN MacDOWELL'S 'DIRGE'

Many Considered His 'Indian'
Suite a Touching Memorial Service.

Herald By PHILIP HALE. March 8, 1908

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

"Jeanne d'Arc," dramatic scenes...Converse Concerto for piano.....Hinton
"Indian" Suite.....MacDowell

Mr. Converse's suite is taken from the music to Percy Mackaye's drama, which was produced in Philadelphia and played here a little over a year ago at the Boston Theatre, with Julia Marlowe as the Maid of Orleans. Mr. Sothorn at the time was anxious that his plays should have appropriate music, and he provided an orchestra of respectable size, for a playhouse, and a competent conductor. Unfortunately he did not reckon on the indifference of the audience.

In Boston the entr'actes were heard with difficulty by those who were interested in Mr. Converse and his work. Some men left their seats, presumably in search of fresh air, and returned smelling of fireworks. Others entertained the women in their charge by finding fault with the drama and by diverting gossip. There was much coughing. The music was lost in the din. Soon after this performance the suite was played at an orchestral concert, led by Mr. Goodrich, in Jordan Hall, and it then made a pleasing impression, as descriptive or suggestive music without any inevitable association with the play that called it into being. The performance last night confirmed this impression.

Mr. Converse has not attempted to compose a symphonic poem in five movements, a work laid out on broad lines.

He has not endeavored to explain in music the singular theory of Dr. Icard concerning the cause of Jeanne's hallucinations, nor do his scenes purport to be deeply psychological. He wrote music for a drama and with the playhouse in view. His music should be taken in the spirit in which it was composed.

Let it be granted at once that the "Battle Hymn" is purely theatrical and without marked significance for concert purposes, and that as a concert piece the interest of the finale is not sustained from the beginning to the end. Yet in this very finale there are beautiful pages and the ending has genuine pathos.

The other movements, "In Domremy," "Pastoral Reverie" and "Night Visions," have excellent qualities. The melodic lines are clear, flowing and individual. There is a sense of dramatic contrast and a marked richness of orchestral color; above all there is the successful expression of a sympathy with a heroine, a sympathy that is not allowed to become either weakly sentimental or bombastically heroic; in a word there is the expression that comes from the exercise of the imaginative faculty.

Nor is it necessary to know the text of the drama in order to share the various moods of the composer. Furthermore, in his expression of thought Mr. Converse is here freer and more spontaneously poetic both in lyric flight and in poignant suggestion than in some of his more important and preceding works. The overture would be a more complete and rounded whole if the last few measures were omitted. They are not only superfluous; they change, and without effect, the mood and line of thought which a sensitive hearer feels should bring the logical, inevitable conclusion.

There are charming orchestral pictures throughout the work. The blending of timbres and the succession of timbres are often arranged with uncommon skill; this is to be observed especially in the "Pastoral Reverie." It should also be remarked that although Mr. Converse employs a very large orchestra, some of his most striking effects are gained by apparently simple means; by an exquisite sense of the value of tints and demitints in his orchestral painting.

Mr. Hinton's concerto was played in Boston for the first time. When it was played at the last Worcester festival by Mme. Katharine Goodson, the composer's wife and the pianist of last evening, the piece seemed well suited to the virtuoso's purposes. Last night the concerto seemed on the whole laboriously constructed, without real melodic charm; music that is not a lucid expression of the composer's intentions, however honorable they may have been; music that suggested manufacture by contract labor. Mme. Goodson played with nervous energy and brilliance of mechanism, and displayed a spirit of wifely devotion.

Dr. Muck and the orchestra gave a most eloquent interpretation of the "Dirge" in MacDowell's "Indian" suite. The "Dirge" itself is the crowning glory of a highly original and engrossing work. This lamentation might be that of the dying race. There is nothing of the luxury of woe; there is no conventional music for "threadbare crape and tears." There is the dignity of man who has been familiar with nature, who has known the voices of the day and of the night on lonely prairie and in sombre forest. There is serene yielding to fate.

To many in the audience this performance was the most touching of memorial services in honor of the dead composer.

"Cut is the branch that might have grown full straight,
And burned is Apollo's laurel bough."

MUSICAL MATTERS

Longest of the Season's Symphony Concerts.

Converse, MacDowell and Hinton Represented.

Grand Opera Promises—
Current Events.

Dr Muck's Anglo-American Symphony program, the 17th of the season, was of generous proportions, nearly two and one-quarter hours being required for playing the "Jeanne d'Arc" scenes by Frederick S. Converse, Arthur Hinton's D minor concerto for piano and orchestra and Edward MacDowell's "Indian" orchestral suite. Mme Katharine Goodson played the piano part in the Hinton concerto, which represented the English division of the program. This and the Converse work were given for the first times at these concerts.

Mr Converse originally wrote the "Jeanne d'Arc" music for the drama produced by Miss Marlowe and Mr Sothorn in 1906 and subsequently the composer revised his work and amplified it for a large orchestra. Since it was performed in Jordan hall about a year ago further changes have been made in portions of the score, but the fundamental structure remains the same, and its idyllic tone pictures suggesting incidents in the life of the French girl heroine and martyr are again welcome, and especially so when shown in vivid and effective contrasts, which was the case under Dr Muck's direction.

The five divisions are admirably varied. In the first the hint at battles to come is skilfully woven into the gentler measures representing peace, the latter idea being developed in pastoral form in the succeeding part. The vigor of the battle hymn and tumult and din of battle are splendidly set forth in the instrumentation of the third movement; the mystery and confusion in the "Night Vision" is typically weird and suggestive of the scene where Jeanne is sleeping in the woods and visions flit across her weary brain.

In the "resumé" in the finale Mr Converse handles skilfully former material in new combinations, working up a grand climax just before the exquisite melody at the close which is in the nature of an apotheosis. The work is one of great merit, and although modern and very effective is not abstruse and overburdened with dissonants and cross-harmonies to produce effects. The former commendation of the "scenes" holds good now, and the orchestral work brought out in new light their many fine passages.

Mme Goodson, as soloist in the Hinton piano concerto, gave a brilliant exhibition of her attainments, in which the velocity of finger work under various conditions was dazzling; and the facility of technique did not impair the limpidity of playing in pianissimo, which is frequently the case. And in chord passages in fortissimo she was in most instances able to hold her own with the orchestra.

The concerto, which was written by her husband, shows Mme Goodson's abilities to excellent advantage; but she has already proved herself an artist of exceptional power and a general encomium for her performance as a whole really is praise enough at this time. The beauty of her crisp, delicate and sparkling pianissimo in the second movement will not soon be forgotten by those who heard it, and the energy and verve of the last movement was nearly as effective, when association with the orchestra is considered. The artist was rapturously applauded and called back several times.

The "Indian" suite by MacDowell is familiar, but a repetition of this sterling work again shows its worth as a contribution to musical literature. Conceived in a broad and patriotic spirit, the lamented composer worked out ideas according to his own high standard, and illustrated his pictures in a musical form, full of poetic characteristics.

All in all, the orchestra was more satisfactory in interpreting this work than in the other two. The quaint and typical "Indian" motifs, the "love song," which gave the wood winds their chances; the roughly strenuous war-time dances, which gave all the intonements something to do, and the "Dirge" were each made interesting, and held the auditors despite the length of the program. And the jollity of the "Village Festival" was indisputably in evidence, so gayly was it rushed through.

For the first time the name of Balakireff, one of the leading Russian composers, will appear on a Boston Symphony program this week. He will be represented by his symphony in C minor, the one work of the kind he has written. It was played for the first time in this country by the Chicago orchestra in January, 1907, and was announced for performance by the Russian society in New York, but for some reason was not given.

Mr Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," which had such a success at the symphony concerts earlier in the season, will be repeated, with Mr Gebhard as pianist. The final number on the program will be Chabrier's overture "Gwendoline."

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Converse—Dramatic Scenes from "Jeanne d'Arc."
Hinton—Piano concerto in D minor.
Pianist, Mme. Katharine Goodson.
MacDowell—"Indian Suite."

An American and English programme! For once Germany and Russia and France were put upon the shelf and the Anglo-Saxons ruled. Yet the programme was indigestible in spots.

Converse's Scenes from "Jeanne d'Arc" sustained the good impression we had formed of it when heard under Mr. Wallace Goodrich's leadership, in Jordan Hall. It might be shorter and the finale might be less vague, but there is a firm grasp of the subject, an absolute mastery of the orchestra, and good poetic instinct in the work. The genius of Mr. Converse is more orchestral than vocal. His "Job" is to be given in Hamburg shortly, but we wish that Germany might make his acquaintance through his less severe and more romantic orchestral music.

The opening movement of his "Scenes" (they are more ambitious than a "Suite") "In Domremy," is to our mind, one of the finest movements in American orchestral music. Its suggestion of village chimes, its rustic second theme, its development of a simple two-noted, Iambic, figure, its strong contrasts, its brilliant end (its piccolo phrases suggest the end of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture) all these points combine to make a very dignified and interesting movement.

The succeeding Pastoral introduces some effective English horn playing, which was excellently executed. The "Night Vision" began like a beautiful "Waldesweben," a moonlight picture that might compare with Schumann's graphically in this direction. In this the unusual Celesta, a set of bell-chimes combined with wooden sounding-boards, and infinitely sweeter than the Glockenspiel, was used very effectively.

The finale, as already intimated, we do not find so powerful as other parts of the work. This ingenious summing up was scarcely necessary. It would have been better to have ended with the battle-scene, which would make a glorious climax. This combative movement is one of the finest parts of the work. It is full of what Shakespeare would mark—"Alarums and excursions," but it is intelligible in the midst of its fury. It is far more coherent than the rough and tumble fight which Strauss has given in his "Heldenleben." The working up of the grand old mediaeval hymn forms a noble end to the movement and would, musically if not historically, make an effective conclusion to a set of movements.

The new concerto by Mr. Arthur Hinton, although effective in its finale, is a somewhat labored work. It gave very few points of melodic ease; the attention of the auditor was strenuously claimed in every measure. The development of a four-noted kettle-drum figure was not quite so easy to follow as the treatment of a somewhat similar idea by Beethoven in his violin concerto. All through the first movement matters were turgid and not easily grasped. But the second movement was more graceful and dainty with its idealization of a waltz-rhythm and its piquant contrasts.

The Andante was in the nature of a long introduction to the finale. It was in a preluding and improvisational vein, although, as in every part of the work, there was some ingenuity of figure treatment. This thematic development (especially in the first movement) proved Mr. Hinton an able musician, a skillful composer, but he should not allow his learning to obscure the melodic and romantic side.

The finale had some fiery and brilliant treatment. There was a martial and triumphant vein in one of its themes, there was a fine working up to a climax, and there was an exciting stretto and coda. It is, we think, the first movement that over-weights this concerto, for the second and last movements have many points of beauty.

Mme. Goodson played the work like a consummate artist. Happy the composer who has her as his interpreter. Every point of the work was given with loving care, such as Clara Schumann used to bestow upon the piano works of her great husband. The delicacy of the second movement, the pensive character of the Andante and the tremendous energy of the finale were all excellently given. The bravura of the end was incomparably fine. The audience responded heartily to this climax and recalled Mme. Goodson three times.

Then came MacDowell's "Indian Suite." Dr. Muck did not conduct this with a tomahawk and the orchestra refrained from war-whoops. The work scarcely made as great an impression on the reviewer as when it was given by Emil Paur. The Dirge was drawn out to such a slow tempo that it nearly fell apart (possibly a "Grave" movement fits best to a Dirge), and the galloping off of the warriors in the third movement could have been made more graphic.

We dislike to see the marks of expression in the English language, as MacDowell has used them. The present writer (in his Dictionary of Music) has stated the case as follows:—

"Although Schumann and Wagner use German terms in their works, and Berlioz and the Cesar Franck school, French, Italian is the preferable tongue for musical terms, for the following reasons: 1st. It has priority. It was the first language used in this field, and has been in almost universal use for three centuries. 2d. It is impossible to allow each composer the use of his native language. If Liszt had used Hungarian, Tchaikowsky Russian, Dvorak Bohemian, Grieg Norwegian, etc., we should find many more difficulties in the matter than in the use of a single language. 3d. Musical notation is a single, universal, written language. Such a language requires an equally universal set of tempo or expression-marks. Exactly as in affairs of state, diplomats have chosen the French language as the universal tongue, music has chosen Italian as her language of tempo and expression-marks; and we urge upon every composer to further this unity by discarding English, French, or German markings, and using Italian only."

Nor is the use of real Indian themes in this work of any great importance. The Indian songs were too local, too tribal, to become really national folk-music in any true sense of the word. Of course it did not much matter where the themes came from, for they were MacDowellized. One could give a great composer a theme from a pupil's finger-exercise and he would be able to make something musical out of it by thematic treatment, as the French cook was able to make a palatable dish out of an old glove.

The Indians in this Suite are inclined to Wagnerism and are ready to discharge muted horns and clarinettes on the slightest provocation.

The beauties of the work need no re-statement. It is a poetic and impressive picture, and in Europe it is likely to arouse especial interest as ethnological music. But after repeated hearings we do not rank it quite as great as some of MacDowell's other orchestral composition, although it is always worthy of a high place in the native repertoire. Louis C. Elson.

UNUSUAL INCIDENTS MARK SYMPHONY CONCERT

"Hands-Across-the-Sea" Program,
Directed by Eminent German Conductor—Glockenspiel Adds Its Harmony.

Unusual incidents and arrangements made the Symphony concert of Saturday night memorable. In the first place the program was entirely English-American—the "Jeanne d'Arc" music of F. S. Converse, who, though a native of Newton and a resident of Westwood, is classed among the Boston composers; the concerto in D minor for piano and orchestra, written by Arthur Hinton of London, and MacDowell's "Indian" suite, written when the lamented composer was living in Boston, and dedicated to the Symphony Orchestra and its conductor at that time, Emil Paur.

Two of the composers honored with places on the program were present at the concert—Mr. Converse and Mr. Hinton. However, neither one of them made his presence generally known by acknowledgment of applause. There was a long call for Mr. Converse, but he held his seat firmly and modestly. Dr. Muck responded until he got suspicious of the intent of the applause and shrugged his shoulders as if to inquire what it was all about.

Tribute to Dead Composer.

As for the third composer, MacDowell, this was the first time one of his works appeared on a Symphony program since his death late in January. The dirge—the fourth movement—made it seem particularly appropriate. And possibly on account of the memorial nature of the number the audience, with the exception of a few, remained seated until the number, which was the last on the program, had been entirely performed.

Only those who have ever witnessed the customary 9.55 rush can appreciate the deep significance of this tribute to the composer.

The soloist of the evening, Mme. Katharine Goodson, in private life is Mrs. Arthur Hinton. Hence on this occasion she played her husband's music. Here was still more emphasis upon the Anglo-Saxon nature of the attractions. And to think that this hand-across-the-sea or blood-is-thicker-than-water occasion should have been presided over by a distinguished visitor from Berlin. However, Dr. Muck is patient and catholic, full of spirit and sympathy. He did his best to make the concert entertaining and stimulating, but failed. The conductor was willing, but the music was weak.

Glockenspiel on the Stage.

Finally, the audience was confronted by something on the stage that looked like—well, some said it was a fancy parlor organ and others thought it might be a new-fangled console for the big organ at the back of the stage. As a matter of fact it was a glockenspiel or carillon, an arrangement of bells or bars played at a keyboard. The player was one of the members of the orchestra, who sat hidden behind the curio; and the instrument was used in the Converse piece. It made very sweet and tinkly music indeed. And back in the southwest corner of the stage was a set of heavy chimbs used in the pageant scene in the Jeanne d'Arc music.

The program of this week's concert embraces a symphony by Balakireff, to be played for the first time; Chabrier's "Gwendoline" overture, and a repetition of Loeffler's "Pagan Poem."

FOR SALE—At cost, SYMPHONY TICKETS.
Rehearsal, $12; 1st row, 1st balcony. Concert, $14; centre, floor; for remaining seven weeks. Address D.F.B., Boston Transcript.
4t(A): mh 6

A SYMPHONY REHEARSAL TICKET
FOR SALE—Centre floor; price now $50. Address K.J.M., Boston Transcript.
5t(A): fe 15

Miss Goodson at the Symphony Concert.

Miss Goodson and the orchestra repeated her husband's piano concerto at the Symphony concert of Saturday night, but it proved no more interesting at a third hearing than it had on Friday afternoon or five months ago at its original performance in America at Worcester. Two virtues it has—it "sounds" and it gives the pianist due opportunity to prove artistry and resource. Many of the old and classic piano concertos, lightly scored for small orchestras in small rooms, or scored with little sense of instrumental values as we now understand them, seem paler and thinner orchestrally at every petition. On the other hand, some ultra-modern concertos merely add a piano to the orchestra and then swamp it. Mr. Hinton escapes either pitfall; his concerto "sounds" clearly and discreetly, and it gives the pianist—and so far that pianist has always been Miss Goodson—range for finesse and for power, for variety of tone, rhythm and shading. So far as the concerto goes, it does gain its end as a virtuoso-piece. The weakness—and the weariness—of it is its lack of definiteness. Freedom of form, freshness of harmony, elasticity of modulation, are all admirable things. Much music that won the ear and stirred the fancy has been so written; but most of it had also a definiteness and a pungency of melodic invention and a warm and communicating mood that Mr. Hinton misses. On he goes with his subjects and counter-subjects, his modulations and progressions, and they leave barely a trace behind of any melodic idea, or any tangible musical thought. The concerto has four movements and episodes diversify some of them, but not one maintains or imparts any alluring or compelling mood. Miss Goodson played the piano part as one who would persuade her hearers to believe in it as she believes in it herself, to find in it what she tries to find. Dr. Muck and the orchestra seconded her to the full. They indeed brought sometimes a semblance of musical and emotional life into what, less sympathetically handled, might have seemed dry bones. Mr. Hinton could hardly complain of the performance. Rather, it was for the audience, recalling Miss Goodson in Grieg's concerto, last year, to complain of the music in which she had returned.

H. T. P.

FOR SALE—At cost, SYMPHONY TICKETS.
Rehearsal, $12; 1st row, 1st balcony. Concert, $14; centre, floor; for remaining seven weeks. Address D.F.B., Boston Transcript.
4t(A): mh 6

FOR SALE
ONE SYMPHONY CONCERT TICKET—Central. Address W.N.N., Boston Transcript.
5t(A): fe 15

216

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XVIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 14, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

MILI BALAKIREFF, SYMPHONY in C major.
I. Largo: Allegro vivo.
II. Scherzo: vivo: Trio, Poco meno mosso.
III. Andante.
IV. Finale: Allegro moderato; Tempo di Polacca.
(First time in Boston.)

CH. M. LOEFFLER, "Pagan Poem." (after Virgil,) op. 14, for ORCHESTRA, PIANOFORTE, ENGLISH HORN, and three TRUMPETS
obligati.
Mr. HEINRICH GEBHARD, Pianist.

CHABRIER, OVERTURE to the Opera "Gwendoline."

The Pianoforte is a Mason and Hamlin.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

SATURDAY EXCELS FRIDAY AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

With New Advantage for Composers, Music and Audience—Dr. Muck Begins His Last Tour—More About the New "Peter Pan"—A Play by Gorky in New York—An Organ at Keith's—Note and Comment of the Day

Trans. — mch. 16, 1908
Theoretically, the quality of the performance at the Symphony concert of Saturday night should excel that of Friday afternoon, and an additional rehearsal on Saturday morning has happened more than once when the conductor was not satisfied with what he had heard the day before. Practically, the concert of Saturday does not always better its predecessor; sometimes indeed the advantage has been on the other side, but last week the event fulfilled the theory to the letter. On Friday, for example, Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline" seemed dimmed by Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" that preceded it. Saturday night it shone and it strode. Its sonorities swelled and shouted and clanged again; its rhythms kept their tumult; the music swept forward—and this time up—to the mighty song of the warriors of Valhalla. Theatrical music, if one likes, and rightly because Chabrier was writing for the theatre, but as truly Viking music as though some composer of the North had written it. "They smote with their shields," goes one of the old chronicles of these Norsemen, and Chabrier, almost alone of modern composers, has really smote in the theatre for them. Saturday evening, too, Dr. Muck and his men played Mr. Loeffler's poem with a fuller intensity of mood and of accent than they have gained before. It is difficult music in itself; but the difficulties are only means to the keener imparting and emphasis of what it would convey. They exist, so to say, to be burned away for the listeners by the insistent passion with which the composer wrote and by the equal passion with which conductor and men should give his music voice. "A Pagan Poem" should speak for itself as music of beauty and power; it should speak yet more eloquently for the intensity of feeling that stirs in every measure of it. Saturday night more than ever before, the listener could feel this intensity, and from end to end it had a new poignancy and a new vividness. It was as though Dr. Muck had at last gone to the heart of the music, and so assimilated all that he found there and so made it a part of himself that he could give it a new freedom and a new intensity of utterance. His men were like him, and the performance brought irresistibly the spell, the passion, the humanity of the music.

Perhaps it was such a performance that made the piece seem so truly the "Pagan" poem of Mr. Loeffler's title. Mr. Loeffler has indeed written no imitative Virgilian eclogue in the measured felicity of expression and the delicate precision of feeling that such a musical venture might invite. Rather, he has broadened, deepened, humanized the verses that originally set spark to his imagination. It is the passion of his own responsive moods that glows and cries in his music. Yet, it is still, as it seemed on Saturday, music of pagan spirit and a pagan world. Every imaginative listener finds what he may in Mr. Loeffler's music, but it is hard to escape the suggestion, at the very beginning, of a mood like that of some Puvis de Chavannes's decorations, in our library, for example. To and fro among such faintly stirring trees, over such lonely lawns, against such wan backgrounds, in such clear pale lights, goes the sorceress of Mr. Loeffler's poem. She is like to see to some of the figures with which Puvis has peopled this land of his imagination. They walk silently on twenty walls, and now Mr. Loeffler has given them voice. It is a pagan voice, too, the voice of a time and a spirit that felt love, and loved love and counted love as a passionate desire that we moderns, unless we happen to be pagan Latins and pagan Slavs (as Sicilians, for example, and Russians are often in reality) may not do. And the gods themselves and the mysterious beings that peopled forest and stream and cliff and valley watched over this passionate desire. Spells might lure them to foster it; spells might persuade them to choke it. The joy and the pain of it was within their power. Mr. Loeffler's music cries with such a desire; and tingles with such a sorcery.

Balakireff's symphony, too, seemed to have more exotic quality in the performance of Saturday night. Not that it escaped the conventions of "national" Russian music more than it had on Friday, but those conventions had the Oriental tinge which is the mark of Balakireff, who turns his ears eastward, as a perceptible German tinge sometimes colors Glazouloff's music as he listens, in spite of himself, to the west. This Oriental suggestion and glamor, now more keenly felt and fully expressed, gave the symphony a fresher interest and individuality. Its insistent repetitions began to justify themselves in the Oriental passion for reiteration, and Balakireff could beat his drums and beat his cymbals with Oriental delight in them. Yet the virus of that older and more sophisticated West does stir in these self-absorbed Slavs, and they seem sometimes to be confessing in this reiteration and this din, their effort and their inability to give their music the body and the significance that the West achieves by more complex means. Vodka is good to drink—and heady—on occasion. It has an exotic tang that surpasses that of Balakireff's music. But most of us come back gladly to the wines and spirits—musical or other—of a less primitive world and taste.

H. T. P.

FADED TEXT

MILY BALAKIREFF

A NEW NAME AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Composer Whose Symphony Is to Be Heard for the First Time Tomorrow—His Peculiar Place and Influence in Russian Music—His Busy Career and Present Seclusion—His Music in the Larger and the Smaller Forms and Its Traits—The Man as Intimates Have Seen Him

Trans. — mch. 17, 1908
BY EDWARD BURLINGAME HILL

It is perhaps unnecessary to assert that the so-called Neo-Russian school of composers occupies a distinctive position in the evolution of modern music. For their works, aside from the intrinsic qualities they possess as music, reflect two important tendencies which have exerted a wide influence. One is the intimate association of Russian mythology and folk-lore in symphonic composition and in opera, as a means of evoking imaginative sensibility in composer and listener alike; the other an insistent predilection for employing folk-song as thematic material to arrive at a more definite national flavor. For these features of their art, they owe the primal initiative in great part to the quiet enthusiasm, the pedagogic insight and the virtually patriarchal authority of Mily Balakireff, whose name will appear on the programme of the Symphony Concert for the first time this week. An earnest if not prolific composer, retiring and modest, as far as pushing his works toward publicity or performance is concerned, he has, nevertheless, written music of a charm and significance that deserves attention in addition to his really eminent services as a propagandist.

Mily Alexievitch Balakireff was born at Nijni-Novgorod, Jan. 3, 1837. It is said that he owed instruction in the rudiments of music to his mother, but the most significant influence in his early years was his association with Oulibicheff, a Mozart enthusiast and biographer, and the author of a pamphlet decrying the later works of Beethoven. In Oulibicheff's library Balakireff learned to know the classic masterpieces, while his private orchestra taught him something of the elements of orchestral effect. Moreover, life in the provinces remote from the great capitals of St. Petersburg and Moscow undoubtedly tended to instill a love for folk-song which has remained an abiding factor in his musical creed. At the age of twenty, after a course of study in the University of Kazan, he came to St. Petersburg prepared to preach the gospel of nationalism in music at a time when Bellini and Meyerbeer occupied the attention of the musical public. On this account he was cordially received by Glinka the real source of Russian nationalist music, at that time smarting under the indifference with which his national opera "Russian and Ludmilla" had been received. For Glinka readily perceived in him a possible continuator of his own work. In a short time Balakireff became the apostle of an organized effort in the direction of a nationalist movement in music. The first to be attracted to his standard was César Cui, then a sub-lieutenant in the corps of engineers, and later a professor of fortification.

The next adherent was Modeste Moussorgsky, who had resigned from the army in order to devote himself to music. Later Nicholas Rimsky-Korsakoff, the naval officer, and Alexander Borodin the chemist were added to this group. The basis of Balakireff's instruction was a thorough analytical discussion of the masterpieces of musical literature from Bach to Berlioz, Liszt and Wagner, not in a conventional manner, but independent of tradition; a careful consideration, in the case of orchestral works, of the means of obtaining instrumental effect. He aimed at formulating the aesthetic doctrines underlying the various forms of composition, rather than a mere preoccupation with their technical construction. Finally he strove by active exhortation to originality of style and expression to secure the adoption of Russian folk-song as a thematic basis for composition. It is pointed out that this insistence upon individual liberty of expression came shortly after the emancipation of the serfs, when the awakening necessity for personal and intellectual freedom was in the air. To increase the scope of his activity, Balakireff, in 1862, with the assistance of the choral conductor, Lomakin, and the musical critic Vladimir Stassoff, founded the Free School of Music in St. Petersburg. For a time this school exercised a real and beneficial influence. One important result achieved by this school was that at its concerts Balakireff produced works by Borodin, Cui and Moussorgsky for the first time. In 1869, Balakireff was appointed director of the Imperial Chapel, and conductor of the Imperial Russian Musical Society.

In the concerts of the latter society Balakireff also did much to promote the interests of his disciples by giving their works. After some years, however, the free school came to an end. Of the causes which led to its abandonment, Borodin wrote to Madame Karmaline (a niece of Glinka): "You have doubtless heard of the disruption of our school. It is not astonishing. So long as we were eggs laid by one hen (and that hen Balakireff) we were all more or less alike; but when the young chickens came out of their shells each one clothed himself in different feathers, and when our wings had grown each one flew away in a different direction." Nevertheless Balakireff's missionary work in formulating the lines on which Russian composers should labor had been accomplished and acceptance of his main principles had become an established fact. He had the satisfaction of seeing produced many orchestral compositions in which folk-song formed much of the constituent material, as well as many operas whose plots were found in tales of Russian legend and folk-lore. Moreover these traits have persisted in the most characteristic Russian music to the present time. For many years Balakireff has led a life of seclusion from public service, although he has continued to compose and publish revisions of earlier works.

If, as a composer, Balakireff has not attained either the original distinction or the mastery of expression acquired by some of his younger adherents, he has nevertheless produced some works of indubitable significance. He does not manifest fertility of invention, or uniform quality, but his compositions are seldom uninteresting. His earliest works are three overtures, one on Spanish themes (composed in 1857, rewritten in 1869), at the instigation of Glinka; one on Russian themes (one of which appeared twenty years later in the finale of Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony) dating from 1858; and lastly one on Czechish themes composed in 1867. Of greater musical importance was the incidental music (overture and entr'acts) for a performance of "King Lear," dating from 1861. This overture, doubtless in a revised version, was published in 1904. It has a definite programme, and reveals able differentiation of characters and mood, but hardly the level of Shakspeare's tragedy. In 1862, Balakireff composed a symphonic poem, "Russia," for the one thousandth anniversary of the Russian empire, founded, as one might naturally suppose, on national melodies. It is said that this work was intended to summarize the various epochs in Russian history. A symphonic poem, "In Bohemia" (composed in 1867, revised and published in 1906) and a symphony (1898) to be played here tomorrow have for thematic material Czechish and Russian folk songs respectively.

These latter works display the zealous nationalist, rather than the individual poet which Balakireff's best compositions proclaim him. His instrumental masterpiece is undoubtedly his symphonic poem "Tamara" (1877-1884), after a poem by Leimontoff. Its theme is the Georgian princess Tamara. In the narrow pass of Darial, where the river Terek roars amidst the mists rises an ancient tower. Here lived the Princess Tamara, who is described as having the aspect of an angel, a demon in her thoughts, at once cruel, wily and divine. At her seductive appeal the passers-by entered to take part in wild nocturnal festivities. Throughout the night the cries of the revellers were heard, but at dawn the sounds ceased abruptly with a sinister and dread silence. The Terek alone broke the quiet, boiling furiously, sweeping before it the inanimate body of Tamara's lover, while she at the window like a white shadow sent forth an adieu to the beloved, a farewell which breathed a tender intoxication. The voice which uttered it had such gentleness that its accents, penetrated with promise, seemed to depict a near and immense happiness. Balakireff has treated this fantastic subject with repressed mystery, ferocity and poetic tenderness. Here he rises above the ardent nationalist to become a poet of imaginative and poignant utterance. "Tamara" is unique among his orchestral works, and to a certain extent almost solitary in the musical literature of his nation. In it his fancy has been fired by the memories of his early travels in the Caucasus. Here the atmosphere of Oriental Russia has awakened in him a fulness of expression which he has scarcely surpassed.

As a composer for the piano, Balakireff has produced a long list of pieces. They show an individual and grateful piano style, harmonic originality and refinement, and much grace of personality. Some of them are written in a virtuoso idiom which is a bar to popularity, others full of charm and poetry belong in the category of salon music, although of an elevated order. He has also made brilliant and effective transcriptions, a Spanish melody by Glinka, arrangements of the same author's "Jota Aragonese" and "Komarinskaja," and a song, "The Lark," which has figured to some extent on concert programmes. There is also a brilliant fantasy on themes from Glinka's opera, "A Life for the Tsar." Stimulating and interesting as these pieces are, it has remained for the Russian Orient again to arouse Balakireff to his most individual achievement in piano music, the Oriental fantasy "Islamey" on Georgian themes. Here is a work absolutely sui generis in the whole range of piano literature. Of gorgeous and exotic imagination, with a wholly novel piano style that in some respects eclipses even the brilliant idiom of Liszt, in its emotional contrasts, skilful and unusual modulations and spontaneous treatment it displays a genius which Balakireff has never equalled in all his writings for piano. Liszt was devoted to the piece, and lost no chance to make it known. It has been played in Boston by MacDowell, Siloti, Carlo Buonamici, Harold Bauer, Josef Hofmann and doubtless by others.

Balakireff's songs, of which he has published no less than forty, are virtually unknown in this country at least, although to some they constitute an important portion of his creative work. Mrs. Newmarch in an article on Balakireff has this to say about them: "A series of songs published between 1858 and 1860 attest the rare qualities of a master jeweller. They are indeed little gems, cut in numberless facets, of which each reflects an exquisite and subtle emotion. The accompaniments to these songs resemble the setting of a jewel—they are independent, but they enhance, they complete the musical thought which glistens at the centre. Such are, for example, the songs 'When Thy Beloved Voice I Hear,' 'Come to Me,' 'Lead Me, O Night,' 'Ecstasy,' 'The Song of the Golden Fish,' 'The Song of Selim' and a 'Georgian Song' recreate marvellously the very atmosphere of the Orient." Mention must also be made in this connection of two collections of folk-songs made by Balakireff. One of thirty for piano duet, and one of forty with words for voice and piano. With those furnish material of priceless value for the of Rimsky-Korsakoff and Arensky they study of Russian folk-song.

Mrs. Newmarch closes the article referred to above with a glimpse of the personal side of Balakireff that seems so in accordance with one's preconceived ideas as to need no apology for its quotation: "A year ago, I saw him in St. Petersburg. It was at the birthday celebration of one of his oldest friends, M. Valdimir Stassoff, a family gathering to which I had been invited with that genial, characteristically Russian omission of 'standing on ceremony.' Long before, when I had first begun to be interested in classic music, the personality and talent of Balakireff had attracted me especially. His was the spark of inspiration which had kindled not only a Russian musical conflagration, but even my far off individual enthusiasm. Naturally I was overjoyed at the prospect of seeing a personality so magnetic and at the same time so retiring. He was expected at nine o'clock; the piano was temptingly left open, like a trap set for a timid bird! From outward appearance, the piano seemed to act on Balakireff as the bait on the unfortunate sparrow,—it acted admirably. After greeting his host, he went immediately to the piano and announced his programme: 'I should like to play you three sonatas—Beethoven's "Appassionata," Chopin's in B minor and Schumann's in G minor. He started at once to play.

"Balakireff is not tall. I do not know his ancestry, but he is not at all of the tall, blond type of Northern Russia. He is more Oriental in physiognomy. His head is small, his complexion dark, his manner somewhat sober and dispirited, but his eyes are full of sympathy and fire—the true eyes of a seer and epic bard. As he took his seat at the piano I was inevitably reminded of my past impression of Von Bülow. There was something in his playing to confirm this resemblance. To be sure, Balakireff is not a dazzling virtuoso like Paderewski, but his technique is entirely adequate. Still, on hearing him play for the first time, the brilliancy of his performance is not the chief impression; neither does he carry all before him by the vitality of his emotion. A temperament so essentially enthusiastic, could not be cold, but yet he has not the emotional power or the profound poetry which were the master qualities of Rubinstein. The most striking trait of his art is his sympathetic, intellectual character. He observes, he analyzes, he teaches putting all in a clear light. His motto might be Stendahl's: 'To see clearly into realities.' Yet Balakireff could never be described as a dry pedagogue. If he is a teacher, he is thoroughly illumined, an inspired and congenial interpreter, who constructs the period and personality of a composer, instead of substituting his own views on the subject.

"On this evening after he had finished his arduous, self-imposed programme, I was ready to see him disappear as quietly as he had come. But my inspiration to say a few words to him in very bad Russian on the subject of his songs, and especially their accompaniments, kept him at the piano. He even went on talking, showing me some unusual rhythms in his songs, progressing insensibly into showing me similar curiosities in his piano compositions. He did not venture to try "Islamey," that favorite of Liszt's, but I remember a graceful and seductively rhythmical waltz.

"But the samovar was steaming on the table, and the odor of tea and citron, which is also seductive, spread through the room. Happily, Balakireff showed no indication of leaving. He came to the table with all the others and talked for a long time on music, principally of the master who dominated the first nationalist renaissance, Glinka. Russians like to prolong their hospitality till late hours of the night; Balakireff was the first to excuse himself, because he had to return to the country early next morning.

"In the month of May the nights at St. Petersburg are misty and uncertain as hallucinations. After midnight the sky has a curious lurid pallor, that is neither twilight nor dawn. It was as if the ghost of the day haunted the night which had caused its death. My fantastic ideas seemed as strange and unreal as dreams. As I hastened through the empty streets I felt as if Balakireff were a magician who had carried me back to that decade after 1860, which was so full of faith and generous hopes—so fully did I seem to have taken part in the struggles and actual triumphs of the new Nationalist School of Russian music."

Here in Boston

Dr. Muck is suffering from a rheumatic or a nervous stiffening of the muscles of his right arm, so that he was barely able to use it in Philadelphia on Monday night when he conducted with the Symphony Orchestra for the last time there. In Washington yesterday afternoon he did not try to conduct, and Mr. Wendling led in his stead, as he will in Baltimore tonight. The likelihood is that Dr. Muck will be able to take the two concerts that the orchestra will give in New York on Thursday and Saturday; but it is a pity that such a mischance should befall him in the midst of his final tour. Trans. Mus. 15, 1908

18TH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

First Performance of Composition by Balakireff Heard in Boston.

LOEFFLER'S ELOQUENT
"PAGAN POEM" REPEATED

Orchestra Does Splendid Work Under Dr. Muck and Wins Applause.

Herald — Feb. 15, 1908
By PHILIP HALE.

The 18th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall.
The programme was as follows:

Symphony in C major.....Balakireff
"A Pagan Poem" (after Virgil)....Loeffler
Overture to "Gwendoline".....Chabrier

Balakireff has been an influence in Russia for half a century, but his only symphony was not performed until 1898, when the composer was 61 years old.
Little of his music has been heard in Boston. The "Islamey" has been played by several distinguished pianists, who were tempted possibly by its reputation for mechanical difficulty. The few other piano pieces known to us in concerts have little distinction. The few songs sung here have flavor. The orchestral piece, "En Boheme," performed at Mrs. Hall's concert in Jordan Hall this season, is uninteresting, and it seemed to be more Russian than Czech, although it is founded on three Czech folk songs. We had heard nothing before last night that would give Bala-kireff a high position among composers of the second rank.

Yet his influence in Russian music is indisputable. He was for years the head of the "Invincible Band"—Cui, Borodin, Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff; he taught them in his own way;
and even Tschalkowsky, who more than once described him as a colossal bore and one that had turned from atheism to the most idolatrous superstition, courted his advice, accepted his suggestions and criticism and dedicated two of his most important orchestral works to him. The personality of the man was no doubt impressive, much more so than any individuality as displayed in his compositions. Turgeneff made fun of him in a letter to Pauline Viardot and denied him talent, yet he admitted in the same letter that he was "a character."

When the members of the "Invincible Band" met together to discuss their art, they agreed that orchestral music as written by Beethoven, Schumann, Berlioz and Liszt had gone as far as it was possible. There was nothing to be done in this direction.

There were new paths to be made in the field of opera, for the Russians did not then, nor do they today, believe in the theories of Wagner or in his form of dramatic expression. The result of their agreement is ironical.
Borodin, Rimsky-Korsakoff and even Balakireff are best known throughout the musical world by their orchestral music, and Balakireff has never completed an opera, though it is said he has worked on one.

The five also agreed that thematic material should be Russian or Russian-Oriental in line, rhythm, color, general character. True Russian music should not show the marked influence of the German and Italian schools. It should be Russian at any cost. Balakireff's collection of Russian folk songs, which is said to be excellent, served as a guide to the younger composers.

His symphony, played last night in Boston for the first time, has been performed in Chicago and Philadelphia. It is an unusually fascinating work, one that well deserved performance, one that might be repeated with profit. As I have said, it was not performed until 1898, but it is highly probable that it was at least sketched years before, as was "En Boheme," which was not published till a few years ago; as was "Tamara," a symphonic poem, which was begun in 1867, put aside and completed in 1882.

The symphony is by no means a work of continually sustained power. If it has exotic charm in melody, harmonic and orchestral color and rhythm, the charm that we have been taught to associate with the music of eastern Russia, it also has characteristics of oriental music that are not wholly agreeable to western ears: a delight in repetitions of a phrase; a persistence in rhythm that becomes monotonous; a barbaric joy in glaring colors and in the beating and clashing of pulsatile instruments.

In the finale the chief theme is a Russian folk song and the source of this tune is named in the score; but one Russian folk melody does not make a Russian symphony. This very tune is less picturesquely Oriental than other themes in the work. It has a rough, burly humor, but it has not the rhythmic or tonal suggestion of the East, nor has it the quality of a fantastical improvisation or of languorous sensuousness.

Certainly the themes of this symphony have as a rule a decided profile, and, apart from the inevitable repetitions dear to the modern Russians—Tschalkowsky did not escape from them—they are often combined or used alternately with poetic and technical skill. The instrumentation is often fantastic, at times almost bizarre, but it is generally effective. Once or twice it seemed to be injudicious, as in the finale, where the second theme in a fortissimo tutti was almost lost in the din of brass.

The first movement opens with quiet seriousness and in an orthodox manner that gives faint hope of future interest, but with the beginning of the main body of the movement, the composer's individuality begins to assert itself; there are frequent revelations of beauty and strength. The scherzo proper is a delight from beginning to end by reason of its originality and fancy; the trio is of a more conventional nature; but the free repetition of the scherzo section is a fresh delight and the close is charming in its unexpected and quaint delicacy.

The andante, on the whole, suffers from the mania for repetition, but its chief contents are characterized by genuine sentiment and melodic grace. The finale is the most frankly exotic of the movements, and the second theme, with its treatment, is perhaps the crowning glory of the work.

Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," suggested by certain verses in the eighth eclogue of Virgil, was performed here for the first time last November, and Mr. Heinrich Gebhard was the pianist, as he was last evening. Indeed, it is almost impossible to think of a performance of the work without Mr. Gebhard's assistance in the ensemble. No one will ever play the piano part with greater comprehension of the composer's intentions or with keener sympathy. When the "Pagan Poem" was produced here
The Herald described at length the nature of the work. It is not necessary to repeat the description. The performance last night was one of great brilliance and superb sonority. As before, Mr.
Longy gave a marvellous reading of the solo for the English horn.

Mr. Loeffler's music will not stale with many repetitions, for in substance and in expression this "Pagan Poem" is a masterpiece of musical eloquence. It does not depend on an intimacy with the eclogue, and he that is anxious over the transliteration of Virgil's verses into music will lose the rare beauty of the music itself. The mere recollection of the amorous and forsaken woman casting her spells to bring back her lover, the remembrance of the burden of her incantations—these should be sufficient for those who insist on a programme.

Mr. Loeffler before this had composed music of indisputable originality, and for the expression of poetic and imaginative thought he had found for himself an individual musical speech that served as the language of mystery and horror, of the ironic and the macabre, of tenderness, of radiant love. With this "Pagan Poem" he has risen to a still greater height, and at the same time he has sounded a still more emotional depth. Here his appeal is broader; it is very human; his message is not merely for those interested in the tendencies of the most advanced moderns. While his melodic voice is richer and more irresistible, his orchestral rhetoric is still more diversified, fuller, more brilliant, more imposing. A composer of true genius acknowledged the applause last night.

The performance of the orchestra was one of uncommon splendor in the symphony and in the "Pagan Poem," and Dr. Muck conducted with a spirit and an authority that will be memorable.

It would be a pleasure to speak of certain details of the performance. Thus Mr. Grisez, the clarinetist, played in the symphony with much more sentiment and a finer sense of tonal contrasts than has been his wont of late. Thus the trumpets in Mr. Loeffler's poem were even more effective than at the first performance.

The concert, one of the most interesting of the season, closed with a gorgeous interpretation of Chabrier's wmd overture to "Gwendoline." It is often said that the untimely death of Bizet was the greatest possible loss to musical France. The death of Chabrier was perhaps an equally severe loss; for this strangely gifted composer had still much to say when he died after a cruel death-in-life;

witness his unfinished "Brisels."

MUCK AND LOEFFLER SHARE HONORS AT CONCERT

Composer of "Pagan Poem" Receives an Ovation at Saturday's Symphony Production, and Conductor of Orchestra Is Encored.

Journal — Feb. 16, 1908
Charles Martin Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" was played by the Symphony Orchestra Saturday night for the second time this season. This was a merited recognition of the intrinsic value of this most ambitious work of the former Symphony player. It was also welcome from the public's point of view, for the character of the composition is too subtle to be comprehended at a single hearing. That the audience enjoyed the piece was evident in the outburst of applause after the performance. The composer had to rise twice from his seat and bow to his friends and admirers.

There was a new piece on the program, a symphony by Balakireff, founder of the Free School of Music in St. Petersburg and former leader of the group that included Cesar Cui,
Borodin, Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakoff. Balakireff is best known in Boston through his fantasia, "Islamey," which has been played here by many local and visiting pianists. Tschikowsky has praised Balakireff's songs. "There was a time," wrote the Russian giant,
"when I could not listen to 'Selim's
Son' without tears in my eyes, and now
I rank 'The Song of the Goldfish' very highly." Both of these songs have been heard in Boston. At times Saturday night the symphony was brilliant; always it showed ingenuity and fertility of imagination. The audience enjoyed it greatly, twice recalling Dr. Muck.

The concert ended with a spirited reading of Chabrier's "Gwendoline" overture. There will be no concert this week, as the orchestra will be on its fifth trip to other cities. Next week two symphonic poems by Gustav Strube, one of the members of the orchestra,
will be a prominent feature.

Here in Boston

Fresh letters of indignant protest have come to us about the departures from Symphony Hall at every pause in the performance of Bischoff's symphony at the concerts of last Friday and Saturday. Unmistakably they unduly protracted the intervals between the movements, and annoyed Dr. Muck and those of the audience who were absorbed in the music. Unquestionably, too, the tendency of a part of the audience, especially on Friday afternoons, to leave the hall before the end of the concerts is steadily increasing, until it has now become almost as much a custom as it is in the performances of opera at the Metropolitan in New York. On the other hand, the listeners at the Symphony Concerts have the right to leave the hall when and as they choose, and no one may interfere with it. Courtesy to the conductor and to the rest of the audience is another matter of which it is futile to reason or debate, but which it is good to practise.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Eighteenth Concert of the Symphony Season.

Grand Opera Prospects Very Bright at the Boston.

Recitals of the Week by Artists of Note.

Globe — Mich. 15, 1908
Dr Muck opened the 18th symphony program with an unfamiliar work, the C major symphony by the Russian Balakireff, one of the new school of composers. Although a prolific writer, he is not very well known in this country, his minor pieces, orchestral and vocal, being about all the representation he has had until recently. This symphony, which is his only work of this class, is in four movements, and though strongly national in many points is not violently so. There are fewer moments of prolonged dissonants here than are usual in the "new school" productions; but in art of orchestral juggling he is evidently not a whit behind his contemporary Slavs, who labor in the musical field.

In the opening movement Balakireff supplies a wealth of thematic material, so episodic and ephemeral in treatment that, aside from some modulations and characteristic fortissimo passages, there is little in it to suggest the influence of Russian inspiration.

The second part, based upon a quaint waltz theme scored in a strikingly complicated manner, is largely given over to a kind of loitering orchestration; an echo as it were of the melody that has just been voiced. The effect is admirably worked out in various combinations, and against these there is a slumbering string accompaniment that is extremely elaborate and difficult. The ending is odd and unexpected in character. In this movement the string bands deserve special mention, for upon their good work depended most of the satisfactory results attending this scherzo.

The andante and finale are really combined in one movement. In the first the changing tonalities, short phrases and elusive lights and shades displayed the skill and originality of the composer to be of the highest grade, and it also showed the abilities of the wood-winds to successfully cope with the musical difficulties set before them. After some brilliant passages for the harp the strenuously accented finale is reached. Here the heavier strings fall into line, soon giving way to the other instruments that meander through a perfect sea of thematic bits that die away one after the other midst intermittent fortissimo suggestions, Slavic and not always melodic.

The wealth of orchestral color and all the sterner qualities of this immensely complicated work were lucidly set forth, every movement being made impressive, though there was much fuss and fury, which to some ears have little or no musical importance. And although so-called Russian music suggests trumpets and horns ad lib to many people, in this case Mr Loeffler has in his "Pagan Poem" utilized the brass contingents with more thrilling effect than Balakireff did in his symphony.

Mr Loeffler's poem, the second number on the program, did not suffer by proximity to the larger work. The work is worthy to be repeated and another hearing shows that it is a good solid composition, interesting, scholarly in ideas and handling. The performance was fine in every way and Mr Gebhard repeated his excellent work at the piano. The concert closed with the "Gwendoline" overture by Chabrier.

The vigor of the performance brought out vividly the barbaric and tumultuous features of a work that fairly rival in this respect similar episodes in the other two program numbers.

The fifth tour will keep the orchestra away from Boston this week. The 19th program, March 27 and 28, will begin with a suite for orchestra by Halvorsen, first time at these concerts. Two symphonic poems for orchestra with viola solo by Gustav Strube and Beethoven's first symphony complete the selections.

Dr. Muck's Programmes

To the Editor of the Transcript:

It is to be hoped that Dr. Muck, the able conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give his hearers the works of the old masters the balance of his stay with us, which works he so finely rendered last year. We have lately had too much of "first time" pieces, which sorely tried the patience of those (and they are quite in the majority) who are lovers of the grand, poetical, rhythmical music of the great leaders of the past. Cut-up, chop-stick, bombastic effects is not music. Music is poetry, not prose, and until some of the would-be modern composers equal at least the old we of the audience have a right to a fair proportion of the works of the old masters that are so beautiful in design, in symmetry and restfulness, and which have withstood the test of time. We get enough of discordant noises these days in the many activities of life—in the shop, the railway train, in the electric and auto car—without listening on the close of a busy week to similar effects in Symphony Hall.

A SYMPHONY PATRON

Boston, March 16.

Dr. Muck's Programmes Again

To the Editor of the Transcript:

I think you are entitled to the thanks of the subscribers to the Symphony Concerts for having printed in your columns yesterday, the letter complaining of Dr. Muck's programmes. I am quite sure the writer has justly expressed the opinion of nine out of ten of the subscribers. While all agree as to the splendid efficiency of the orchestra, and the ability of the conductor, the constant infliction of so much of the music of the advanced modern German school has given great dissatisfaction.

SEASON TICKET HOLDER

March 19.

Our Programmes Again

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Without in any way wishing to enter into a controversy on Dr. Muck's programmes I would like to say a few words in reply to what "Music Lover" wrote in your issue of Friday. I am quite aware of the educational interest of the Symphony concerts, but cannot help reminding him that in the modern method the exhibition of the frightful example and also punishment are eliminated. It can hardly be necessary for such an audience to be subjected to listening to such compositions as Bischoff's Symphony twice over, to convince them that the Germany of the twentieth century is in music, as in all the fine arts, painting, sculpture or architecture, at a lower level than it has been for centuries.

SEASON TICKET HOLDER

March 21.

To the Editor of the Transcript:

I would hereby second the motion made by a writer in this column of your issue of the 16th, regarding a change in the programmes of the Symphony concerts for the rest of the season. I can also testify that the superabundance of "first time" compositions, and "bombastic efforts" that we have had thrust upon us this winter are far from satisfying or enjoyable to myself, as well as to many others who are regular attendants upon the concerts and we long for a return to the grand and beautiful works of the old masters whose compositions have stood the test of time; and we feel this is due to our true music lovers.

ANOTHER SYMPHONY PATRON

March 22.

DR. MUCK'S PROGRAMMES FIND DEFENDERS

Today's Letters Give a New Turn to the Debate—Mme. Kalich Acts Her New Part in New York—A Pretty Theatrical Quarrel in Paris with the Academy, the Comedie-Francaise and the Government All Involved—Dr. Muck's Neuritis—Plays for the Hollis and the Colonial in May—Rudolf Ganz's Departure and Germaine Schnitzer's Return—Theatrical News of the Day

The Other Side Speaks

To the Editor of the Transcript:

We cannot hope to change the conservative attitude of your two correspondents of March 23, towards Dr. Muck's programme, but we trust their advice will not be followed. There are many conductors who are able to give us traditional interpretation of well-known music, but there are few who can reveal to us the new as well as glorify the old. While we have such a one let us appreciate the privilege, and make the most of it. The compositions of our own day may not be as universally enjoyable and inspiring as are the great works of the past which have "stood the test of time," but let us not refuse to put the work of our own day to a similar test, and let us be glad of an occasional opportunity to judge for ourselves as to its significance and worth without leaving it to future generations.

ANOTHER MUSIC LOVER

March 24.

To the Editor of the Transcript:

In re Dr. Muck's programmes, may it be permitted me to speak who would fain be numbered with the "younger set" but am constrained by the length of regular attendance, extending over nearly twenty years, at the Saturday evening concerts. I am, notwithstanding, delighted every time I note a "first time" upon a promised programme. Sibelius, Mahler, Strauss, Puccini, Jacques-Dalcroze, d'Indy, Elgar, Loeffler—are not the names and the more or less individualized schools and trends of thought they represent—are not the very nationalities that unconsciously to the nearer form a background to their music—are not their efforts to create something different in art, sufficient to whet a musical curiosity, to justify listening from the intellectual standpoint alone? All this apart from the question of individual appreciation. Granted an overwhelming majority in the audience of those whose pleasurable feelings are destroyed by consecutive fifths, unresolved sevenths, inexperienced progressions and all the stock damnanda, one could forego a personal delight in rich and strange orchestration, in strange and symbolic "atmospheres," in symbolic and fascinating rhythms. I had rather hear our Symphony Orchestra "tune up" than listen to most so-called "music" or not go at all.

But why draw this hard and fast line between the old and the new? My musical enjoyment is very keen when I hear good plain song. It is very high when I have the privilege of a Beethoven symphony. It is very eager while I listen to the "incantations" of Méliande. Why may we not enjoy a "Catholic Revival" in music, and are not Dr. Muck's programmes good material ad propagandam fidem—a catholicity literally comprehensive, not arrogated as a title by one line of tradition?

CAMBRIDGE

March 24.

To the Editor of the Transcript:

As one of the nine out of ten people who are dissatisfied with the programmes of the Symphony Concerts, I wish to offer a suggestion. If we are to have again Bischoff's symphony or other similar works, would it not add mightily to the cheerfulness of the evening if the programme were to state "Probably last time in Boston?" I feel that my greatest limitation in attempting to understand the present situation lies in the fact that I have never met the one man in ten who enjoys the recent programmes. It is my belief that he is more rare than is commonly supposed, and is, indeed, no other than "The man that hath no music in himself. Nor is not moved by concord of sweet sounds."

ANOTHER SYMPHONY PATRON

March 25.

The Debate on the Programmes

To the Editor of the Transcript:

I have clung to a theory that none but the musically gifted had much right to opinions about the Symphony programmes, and that, although the rest of us might be bursting with comment we are "out of it," so to speak, through our own limitations. The talented and the taught are our lawful heads. We are the submerged tenth who inherit nothing and are trained to nothing.

We are merely, in the most fruitless and irresponsible way, wakened to ecstatic tremors by sweet sounds the which we have no means of making for ourselves. Some of us cannot even sit down to a score, to read and remember.

But if they only guessed—the puissant They who reign over us—how we watch and listen a season through for a hint that the old, the immortally beautiful things are to be given—why, the very violins of the orchestra would jump out of their cases and begin playing to us before the concert begins! Dr. Muck himself could n't prevent it.

They tell us—again the Olympian They—that they have heard these things over and over, and they hint to us—at least by giving away their tickets on Beethoven nights—that they are tired of listening. But we are not tired! It seems not so long ago that we were sitting up nights over "Charles Auchester," and wondering, too, how a Beethoven symphony really sounded. We found out. It sounded like something as incredible and as certain as heaven, and like the world waking up in the spring. And we are not yet sated with spring nor the sunrise, though both come with regularity and, as some maintain, too often. Music is not a business with us. It is a means of being happy. And we humbly own that those to whom it is a serious occupation have their right to know what is doing in it all over the world and to hear when another Beethoven or a new Schumann is born; but we beg them to allow us turn and turn about. "Drink fair, Betsy!" If we go sweetly (if puzzled!) away, after "some new thing," let it be with the snug certainty that next night the table will be spread for us—it will be our programme.

ALICE BROWN

March 26.

To the Editor of the Transcript:

I was glad to see the two letters defending the Symphony programmes in your issue of March 25, and should be glad to tell "Another Symphony Patron," who is one of the nine out of ten dissatisfied with them, that there are 500 people at every rehearsal who wait two hours, and often much longer, for the chance of hearing the new music, as well as the old, of which Dr. Muck is such a sympathetic interpreter. This patron, who has never been fortunate enough to meet the "one man in ten," might be interested to go on a "rush seat" some day.

CONSTANT ATTENDANT

March 27.

It has been remarked before on this page that such enterprise as Dr. Muck has shown, and as other conductors have shown, in making known here novelties of a like character is the kind of enterprise which must be unflinchingly persisted in if we are to avoid stagnation; better, it was said, the disclosure of repeated banalities, than the failure to uncover, through a drowsy complacency, even a minor masterpiece. Therefore it was well that Mr. Reger's piece should have been set before us. [Harper's Weekly.]

Perhaps it will aid our correspondents in the debate which they have begun and are continuing interestingly and informingly, and make the subject matter of it clearer to our readers in general, to print herewith a list of the pieces that Dr. Muck has put thus far on the programmes of the Symphony Concerts this season, with that of today included. To meet the course of the debate we have divided them roughly into a classic and a modern group, and placed in the former the music of composers modern by date but of established place as accepted classics—or something less. A star marks in both groups the pieces played for the first time in Boston.

THE CLASSICS

Bach: Suite in D major; Toccata and Fugue for Organ.
Beethoven: Symphonies No. 6, No. 4, No. 2; "Leonore" Overture No. 1.
Berlioz: Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."
Bizet: Overture, "Patrie."
Brahms: Symphony, No. 2; No. 4; Concerto for Violin.
Dvorak: Overture, "Carnaval."
Goetz: Symphony in F major.
Goldmark: Overture, "In the Spring."
Händel: Concerto for Wind Choirs and Strings.
Haydn: "Surprise" symphony.
Lalo: Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys." "Spanish Symphony" for Violin.
Liszt: Concerto for Piano, No. 2.
Mendelssohn: "Scotch" Symphony.
Mozart: Symphony in G minor; in D major; "Three German Dances."
Rheinberger: Concerto for Organ.
Rubinstein: Concerto for Piano, No. 4.
Schumann: Overture to "Genoveva;" Overture to "Manfred."
Wagner: Kaisermarsch.
In all, twenty-eight pieces.

THE MODERNS

D'Ambrosio: *Concerto for Violin.
Balakireff: *Symphony in C major.
Bischoff: *Symphony in E major.
Boeche: *Tone-Poem "Taormina."
Bossi: *Intermezzi Goldoniiani.
Bruckner: Symphony in D minor.
Chabrier: "España;" Overture to "Gwendoline."
Chadwick: Symphonic Sketches.
Chausson: *Tone-Poem, "Viviane."
Converse: "Jeanne d'Arc."
Dohnanyi: *Concert-Piece for Cello.
Franck: *Tone-Poem, "The Redemption."
Hinton: *Concerto for Piano.
Humperdinck: *Overture to "The Forced Marriage."
d'Indy: *"Wallenstein."
Loeffler: *"A Pagan Poem."
MacDowell: "Woodland" Suite; "Indian" Suite; Concerto for Piano, No. 2.
Pfitzner: *Overture to "The Little Christ-Elf."
Reger: *Variations and Fugue.
Reznicek: *Two Movements of "Symphonic Suite."
Rimsky-Korsakoff: *"Spanish Caprice."
Schilling: *Fantastic Suite.
Schjelderup: *Two Orchestral Pieces.
Strauss: "Till Eulenspiegel."
Strube: Two Pieces—one *new—for Viola and Orchestra.
In all, twenty-eight pieces.

Clearly the balance is even—much evener than some of the disputants have believed.

That Tenth Man Speaks

To the Editor of the Transcript:

As your correspondent of March 25 is so evidently troubled by his failure to meet the "one man in ten, who enjoys the recent programmes" at the Symphony Concerts, may I have the pleasure of helping him to a better understanding of the "present situation" by introducing myself as that supposedly "rare being"? I do not, however, presume to claim the title of "The man that hath no music in himself," as it would seem that my nine brethren have a better right to it, since they have been unable to appreciate the opportunity afforded them of gaining a knowledge of the works of today that we feel assured will "stand the test of time." No one denies the greatness of the old masters, but did they not have a "first time"? Do not we of today owe our composers the same chance, and should we not be thankful that we have had them revealed to us by one so gifted as Dr. Muck?

March 26. 1908

THE TENTH MAN

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" Repeated, a New Symphony by Balakireff and a Clanging Overture by Chabrier—A Varied Field, in Which Mr. Loeffler Was Clearly the Master—Balakireff's Conventional Russian Music, and Chabrier's Undeserved Plight

Trans.

March 14, 1908

Mr. Loeffler almost had the afternoon to himself at the Symphony Concert of yesterday, less because the audience listened very intently to the repetition of his "Pagan Poem" and applauded him very warmly at the end, than because his music dimmed the glow of Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline" that followed, and in recollection made the preceding symphony by Balakireff seem in comparison rather a poor and common thing. It is four years since the striding, clanging overture—a passionate rhythms and passionate sonorities—to Chabrier's viking opera has been played in Boston, and memory leapt to welcome it. Good to hear again would be the languorous music of the on-rushing Danes and the four-square chant of Walhalla in the resounding finale. In itself, there is not a reason why the music should have lost for the moment its fire of passionate imagination, its splendor of passionate utterance. Chabrier's thrilling vitality easily survives the years. By it and by the power of rhythm in which he gives it play, he lives and will live long. The overture to "Gwendoline" needs no atmosphere of the theatre and no aid from the rising curtain and the succeeding play. As music it speaks for itself, and Dr. Muck, as always in an operatic overture, made it speak eloquently.

And yet merely because Chabrier's overture happened to follow Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem it sounded strangely tame and a little empty. The glowing sonorities had momentarily lost their power after the finer intensities of Mr. Loeffler's music. A passion of rhythmic energy and imagination like Chabrier's seemed rather a poor thing after the wider-ranging expressiveness in melodic idea, in harmony, in instrumental coloring, in the full resource of music that stirred in Mr. Loeffler. The overture to "Gwendoline" seemed rhetorical and "effective" in the meaner sense of the word after the sensitiveness and the subtler yet not less potent imaginings of "A Pagan Poem." Chabrier was of the temperament that must take thought of its audience, even when he wrought in such fire of spirit as that in which seemingly he wrote his "little Gwendoline." Mr. Loeffler's idea and purpose and all that they suggested to him had seemingly driven all else from his imagination. Long as he worked upon "A Pagan Poem," often as he transformed it, it still sounds spontaneous and inevitable to its theme.

And in retrospect, Mr. Loeffler's music no less dimmed Balakireff's. Mr. Loeffler's is a familiar name on the programmes of the Symphony Concerts. Balakireff's stood there for the first time. Yet, at every turn, "A Pagan Poem" seemed new, fresh, individual and original, to lead, to command, and to absorb the listener. The symphony in C major, on the other hand, was precisely what the same listener had reason to expect in new music by a new Russian. By chance or by design the lesser Russian composers with their loud disdain of the non-Slav world outside, have shut themselves in a little world of their own where they and seemingly all things musical run in the same mould. Balakireff is alert, fanciful, spontaneous in the instrumental dress that he gives his symphony. Easily he gains the bizarre and the unsuspected. He can write a highly fantastic and light-footed scherzo, with a becomingly songful middle passage. His slow movement runs in brooding and melancholy song. He knows his Russian folk-tunes, and he can make them whirl in riotous rhythm and sonority, or set them more quietly to singing themselves through varied instrumental voices. He has heard, and he uses, strumming Oriental rhythms and languid Oriental song. But he cannot develop, elaborate and vary his melodies and draw new musical and poetic suggestion from them. On goes his symphony, changeless its instrumental raiment and decoration. There he is fertile and fanciful enough, but fecund imagination deserts him with his melodies. They are rather poor little melodies; they lead no whither; imaginative zest is not in them; body they have not. And so to traverse the traits of Balakireff's symphony is to traverse scarcely less the traits of many a Russian symphony of the school that calls him father. We in Boston have heard such music before—Glazounov's for example; we shall hear more of it again and already we are beginning to accuse it of monotony in all else than instrumental color and voice. Perhaps, after all, primitive folk, Slav or any other, wear none too well in the sophisticated arts of a sophisticated 'Old World.' Balakireff has written a mildly amusing little symphony à la Russe, and no more.

Moreover, in spite of the assertions of their partisans, it is not the virtue of these "nationalists," these primitives, these apostles of folk-tunes, to write music of poignant and compelling human quality and voice. Far oftener, as it seems, the men who keep to the good old prescription in the arts and look in their hearts and write, achieve the expressiveness, the emotional force, the poetic suggestion that the others may not compass. Mr. Loeffler's music in "A Pagan Poem" or anywhere else, bears no mark of nationality. It courts no real or assumed simplicity. It finds its inspiration in the composer's own mind and heart. It needs no spur but the purpose that has possessed him. Grant that Balakireff was writing absolute music in his symphony, while Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem has the literary, the poetic and the emotional suggestion of the chosen fragment of Virgil's eclogue behind. Yet "A Pagan Poem" is no whit less symphonic than the Russian music; rather it is many fold more so in the development, the modulation, the contrasts and the combinations of its melodies. Put Virgil's verse aside and listen to "A Pagan Poem" as so much absolute music, independent of all things but itself. Then recall Balakireff's thin, monotonous, and laboring little symphony, and the advantage in expressive, emotional, human, and poetic quality, is all on Mr. Loeffler's side. The listener need not know the longing and the elation of Virgil's girl, the sorceress-spells, the haunting refrain, to feel the passionate intensity, the human significance, the imaginative suggestion of Mr. Loeffler's music.

Moreover in this particular case such comparisons are intrinsically futile. Balakireff's symphony will go and come in the plenteous tides of new and of Russian music. Dr. Muck, as it is his duty to do, has informed his audiences of it sympathetically and left them to keep what impressions they will. "A Pagan Poem" remains, the ablest achievement, thus far, of one of the most truly eminent and truly distinguished composers of our time. Nowhere, in all his music, has Mr. Loeffler written with more resourceful, imaginative and significant command of his medium. Nowhere has he filled so large a canvas so completely and so vividly. Nowhere has he written music of such intensity of mood and such passion alike of frank utterance and of subtler suggestion. In "A Pagan Poem" he has gained a new largeness, substance, warmth and humanity of imagination and expression. Mr. Loeffler is the poet still who writes in tones and makes them serve and heighten his poetic purpose, but he is such a poet with a wider, deeper, and more stirring eloquence. Virgil's girl is nearly 2000 years old. Rollinat, Maeterlinck, and the rest of Mr. Loeffler's Frenchmen count barely their half-century. But it is she, not they, who has quickened his spirit almost to a new birth.

H. T. P.

Post-SYMPHONY CONCERT

A symphony in C major by Mily Balikereff, who may in a sense be called the father of the modern school, was heard for the first time in this city at the Symphony public rehearsal and concert of Friday and Saturday. Charles M. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" for orchestra and piano, which was given its initial performance earlier in the season, was repeated by general request and Chabrier's overture to his opera "Gwendoline" completed the programme. Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, as before, played the piano part in the performance of the Pagan Poem.

Now Balikereff is a burning patriot, and a nationalist to the backbone. The hope of the aged Glinka, the first great Russian composer, his development proceeded along strictly national lines. His important works have almost invariably been based on folk-song. Did he not, by the use of three Russian tunes, respectively representative of "Paganism," "Cossack Democracy," and "Modern Russia," portray the past, present and future of his mighty land? The orchestral fantasia, "En Boheme," which was played for the first time in Boston at Mrs. R. J. Hall's concert last January in Jordan Hall, was one crazy-quilt of Czech melodies, and these melodies were strung together to form a loose, shambling, hobbling affair that was all joints.

This symphony, which is very national in context, is a far more finished and mature effort than the piece just mentioned, though in the first movement and some measures of the andante there is a still evident lack of constructive ability. A symphony that will live requires something more than a few themes thrown into a pot together and boiled according to recipe. Balikereff is enamoured of the curve and the momentum of his dear melodies, but to combine these melodies to realize them in a manner to build a strong, proportional tonal edifice seems not always within his capacity. In the opening portion of the work he has adnared too closely to the classic mould. So many bars filled with notes, many feet ruled and measured. As the movement progresses the composer gets more truly en rapport with his task, but this section is the least successful and characteristic of the four.

The work, however, as a whole, rings true. It is genuinely and unmistakably Russian, which is something that can too seldom be said of the effusions of the so-called "modern Russian school." The orchestral style is that of Berlioz, smeared with Russian grease. There is the exotic richness and depth of color, the sensuousness, the cloying curve of Oriental song. The voice of that clarinet in the slow movement might be heard brooding over the long reaches of the steppes in the palpitating, unfathomable summer night; the tunes of the finale, with their dance rhythms and melting sensuousness, are truly of Russia. To some this music may be antagonistic, perhaps vulgar, but I confess to great pleasure in the rhythms that clamor, the lush melodies that might easily pall, the crashing drums and cymbals, the unrefined pomp and bombast, the sonorous splurges of the brass.

To go a little more into detail, the Scherzo, which has a strong, symphonic pulse, is fascinating in its material and the ingenuity with which that material is handled. The andante is a romanza at once passionate and elegiac, and most sumptuously scored. It leads directly into the finale, which is practically a rondo on themes of a very national character. The free rondo form, which does not require extended development in the sense that the "sonata form" of the first movement does, is very suitable as the vehicle of such fragmentary material, and the composer is correspondingly happy and resourceful in his writing. The symphony, in spite of lapses where it savors of the perfunctory or commonplace, is a vital and individual creation.

Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" has been rapturously hailed as his greatest composition, his most mature and human achievement. Statements of that sort cannot possibly be conclusive at a time when we are so close to works of unusual distinction and workmanship. That Mr. Loeffler has made a notable addition to a series of works of remarkable originality is beyond dispute. That he has never written with more consummate mastery seems probable, though this question also, to be authoritatively decided, would require the most intimate acquaintance with the works of the composer and a judge versed as few are in the art of composition.

To this writer, who cannot boast so close an acquaintance with these compositions as he would desire, the Pagan Poem, at the second hearing, had not the force, the irresistible fascination and conviction of either the "Death of Tintagiles" or the "Villanelle du Diable," to mention at random two earlier orchestral works. It seems in places to be a series of episodes and the thought to be often over-elaborated.

Again and again come wonderful and engrossing passages. It could not be otherwise with a composer possessed as Mr. Loeffler of so keen and individual sense of the beautiful. The opening pages, which certainly establish a mood, and the conclusion appear at present to be the strongest parts of the work. Wonderful, throughout, are the orchestral effects, wondrous the splendid, but often cold, tints of that gorgeous palette. How rare and precious those harmonies! One feels the composer smacking his lips over some finely delineative phrase or purple tone-color. Who treasures a new and subtle taste more than he? Could anything more beautiful than the solo for the English horn, or more strangely imaginative than the far-off call of the trumpets, an idea in itself a triumph, be conceived? The effect of the combined timbres of the two instruments at the entrance of the trumpets is beyond the power of words to describe.

235

At times the fantasy of the composer glows at a passionate, white heat; again it subsides into quieter but no less entrancing hues. Yet, with all this, ideas seem too often to be dallied with, picked over, juggled with the tremendous enthusiasm of an untamable caprice, until there is a dangerous approach to redundant prolixity.

The warmer humanity of the music, as contrasted to what many consider the more remote former style of the composer, has been remarked upon. It is true that the music often flames with ardor, but it is the ardor of the intellect and the imagination, not of the flesh. In spite of such passages as those immediately preceding and following the last appearance of the trumpet motive Mr. Loeffler is still "un cerebral," a decadent, and so in all probability he will remain. One would not wish it otherwise, for we could not afford to lose a jot or tittle of his personality. Even the overwhelming jubilation at the end is the unmasterable exuberance of a brain and nerves always tuned to the highest pitch, and even it, to me, savors of irony and the macabre.

These are present impressions which may be altered tomorrow. No more interesting work has been heard this season; no work has more whetted curiosity. To hear it once was to ardently desire a second opportunity of so doing; to hear it twice is to have the desire for repeated hearings increased tenfold. It would be mightily interesting, now, to have an opportunity of comparing Mr. Loeffler's earlier works with this latest creation.

The performance was an exceptionally brilliant one. Mr. Gebhard, who is unsurpassed in this city as an ensemble player, excelled as he did at the first performance. At the conclusion of the piece the composer acknowledged warm and long-continued applause.

The overture to "Gwendoline" is often vulgar and melodramatic, if you will, and strongly tinged with Wagner—what composer of Chabrier's period could well avoid being? These facts are unable to rob the music of its originality and exceeding dramatic force. It is superbly, perhaps here and there too heavily, instrumentated, and it blazed as a firebrand yesterday.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Balakireff—Symphony in C.
Loeffler—"Pagan Poem" for orchestra and piano.

Pianist, Mr. Heinrich Gebhard.

Chabrier—"Gwendoline" overture.

Three works of the modern school, in which each composer was striving after the infinite and straining for originality, became somewhat of a task for the auditor. Of these three Chabrier's was the most tangible, Loeffler's the most subtle, and Balakireff's the most ambitious.

Balakireff has also been stung by the modern tarantula and in this symphony frequently leaves the Muscovite high-road of melody. The work shows effort rather than inspiration. The introduction of the work is not especially impressive but there is the latter-day note of mystery and dread in the subordinate theme of the allegro. There is plenty of development and a rather bombastic climax in the first movement.

The Scherzo is decidedly interesting and gives some novel effects, particularly in its Coda which ends in the highest register. The andante leans to orientalism. It is rather fragmentary, a thing of shreds and patches, and not a broad slow movement such as Brahms or the accepted symphonists would write. It leads directly into the finale and both the last movements exhibit some contrapuntal skill. Again there is the Oriental flavor, this time apportioned to the clarinette, which was excellently played.

The work is long, of course, for brevity has been entirely abolished by modern orchestral composers. There is a dramatic and spicy finale, a Coda which is peppery enough and which lost nothing in the brilliant reading of Dr. Muck.

The symphony as a whole only emphasized the fact that Russia is not producing a second Tchaikowsky. During the lifetime of the latter composer he was denounced as not being Russian enough, but the German influences that worked upon him prevented him from becoming a local second-rater. Here we have Balakireff trying also to become cosmopolitan and relegate "local color" into second place. He does not wholly succeed. His new symphony is not one that is likely to become a standard work. It has some beautiful moments, but it is not a work of long breath, nor do many of even its best points linger in the memory.

The symphony was not a good preparation for Loeffler's "Pagan Poem." This work was finely played. The orchestra was in good form, the trumpets gave their triumphant fanfares with spirit, the English horn was very impressive in its "obbligato" and the pianist was perfection. Mr. Gebhard in this poem proves what a thorough artist he is. It is far more difficult to weave such a thread of piano-work into the warp and woof of such a free composition than it would be to play almost any concerto. Mr. Gebhard achieved this task not only with technical surety but with poetic instinct. He was liberally applauded and the composer also was given similar homage and forced to bow his acknowledgments.

It may have been the placing of the work that caused it to have somewhat less effect than at its first performance. Each time that we heard the "Death of Tintagiles" we liked it better. We are not quite sure that this will be the result with the "Pagan Poem." Nevertheless it is a strong picture of yearning and longing, of mystery and of spell-weaving, and when Daphnis finally comes home with his small brass band, not stopping even to wipe his feet on the door-mat, one cannot but share in the enthusiasm of the young lady who occasioned the return.

The overture to "Gwendoline" was brilliantly performed. Here we have a modern Frenchman who is melodic and powerful at the same time. He would probably never have rivalled Bizet in this field, yet his development might have been somewhat on the same lines, had he lived longer. In this overture there is far more effort than one can find in any of Bizet's compositions except, perhaps, in his weak "Patrie" overture. The work begins with heavy sequences which culminate in loud kettle-drum strokes, and the piccolo begins shrieking very early in the proceedings. The overture is intense almost all the way through. But, as above intimated, there are touches of sweet melody and the goddess of tune is not shown the door, as she is in so many modern Gallic compositions. The theme given by violoncellos and deep woodwind at the beginning, after the sequences, is beautiful. Much skilful figure development is in the overture and there is a very loud climax at the end, in which Dr. Muck allowed his brasses to go to their lung-limit. We are glad that our conductor has no Chesterfieldian suavity when it comes to working up a strong crescendo.

It is in his earnest themes that Chabrier is at his best, in some of the lighter melodies he seems more akin to Offenbach than to Bizet, and not the Offenbach of "Les Contes d'Hoffmann" either. But Chabrier is certainly one of the strong French composers and is to be placed in the same sheepfold with Bizet, Dukas, Cesar Franck, etc.

At the next concert, a week from Saturday, we are to be allowed to have different schools on the same programme, our resident composer, Gustav Strube, a modern Norwegian, Halvorsen, and an interesting composer of long ago, named Beethoven, will be represented. The last-named is said to have had some very curious musical theories, such as ending when one has nothing more to say, presenting clear themes in a symmetrical relationship, writing tuneful melodies, etc. We can only conjecture what effect these unusual devices will have upon our public.

Louis C. Elson.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

A symphony in C major by Milly Balakireff, who may in a sense be called the father of the modern school, was heard for the first time in this city at the Symphony public rehearsal and concert of Friday and Saturday. Charles M. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" for orchestra and piano, which was given its initial performance earlier in the season, was repeated by general request and Chabrier's overture to his opera "Gwendoline" completed the programme. Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, as before, played the piano part in the performance of the Pagan Poem.

Now Balakireff is a burning patriot, and a nationalist to the backbone. The hope of the aged Glinka, the first great Russian composer, his development proceeded along strictly national lines. His important works have almost invariably been based on folk-song. Did he not, by the use of three Russian tunes, respectively representative of "Paganism," "Cossack Democracy," and "Modern Russia," portray the past, present and future of his mighty land? The orchestral fantasia, "En Boheme," which was played for the first time in Boston at Mrs. R. J. Hall's concert last January in Jordan Hall, was one crazy-quilt of Czech melodies, and these melodies were strung together to form a loose, shambling, hobbling affair that was all joints.

This symphony, which is very national in context, is a far more finished and mature effort than the piece just mentioned, though in the first movement and some measures of the andante there is a still evident lack of constructive ability. A symphony that will live requires something more than a few themes thrown into a pot together and boiled according to recipe. Balakireff is enamoured of the curve and the momentum of his dear melodies, but to combine these melodies to realize them in a manner to build a strong, proportional tonal edifice seems not always within his capacity. In the opening portion of the work he has adquired too closely to the classic mould. So many bars filled with notes, many feet ruled and measured. As the movement progresses the composer gets more truly en rapport with his task, but this section is the least successful and characteristic of the four.

The work, however, as a whole, rings true. It is genuinely and unmistakably Russian, which is something that can too seldom be said of the effusions of the so-called "modern Russian school." The orchestral style is that of Berlioz, smeared with Russian grease. There is the exotic richness and depth of color, the sensuousness, the cloying curve of Oriental song. The voice of that clarinet in the slow movement might be heard brooding over the long reaches of the steppes in the palpitating, unfathomable summer night; the tunes of the finale, with their dance rhythms and melting sensuousness, are truly of Russia. To some this music may be antagonistic, perhaps vulgar, but I confess to great pleasure in the rhythms that clamor, the lush melodies that might easily pall, the crashing drums and cymbals, the unrefined pomp and bombast, the sonorous splurges of the brass.

232

To go a little more into detail, the scherzo, which has a strong, symphonic pulse, is fascinating in its material and the ingenuity with which that material is handled. The andante is a romanza at once passionate and elegiac, and most sumptuously scored. It leads directly into the finale, which is practically a rondo on themes of a very national character. The free rondo form, which does not require extended development in the sense that the "sonata form" of the first movement does, is very suitable as the vehicle of such fragmentary material, and the composer is correspondingly happy and resourceful in his writing. The symphony, in spite of lapses where it savors of the perfunctory or commonplace, is a vital and individual creation.

Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" has been rapturously hailed as his greatest composition, his most mature and human achievement. Statements of that sort cannot possibly be conclusive at a time when we are so close to works of unusual distinction and workmanship. That Mr. Loeffler has made a notable addition to a series of works of remarkable originality is beyond dispute. That he has never written with more consummate mastery seems probable, though this question also, to be authoritatively decided, would require the most intimate acquaintance with the works of the composer and a judge versed as few are in the art of composition.

To this writer, who cannot boast so close an acquaintance with these compositions as he would desire, the Pagan Poem, at the second hearing, had not the force, the irresistible fascination and conviction of either the "Death of Tintagiles" or the "Villanelle du Diable," to mention at random two earlier orchestral works. It seems in places to be a series of episodes and the thought to be often over-elaborated.

Again and again come wonderful and engrossing passages. It could not be otherwise with a composer possessed as Mr. Loeffler of so keen and individual sense of the beautiful. The opening pages, which certainly establish a mood, and the conclusion appear at present to be the strongest parts of the work. Wondrous, throughout, are the orchestral effects, wondrous the splendid, but often cold, tints of that gorgeous palette. How rare and precious those harmonies! One feels the composer smacking his lips over some finely delineative phrase or purple tone-color. Who treasures a new and subtle taste more than he? Could anything more beautiful than the solo for the English horn, or more strangely imaginative than the far-off call of the trumpets, an idea in itself a triumph, be conceived? The effect of the combined timbres of the two instruments at the entrance of the trumpets is beyond the power of words to describe.

At times the fantasy of the composer glows at a passionate, white heat; again it subsides into quieter but no less entrancing hues. Yet, with all this, ideas seem too often to be dallied with, picked over, juggled with the tremendous enthusiasm of an untamable caprice, until there is a dangerous approach to redundant prolixity.

The warmer humanity of the music, as contrasted to what many consider the more remote former style of the composer, has been remarked upon. It is true that the music often flames with ardor, but it is the ardor of the intellect and the imagination, not of the flesh. In spite of such passages as those immediately preceding and following the last appearance of the trumpet motive Mr. Loeffler is still "un cerebral," a decadent, and so in all probability he will remain. One would not wish it otherwise, for we could not afford to lose a jot or tittle of his personality. Even the overwhelming jubilation at the end is the unmasterable exuberance of a brain and nerves always tuned to the highest pitch, and even it, to me, savors of irony and the macabre.

These are present impressions which may be altered tomorrow. No more interesting work has been heard this season; no work has more whetted curiosity. To hear it once was to ardently desire a second opportunity of so doing; to hear it twice is to have the desire for repeated hearings increased tenfold. It would be mightily interesting, now, to have an opportunity of comparing Mr. Loeffler's earlier works with this latest creation.

The performance was an exceptionally brilliant one. Mr. Gebhard, who is unsurpassed in this city as an ensemble player, excelled as he did at the first performance. At the conclusion of the piece the composer acknowledged warm and long-continued applause.

The overture to "Gwendoline" is often vulgar and melodramatic, if you will, and strongly tinged with Wagner—what composer of Chabrier's period could well avoid being? These facts are unable to rob the music of its originality and exceeding dramatic force. It is superbly, perhaps here and there too heavily, instrumentated, and it blazed as a firebrand yesterday.

There will be no rehearsal and concert next week. On the following Friday and Saturday two new compositions by Mr. Gustave Strube, the well-known composer and member of the orchestra, will be played for the first time.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" Repeated, a New Symphony by Balakireff and a Clanging Overture by Chabrier—A Varied Field, in Which Mr. Loeffler Was Clearly the Master—Balakireff's Conventional Russian Music, and Chabrier's Undeserved Plight

Mr. Loeffler almost had the afternoon to himself at the Symphony Concert of yesterday, less because the audience listened very intently to the repetition of his "Pagan Poem" and applauded him very warmly at the end, than because his music dimmed the glow of Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline" that followed, and in recollection made the preceding symphony by Balakireff seem in comparison rather a poor and common thing. It is four years since the striding, clanging overture—a passionate rhythms and passionate sonorities—to Chabrier's viking opera has been played in Boston, and memory leapt to welcome it. Good to hear again would be the languorous music of the on-rushing Danes and the four-square chant of Walhalla in the resounding finale. In itself, there is not a reason why the music should have lost for the moment its fire of passionate imagination, its splendor of passionate utterance. Chabrier's thrilling vitality easily survives the years. By it and by the power of rhythm in which he gives it play, he lives and will live long. The overture to "Gwendoline" needs no atmosphere of the theatre and no aid from the rising curtain and the succeeding play. As music it speaks for itself; and Dr. Muck, as always in an operatic overture, made it speak eloquently.

And yet merely because Chabrier's overture happened to follow Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem it sounded strangely tame and a little empty. The glowing sonorities had momentarily lost their power after the finer intensities of Mr. Loeffler's music. A passion of rhythmic energy and imagination like Chabrier's seemed rather a poor thing after the wider-ranging expressiveness in melodic idea, in harmony, in instrumental coloring, in the full resource of music that stirred in Mr. Loeffler. The overture to "Gwendoline" seemed rhetorical and "effective" in the meaner sense of the word after the sensitiveness and the subtler yet not less potent imaginings of "A Pagan Poem." Chabrier was of the temperament that must take thought of its audience, even when he wrought in such fire of spirit as that in which seemingly he wrote his "little Gwendoline." Mr. Loeffler's idea and purpose and all that they suggested to him had seemingly driven all else from his imagination. Long as he worked upon "A Pagan Poem," often as he transformed it, it still sounds spontaneous and inevitable to its theme.

233
 And in retrospect, Mr. Loeffler's music no less dimmed Balakireff's. Mr. Loeffler's is a familiar name on the programmes of the Symphony Concerts. Balakireff's stood there for the first time. Yet, at every turn, "A Pagan Poem" seemed new, fresh, individual and original, to lead, to command, and to absorb the listener. The symphony in C major, on the other hand, was precisely what the same listener had reason to expect in new music by a new Russian. By chance or by design the lesser Russian composers with their loud disdain of the non-Slav world outside, have shut themselves in a little world of their own where they and seemingly all things musical run in the same mould. Balakireff is alert, fanciful, spontaneous in the instrumental dress that he gives his symphony. Easily he gains the bizarre and the unsuspected. He can write a highly fantastic and light-footed scherzo, with a becomingly songful middle passage. His slow movement runs in brooding and melancholy song. He knows his Russian folk-tunes, and he can make them whirl in riotous rhythm and sonority, or set them more quietly to singing themselves through varied instrumental voices. He has heard, and he uses, strumming Oriental rhythms and languid Oriental song. But he cannot develop, elaborate and vary his melodies and draw new musical and poetic suggestion from them. On goes his symphony, changeful in its instrumental raiment and decoration. There he is fertile and fanciful enough, but fecund imagination deserts him with his melodies. They are rather poor little melodies; they lead no whither; imaginative zest is not in them; body they have not. And so to traverse the traits of Balakireff's symphony is to traverse scarcely less the traits of many a Russian symphony of the school that calls him father. We in Boston have heard such music before—Glazounoff's for example; we shall hear more of it again and already we are beginning to accuse it of monotony in all else than instrumental color and voice. Perhaps, after all, primitive folk, Slav or any other, wear none too well in the sophisticated arts of a sophisticated Old World. Balakireff has written a mildly amusing little symphony à la Russe, and no more.

Moreover, in spite of the assertions of their partisans, it is not the virtue of these "nationalists," these primitives, these apostles of folk-tunes, to write music of poignant and compelling human quality and voice. Far oftener, as it seems, the men who keep to the good old prescription in the arts and look in their hearts and write, achieve the expressiveness, the emotional force, the poetic suggestion that the others may not compass. Mr. Loeffler's music in "A Pagan Poem" or anywhere else, bears no mark of nationality. It courts no real or assumed simplicity. It finds its inspiration in the composer's own mind and heart. It needs no spur but the purpose that has possessed him. Grant that Balakireff was writing absolute music in his symphony, while Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem has the literary, the poetic and the emotional suggestion of the chosen fragment of Virgil's eclogue behind. Yet "A Pagan Poem" is no whit less symphonic than the Russian music; rather it is many fold more so in the development, the modulation, the contrasts and the combinations of its melodies. Put Virgil's verse aside and listen to "A Pagan Poem" as so much absolute music, independent of all things but itself. Then recall Balakireff's thin, monotonous, and laboring little symphony, and the advantage in expressive, emotional, human, and poetic quality, is all on Mr. Loeffler's side. The listener need not know the longing and the elation of Virgil's girl, the sorceress-spells, the haunting refrain, to feel the passionate intensity, the human significance, the imaginative suggestion of Mr. Loeffler's music.

234

Moreover in this particular case such comparisons are intrinsically futile. Balakireff's symphony will go and come in the plenteous tides of new and of Russian music. Dr. Muck, as it his duty to do, has informed his audiences of it sympathetically and left them to keep what impressions they will. "A Pagan Poem" remains, the ablest achievement, thus far, of one of the most truly eminent and truly distinguished composers of our time. Nowhere, in all his music, has Mr. Loeffler written with more resourceful, imaginative and significant command of his medium. Nowhere has he filled so large a canvas so completely and so vividly. Nowhere has he written music of such intensity of mood and such passion, alike of frank utterance and of subtler suggestion. In "A Pagan Poem" he has gained a new largeness, substance, warmth and humanity of imagination and expression. Mr. Loeffler is the poet still who writes in tones and makes them serve and heighten his poetic purpose, but he is such a poet with a wider, deeper, and more stirring eloquence. Virgil's girl is nearly 2000 years old. Rollinat, Maeterlinck, and the rest of Mr. Loeffler's Frenchmen count barely their half-century. But it is she, not they, who has quickened his spirit almost to a new birth.

H. T. P.

PRAISE FOR DR. MUCK.

From the New York Times, March 22.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra finished its New York season yesterday afternoon with a concert in Carnegie hall devoted to the elder classics—to Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," and Beethoven's Fourth Symphony. In this concert Dr. Muck took leave of New York, for his engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra ends with the season in Boston, and he must return to Berlin. His admirers—and they must surely number all who have heard his concerts in the two seasons he has conducted the Boston Orchestra here—will hope that his absence will be but for a time.

That is for the future to determine. But music lovers of New York will have a keen regret in losing a conductor of gifts so remarkable as Dr. Muck has shown himself to be. He took up, to be sure, in the Boston Orchestra, an instrument brought to the highest perfection by his predecessor, Mr. Gericke, whose memory is still fragrant. Without sacrificing any of this perfection he has swayed the orchestra with his own spirit and made its playing the absolute expression of his own purposes. And it is giving Dr. Muck the highest praise as a conductor to say that those purposes are always those of the composer. His stay with the Boston Orchestra has maintained the standard and the traditions of that organization, and has been a benefit and a stimulant.

Of the performance yesterday there is little to say. Dr. Muck conducts the music of the classical masters not only with devotion and reverence, but also with zest and with a keen perception that it is alive and that it lives because it has vital qualities with which its interpretation is to be infused. He conducted yesterday under a double disadvantage due to the affection of the arm that caused him to spare it noticeably on Thursday night, and to an added indisposition that laid him low on the following day.

However, these personal ailments were not reflected in his performance of the music, which was well-nigh flawless. All three of the compositions played were light-hearted in character and congruous with the Spring day outside. The "Surprise Symphony" was played with delicacy, lightness, and grace.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XIX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 28, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

Owing to the indisposition of DR. MUCK, MR. CARL WENDLING will conduct.

BRAHMS,

SYMPHONY in E minor, No. 4, op. 98.

- I. Allegro non troppo.
- II. Andante moderato.
- III. Allegro giocoso.
- IV. Allegro energico e passionato.

GUSTAV STRUBE,

TWO SYMPHONIC POEMS for ORCHESTRA with VIOLA SOLO.

Conducted by the Composer.

- a) Longing.
- b) Fantastic Dance.
(First time.)
Mr. E. FERIR, Viola.

BERLIOZ,

OVERTURE to the Opera "Benvenuto Cellini," op. 23.

2 234

symphony, while Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem has the literary, the poetic and the emotional suggestion of the chosen fragment of Virgil's eclogue behind. Yet "A Pagan Poem" is no whit less symphonic than the Russian music; rather it is many fold more so in the development, the modulation, the contrasts and the combinations of its melodies. Put Virgil's verse aside and listen to "A Pagan Poem" as so much absolute music, independent of all things but itself. Then recall Balakireff's thin, monotonous, and laboring little symphony, and the advantage in expressive, emotional, human, and poetic quality, is all on Mr. Loeffler's side. The listener need not know the longing and the elation of Virgil's girl, the sorceress-spells, the haunting refrain, to feel the passionate intensity, the human significance, the imaginative suggestion of Mr. Loeffler's music.

Moreover in this particular case such comparisons are intrinsically futile. Balakireff's symphony will go and come in the plenteous tides of new and of Russian music. Dr. Muck, as it his duty to do, has informed his audiences of it sympathetically and left them to keep what impressions they will. "A Pagan Poem" remains, the ablest achievement, thus far, of one of the most truly eminent and truly distinguished composers of our time. Nowhere, in all his music, has Mr. Loeffler written with more resourceful, imaginative and significant command of his medium. Nowhere has he filled so large a canvas so completely and so vividly. Nowhere has he written music of such intensity of mood and such passion alike of frank utterance and of subtler suggestion. In "A Pagan Poem" he has gained a new largeness, substance, warmth and humanity of imagination and expression. Mr. Loeffler is the poet still who writes in tones and makes them serve and heighten his poetic purpose, but he is such a poet with a wider, deeper, and more stirring eloquence. Virgil's girl is nearly 2000 years old. Rollinat, Maeterlinck, and the rest of Mr. Loeffler's Frenchmen count barely their half-century. But it is she, not they, who has quickened his spirit almost to a new birth.

H. T. P.

PRAISE FOR DR. MUCK.

From the New York Times, March 22.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra finished its New York season yesterday afternoon with a concert in Carnegie hall devoted to the elder classics—to Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," and Beethoven's Fourth Symphony. In this concert Dr. Muck took leave of New York, for his engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra ends with the season in Boston, and he must return to Berlin. His admirers—and they must surely number all who have heard his concerts in the two seasons he has conducted the Boston Orchestra here—will hope that his absence will be but for a time.

That is for the future to determine. But music lovers of New York will have a keen regret in losing a conductor of gifts so remarkable as Dr. Muck has shown himself to be. He took up, to be sure, in the Boston Orchestra, an instrument brought to the highest perfection by his predecessor, Mr. Gericke, whose memory is still fragrant. Without sacrificing any of this perfection he has swayed the orchestra with his own spirit and made its playing the absolute expression of his own purposes. And it is giving Dr. Muck the highest praise as a conductor to say that those purposes are always those of the composer. His stay with the Boston Orchestra has maintained the standard and the traditions of that organization, and has been a benefit and a stimulant.

Of the performance yesterday there is little to say. Dr. Muck conducts the music of the classical masters not only with devotion and reverence, but also with zest and with a keen perception that it is alive and that it lives because it has vital qualities with which its interpretation is to be infused. He conducted yesterday under a double disadvantage due to the affection of the arm that caused him to spare it noticeably on Thursday night, and to an added indisposition that laid him low on the following day.

However, these personal ailments were not reflected in his performance of the music, which was well-nigh flawless. All three of the compositions played were light-hearted in character and congruous with the Spring day outside. The "Surprise Symphony" was played with delicacy, lightness, and grace.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XIX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 28, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

Owing to the indisposition of DR. MUCK, MR. CARL WENDLING will conduct.

BRAHMS,

SYMPHONY in E minor, No. 4, op. 98.

I. Allegro non troppo.

II. Andante moderato.

III. Allegro giocoso.

IV. Allegro energico e passionato.

GUSTAV STRUBE,

TWO SYMPHONIC POEMS for ORCHESTRA with VIOLA SOLO.

Conducted by the Composer.

a) Longing.

b) Fantastic Dance.

(First time.)

Mr. E. FERIR, Viola.

BERLIOZ,

OVERTURE to the Opera "Benvenuto Cellini," op. 23.

Trans. Here in Boston March 23, 1908
 Dr. Muck returned from New York yesterday still beset by the neuritis in his right arm that hampered him during the trip of the Symphony Orchestra last week to the cities to the southward. In spite of the effort and even the physical pain, he conducted at three of the six concerts—at one in Philadelphia and at two in New York. The nervous strain has told upon him, and therefore, he will rest this week that he may be the better able to go forward with his work through the rest of the season. Accordingly, Mr. Wendling, the concert master of the orchestra, will conduct at the concerts of Friday and Saturday with the favorable impression that he made in Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn last week to quicken interest in his conducting here. The programme for the concerts has also been changed, and it now comprises Brahms's symphony in E minor, No. 4; Hugo Wolf's tone-poem, "Penthesilea," unheard here for some years; Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," and the two pieces by Mr. Strube for orchestra with viola obbligata already announced.

The New York newspapers are hinting once more that Dr. Muck's return to Berlin "will be only for a time." Again, and in particular justice to Mr. Fiedler, who will succeed him, it may be stated on the best of authority that there is no "understanding" or hint of an "understanding" about a return of Dr. Muck to Boston. He goes to Berlin to resume his work at the opera house there; he is bound to that work for years to come. What the future may hold thereafter no one knows, and surmising is as futile as it is easy.

Here is the way, according to the New York Evening Sun, in which Mr. Loefler's "three trumpets obbligati" in "A Pagan Poem" were played in Carnegie Hall last week: "Thanks to a telephone company that had some music in the place where its soul ought to be, and in this case it was its president who was invoked, there had been installed, in a matter of two hours or so, a telephone from the stage to an inner room. There, behind two sets of closed doors, the trumpets and an assistant conductor played the soft airs of the absent Roman lover, and the audience heard them through a funnel at the mouth of the telephone."

For Dr. Muck's last appearance in New York with the Symphony Orchestra on the afternoon of Saturday, March 21, he has made a programme wholly of the music of American composers—Mr. Loefler's "A Pagan Poem," MacDowell's "Indian" suite and Mr. Converse's suite from his music to MacKaye's play of "Jeanne d'Arc." Thus the conductor, apparently, would pay a quiet and well-devised compliment to the American public that for two years has heard him so eagerly and applauded him so warmly.

Trans. Dr. Muck's Final Tour March 16-1908
 This week the Symphony Orchestra is making the last of its monthly journeys for the current season to Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York, and in each of the five cities Dr. Muck will conduct for the last time before he returns to Berlin. In each no less truly than in Boston he has won a public that will take warm leave of him. To give the field to the conductor himself, no singer or virtuoso accompanies the orchestra, and by chance or design Dr. Muck has made programmes for the six concerts that fairly traverse his powers alike in classic and modern music. They range from Händel and Haydn of the eighteenth century down to Loeffler and Reger of the day before yesterday, and German and French, Russian and American pieces all stand upon them. Yet on five of them there is at least one classic, and the two final programmes with which Dr. Muck appears for the last time in Brooklyn and New York are wholly classical. For the other concert in New York Dr. Muck has made his first "all-American" programme, perhaps in happily conceived and grateful compliment (under all the conductor's reserve and self-effacement) to the public that next to our own in Boston has been warmest toward him. Here follow the six programmes of the week:

In Philadelphia, Monday:
 Beethoven: Symphony No. 6, Pastoral.
 MacDowell: Indian Suite.
 Rimsky-Korsakoff: Caprice on Spanish Themes.

In Washington, Tuesday:
 Beethoven: Symphony No. 4.
 Strauss: Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks.
 Chabrier: Overture to "Gwendoline."

In Baltimore, Wednesday:
 Händel: Concerto in F major for Strings and two Wind Orchestras.
 Reger: Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme, Hiller.
 Rimsky-Korsakoff: Caprice on Spanish Themes.

In New York, Thursday:
 Converse: "Jeanne d'Arc," Dramatic Scenes for Orchestra.
 Loefler: A Pagan Poem.
 MacDowell: Indian Suite.

In Brooklyn, Friday:
 Händel: Concerto in F major for Strings and two Wind Orchestras.
 Haydn: Symphony in G major, No. 6.
 Mozart: Symphony in D major.

In New York, Saturday:
 Haydn: Symphony in G major, No. 6.
 Mozart: Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro."
 Beethoven: Symphony No. 4.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans. March 28, 08
 Mr. Wendling Conducts Capably and Interestingly, and the Orchestra Seconds Him to the Utmost—Brahms and Berlioz to Begin and to End the Programme, with Mr. Strube's Little Tone-Poems for Viola and Orchestra Between—The New "Fantastic Dance"

A ripple of applause welcomed Mr. Wendling when he appeared first yesterday afternoon to conduct, in Dr. Muck's absence, at the Symphony Concert. At the close of each movement of Brahms's symphony in E-minor, with which the programme began, it waxed heartier, and for a departing audience, it was unusually warm at the end of the whole concert. Experienced concert-master though he is, Mr. Wendling is almost new to conducting; Dr. Muck's neuritis first disabled him in Washington and Baltimore last week; all unexpectedly Mr. Wendling had then to take the orchestra and perform, modestly, but no less heroically, the feat of leading it through Reger's tortuous Variations and Rimsky-Korsakoff's exacting "Spanish Caprice" without rehearsals—and with effect. Here at least he had his share in the choice of the pieces to be performed and opportunity to rehearse the orchestra in them. The men—quick and shrewd judges of a conductor suddenly set over them—had answered to him in Baltimore and Washington and done all that they might to aid. They were not less responsive and helpful yesterday, and the esprit du corps of the whole band was good to feel. Sometimes we listeners are prone to forget that the Symphony Orchestra is a living institution in its men as well as its conductor, and that at need they can bear their part in an emergency and bear it heartily and well. They made the path of Mr. Wendling as easy as they could, and, doing so, they were loyal to their work, the orchestra and themselves.

Moreover, the major piece on the programme—Brahms's symphony in E minor—happened to suit Mr. Wendling's traits admirably. Last autumn, when as a new violinist, he played Brahms's concerto, he showed both sympathy and aptitude for the composer's music, and yesterday his conducting of the symphony confirmed both. He read the music lucidly; but never as so much dry exposition of certain melodic ideas. He threaded clearly the mazes of the finale, and yet in his pursuit of them he did not forget to make the entrance of the trombones the stirring beginning of a climax that rose steadily to the end. He read the symphony as music that has no other appeal than its own quality and its own processes; but he did not forget that in them are the emotions of thoughtful, imaginative, beautiful and ordered sound. He kept Brahms continent and contained, as he should be, but he nowhere made him austere. In particular he gained the dusky instrumental coloring in which Brahms delighted—notably in the serener passages of the first movement, and in the varied song of the andante. Here and there the music might have been more elastic; once again the ear and the fancy missed a stroke that they expected; the rare eloquence with which now and then an exceptional conductor can lift Brahms to something close to majesty was indeed lacking. Mr. Wendling let the composer speak for himself, but kept him, so to say, speaking truly. And at the end of the concert, he was no less sympathetic and understanding toward the very different music of the Berlioz of the overture to "Benvenuto Cellini." Like most of Berlioz's music it needs performance up to the hilt. In an ideal musical world an orchestra of Berliozes should perform it. As it is in this nearer and more material world, it is a long-standing tour de force of our orchestra. The men, no less than the conductor, seemed to come eagerly to it yesterday, and it "sounded" with all Berlioz's breadth and energy of voice, his amplitude and richness of instrumental coloring, his sharpness of dramatic accent, his abrupt intensities of mood. Equally the men and Mr. Wendling made it true and stirring Berlioz.

Between Brahms and Berlioz came Mr. Strube's two pieces for orchestra and viola, with Mr. Féir to play the solo part and the composer to conduct with the men as loyally eager to do his will and catch the vein and voice of the music to the utmost as they had been with Mr. Wendling. One of the pieces, "Longing," a tone-poem in little, was played at the Symphony Concerts three years ago; the contrasting second, "A Fantastic Dance," came newly to performance yesterday. The suggestion and the background of both are poems by Mr. William Lyman Johnson—the one the voice of longing for the peace of night and solitude after the tumult of the day and the world; the other picture of mystic and purifying dance that clears and scatters the earth's accumulated sorrow by the whirl and passion of its own wildness. Mstreal verse in spirit under all its rather rhetorical rush of words, and it is this spirit that Mr. Strube has caught and reflected in his music and given it a mystery withal that is of his own imagination so kindled.

Throughout the two tone-poems—as they really are in little—are music of shadowy, remote, fitful and vaporous suggestion. It is the echo now harsh and shivering, and now faint and far of the turbulent day that makes the musical background of "Longing." It is the clamorous echo of the wild dance rather than the din of it that runs through the second piece. And the voice of the yearning viola in the first is a gentle, brooding, musing voice, speaking in subdued intensities. In the dance, in turn, the viola speaks the spirit of the purifying rite—the weariness of spirit, the weight of the sorrow that the wild ceremony is lifting, the longing, again, for the peace that is to come. The plaintive tone of the viola as a familiar thing, the poignancy of its voice is an old device of instrumental expression. Mr. Strube has found the suggestion of mystery that is also in its tones and made it serve his imaginings. Yet he has kept the viola a solo instrument; he has given it even its cadenza, and yet held it unforcedly in his whole poetic scheme. With no less inventive resource and imaginative skill, he has made both pieces as truly symphonic in structure as though he were writing "absolute" music. He heeds form because he can make it serve his imaginative and expressive ends, without licence and without defiance.

H. T. P.

WENDLING CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Herald ———— Feb. 29, 08

New Orchestral Piece by Gustav Strube with Mr. Ferir as Viola Soloist.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 19th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in E minor, No. 4.....Brahms
Two symphonic poems for orchestra and viola solo, "Longing" and "Fantastic Dance".....Strube
Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini".....Berlioz

Mr. Wendling, the concert master, conducted. Dr. Muck's arm needs rest, and Mr. Wendling will conduct the public rehearsal and the concert of the orchestra this week.

Mr. Strube's symphonic poem "Longing" was produced at a Symphony concert about three years ago. The viola solo was then played by Mr. Ferir, who also played it beautifully last night. The "Fantastic Dance," heard last evening for the first time, was composed by Mr. Strube in 1906 as a companion piece. Verses by Mr. W. L. Johnson, the poet of "Longing," suggested the fantastical music to Mr. Strube, who endeavored, no doubt, to outvie the spirit of the poet's lines:

The whirl of this dance of earth,
Dislustered dance, and vague, importuned mirth,
'Gainst sorrow only can protest.

The sympathetic shriek of flaming continents.

The long tale cry of quenched armaments,
The wild, strident thoughts that in me clash and crash.

Whether Mr. Strube succeeded in being more fantastical than Mr. Johnson is after all a minor question. He certainly succeeded in producing an uncommon score as far as instrumentation is concerned. His use of instruments is masterly, and in this work he has found new combinations and contrasts of timbres, surprising and bizarre effects. In this respect Mr. Strube has indisputable talent; he has true orchestral imagination. Furthermore this dance in rondo form has inherent character without the aid of gorgeous or singular instrumental dress. Whether you like it or dislike it, there it is and it makes an impression.

It is not merely an experimental work, a study in the fantastical; it has well rounded form and substance; it has a logical flow of thought, a continuity that leads inevitably to the end. The piece is a brilliant one, and on the whole to be preferred to the earlier "Longing," which, although it contains passages of contemplative beauty and has mood, is nevertheless too discursive, and the sentiment is occasionally too near sentimentalism.

Mr. Ferir again gave pleasure by his wondrous tone, artistic phrasing and sympathetic interpretation. He and the composer, who conducted his pieces, were warmly applauded.

Brahms' symphony in E minor is the least impressive of the four. The austerity with which the composer has been reproached—in many instances unjustly—is here pronounced. The solidity of the structure may be admired, but the structure itself is granitic and unrelieved.

The symphony has not the epic grandeur of the first, the geniality of the second, the wealth of varied beauty that distinguishes the third, nor is there in the fourth anything that compares with the superb opening burst of its immediate predecessor.

The overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" is now 70 years old at least, and it is still effective, brilliant, exciting. The years go by and music that was once applauded is now utterly forgotten, and music that was once mocked and hissed is now honored and even listed as classic—if that term be a compliment. There is constant readjustment of values. This composer is asked to sit lower and that one is placed nearer the Muse herself. Berlioz is surely among the immortals.

If the composers of the 19th century be calmly examined, without favor, without prejudice, there is no greater force, no more striking individual influence in orchestral music than Hector Berlioz. He created the modern orchestra. However daring the ultra-modern may be in his orchestral writing, he owes a heavy debt to the man that without academic training, by sheer creative genius, taught the orchestral way to posterity and is still today in the front rank.

Mr. Wendling conducted with much energy. He knew what he wanted, and he was as a rule successful in obtaining it. His task in view of the circumstances was not an easy one, and he acquitted himself manfully.

Mrs. Muck Gives Last of Her Three Receptions on Tuesday

Mrs. Karl Muck gave her last at home at her apartment at the Empire on Commonwealth avenue on Tuesday. The others were on Feb. 25 and March 10. Among those who received invitations for these receptions were Maj. and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mrs. Knyvet Winthrop Sears, Mrs. Russell Codman, Mrs. Winthrop Sargent, Mr. and Mrs. William W. Vaughan, Dr. and Mrs. S. J. Mixter, the Arthur Beebes, Mr. and Mrs. B. J. Lang and Miss Lang, the Richard Dixes, Mrs. Charles Sargent, Mrs. Guy Lowell, Mrs. T. Lindall Winthrop, Mrs. Hugh Cabot, Mrs. L. Shannon Davis, Mrs. J. L. Bremer, Mrs. John L. Gardner, Dr. and Mrs. Arnold, Mrs. J. Emery Tippet, Miss Helen Read and the Misses Read. Mrs. Muck has grown very fond of Boston and its people and is full of regret over her permanent leaving for her home in Germany.

Boston Symphony Concerts.

Owing to the indisposition of Dr. Muck, concert-master Carl Wendling conducted two numbers of the 19th symphony programs and Gustav Strube, another member of the orchestra, guided his fellow-players through his two symphonic poems. These were "Longing" and a companion piece, "A Fantastic Dance," which was played here for the first time. The poems are written for orchestra and viola solo, the latter bringing forward Mr. E. Ferir as soloist. Brahms' fourth symphony opened the concert and Berlioz' overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," completed the four selections.

Mr. Wendling led the orchestra admirably through devious musical ways that were quite familiar to the men and Brahms and Berlioz each received adequate interpretation. The players had no difficulty in following Mr. Wendling's desires and their responses to his baton were prompt and evidently in accordance with his ideas.

There is so much of somber hue in the trial coloring of the Brahms composition that it is rather difficult to avoid monotony in parts of the first and finale movements, but Mr. Wendling succeeded well in steering clear of this pitfall and the orchestra gave a perfectly smooth performance. In the Berlioz overture there were even better results, the more brilliant and pompous nature of the work seeming to be more effective in its appeal to players as well as the audience.

Mr. Strube in his two poems gives the viola prominence as a solo instrument, and Mr. Ferir showed that it can be made quite effective in this somewhat infrequent position. "Longing" represents a peaceful night with fitful moments of disturbance, the composition running mainly in legato passages. The solo viola by its depth of tone carries out well the idea of theme and Mr. Ferir played the music with fine, expressive significance.

The soloist in the newer poem, the dance, gave further evidence of artistic ability, for the wild, weird, discordant measures were of the most extravagant modern type, calling for dash and brilliancy in execution. All this was vividly set forth by the soloist. Mr. Strube has handled his scheme skilfully, his instrumental juggling is sufficiently non-melodic and ear-piercing at times to suit the most ultra-modern musical enthusiast, and the performance under his baton was as stirring as one could reasonably desire. Composer and soloist were liberally applauded.

Dr. Muck's arm is so slow in improving that under the advice of his physician he will not conduct the symphony concerts this week, and Mr. Wendling will take his place once more. On this account the program is as follows: Hugo Wolf symphonic poem, "Penthesilea"; Liszt concerto for piano in E flat major, No. 1; Tchaikowsky symphony No. 5, in E minor. Mme. Olga Samaroff will be the soloist. Globe

Here in Boston

Apropos of the current debate over Dr. Muck's programmes at the Symphony Concerts and the place he gives to new and ultra-modern music on them, it is worth while recalling his remark when Mr. Fiedler was announced to succeed him as the conductor of the orchestra. "He is a broad musician," said Dr. Muck, "well grounded in the classics, but a very ardent disciple of the modern school."

A novel and curious piece is to be played at the Symphony Concerts next week for the first time in America—"Die Nachtliche Heerschau" ("The Midnight Review") by Paul Ertel, a composer and reviewer of Berlin. Here is a hint of the music from a listener who heard it last month there: "Ertel has caught well the uncanny, mysterious atmosphere of a dark and sombre hour. With subdued clashing of cymbals and rattling of xylophonic bones, he makes vivid picture of the dead warriors who have been summoned from their graves to pass in midnight review before their great chief—Napoleon. The themes are 'popular,' but so are the parade marches of troops, whether dead or living. At the close comes one of Ertel's ingenious contrapuntal structures built upon the 'Marseillaise.' It was all extremely interesting."

Mr. Strube's New Piece

Mr. Strube's "Fantastic Dance" for viola and orchestra, which is to be played for the first time at the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday, with Mr. Ferir taking the solo part, was written in 1906. He designed it as a companion piece to the tone-poem, "Longing," written a year earlier, also for viola and orchestra, and played under Mr. Gericke at the Symphony Concerts in the spring of 1905. For the first time the two pieces will stand together in the programmes of this week. Both were suggested by verses by William Lyman Johnson of Boston, and to his courtesy we owe the following note about them. "The music of 'Longing' is suggestive of redolent nightfall, filled with peace and night-sounds. The solo viola expresses the longing for the peace and hope that merciful, mothering night brings to him who is tired of 'the clamor, din and gossip of the day,' and all that the struggle for existence suggests.

240

"The verses which suggested the 'Fantastic Dance' to Mr. Strube are part of a larger poem which deals with an ancient sacred rite of relieving the earth of its accumulated sorrows. From this poem Mr. Strube selected the following lines as a motto for his music:

"Whirl, wild, bewildering dance,
With crash and blurr of dissonance.

O, I am weary, weary, let me rest!
The whirling of this dance of earth,
Dislustered dance, and vague, importuned mirth,
'Gainst sorrow only can protest.

No! No! I cannot rest. The dance, the dance—

Once more the dance and crashing dissonance,

The beat of drums, the cymbals' metal clash.

The sympathetic shriek of flaming continents.

The long, pale cry of quenched firmaments,
The wild, attritioned thoughts that in me clang and crash.

Whirl, whirl, O wild bewildering dance,
With lurid crash and blurr of dissonance.
And burn, ye magic fires, for this sacred night,
And melt the chains of grief that holds me tight."

STRUBE AND FERIR REAP SYMPHONY HONORS

Viola Soloist Gives Delightful Rendering of First Violinist's Composition, and Both Are Repeatedly Recalled.

As usual, there was a novelty at the Symphony concert Saturday night. This time it was a symphonic poem for orchestra and viola solo, by Gustav Strube, who has been one of the first violins in the orchestra since 1891. The piece, bearing the title of "Fantastic Dance," was suggested to Mr. Strube by some lines dealing "with an ancient, sacred rite of relieving the earth of its accumulated sorrow." The composition was enthusiastically received. Mr. Strube and Mr. Ferir, the viola player, were recalled again and again. Mr. Ferir also played the solo part in another symphonic poem by Mr. Strube, "Longing," which was first heard at the Symphony Hall three years ago.

Dr. Muck being still disabled by neuritis, Mr. Wendling led the orchestra through the Brahms symphony in E minor and the Berlioz overture to "Benvenuto Cellini." Both numbers were brilliantly played. The orchestra never gives finer proof of its stability and artistry than on such occasions.

Mme. Samaroff will be the soloist at this week's concert. She will play the Liszt concerto in E flat major. There are few more delightful pianists than this young American. The orchestra, with Mr. Wendling again leading, will play Tchaikowsky's E minor symphony and Hugo Wolf's symphonic poem "Penthesilea."

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME. adv.

Brahms. Symphony in E minor.
Strube. Two symphonic poems for Orchestra and Viola.
Berlioz. "Benvenuto Cellini" Overture.

Dr. Muck was ill and Mr. Carl Wendling became conductor. It is possible that some of the recent modern works that Dr. Muck has been trying to digest have caused blood-poisoning. Fortunately he is not dangerously ill and will resume the baton a week from Friday.

Mr. Wendling was a surprise. He conducted more than well, for some of the movements were notably brilliant and poetic. In the first movement of the Brahms symphony we missed some of the subtler "nuances," but the rest of the great work was finely interpreted. The variations of the finale were excellently given and the young conductor deserved the hearty recall which followed the end of the work; without any "if," or "but," or "perhaps," it was a very effective performance.

What a relief it was to listen to a work in which emotion and intellectuality were in good equipoise! Here was something tangible at last. One could follow the eight measures of the Passacaglia of the Finale with ease, and revel in their beauty and ingenuity. In this movement the flute work, the variation with the horns, and the grandeur of the final climax, all deserve enthusiastic record.

We were also intensely pleased with the interpretation of the second movement, with its strange scale-formation, its quaint harmony. It was not exaggerated but gave a tranquil and pensive picture in decided contrast to the feverish or gloomy moods of the more radical composers.

But the next work plunged into the deepest of musical sorrow. In Mr. Strube's "Longing" the viola had a heart-ache, or a head-ache, or at least a "Katzenjammer." We sympathized with its troubles, until it repeated them about 200 times, when we began to tire of the tale of woe. "Longing" was the title of this musical misery. It soon became "prolonging," but, in all its length it never once cheered up. It was about as varied and as bright as the celebrated picture (of the modern impressionist school) of a negro, without a candle, searching for a black cat, in a dark cellar, at midnight.

Mr. Ferir played excellently and his broad work on the C string was especially effective. The lack of contrast weighted him down, however, and spoiled the first number. Nevertheless we are glad that Mr. Strube has turned his attention to the viola. This instrument is the Cinderella of the orchestra. Standing between the expressive violin and the broad-toned violoncello, it suffers the fate of a poor relation and is neglected in favor of its richer brother and sister. Yet it has a brooding tone-quality that cannot be produced on any other string instrument.

The only important works for viola are Rubinstein's sonata for the instrument, with piano, and Berlioz's "Childe Harold" symphony, in which, quite in accordance with its melancholy timbre, the viola becomes Byron's mournful hero. Mr. Strube was quite right to give the tone-picture of sadness to the viola, only he committed the usual modern fault of prolixity. "Longing" needs shortening.

The second number was "Fantastic Dance" and was far more exciting than "Longing." Here Mr. Strube displayed complete mastery of the large modern orchestra and presented some very original and exciting music. The movement began with musical shudders which were made more impressive by soft strokes of bass drum. There was an Oriental dance theme with very effective scoring. The interest was sustained throughout. The form also was clear enough, and had not the dance been preceded by so lengthy, vague and monochromatic a number it might have made a strong effect. As it is we hope that it may be played again by itself. It ended with a strong climax. Mr. Ferir was not so constantly prominent in this as in the first number, but he was remarkably clear and full-toned in the double-stopping of his cadenza, and all his work calls for commendation.

Mr. Strube conducted his own composition and all Boston knows that he is an authoritative conductor. He was recalled, with Mr. Ferir, twice, at the end of the performance.

A fiery performance of the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture ended the concert. It was distinguished by some superb oboe-playing and by a very well-worked-up final climax, but as a whole, this overture is not nearly as effective as its companion piece, founded on the same opera,—the "Carnaval Romaine" overture. Happy thought; why not alter the title of this into "Carnaval Ptomaine" overture, and perform it to welcome Dr. Muck on his return to the concerts?

The last half of the programme was tepid compared with the power of the first part, the Brahms symphony. The chief success of the evening was won by the conductor "ad interim,"—Mr. Carl Wendling,—who, if he could not replace such a master as Dr. Carl Muck, certainly did not "rattle round" in the position to which he was so suddenly called.

Louis C. Elson.

Trans. The Symphony Concert neh. 30-1908

Seemingly, Mr. Wendling came more confidently to the conducting of the Symphony Concert of Saturday than he had to that of Friday afternoon. He was surer of himself, his men and his music, and from the beginning his audience, who had evidently heard good report of his work on Friday, bade him be sure of it. There was hearty applause for him when he first appeared, and still heartier, even to a recall, at the end of Brahms's symphony. Thus encouraged, Mr. Wendling conducted more freely and elastically than he had at his first appearance in an unfamiliar task to an uncertain audience. The symphony went with more energy of rhythm, more vigor of utterance, more contrasts of tone, and more of the large and massive quality that is in the music. At moments this new breadth and fire brought an eloquence that sprang from the conductor's zeal and responsiveness as well as from the music itself. At least Mr. Wendling can achieve a massive Brahms. And no less truly than on Friday he and his men achieved a passionately dramatic, almost a riotous, Berlioz in the overture to "Benvenuto Cellini." The music not only "sounded" but it glowed until it was easy to wonder how an opera thus began should have fallen so quickly and by its own lifelessness into utter failure. Perhaps it was the fate of Berlioz to be short-breathed, but his compensation is to live by the things like the overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" that were born of his fiery moments. Short-breathed Mr. Strube certainly is not in his tone-poem, "Longing," and it needed all his skill in the adjusting of every piquant detail in the instrumentation to save the music from monotony. It needs the companionship of the more incisive dance that at last followed for the foil that the composer originally designed, and both were the more vivid, each in its kind, for Mr. Ferir's playing of the solo viola and of his sympathetic coloring of its tone.

H. T. P.

TWO SYMPHONY TICKETS

FOR SALE, for Saturday evening or for entire season. Tel. Cambridge 1498-1.
(A):

FOR SALE—TWO SYMPHONY CONCERT SEATS—Alternate Saturdays, A 30-31, first balcony, left, price $16.50 each. Address O.F.O., Boston Transcript.
(A)

SYMPHONY

TICKETS FOR SALE. WADSWORTH. 40 State street, Room 47. Telephone Main 4084-1.
51(A): 014

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Pat. ———— 21.08
Dr. Muck Temporarily Disabled—Mr. Wendling Conducts—Mr. Ferir Plays Compositions by Strube

A slight accident which occurred to Dr. Muck's arm some weeks ago was disregarded at the time, and the continual strain on that member in the course of many rehearsals has ultimately resulted in its temporary disablement. The conductor's place was taken by Mr. Wendling, the concert-master, who had also conducted a number of the concerts during the last tour of the orchestra.

As a result of these conditions the programme that had been announced was altered, and the works given were these: Brahms' Symphony in E minor, No. 4; Two Symphonic Poems for viola and orchestra, "Longing" and "Fantastic Dance" (first time), after poems by W. L. Johnson of Boston, by Gustave Strube; Overture to the opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz. Mr. E. Ferir, the first viola player, interpreted the viola part in the performance of Mr. Strube's compositions. The men of the orchestra might truly be said to be responsible for this programme.

Mr. Strube's "Longing" was first given at a memorable concert in the spring of 1905, when Paderewski played the Chopin F minor concerto and Cesar Franck's symphony that towers so high among the greatest masterpieces of modern music was given an unforgettable performance. Since that time the composer has made some slight revisions in the score.

The impressions received at the first performance were renewed on this occasion. Mr. Strube writes with unusual clearness and distinction, with melodic charm, and he employs an atmospheric harmonic background. He is rarely felicitous in the treatment of the solo instrument, and the finely-wrought orchestration is an achievement of ingenuity and good taste. He has given us a beautiful nocturne, a poetic nucleus of the poem that inspired its creation.

The "Fantastic Dance" was composed in 1906. It was conceived as a companion piece to the "Longing" written a year previously. The poem that gave rise to this composition deals, we are told, "with an ancient, sacred rite of relieving the earth of its accumulated sorrow." There are lines that deserve quotation, if only to elucidate the motives of the music. The main motive might be said to consist in the first quotation that Mr. Strube makes:

"Whirl! wild, bewildering dance,
With crash and blur of dissonance."

Two moods are contrasted, the first following the lines:

"Oh, I am weary, weary; let me rest!" etc.

The second is thus described:

"No! No! I cannot rest. The dance, the dance—
Once more the drums and crashing dissonance."

The first of Strube's compositions, the "sympathetic shriek of flaming continents," the long, pale cry of quenched firmaments, the wild, attritioned thoughts that in me clang and clash."

This is a terrible fellow! Mr. Strube's music is free and rhapsodical in content, if not in form. Though there is some finely dissonant harmony he has fortunately not seen fit to literally reproduce either the "sympathetic shriek of flaming continents," or the "long, pale cry of quenched firmaments." Neither has he endeavored to philosophize in a wild and attritioned manner. There is an introduction which is as an invocation, a summons to the spirit dance. There is resourceful and original handling of material. Again there is masterly scoring, orchestration that is at once clear and refined, brilliant and incisive, an orchestral idiom that stands by itself in these days of wonderful instrumentation, that is essentially and entirely Mr. Strube's own. The composer conducted the performances of his own compositions, which were warmly received.

Mr. Wendling conducted in a manner deserving of the highest praise. He displayed not only the solid musicianship that we might with reason expect of the man who gave such a thoughtful and sincere interpretative reading of the Brahms concerto earlier in the season, but he had his forces under good control, and he evidenced the most sensitive appreciation of the inmost characteristics of the two very different compositions which came under his baton.

Mr. Wendling is no doubt a keen admirer of Brahms, and seldom has the E minor symphony been more strongly and sanely presented, with more just regard for its structural symmetry and the absolute, impersonal character of the music. Yet, it is not given to every conductor to turn from this noble and eternal work and give the glowing performance of Berlioz's striving overture that took place yesterday evening.

Mr. Wendling is at present expected to conduct the rehearsal and concert of next week. The programme will consist of Hugo Wolf's Symphonic Poem, "Penthesilea"; Liszt's E flat piano concerto, and Tchaikowsky's Symphony in E minor, No. 5.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 4, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

Owing to the indisposition of DR MUCK, MR. CARL WENDLING will conduct.

HUGO WOLF,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "Penthesilea," after the like named tragedy of Heinrich von Kleist.

LISZT,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA, in E flat major, No. 1.
Allegro maestoso.—Quasi adagio.—Allegretto vivace.—
Allegro animato.—Allegro marziale animato.—Presto.

TSCHAIKOWSKY,

SYMPHONY No. 5, in E minor, op. 64.
I. Andante: Allegro con anima.
II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
III. Valse: Allegro moderato.
IV. Finale: Andante maestoso: Allegro vivace.

Soloist:

Mme. OLGA SAMAROFF.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Pat Mich 21.08
Dr. Muck Temporarily Disabled—Mr. Wendling Conducts—Mr. Ferir Plays Compositions by Strube

A slight accident which occurred to Dr. Muck's arm some weeks ago was disregarded at the time, and the continual strain on that member in the course of many rehearsals has ultimately resulted in its temporary disablement. The conductor's place was taken by Mr. Wendling, the concert-meister, who had also conducted a number of the concerts during the last tour of the orchestra.

As a result of these conditions the programme that had been announced was altered, and the works given were these: Brahms' Symphony in E minor, No. 4; Two Symphonic Poems for viola and orchestra, "Longing" and "Fantastic Dance" (first time), after poems by W. L. Johnson of Boston, by Gustave Strube; Overture to the opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz. Mr. E. Ferir, the first viola player, interpreted the viola part in the performance of Mr. Strube's compositions. The men of the orchestra might truly be said to be responsible for this programme.

Mr. Strube's "Longing" was first given at a memorable concert in the spring of 1905, when Paderewski played the Chopin F minor concerto and Cesar Franck's symphony that towers so high among the greatest masterpieces of modern music was given an unforgettable performance. Since that time the composer has made some slight revisions in the score.

The impressions received at the first performance were renewed on this occasion. Mr. Strube writes with unusual clearness and distinction, with melodic charm, and he employs an atmospheric harmonic background. He is rarely felicitous in the treatment of the solo instrument, and the finely-wrought orchestration is an achievement of ingenuity and good taste. He has given us a beautiful nocturne, a poetic nucleus of the poem that inspired its creation.

The "Fantastic Dance" was composed in 1906. It was conceived as a companion piece to the "Longing" written a year previously. The poem that gave rise to this composition deals, we are told, "with an ancient, sacred rite of relieving the earth of its accumulated sorrow." There are lines that deserve quotation, if only to elucidate the motives of the music. The main motive might be said to consist in the first quotation that Mr. Strube makes:

"Whirl! wild, bewildering dance,
 With crash and blur of dissonance."

Two moods are contrasted, the first following the lines:

"Oh, I am weary, weary; let me rest!" etc.

The second is thus described:

"No! No! I cannot rest. The dance, the dance—
 Once more the drums and crashing dissonance,

The beat of drums, the cymbals' metal crash,
 The sympathetic shriek of flaming continents,
 The long, pale cry of quenched firmaments,
 The wild, attritioned thoughts that in me clang and clash."

This is a terrible fellow! Mr. Strube's music is free and rhapsodical in content, if not in form. Though there is some finely dissonant harmony he has fortunately not seen fit to literally reproduce either the "sympathetic shriek of flaming continents," or the "long, pale cry of quenched firmaments." Neither has he endeavored to philosophize in a wild and attritioned manner. There is an introduction which is as an invocation, a summons to the spirit dance. There is resourceful and original handling of material. Again there is masterly scoring, orchestration that is at once clear and refined, brilliant and incisive, an orchestral idiom that stands by itself in these days of wonderful instrumentation, that is essentially and entirely Mr. Strube's own. The composer conducted the performances of his own compositions, which were warmly received.

Mr. Wendling conducted in a manner deserving of the highest praise. He displayed not only the solid musicianship that we might with reason expect of the man who gave such a thoughtful and sincere interpretative reading of the Brahms concerto earlier in the season, but he had his forces under good control, and he evidenced the most sensitive appreciation of the inmost characteristics of the two very different compositions which came under his baton. Mr. Wendling is no doubt a keen admirer of Brahms, and seldom has the E minor symphony been more strongly and sanely presented, with more just regard for its structural symmetry and the absolute, impersonal character of the music. Yet, it is not given to every conductor to turn from this noble and eternal work and give the glowing performance of Berlioz's striving overture that took place yesterday evening.

Mr. Wendling is at present expected to conduct the rehearsal and concert of next week. The programme will consist of Hugo Wolf's Symphonic Poem, "Penthesilea"; Liszt's E flat piano concerto, and Tchaikowsky's Symphony in E minor, No. 5.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 4, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

Owing to the indisposition of DR. MUCK, MR. CARL WENDLING will conduct.

HUGO WOLF,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "Penthesilea," after the like named tragedy of Heinrich von Kleist.

LISZT,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA, in E flat major, No. 1.
 Allegro maestoso.—Quasi adagio.—Allegretto vivace.—
 Allegro animato.—Allegro marziale animato.—Presto.

TSCHAIKOWSKY,

SYMPHONY No. 5, in E minor, op. 64.
 I. Andante: Allegro con anima.
 II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
 III. Valse: Allegro moderato.
 IV. Finale: Andante maestoso: Allegro vivace.

Soloist:

Mme. OLGA SAMAROFF.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

MME. SAMAROFF SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Send
Receives Ovation for Her Rendition of the List Concerto.
Wendling Conducts.

Mme. Samaroff, who in spite of her name is an American, was the soloist at the Symphony concert Saturday night. She played the Liszt concerto in E flat—played it with remarkable ease and brilliancy. The concerto was a happy choice for this popular pianist. It showed her at her best. The audience recalled her so many times that it seemed as if once more the no-encore rule might be broken, but it wasn't. Paderewski and DePachmann still remain in a class by themselves.

The orchestra was led again by Mr. Wendling, the concert master. Dr. Muck's arm is not yet free of the neuritis. The concert began with a spirited performance of Hugo Wolf's symphonic poem, "Penthesilea." The work seemed to please the friends of both classical and modern music. The applause was very hearty and the performance, if not the composition, deserved it. The last number on the program was the fifth symphony of Tchaikowsky, which, even with its waltz movement, is like a funeral piece. But it is a thrilling emotional picture, nevertheless, and was so read by Mr. Wendling. Thus the concert was a memorable one.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT

Send
It is uncertain yet whether Dr. Muck will resume his work as conductor of the Symphony concerts next week. His arm has shown very considerable improvement, but he is under strict orders not to use it until it is quite well. At any rate, whether he or Mr. Wendling conducts, the twenty-first program will be as follows:

Overture to Figaro's Wedding.....Mozart
Symphony in E flat major, No. 2...Ph. Em. Bach
Overture, "Coriolanus".....Beethoven
Symphony, No. 3.....Henry K. Hadley

Mr. Hadley's new symphony, which is to be played, is looked forward to with much interest, for none of the younger American composers have made more rapid progress in their art than he. Last year the patrons of the Symphony concerts heard his symphonic poem, "Salome," which made a most favorable impression and showed a very considerable advance over anything he had done before that time. The new symphony in B minor which is to be played has been received with great favor in Berlin and other German cities, where it has been performed under the direction of the composer.

Olga Samaroff Soloist Strike at the Symphony Concert.

Dr. Muck being ill with neuritis and unable to use his conducting arm, last night's symphony concert was conducted by Herr Carl Wendling, the concert-master of the orchestra. Herr Wendling conducted splendidly, making somewhat hard work of it for himself, and at times apparently lifting the whole weight of the orchestra by his single arm. The players were with him all the way, and a person with poor eyesight would have been troubled to say whether Wendling or Muck held the baton.

The program began with Hugo Wolf's symphonic poem, "Penthesilea," which is based on the tragedy of the same name by Heinrich von Kleist; then came the Liszt concerto in E flat major, with Mme Olga Samaroff at the piano, and finally the Tchaikowsky symphony No. 5—a program impossible of different arrangement, yet having a curious effect in its sequence of a let-down from a great tension, and then a taking up of a tremendous emotional burden again. One was tired at the end; also the pianist suffered by the program arrangement, for one forgot her marvelous performance in the upheavals round it.

For Mme Samaroff's performance was no less than marvelous. She is exceedingly good to see at a piano; those long, wonderfully pliant hands that float or flicker over the keyboard; the modest yet confident reading of a freakish, ungrateful composition, the lightning of her attack and the superb technic, all make her most pleasing to the appreciator of piano playing. Without the strength for the topmost heights of fortissimo, without the weight and crash of the masculine player—and at times almost drowned by an enthusiastic wind section—she made the concerto almost intelligible, and played the "motto theme" like a dancing will-o'-the-wisp.

The savage, terrible music of Hugo Wolf's setting to Kleist's tragedy, which opened the concert, has been played here before, the first time being in 1904. It was written shortly before Wolf was confined in a madhouse, and indeed when he was discharged for the first time Wolf himself, supposed to be cured, said: "It's a pity I ever wrote such trash." Nevertheless, and notwithstanding that at its first rehearsal in 1886 the orchestra laughed, there was no laughing at it as trash last night. It had a reading as fiery as Wolf's own imagination could have demanded, and was as moving emotionally as it was interesting. It is not a thing that will be played often.

The Tchaikowsky symphony most nearly adheres of all his works to symphonic form. Yet, after hearing two performances of it, the composer regarded it as a failure. Certainly, as played last night, it did not take the hearer to the heights reached by the "Pathetic" symphony. It is dramatic, it is the movement of great qualities in contention, and it is tragic, even in the magnificent crimson of its finale. But the very thematic repetition which makes it a wonder of construction robs it of the chiefest characteristics of Tchaikowsky. The repeated climaxes of the first movement thrash emotion until it can bear no more.

The symphony was beautifully played; the ensembles were clear and the tempi were demanded flexible and wilful as the composer himself could have asked. It is uncertain yet whether Dr. Muck will resume his work as conductor of the Symphony concerts this week. At any rate, whether he or Mr. Wendling conducts, the 21st program will be as follows: Overture to "Figaro's Wedding," Mozart; symphony in E-flat major, No. 2, Ph. Em. Bach; overture, "Coriolanus," Beethoven; symphony No. 3, Henry K. Hadley.

DR. MUCK ILL, SYMPHONY PROGRAM IS CHANGED

Owing to a severe attack of neuritis, which has disabled his right arm, Dr. Muck will not conduct the symphony concerts this week, as it is necessary for him to give his arm a complete rest. He conducted last week the Philadelphia and two New York concerts under great disadvantage, and his arm was not helped any by it. Consequently Mr. Wendling, who last week conducted the concerts in Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn, will take his place on Friday and Saturday. On this account there have been some important changes of program. The revised program is as follows:

Brahms: Symphony No. 4, in E minor.
Strube: Two Symphonic Poems for orchestra and viola—(a) "Longing"; (b) "Fantastic Dance" (first time).
Hugo Wolf: Symphonic poem, "Penthesilea."
Berlioz: Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."

It seems that the original cause of the neuritis from which Dr. Muck is now recovering was a mischance that befell him some weeks ago in Providence. He had gone thither to conduct at a concert of the Symphony Orchestra; the door of his carriage stuck, and he struck it sharply. As the blow fell, the back of his hand hit the little button which holds the curtain lowered. Dr. Muck thought nothing of what seemed at the time a trifling bruise. Then little by little his right arm began to fall him, and his physician discovered that he had injured one of the long nerves that run from the hand upward. The neuritis that has disabled the conductor for a fortnight ensued, but it is now yielding rapidly to his enforced rest.

A New Symphony by Henry K. Hadley—The Apollo Club in a Programme of Short Pieces—Mendelssohn's St. Paul by the People's Choral Union—And "Samson and Delilah" by the Handel and Haydn Society Trans. Apr. 4, 1908

It is still uncertain whether Dr. Muck will resume his work as conductor of the Symphony concerts next week. Though his arm has shown considerable improvement, he is still under strict orders not to use it until it is quite well. Whether he or Mr. Wendling conducts, however, the twenty-first programme will be as follows:

Mozart—Overture to Figaro's Wedding.
Ph. Em. Bach—Symphony in E-flat major, No. 2.

Beethoven—Overture "Coriolanus."

Henry K. Hadley—Symphony No. 3.

The new symphony by Mr. Hadley arouses much interest and expectation, especially in view of the rapid strides of his development. Last year, when his Symphonic Poem "Salome" was heard at the Symphony Concerts, it made a most favorable impression and displayed a considerable advance over anything he had done before that time. The new symphony in B minor, which is to be played next week, has been well received in Berlin and other German cities, where it has been performed under the direction of the composer.

strument brought to the highest perfection by his predecessor, Mr. Gerlicke, whose memory is still fragrant. Without sacrificing any of this perfection he has swayed the orchestra with his own spirit and made its playing the absolute expression of his own purposes. And it is giving Dr. Muck the highest praise as a conductor to say that those purposes are always those of the composer. His stay with the Boston orchestra has maintained the standard and the traditions of that organizations, and has been a benefit and a stimulant. Of the performance yesterday there is little to say. Dr. Muck conducts the music of the classical masters not only with devotion and reverence, but also with zest and with a keen perception that it is alive and that it lives because it has vital qualities with which its interpretation is to be infused. The "Surprise Symphony" was played with delicacy, lightness and grace. Seldom has the "Figaro" overture shimmered so dazzlingly. Taken at a swift tempo, the inherent joy of the music was wonderfully expressed. Beethoven's fourth symphony, which followed the intermission, if more serious in tone, is quite as pleasant melody as the numbers which came before. The audience was loth to let Dr. Muck go, and after the concert he was recalled to the platform many times."

The Tribune adds: "So far as his deeply interesting activities have revealed Dr. Muck's musical individuality to New York concert audiences, his natural utterance leans rather toward what is poised and balanced and restrained than toward the broadly heroic style. There have been evidences in plenty of his readiness to give reasonable rein to the heroic elements in music both old and new, but it is scarcely by his interpretation of grandiose emotional communications that Dr. Muck will be remembered here. Rather will grateful lovers of musical art recall such spirited and brilliant achievements as his recent performance of Max Reger's variations and fugue, or, to look further and higher, Dr. Muck's memorable and uplifting presentation of the Brahms symphony in C minor, at the outset of his New York doings. This latter proclamation, indeed, could not be easily forgotten by any sensitive hearer who had the good fortune to share in its enjoyment. And there might be many other occasions cited here wherein general delight was taken at the time, due largely to the sane, appreciative and penetrating musicianship of this Berlin conductor, and to his unfailing determination to find and disclose the essential beauty and meaning of what he played.

"In accepting the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck acquired command of a noble instrument of artistic expression. It is part of his two years' record in America that he has used this instrument with rare skill and keen sympathy in furtherance of high ideals.

He leaves it, moreover, in as superlative a state of efficiency as when he took it up. Listening yesterday to the clean-cut precision, the delicate nuancing and the fine muscularity of this orchestra, which is forceful but never ponderous, one may well believe that Dr. Muck, relinquishes with regret his privileged post as its leader, even to return to his aristocratic Berlin duties. Dr. Muck's memory of American appreciation of his work will be based on substantial and gratifying evidence."

DR. MUCK TO TRY CONDUCTING TONIGHT

The Good Prospect That He Can Resume Work—The Coming of Mrs. Fiske in "Rosmersholm"—William Archer Returns to America, Sees Some of Own Plays and Talks of Them with Sundry Anglo-American Comparisons—Arthur Symonds Discovers Arthur Farwell and Rejoices About Society and Music—Coming Plays at Our Theatres—Shaw's and Barrie's New Pieces—Other News of the Day Trans. Apr. 6, 1908

Tonight for the first time in two weeks and a little more, Dr. Muck will conduct again, at a concert that the Symphony Orchestra is giving in Hartford. He will not undertake to lead through the whole programme, but he will conduct the more important pieces upon it. If his stiffened arm bears this test well, there is every likelihood that he will conduct at the Symphony Concert here on Friday and Saturday. The arm has improved rapidly of late, and Dr. Muck has regained sufficient freedom in the use of it to risk conducting again. This freedom, however, fluctuates from day to day, and the arm is still not altogether dependable. On the other hand, Dr. Muck is very impatient of his enforced idleness. Life without work, when in every respect but his arm, he is altogether well, hangs heavily on his hands. He is eager to be conducting again, and his will, as he has shown more than once in America, can carry him far. In particular he wishes to round out his stay here with concerts that shall maintain or excel the standard of performance that he has kept the season through. Now that he is departing, he believes that he owes such work doubly to the public of the orchestra, and his eagerness so to testify his appreciation of its liking for him has made him the more impatient with the mischance that disabled him. If his arm serves him well tonight, there is every prospect that he will conduct at the four pairs of concerts that remain to finish the season here.

Soloist To Sing At The Symphony

Mme. Olga Samaroff,
Who will appear at Symphony Orchestra concert for California's benefit.
Not the least attraction at the San Francisco Relief concert which the members of the Symphony Orchestra are to give in Symphony Hall next Sunday evening, will be the appearance of Olga Samaroff as the soloist. Mme. Olga Samaroff was the soloist at last week's Symphony concert and was received with great enthusiasm by both audiences.

As soon as she heard that the Symphony Orchestra had planned this concert she offered her services, which were gladly accepted, and she is staying over in Boston purposely for this concert. She will play Liszt's E-flat concerto for the piano, with which she won most enthusiastic praise this last winter as soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

NEW SYMPHONY LEADER FAVORS MODERN MUSIC

Max Fiedler, who has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as successor to Dr. Karl Muck, is a man of greatest catholicity of taste in music, and is particularly favorably disposed to modern music. He has the reputation in Germany of being one of the finest musicians in the country, and is regarded as an authority on the great classics of musical literature. His years as director of the Hamburg Conservatory seem not to have developed in him any pedantic tendencies, and a review of his program for the Philharmonic concerts in Hamburg shows that while he has paid due respect to the great men of the past he has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the times.

It is an interesting fact about Mr. Fiedler, that he is the first conductor the orchestra has had since Henschel who is better known in concert than in opera. Gericke came from the Vienna Opera House with little or no concert experience. Nikisch and Paur came from the Municipal Opera in Leipzig, and neither of them had any great experience in concert work. Dr. Muck came from the Royal Opera in Berlin, and while he had done considerable concert work during his career, he was primarily an operatic conductor, a fact which did not make his first season in Boston any too easy, for the compilation of twenty-four different programs is not a simple task even when a man has made a specialty of concert work.

It is Mr. Fiedler's reputation for breadth of view which had much to do with his choice as Dr. Muck's successor. The tradition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always demanded that while a majority of the works presented in the course of a season should be drawn from the great classics, the patrons of the orchestra should be kept informed by performances of all that was worthy in modern music. As a result of Mr. Gericke's last eight years of service, Boston today has probably the strongest cult for modern French music that can be found outside of Paris, and the conductor of the orchestra must be able to gratify the many varied tastes of the patrons of the Symphony concerts if he is to succeed. Dr. Muck has been very generous in novelties, and he has produced some very important works for the first time in America. Mr. Fiedler unquestionably will observe the tradition which was made and maintained by his distinguished predecessors.

THE SYMPHONY

Mr. Wendling conducted the twentieth rehearsal in the present season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as Dr. Muck is still in need of rest. The programme was as follows:

Symphonic Poem "Penthesilea".....Hugo Wolf
Concerto No. 1 in E-flat.....Liszt
Symphony No. 5 in E minor.....Tschalkowsky

Mme. Olga Samaroff was the soloist.

The fame of Hugo Wolf undoubtedly will rest chiefly upon his marvellous fertility as a song writer, in spite of his opera, "Der Corregidor" and other works, for the list of his lyrics reaches the total of five hundred or more. No less an authority than Mr. Ernest Newman, who is not given to reckless or intemperate utterance, has pronounced him the greatest song composer in the history of music. Songs by Wolf have figured occasionally upon the programmes of Mme. Sembrich, Mr. Francis Rogers and Mr. Eliot Hubbard, while Mr. Bispham sang a long group of them at a recent recital. This ill-fated composer is also remembered by his "Italian Serenade," a work of charm and fancy, played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1905, and also in a version for string quartet by the Kneisel Quartet in the preceding year. The symphonic poem "Penthesilea," which appears to be his only published work for large orchestra, was given under Gericke in the autumn of 1904. It is hardly surprising that the history of this celebrated Amazon should have tempted Wolf. For in spite of its abnormal character, there is abundant opportunity for the delineation of vivid incident, the picturesque and sensuous contrast of the Feast of Roses, the wild conflict between warlike and human propensities precipitating a tragic conclusion. Moreover, Wolf was directly incited to the composition of "Penthesilea" by Hermann von Kleist's drama of the same name, which had affected the composer with unspeakable vividness. The music was composed when he was but twenty-three years old, although he worked at it many years later after his reason had given way. When the score was published in 1903, it was revised in some respects by Joseph Hellmesberger. As a whole this poem shows traces of immaturity and inexperience, although the first impression is one of surprise at the positive excellence of its descriptive verity. In spite of the vigor of the first section depicting the departure of the Amazons for Troy, there are traces of the tentative and the experimental; the fanfares illustrative of the march of the Amazons is somewhat conventional and verging upon crudity. With the episode treating of the Feast of Roses, comes a revelation of imagination, of emotional fancy that is far more convincing. While the sensuousness of this scene is somewhat restrained, it remains alluring to the fancy, and captivating by reason of its intrinsic musical beauty. The section of conflict also seems somewhat tame in comparison with such more unforgettable combats as in Strauss's "Heldenleben," it must be remembered that Strauss had won his technical independence by a long list of orchestral works of progressive scopes in descriptive ambition, and that "Penthesilea" was virtually a first attempt seventeen years before, a long time in the ultra-rapid development of modern music. Furthermore the closing portions of the poems describing Penthesilea's death contain much of touching pathos and genuinely tragic simplicity. All in all, a remarkable if youthful work which interests not only by its native qualities, but on account of the promise which was destined to remain unfulfilled.

Liszt's E-flat concerto, long the subject of scurrilous criticism because forsooth a triangle was indicated in the score, has long been the virtuoso concerto par excellence. But its virtuosity is of an unusual order. It does not display its innate quality to the precise and composed technician, it cannot be played complacently or casually. It demands an audacious, unhesitating bravura, large rhetorical phrases, bold accents, and a careless contempt for its difficulties. Its octave cadenzas suggest the remorseless dash of the eagle upon its prey. Madame Samaroff is known in Boston as a pianist of uncommon fleetness of touch, of rippling and precise passage work, of clean-cut phrase in which the note of passion is conspicuously absent. Neither by temperament nor technical capacity is she the pianist for the first two sections of this concerto. The absolute domination of the piano was missing; she does not possess the brute strength, the fulness of tone, the heroic accent to do justice to the sentiment of the music. In the scherzo, however, her delicate tracery of passage work was all that could be desired, and nothing could exceed the fascination of her shimmering virtuosity. If again in the opening octave cadenzas of the finale, the fiery bravura was again somewhat tempered, Mme. Samaroff carried all before her by the sheer velocity of the conclusion, a brilliant performance carried through with unfailing glitter and rhythmic incisiveness. It is surely no reproach that her singing phrases in the first portion and in the adagio were deficient in breadth of tone and rhetorical accent, for this is largely a matter of temperament, but the grace and verve of scherzo and finale call for unusual and positive commendation. The audience in its enthusiasm recalled Mme. Samaroff again and again.

Tschalkowski's fifth symphony lacks something of that universality of appeal which threatens to make the "Pathetic" hackneyed and a by-word before its just time. But to the discriminating admirer of Tschalkowski it yields to none of his symphonies in charm and in the revelation of his intimate individuality. The composer has been reproached for writing suites rather than symphonies, but he is surely not entitled to blame because the third movement is a waltz. The departure from convention is not so signal as Beethoven's replacing of the time-honored minuet with a scherzo, and moreover the way in which the theme of the introduction reappears in the slow movement and finale is eminently symphonic. Furthermore the composers of other nations cannot be compelled to adhere strictly to the German notion as to what constitutes a symphony. Liszt did not do this, neither did César Franck nor Saint-Saëns in his symphony in C minor, nor Vincent d'Indy in his instrumental masterpiece, the second symphony in B flat. Yet these works are indisputably symphonies in the full meaning of the word. If in this fifth symphony, Tschai-kovski has departed somewhat from the strict letter of the symphony, it nevertheless remains a work of great individuality of sentiment, masterly technical treatment, and profoundly human emotion.

250

Mr. Wendling must gain the respect of his audience for the capable manner in which he again carried through a programme under conditions that well might prove harassing to many. He accompanied Madame Samaroff with precision and elasticity in a concerto that makes many demands upon the conductor. His interpretation of the symphony was distinguished by conspicuous breadth and temperamental warmth.

E. B. H.

Wolf and Tschaikovski at the Next Symphony Concerts—The Cecilia in a Programme of Short Pieces—"Samson and Delilah" by the Handel and Haydn Society—The Shortening Calendar

Neuritis still besets Dr. Muck's right arm; it requires another week of rest; and Mr. Wendling therefore will conduct at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday night. The symphony is Tschaikovski's fifth, in E minor—of the long-drawn and passionate andante and of the slow waltz for a scherzo—unplayed here for at least three seasons. The concerto is Liszt's in E-flat major for piano and orchestra, and in it Mme. Samaroff will play the piano part, as she did, and notably well, at the concert for the fund of the relief of San Francisco in the spring of 1906. None the less, the concerto is hackneyed, and it is a pity that Mme. Samaroff was unable to follow her original intention and play Schumann's. To begin the programme stands Hugo Wolf's tone-poem, "Penthesilla," one of the three pieces of purely instrumental music that he left behind him, and drawn from Kleist's tragedy of the Amazon queen, her pride, her passion, her humiliation and her death.

DR. MUCK'S LEAVE-TAKING IN NEW YORK

The Reviewers' Eulogies—More Letters About His Programmes—Mr. de Pachmann as an "Eccentric Entertainer"—The

trans. — Mch. 23. 1906

On Saturday afternoon, at the final concert for the current season of the Symphony Orchestra in New York, Dr. Muck made his last appearance there as a conductor. All the pieces on his programme were classics—Haydn's "Surprise" symphony of the sudden drumbeat, Beethoven's fourth symphony and Mozart's overture to "Figaro's Wedding," as yet unplayed here under Dr. Muck. All three "numbers" are familiar; there was no assisting virtuoso, and thus the concert was practically Dr. Muck's own. Plainly it was for him that the audience filled Carnegie Hall and received and sped him with very hearty applause. Naturally, the reviewers of the New York newspapers use the occasion for general comment on Dr. Muck's conducting and the appreciation that it has won there in the past two years. Says the Sun, for example: "With yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall terminated, so far as New York is concerned, the activities of Karl Muck. He has endeared himself to the musical public of this city by qualities of the finest kind. Not only has he shown himself to be a musician of the most profound scholarship, but also of the widest and most polished taste. His veneration for the classics is equalled by his enthusiasm for the writers of today. He has directed with superb skill compositions by the old masters and the progressists of the current time. He has demonstrated in every instance his right to the title of interpreter.

"He has proved that an orchestra can be splendidly conducted without excitable gesticulation, but with repose and dignity. He has shown, too, that there were resources in the Boston Symphony Orchestra not previously disclosed. The tonal beauty of the playing of the organization has not diminished under his guidance, but it has gained in brilliancy and sonority. The orchestra was never before at such a high pitch of excellence as that at which he leaves it. It is a loss to music in this country to have him go away. But the German emperor, it seems, is unwilling to do without him any longer. For this we surely cannot blame his Imperial Majesty. If this writer were an emperor and had a conductor like Dr. Muck he would keep him at home, no matter how anxious Boston might be to borrow him for a year or two more."

The Times continues: "Music lovers of New York will have a keen regret in losing a conductor of gifts so remarkable as Dr. Muck has shown himself to be. He took up, to be sure, in the Boston orchestra, an in-

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME. Feb. 08
 Wolf—"Penthesilla." Symphonic poem.
 Liszt—Piano concerto in E flat.
 Pianist, Mme. Olga Samaroff.
 Tchaikowsky—Symphony No. 5, E minor.

Mr. Wendling conducted once more, since Dr. Muck's arm is not yet well. Mr. Wendling is not as yet a graceful conductor, but he understands his score, he knows what he wants and he generally attains it. He has conducted but little heretofore and his virile readings augur well for his future in this field.

Poor Hugo Wolf! When one thinks upon his miserable life and many misfortunes one is apt to over-praise his musical creations. Yet there is no question but that he possessed the divine spark of genius, only it was revealed more clearly in his vocal than in his orchestral compositions. "Penthesilla" is more striking in its ideas than in its orchestration, but even these ideas are very unequal, at times furious, at times conventional.

The March of the Amazons is a strong feature of the work, yet we fancy that it might easily become as hackneyed, on repeated hearing, as Raff's "Lenore" parade. The bold beginning of the work is one of its strong features, so are the fanfares that summon the Amazons to their march to Troy. Best of all is the fiery ending, which lost nothing in Mr. Wendling's reading. The tender and tuneful "Dream of the Feast of Roses" is in effective contrast with the surrounding fury. In almost every part of the work one can find the impatience and unrestraint of an impetuous genius. It is easy to understand how the Brahmsites of Vienna may have attacked Wolf quite honestly, yet most unjustly. It seems as if criticism would never learn the lesson of studying carefully anything that is radically different from the school it loves best.

Liszt's favorite concerto is a free work, a rhapsody rather than a concerto, but it is popular and intelligible in the midst of all its abandon, in spite of the jesting words ("Das versteht ihr alle nicht") which the composer once attached to its chief figure. Mme. Samaroff has sprung into such prominence that she stands today as one of the world's famous female pianists. She is as reliable as a rock and has poetry and technique so well united that she is successful in almost everything she attempts.

Yet we did not find this concerto as rhapsodical as it might have been; we did not discern the leonine vein which D'Albert or Rosenthal would have given to it. There was more of suavity, more of elegance, than Liszt intended here. Nevertheless there was surety everywhere and excellent ensemble; there was great brilliancy too in her octave and chord work and the final march of triumph was so effective that a very great outburst of enthusiasm followed the close and Mme.

251

Samaroff was recalled (unless we miscounted) six times!

Liszt's E flat concerto is always better received than his greater concerto in A. In just the same manner Tschai-kowsky's "Pathetic" symphony always takes precedence of his nobler E minor symphony. If ever the Muscovite stood clearly revealed in tones it is in this symphony, and yet the Russians reproached Tschai-kowsky with not being "national" enough in his music! The young Russians inscribed "Para Domoi" ("let us get home") upon their banners, but their idea of getting home seemed to be to confine themselves to a musical diet of Caviar only. Such a symphony as this in E minor does more to advance Russian music than all that the efforts towards nationalism that Balakireff, Cui, and the subsequent "reformers" could do.

The great mastery of the wood-wind which Tschai-kowsky possessed was in evidence from the very beginning, and the bassoons especially did excellent work. Tschai-kowsky's gloom is chiefly achieved by sending clarinettes down into the "chalumeau" register and causing bassoons and brasses to growl softly in the sub-cellar. The first movement ended in the depths and the second began there. In this latter movement the horn gave its beautiful theme in a flawless manner and the subsequent development of its chief figure in imitative counterpoint and with many other devices was very interesting. Again the clarinette went into its lowest register and its breadth in the ending deserves mention.

The Waltz movement is far less powerful than the rest of the work. Suddenly one is transported from Muscovite vigor and intensity to the Chesterfieldian suavity of a Parisian ball-room. The waltz does not admit of symphonic use as the minuet does. The minuet is marked, in music, with the same rhythm as the waltz, but while the minuet is a true 3/4 rhythm, the waltz is in reality 6-4, a more soothing, swingy and monotonous effect. The transition from the minuet into the waltz can be studied best in some of the minuets of Schubert, which begin to tend towards a 6-4 swing.

The waltz in this symphony had much reiteration and was, in itself, too elegant for this fiery symphony, but it formed a good foil to the Finale, which was earnest from its very beginning. There was much of folk-song strength in this finale. The contrasts were effective and the climaxes full of energy and grandeur. The development is ingenious enough, contrapuntal skill is frequently displayed, and the movement is truly symphonic in its union of intellectuality and emotion. The lack of this equipoise in most modern orchestral music is the bane of the concert-programme today.

It is a far cry from Brahms to Tschai-kowsky; they are almost opposites; they could not comprehend one another; yet both of them have proved, in different ways, that the symphonic well has not yet run dry. They have been vigorous and sturdy in expression, and absolutely sure of their effects, without becoming ascetic, ugly, puzzling or prolix. Would that our musical extremists would go and do likewise.

Louis C. Elson.

SYMPHONY GIVES ITS 20TH CONCERT

Mr. Wendling Conducts, as Dr.
Muck's Arm Troubles
Him Still.

WOLF'S "PENTHESILEA" PART OF PROGRAMME

Mme. Samaroff Is Brilliant in Liszt's Concerto, Playing
with Engaging Ease.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its 20th concert last night in Symphony Hall. Mr. Wendling, the concert master, conducted in the place of Dr. Muck, whose arm still troubles him. The programme was as follows:

Symphonic poem, "Penthesilea".....Wolf
Concerto in E flat No 1 for piano.....Liszt
Symphony in E minor, No. 5.....Tschalkowsky

Hugo Wolf was not the first musician to be enthusiastic over a play and to give vent to his emotions, thus excited, in an orchestral composition. Berlioz was long before him, not to mention others, and Berlioz was more successful in putting into notation his screaming delight. Wolf was a young man when, fascinated by Kleist's gruesome tragedy, he chose Penthesilea for a symphonic heroine. He never heard his work, yet he knew that it needed revision and in his last years of madness he endeavored to reunite a portion of his tone poem.

Wolf's reputation has been enhanced by the horror of his ending, and it has also been made doubtful by the wild praise of biographers and partisans. It is not unlikely that his name will be preserved by the tragedy of his life and by a few of his songs. Surely this symphonic poem is at the best only the school exercise of a highly imaginative young man with an overheated brain; a young man who had not the technical facility to express clearly or effectively the fantastical thoughts that obsessed him. Now and then in the work he made a lucky stroke. The "Dream of the Forest of Hesse," though it is obviously sentimental, has mood and feeling; but the battle scene is ordinary, and the March of the Amazons, though it opens admirably, is soon little better than the March of the Amazons in our old friend, "The Black Crook," with the memorable song, "I Am Stalacta," sung by the leader with the aid of an unabashed chorus of women, who to boyish eyes seemed wondrous fair.

Mme. Samaroff gave a brilliant performance of Liszt's concerto, which is better suited to her present stage of virtuoso development than any of the other concertos she has chosen to play here. There are some that sniff at this concerto, yet its brilliance is still untarnished, though it was composed 60 years ago. The music is something more than pomp and glitter. It has a peculiar elegance that has been approached only by that of Saint-Saens. Furthermore, it has the relief of sentiment, not deep emotion, not passion, but distinguished sentiment, that of the old school gallantry. And how modern is the structure of this composition in spite of the many and envious years!

Mme. Samaroff played not only brilliantly and with engaging ease. She was more poetical in the pages of court elegance, the musical "Vers de Societe," than is her wont. It would be hard to say in which section of the concerto she was most successful. Perhaps in the "Quasi Adagio," for it was here that those acquainted with her performances might have expected her to be least effective. The disappointment, therefore, was the more pleasurable. The interpretation, for it was an interpretation and not a mere performance, was unusually delightful and engrossing.

There are some also who protest against Tschalkowsky's tragic fifth symphony, music that is heavy with bodement, music that is at times almost sinister, music that is charged with sadness, which is too deep for words and turns instinctively to musical expression. They call it coarse, for they fail to appreciate its human strength. Some go so far as to call it vulgar, melodically, dynamically vulgar. At the same time they call for civet. Much of the best music composed by Tschalkowsky is not only the revelation of an unusual personality, it is also the expression of a melancholy and doubting race. Race? Say rather period in the world's history.

Tschalkowsky had no time to be subtle. Subtlety was not in his nature. He shouted his grief and joy, and, as he was an eminently human being, his music has an overwhelming influence over those who have doubts and fears and passions, who are now exultant and now flounder in the slough of despond. As for the "coarseness" of which the genteel complain, the strength in any work of an intensely human animal seems to some unpardonably coarse.

Mr. Wendling conducted again with energy and spirit.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XXI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 11, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

MOZART,	OVERTURE to "The Marriage of Figaro."
PHILIP E. BACH,	SYMPHONY No. 2, in E flat major.
BEETHOVEN,	OVERTURE to "Coriolanus."
HENRY HADLEY,	SYMPHONY No. 3, in B minor.

sturdy in expression, and absolutely sure of their effects, without becoming ascetic, ugly, puzzling or prolix. Would that our musical extremists would go and do likewise.

Louis C. Elson.

SYMPHONY GIVES ITS 20TH CONCERT

Mr. Wendling Conducts, as Dr.
Muck's Arm Troubles
Him Still.

WOLF'S "PENTHESILEA"
PART OF PROGRAMME

Mme. Samaroff Is Brilliant in Liszt's Concerto, Playing
with Engaging Ease.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its 20th concert last night in Symphony Hall. Mr. Wendling, the concert master, conducted in the place of Dr. Muck, whose arm still troubles him. The programme was as follows:

Symphonic poem, "Penthesilea".....Wolf
Concerto in E flat No 1 for piano.....Liszt
Symphony in E minor, No. 5.....Tschalkowsky

Hugo Wolf was not the first musician to be enthusiastic over a play and to give vent to his emotions, thus excited, in an orchestral composition. Berlioz was long before him, not to mention others, and Berlioz was more successful in putting into notation his screaming delight. Wolf was a young man when, fascinated by Kleist's gruesome tragedy, he chose Penthesilea for a symphonic heroine. He never heard his work, yet he knew that it needed revision and in his last years of madness he endeavored to reunite a portion of his tone poem.

Wolf's reputation has been enhanced by the horror of his ending, and it has also been made doubtful by the wild praise of biographers and partisans. It is not unlikely that his name will be preserved by the tragedy of his life and by a few of his songs. Surely this symphonic poem is at the best only the school exercise of a highly imaginative young man with an overheated brain; a young man who had not the technical facility to express clearly or effectively the fantastical thoughts that obsessed him. Now and then in the work he made a lucky stroke. The "Dream of the Feast of Roses," though it is obviously sentimental, has mood and feeling; but the battle scene is ordinary, and the March of the Amazons, though it opens admirably, is soon little better than the March of the Amazons in our old friend, "The Black Crook," with the memorable song, "I Am Stalacta," sung by the leader with the aid of an unabashed chorus of women, who to boyish eyes seemed wondrous fair.

Mme. Samaroff gave a brilliant performance of Liszt's concerto, which is better suited to her present stage of virtuoso development than any of the other concertos she has chosen to play here. There are some that sniff at this concerto, yet its brilliance is still untarnished, though it was composed 60 years ago. The music is something more than pomp and glitter. It has a peculiar elegance that has been approached only by that of Saint-Saens. Furthermore, it has the relief of sentiment, not deep emotion, not passion, but distinguished sentiment, that of the old school gallantry. And how modern is the structure of this composition in spite of the many and envious years!

Mme. Samaroff played not only brilliantly and with engaging ease. She was more poetical in the pages of court elegance, the musical "Vers de Societe," than is her wont. It would be hard to say in which section of the concerto she was most successful. Perhaps in the "Quasi Adagio," for it was here that those acquainted with her performances might have expected her to be least effective. The disappointment, therefore, was the more pleasurable. The interpretation, for it was an interpretation and not a mere performance, was unusually delightful and engrossing.

There are some also who protest against Tschalkowsky's tragic fifth symphony, music that is heavy with bodement, music that is at times almost sinister, music that is charged with sadness, which is too deep for words and turns instinctively to musical expression. They call it coarse, for they fail to appreciate its human strength. Some go so far as to call it vulgar, melodically, dynamically vulgar. At the same time they call for civet. Much of the best music composed by Tschalkowsky is not only the revelation of an unusual personality, it is also the expression of a melancholy and doubting race. Race? Say rather period in the world's history.

Tschalkowsky had no time to be subtle. Subtlety was not in his nature. He shouted his grief and joy, and, as he was an eminently human being, his music has an overwhelming influence over those who have doubts and fears and passions, who are now exultant and now flounder in the slough of despond. As for the "coarseness" of which the genteel complain, the strength in any work of an intensely human animal seems to some unpardonably coarse.

Mr. Wendling conducted again with energy and spirit.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XXI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 11, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

MOZART,	OVERTURE to "The Marriage of Figaro."
PHILIP E. BACH,	SYMPHONY No. 2, in E flat major.
BEETHOVEN,	OVERTURE to "Coriolanus."
HENRY HADLEY,	SYMPHONY No. 3, in B minor.

254

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XXI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 11, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

MOZART,

OVERTURE to the Opera "The Marriage of Figaro"

C. P. E. BACH,

SYMPHONY in E flat major, No. 2.

I. Allegro di molto.

II. Larghetto.

III. Allegretto.

(First time in Boston.)

BEETHOVEN,

OVERTURE to "Coriolanus." op. 62.

HENRY HADLEY,

SYMPHONY in B minor, No. 3, op. 60.

I. Moderato e maestoso.

II. Andante tranquillo.

III. Scherzo: Allegro con leggerezza, ben ritmato,

IV. Allegro con giubbilo.

(First time in America.)

SPECIAL NOTICE. Because of Good Friday, the next Public Rehearsal will be on Thursday Afternoon, April 16.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME, April 13, 08

Mozart. "Marriage of Figaro" Overture.
C. P. E. Bach. Symphony in E flat.
Beethoven. "Coriolanus" Overture.
Henry Hadley. Symphony in B minor. No. 3.

It was a very welcome symphonic dessert after a week of operatic feasting, and we had two conductors at the price of one, the first conducting with his left hand and the other with his right. Dr. Muck was welcomed with some effusion. His arm is not yet quite well, but he is such a born leader that we believe that he could conduct with both hands tied behind his back.

In connection with the various illnesses that seem to come to our modern conductors is it not possible that John Stuart Mill was quite right when he accused modern music of demanding more of the human brain than it could possibly furnish? Mill's remark applied to the musical auditor, but it fits with still greater force to the conductor. His brain is taxed in a superhuman manner, and nervous ailments crowd upon him. Poor Fritz Scheel lost his reason, Gericke was on the verge of physical break-down, Dr. Muck has had a species of neuritis,—to speak of American conductors only. Modern music instead of being a pleasure and an Art of beauty has become a dire and dangerous task-mistress.

Dr. Muck took the "Marriage of Figaro" overture at a furious pace. It is marked "Presto," but we hold that a Mozart "presto" is not faster than many a Liszt "Allegro." However, the strings were able to maintain the pace, in the scale-work of the chief theme and of the Coda, without blurring. We think that many modern conductors take this overture and that of "The Magic Flute" too rapidly for the best effect.

"Symphony" meant something very different in the days of Bach from what it does at present. The reviewer has in his library the first English Musical Dictionary, (1724) which defines the word as—"Airs in Two, Three, or Four Parts, for Instruments of any Kind; or the Instrumental Parts of Songs, Motets, Operas; or Concertos are so called."

J. S. Bach called his three-part Inventions "Symphonies." The symphony of this concert was of this kind but somewhat larger. Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach did not follow the sonata-allegro form of Corelli in his symphonies but indulged in strong contrasts and (for his time) good figure development. Dr. Muck took the work in strong and manly style and it made an excellent impression. It was an interesting specimen of a transition period.

C. P. E. Bach leaned far more towards the modern vein than his father did. Burney thought him greater than his father. That, of course, is absurd, but the gifted son proved that sometimes a talent can do as valuable work as a genius, for he became a chain linking the old to the new, and fulfilled a great task in the history of musical development. It was most interesting to listen to this single movement symphony in the antique form. The performance was excellent.

The two overtures of the programme were in great contrast. While the "Marriage of Figaro" overture is light and chattering, the "Coriolanus" is tragic and earnest. It received a noble reading. The strength of the Coriolanus theme was in exquisite contrast with the tenderness of the subordinate theme, which presumably represents the wife and mother. The synopations and alterations of the theme on its return graphically suggest vacillation, irresolution, and finally Death. It must be remembered that it is not Shakespeare that is here represented, but Collin, the Austrian Secretary of War, who made a play upon the Roman subject. It is a pity that Beethoven never studied Shakespeare. He read a few of the plays in later life and marked the passage—

"How far that little candle throws his beams! So shines a good deed in this naughty world," in his copy of "The Merchant of Venice," but never used it (or any Shakespearean theme) musically. The "Coriolanus" overture received much applause and Dr. Muck was recalled at its end with some enthusiasm.

Now the second conductor appeared. He conducted with his right hand—also with his left, his legs, his body and his face. We have already chronicled our high estimation of Mr. Carl Wendling as a conductor. He has had but little experience, yet he grasps the salient points of a work and he brings them out of the orchestra, too. But he is as vehement in motion as the operatic Hertz himself, of whom Heine might have written,—

"Was poch'st du denn so wunderbar, m. Hertz, r. in Hertz?"
A little more repose in action would bring good results.

The Hadley symphony is a good addition to the list of American classical works. It is not as remarkable as his "Salome" but it is above all of his other works with which we are acquainted. The first movement reminds somewhat of Mahler's style, in that it gives a very dramatic picture but calls it "absolute music," this is without any definite story. This, I think is a mistaken policy. When we hear the vivid contrasts, the phrases "with fate" and with brasses, the constant reiteration of a two-noted figure without much musical significance, we have the right to ask for an explanation of this mystery. Mahler's symphonies are all often tragedies with the plot omitted. Nevertheless, we were much impressed with the poetic beauty and the admirable skill displayed all through this first movement. There was good form evident and the length was reasonable.

The second movement (Andante Trappo) was also a definite picture although the composer declined to call it "programme-music." It might well be called "Sunday Morning," or "Dimanche au Village," or something of that sort. It is chiefly founded on a recurring figure

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dr. Muck Conducts Again—Two Classic Overtures, an Old Symphony by Emmanuel Bach and a New Symphony by Henry Hadley — The Progress of the Young Composer

Dr. Muck conducted the first three numbers of the programme of the twenty-first rehearsal, while Mr. Wendling conducted the new symphony by Hadley which he had rehearsed. The programme follows:

Overture, "The Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Symphony in D major.....Emmanuel Bach
Overture, "Coriolanus".....Beethoven
Symphony No. 3, in B minor.....Henry Hadley

The ever-delightful Mozart overture, before which even the most lukewarm critic of Mozart must glow with enthusiasm, was played with contagious vivacity of spirit, remarkable precision and a fresh and piquant gaiety. It is a matter of equal triumph for orchestra and conductor that its flowing passages came out with such fleet and yet clear velocity. Especially notable was the genuine simplicity which Dr. Muck gave to the piece without the slightest attempt at expressive modernization. His instinct might be relied upon to recognize that here such effort would be fruitless.

The Emanuel Bach symphony offers an unusual opportunity for the strings, and decision of attack and med more appealing. stic of the music it unified elegance rather brilliance of expression was unfortunate in the marvellous contrast the universality of which were the distinction father's art. Neither enough in the evolution of the symphonic form which and structural coherence the best symphonies and Mozart. Nor, is there any hint in its of this symphony of found grasp of ex-the chamber works, onies of Beethoven, s. Nevertheless the uel Bach have their works of his immediate the historic standardly worth while.

Moreover, by his interpretation Dr. s due value. ure to Coriolanus, eloquent expression in his middle steadfast to the letter and the spirit of the composer's intention. Seldom has this overture been more brilliantly and flawlessly played, yet here it would seem as if something of the spirit of modernization might be justifiable; a slightly more definite contrast between first and second theme, and more insistence on the tragic nature of the conclusion. Yet after all Dr. Muck was more faithful to the purist's point of view.

Mr. Hadley has now been living for some years in Europe and there are tangible results to be seen in his music. His poem for orchestra on "Salome" showed greater warmth of expression, a more tangible realization of mood than in any of his previous works. There was an evident increase also in technical dexterity. Consequently there was an unusual curiosity and interest to compare his latest work in the symphonic form with its predecessor "The Four Seasons" composed in this country. In this latter work, which had the unusual distinction of gaining two prizes, its chief characteristics were an uncommon facility in technical treatment, as well as a distinct faculty for handling orchestral forces. Musically this symphony had less distinction, and the characterization of the contrasting seasons (a difficult subject at best), was inclined towards the commonplace, in spite of the correctness and by no means infrequent cleverness of expression. This facility of expression has hitherto remained virtually an obstacle to Mr. Hadley's evident and praiseworthy ambition, and the extent to which this quality would be evident in this new symphony was a matter for conjecture. Accordingly the first movements gives an impression of somewhat unsubstantial character theoretically.

The first theme is not particularly impressive, nor is its elaboration striking; the second theme is far more interesting, both melodically and harmonically. There is no definite sense of a clear and forceful coherence, yet there is more individuality of expression than in the corresponding movement of "The Four Seasons," a growth in depth of sentiment and a conspicuous skill in orchestral treatment. The second movement leaves a more tangible and convincing memory to the listener. It establishes a graceful and picturesque mood at once. The recurring bell phrase is woven adroitly into the development of the opening theme; there is variety and picturesqueness of treatment. If the middle episode is somewhat less persuasive, the return of the first mood and the conclusion are felicitous and poetic. The scherzo is decidedly bright and skilful in its contrast of rhythm, but the musical material is not on as high a level as the two preceding movements. The finale begins effectively, but its treatment is wanting in substantial development, in spite of a brilliant peroration and close. As a whole, a work in which interesting ideas and genuine fancy jostle those that are less worthy and more commonplace. Still, this symphony shows an indisputable advance both in musical substance and treatment, and the use of the orchestra throughout shows greater in-

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME, April 13, 08

Mozart. "Marriage of Figaro" Overture.
C. P. E. Bach. Symphony in E flat.
Beethoven. "Coriolanus" Overture.
Henry Hadley. Symphony in B minor. No. 3.

It was a very welcome symphonic dessert after a week of operatic feasting, and we had two conductors at the price of one, the first conducting with his left hand and the other with his right. Dr. Muck was welcomed with some effusion. His arm is not yet quite well, but he is such a born leader that we believe that he could conduct with both hands tied behind his back.

In connection with the various illnesses that seem to come to our modern conductors is it not possible that John Stuart Mill was quite right when he accused modern music of demanding more of the human brain than it could possibly furnish? Mill's remark applied to the musical auditor, but it fits with still greater force to the conductor. His brain is taxed in a superhuman manner, and nervous ailments crowd upon him. Poor Fritz Scheel lost his reason, Gericke was on the verge of physical break-down, Dr. Muck has had a species of neuritis,—to speak of American conductors only. Modern music instead of being a pleasure and an Art of beauty has become a dire and dangerous task-mistress.

Dr. Muck took the "Marriage of Figaro" overture at a furious pace. It is marked "Presto," but we hold that a Mozart "presto" is not faster than many a Liszt "Allegro." However, the strings were able to maintain the pace, in the scale-work of the chief theme and of the Coda, without blurring. We think that many modern conductors take this overture and that of "The Magic Flute" too rapidly for the best effect.

"Symphony" meant something very different in the days of Bach from what it does at present. The reviewer has in his library the first English Musical Dictionary, (1724) which defines the word as—"Airs in Two, Three, or Four Parts, for Instruments of any Kind; or the Instrumental Parts of Songs, Motets, Operas; or Concertos are so called."

J. S. Bach called his three-part Inventions "Symphonies." The symphony of this concert was of this kind but somewhat larger. Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach did not follow the sonata-allegro form of Corelli in his symphonies but indulged in strong contrasts and (for his time) good figure development. Dr. Muck took the work in strong and manly style and it made an excellent impression. It was an interesting specimen of a transition period.

C. P. E. Bach leaned far more towards the modern vein than his father did. Burney thought him greater than his father. That, of course, is absurd, but the gifted son proved that sometimes a talent can do as valuable work as a genius, for he became a chain linking the old to the new, and fulfilled a great task in the history of musical development. It was most interesting to listen to this single movement symphony in the antique form. The performance was excellent.

The two overtures of the programme were in great contrast. While the "Marriage of Figaro" overture is light and chattering, the "Coriolanus" is tragic and earnest. It received a noble reading. The strength of the Coriolanus theme was in exquisite contrast with the tenderness of the subordinate theme, which presumably represents the wife and mother. The syncopations and alterations of the theme on its return graphically suggest vacillation, irresolution, and finally Death. It must be remembered that it is not Shakespeare that is here represented, but Collin, the Austrian Secretary of War, who made a play upon the Roman subject. It is a pity that Beethoven never studied Shakespeare. He read a few of the plays in later life and marked the passage—

"How far that little candle throws his beams! So shines a good deed in this naughty world." in his copy of "The Merchant of Venice," but never used it (or any Shakespearean theme) musically. The "Coriolanus" overture received much applause and Dr. Muck was recalled at its end with some enthusiasm.

Now the second conductor appeared. He conducted with his right hand—also with his left, his legs, his body and his face. We have already chronicled our high estimation of Mr. Carl Wendling as a conductor. He has had but little experience, yet he grasps the salient points of a work and he brings them out of the orchestra, too. Of three notes (a "ground") given on the Glockenspiel in imitation of distant church bells. It is very ingenious, very tranquil and very beautiful.

This making of a Carillon, or chime, the foundation of a movement, is not new. Bizet did it most effectively in his "Suite Arlesienne," and Massenet gave a touch of it in his "Angelus" in "Scenes Pittoresques." But the carillon itself is more original than these. The two composers above cited use a sort of "Three Blind Mice" figure for their bells ("Mi, re, do"), while Hadley employs B, C sharp and G sharp (dominant, submediant and mediant), a quaint succession which he makes splendidly effective. The melodies worked up against these notes are very charming and in good contrast with each other. At a first hearing this movement seemed the gem of the work.

The Scherzo was less marked in character, certainly less original and striking. The finale had some fine themes and sufficient figure treatment. Best of all, Mr. Hadley did not discard melody and did not indulge in that fearful prolixity which is dreaded every time that a modern composer writes a symphony. This is a work that will grow upon acquaintance and deserves repetition at these concerts.

Louis C. Elson

The quillo) the c gram) titled "Sunday Morning," or "Dimanche au Village," or something of that sort. It is chiefly founded on a recurring figure

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dr. Muck Conducts Again—Two Classic Overtures, an Old Symphony by Emmanuel Bach and a New Symphony by Henry Hadley — The Progress of the Young Composer

Dr. Muck conducted the first three numbers on the programme of the twenty-first rehearsal, while Mr. Wendling conducted the new symphony by Hadley which he had rehearsed. The programme follows:

Overture, "The Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Symphony in D major.....Emmanuel Bach
Overture, "Coriolanus".....Beethoven
Symphony No. 3, in B minor.....Henry Hadley

The ever-delightful Mozart overture, before which even the most lukewarm critic of Mozart must glow with enthusiasm, was played with contagious vivacity of spirit, remarkable precision and a fresh and piquant gaiety. It is a matter of equal triumph for orchestra and conductor that its flowing passages came out with such fleet and yet clear velocity. Especially notable was the genuine simplicity which Dr. Muck gave to the piece without the slightest attempt at expressive modernization. His instinct might be relied upon to recognize that here such effort would be fruitless.

The Emanuel Bach symphony offers an unusual opportunity for the strings, and seldom has their precision of attack and warmth of color seemed more appealing. The chief characteristic of the music itself seems to be a dignified elegance rather than depth or incisive brilliance of expression. Emanuel Bach was unfortunate in possessing little of the marvellous contrapuntal dexterity and the universality of melodic expression which were the distinguishing traits of his father's art. Neither had he progressed far enough in the evolution of sonata or symphonic form which gave the conciseness and structural coherence which we find in the best symphonies and sonatas by Haydn and Mozart. Nor, it must be confessed, is there any hint in the tentative experiments of this symphony of the grandeur and profound grasp of expression to be found in the chamber works, overtures and symphonies of Beethoven, Schumann and Brahms. Nevertheless the pioneer efforts of Emanuel Bach have their abiding tribute in the works of his immediate successors, and from the historic standpoint alone it was abundantly worth while that it should be heard. Moreover, by his careful and polished interpretation Dr. Muck gave the music its due value.

In the familiar overture to Coriolanus, Beethoven attains the eloquent expression of a tragic subject in his middle period. Here, also, Dr. Muck remained steadfast to the letter and the spirit of the composer's intention. Seldom has this overture been more brilliantly and flawlessly played, yet here it would seem as if something of the spirit of modernization might be justifiable; a slightly more definite contrast between first and second theme, and more insistence on the tragic nature of the conclusion. Yet after all Dr. Muck was more faithful to the purist's point of view.

Mr. Hadley has now been living for some years in Europe and there are tangible results to be seen in his music. His poem for orchestra on "Salome" showed greater warmth of expression, a more tangible realization of mood than in any of his previous works. There was an evident increase also in technical dexterity. Consequently there was an unusual curiosity and interest to compare his latest work in the symphonic form with its predecessor "The Four Seasons" composed in this country. In this latter work, which had the unusual distinction of gaining two prizes, its chief characteristics were an uncommon facility in technical treatment, as well as a distinct faculty for handling orchestral forces. Musically this symphony had less distinction, and the characterization of the contrasting seasons (a difficult subject at best), was inclined towards the commonplace, in spite of the correctness and by no means infrequent cleverness of expression. This facility of expression has hitherto remained virtually an obstacle to Mr. Hadley's evident and praiseworthy ambition, and the extent to which this quality would be evident in this new symphony was a matter for conjecture. Accordingly the first movements gives an impression of somewhat unsubstantial character theoretically.

The first theme is not particularly impressive, nor is its elaboration striking; the second theme is far more interesting, both melodically and harmonically. There is no definite sense of a clear and forceful coherence, yet there is more individuality of expression than in the corresponding movement of "The Four Seasons," a growth in depth of sentiment and a conspicuous skill in orchestral treatment. The second movement leaves a more tangible and convincing memory to the listener. It establishes a graceful and picturesque mood at once. The recurring bell phrase is woven adroitly into the development of the opening theme; there is variety and picturesqueness of treatment. If the middle episode is somewhat less persuasive, the return of the first mood and the conclusion are felicitous and poetic. The scherzo is decidedly bright and skilful in its contrast of rhythm, but the musical material is not on as high a level as the two preceding movements. The finale begins effectively, but its treatment is wanting in substantial development, in spite of a brilliant peroration and close. As a whole, a work in which interesting ideas and genuine fancy jostle those that are less worthy and more commonplace. Still, this symphony shows an indisputable advance both in musical substance and treatment, and the use of the orchestra throughout shows greater individuality of style, as well as a more precise command of the instrumental resources. Mr. Wendling carried through the performance as excellently, and he is much to be congratulated for his creditable work.

E. B. H.

DR. MUCK AT HIS POST.

Will Be Able to Conduct at Symphony Concert This Afternoon.

Dr. Karl Muck will be able to conduct at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon and at the concert Saturday (tomorrow) evening the overtures by Mozart and Beethoven and the little symphony by C. P. E. Bach. Hadley's new symphony in B minor, No. 3, will be conducted by Mr. Wendling, the concert master, who has rehearsed it.

The public rehearsal of the orchestra next week will be on Thursday afternoon, inasmuch as the day after will be Good Friday.

21ST SYMPHONY

CONCERT GIVEN

First Performance of New Composition by Henry Hadley Takes Place.

The 21st Symphony concert was given last night in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck, who was welcomed heartily, conducted the first three works: Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," C. P. E. Bach's Symphony in E flat major, No. 2, and Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus." Mr. Wendling, the concert master, conducted Henry Hadley's Symphony in B minor No. 3, which was performed for the first time in this country.

The overture to Mozart's opera—and there is not a more animated and sparkling prelude to a comedy—was played with delightful delicacy, the finest sense of proportion, and irresistible brio. The symphony by Bach was played here for the first time. It is one of four composed at Hamburg in 1776. The first of the set has been heard here. The second is in three movements, which are closely connected. The first is a lively allegro, which shows Bach's independence of formulae as they existed in his period. The free use of the wind instruments is also noticeable. The second movement is a short Larghetto, which is Mozartian both in mood and in form of expression. The third movement, an al-legretto, is the least interesting of the three. As a whole the symphony is a charming little work that gave immediate pleasure and might well be repeated. Dr. Muck's reading of the noble "Coriolanus" overture was impressive.

There is natural interest here in Mr. Hadley's works, for he is a Somerville boy, he has indisputable talent, and as composer and conductor he is fast gaining an honorable reputation in Europe. This symphony, his third, was composed in Italy and at Munich in the summer of 1906. It was performed for the first time under the composer's direction at Berlin last December. The music is absolute, that is to say, it has no programme, although Mr. Hadley writes that the second movement was suggested by hearing afternoons the bells from a distant church which he heard in a secluded spot in woods near Monza, where he worked out of doors.

The symphony is in the usual form. The first movement is not one of special distinction. The themes are fresh, but the development is conventional, although it is written by a practised hand, and the instrumentation is in no way remarkable. The two movements that follow have decided character. The Andante, with its suggestion of church bells, its suave chief melody, its romantic contrasting section, has real beauty, and the music is singularly euphonious through choice of harmonies and masterly instrumentation. Much may be justly expected of the man who has written this andante and the scherzo that follows. This scherzo, which is technically difficult, is original in conception and in the expression of thought. The finale is not on a level with the two preceding movements. The chief theme is rather ordinary, the treatment of the second reminds one of Puccini, and the movement as a whole is an example of routine facility.

The public rehearsal this week will be on Thursday afternoon.

First Performance of Hadley's Symphony.

Globe — April 12, 08

"Samson and Delilah" to be Sung by the Handel and Haydn.

People's Choral Union—Other Concerts.

The principal work performed at last night's symphony concert was Henry Hadley's third symphony, which was given for the first time in America. It was composed in the summer of 1906, partly in Italy and partly in Munich.

In the midst of much of the modern

French and German compositions Mr. Hadley's symphony stands forth clear, clear and simple. However, it raises no great emotions in the hearer; the audience is neither spellbound nor gasping at the close of any movement. It is color in tone, stirring only by moments, waking admiration, but rarely carrying the hearer to great heights. The composer said of it, "The work is in the usual form and is vigorous and buoyant." Perhaps no better description could be made. It begins with a bold theme, which might in extenso be noble, but it has the air of suggesting, of being only half given. All through the first movement of the symphony this theme returns, yet it never wakes one's soul nor wrings the heart.

The second movement (andante tranquillo) contains a passionate melody, all too short, over a "landscape" with tinkling church bells insisting unobtrusively, even through the dissonances. As the movement began at the Friday rehearsal, fire apparatus went by the hall on Massachusetts av. and it was ironical how the apparatus bells and whistles fell in with Mr. Hadley's scheme, and the higher voices take it up, the oboe objecting with sudden malice. And the movement falls to a golden end.

The scherzo has a fantastic little quicksilver dance of a theme and is conventional in form, going through a trio—as if a Pierrot should dance a minuet.

The final movement (allegro) steps into a brilliant, warm B major march, chanted triumphantly, and except for some thickness in the scoring, some rather heavy writing of the inner notes which fogs it, a brilliant bit. It goes higher and higher in color, and ends in a shout.

Mr. Hadley is infinitely nearer the heart than some of his contemporaries, but concerts of his works are no places for musical lightweights. Herr Carl Wendling conducted with immense spirit.

The program began happily enough last night with Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," which Dr. Muck conducted with his left hand, as he did also the Beethoven overture to "Coriolanus," with its tragic explosions and horror, and the No. 2 symphony of Carl Philip Emmanuel Bach, which was played for the first time in Boston. This symphony is in three movements, all joined together, and is very short. It delights in passages in octaves, in unisons of mixed tones, and in a robust heartiness which is good hearing in the midst of moderns. It is satisfying music, in a word, without calling up either pictures or emotions.

Friday of this week being Good Friday the regular rehearsal will be given on Thursday afternoon and the concert on Saturday evening. Harold Bauer, the pianist, will be the soloist. The program contains Beethoven's first symphony, Ertel's "Midnight Review," a pianoforte concerto by Emmanuel Moor and the overture to d'Albert's "L'Improvisatore." The second and third numbers are played for the first time in Boston.

HADLEY'S SYMPHONY GIVEN FIRST READING

Henry Hadley's B minor symphony was performed for the first time in America by the Boston Symphony Saturday night at the twenty-first concert. Carl Wendling conducted. The work was written in 1906 in Italy and in Munich, and its initial performance was in Berlin last December under the composer's direction.

The symphony is not especially inspiring, being in the usual form with a first movement of little importance. The andante or second movement is a well painted town picture with a figure for church bells, with a romantic chief theme developed with scholarly skill. The scherzo is technically difficult and has an exquisite trio. The last movement possesses little to interest and is the weakest of the four. The symphony leaves behind the impression that Mr. Hadley was continually climbing, climbing, rising, rising, and getting nowhere. It was given a masterly reading.

Dr. Muck conducted Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," C. P. E. Bach's E flat symphony and Beethoven's noble overture to "Coriolanus." He did not use a baton and conducted with his left hand. The Bach symphony was played for the first time in Boston.

Globe — April 5, 1908

An opportunity will be given music lovers at the Friday and Saturday Boston symphony orchestra concerts of this week to hear the first production in this country of the symphony No. 3 in B minor, Henry K. Hadley's latest work, which has been produced but once, and then abroad.

Mr. Hadley, a composer of international repute, is a Somerville boy born and bred. His father, S. Henry Hadley, has for many years been the musical instructor in the Somerville schools and in other cities and towns around Boston. A brother, Arthur, is at present a member of the Boston symphony orchestra and will take part this week in producing the young composer's work, which is said to be his best.

Mr. Hadley is at present in Mainz, Germany, where he is conducting the symphony orchestra of that place. He has been abroad for four years and during that time has conducted the production of "Salome" in Warsaw, Berlin and Cassel.

The new symphony was produced for the first time in Berlin by the Philharmonic orchestra under Mr. Hadley's own direction on the evening of Dec. 27. It met with marked favor at the hands of a critical audience.

S. Henry Hadley will be present at the concerts on Friday and Saturday and will listen with interest to his son's composition. He has been confined to his Somerville home, 46 Pearl st., for six weeks with the grippe, from which he has just recovered.

2 SATURDAY SYMPHONY TICKETS for sale for remaining concerts; floor seats; price reasonable. Apply Tel. 822-1 Cambridge, or address M.S.K., Boston Transcript. ThS(A): mh 12

HADLEY'S SYMPHONY HEARD FOR FIRST TIME IN AMERICA

The programme of the 21st public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra was as follows: Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; symphony in E flat major, No. 2, Philip Emmanuel Bach; overture to Coriolanus, Beethoven; symphony No. 3 in B minor, Op. 60, Henry K. Hadley (first time in America).

Dr. Muck's arm was sufficiently recovered to permit of his conducting the performance of the first three numbers of the programme; Mr. Wendling conducted that of the symphony, which he had rehearsed.

It was very evident that Dr. Muck's temporary absence from rehearsals and concerts had not displaced him in the regard of his men, for they responded to his wishes with the utmost enthusiasm and alacrity. There were excellent performances of the two overtures and the Bach symphony.

The prelude by Mozart was taken at a very rapid tempo, its execution was wonderfully clean, and the quality of tone light and clear and buoyant. But the overture is not by length or construction well adapted for the concert room. The Bach symphony, like the overture, is vigorous, beautiful, open-air music. It is good to have frequent reminders of the fact that Philip Emmanuel, though the son of his father, was a composer of uncommon originality and fertility of invention; but this symphony is not music of today, and it is to modern ears a trifle prolix. The Beethoven overture holds its place, a dramatic masterpiece of the highest order, and the performance was a convincing revelation of its inherent qualities.

It would not be well, after a single hearing, to make any conclusive remarks on the subject of Mr. Hadley's latest symphony, a symphony which is the work of a sincere and gifted composer who is continually gaining in mastery. Mr. Hadley, who was born at Somerville in 1871, is now meeting with much encouragement as a composer and conductor in Europe. The first three movements of the work heard yesterday were written in the months of June and July, 1906, in Italy, near Milan. "The second movement was suggested on hearing every afternoon the bells from a distant church, which were wafted across the fields to a secluded spot in the woods, where I worked out of doors." The final movement came into being at Munich the following August.

There is some good material in the first movement of the symphony, and some interesting moments, but though from a technical standpoint the section hangs together fairly well, from a musical standpoint it does not, on preliminary

HENRY K. HADLEY
Of Somerville, whose third Symphony was given for the first time in America at the Symphony concerts of Friday and Saturday.

acquaintance. The ideas are not of a truly symphonic character; you do not feel the "long breath." The slow movement is a felicitous tone-sketch—it would be called by some "atmospheric." The scherzo seems at present the most vivid and original part of the work. The finale, while very evidently written in consonance with the spirit of the other sections, is disproportionately short, and it is as if the composer took up his pen in a different frame of mind from that in which he had previously been writing. This movement, in itself, is concise and effective.

So much for impressions. Mr. Hadley writes sane, healthy music. He does not, happily, see fit to wallow in the slough of psychological despond, as so many young men of today are prone to do. If one compares this symphony to "The Four Seasons," heard here in 1905, a great advance is at once perceptible, an advance that gives brilliant promise for the future. This promise we feel the more faith in, inasmuch as Mr. Hadley is industrious and self-critical, and unquestionably working in the right direction.

Dr. Muck will conduct the entire programme of the concerts next week, which will take place on Thursday afternoon instead of Friday, and on Saturday night.

HADLEY'S WORK TO BE HEARD.

Symphony Composed By Somerville Musician to Be Produced By Boston Symphony Orchestra This Week.

HENRY K. HADLEY.

262

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XXII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 18, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 1.

ERTEL,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "The Midnight Review."
(First time.)

MOÓR,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE.
(First time.)

D'ALBERT,

OVERTURE to the Opera "The Improvisatore."

Soloist:

Mr. HAROLD BAUER.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

BEETHOVEN—AND OTHERS—AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A New Tone-Poem by Ertel and a New Concerto by Emanuel Moor—Mr. Gebhard at Milton and His Advance in His Work—The Symphony Orchestra to Give a Concert for the Chelsea Relief Fund—Stephen Phillips Dramatizes Scott's "Bride of Lammermoor"—A Summer Musical Piece for Boston—Mr. Moody's Second Play—A Telling Little Piece by Mr. Sutro

The classics, with Beethoven's first symphony, in C major, had their turn at the beginning of the Symphony Concert yesterday, and then came a longer inning for the moderns with d'Albert's overture to his opera, "The Improvisatore," Emanuel Moor's new concerto for piano "with orchestral accompaniment," and Paul Ertel's new tone-poem, "The Midnight Review." One by one, in the course of his two years in Boston, Dr. Muck has conducted in the seven other symphonies by Beethoven that are possible in purely orchestral concerts. Only the first remained—very early and here and there rather tedious Beethoven, to which the conductor gave its true and sympathetic voice. The first movement for example, echoes Mozart and has its Haydn-like commonplaces; yet Dr. Muck found in it at least a hint of the thrilling solidity of Beethoven's later music, as though the sense of ordered power was already stirring faintly and unconsciously in the young composer. Similarly the conductor held the slow movement to the pretty song that the youthful Beethoven designed. The scherzo went with airy lightness and spontaneous elasticity in its instrumental play, and the delicacy with which the orchestra and the conductor spun the final rondo hid its slenderness. It is quite useless to try to make this first symphony of Beethoven sound important or imposing. It is youthful work, obedient to the musical precedent and custom of the time, and departing from it oftener by the qualities that were instinctive in this Beethoven of his twenties than by compelling force of design and purpose. It has its occasional graces of invention and its clear purity and simplicity of style (as orchestral and melodic style went in 1800) is good to hear. Yet it has its commonplaces as well as its pretty charm and pleasant vivacity. Perhaps, had any other name stood on the title page, and Beethoven had gone no farther, it would have slipped into the oblivion that hides so many other symphonies of its time. There is only to take it for what it is, and once more Dr. Muck's conducting in it was proof of his sensitive and discriminating acumen. He did not try to amplify, heat or sharpen it. He let its bare places go and come. He did not try to find emotion where there is only the zest of composition. He was content to let the prettiness of the matter and the purity of the manner speak brightly and fully for themselves. So played, early Beethoven gives its own pleasure apart from what the wise men call his "artistic evolution," with which, after all, an audience in a concert room is not much concerned.

Two of the moderns—d'Albert and Ertel—were fun to hear, and the third—Moor, with Mr. Bauer to play his concerto—provoked to more serious impressions. At last in Germany and Austria, with "Tiefland" going up and down the opera houses from Trieste to Bremen, audiences and reviewers are willing to admit that d'Albert can write an opera that is genuine music-drama. Seven years ago, when "The Improvisatore" was new, they were sure that he could write no more than the orchestral part of one. They liked his preludes, applauded his ballet music, praised the richness and variety of his instrumentation and were bored by all the rest. Thus, until he wrote "Tiefland," the tireless d'Albert's operas came and went, leaving only some orchestral fragment behind. The most lasting of these is the overture to "The Improvisatore." The opera was a melodrama of passion and intrigue in the Padua of the glowing Italy of the despots and the awakening arts. D'Albert conceived his overture, seemingly, as a "tone-picture" of the glow and bustle of the lusty life of the hour and flung it off at a heat of gay melody, snapping rhythms, bright instrumental coloring, and general orchestral tumult. It was, said one of the disdainful reviewers, the only touch of "improvisation" in the whole opera. It holds its fire against the years, and yesterday it danced and chattered and bustled—even sung—as gayly as ever.

D'Albert's inspiration was life as he fancied it in that throbbing Padua where every man had an art, a mistress, and a dagger. Ertel's inspiration is ghosts—the phantoms of Napoleon's soldiery rising from the sands of Acre to the fields of Waterloo, to be reviewed at midnight by their phantom emperor. Zedlitz made some indifferent verses about the scene, and besought Schubert to put them to music. The composer found little suggestion in them, and for nearly a century they have awaited the Paul Ertel who now writes music and about music in Berlin. He has set to the task with all the resources and all the freedom of an ultra-modern devising. The tone-poem begins as though the earth was cracking and opening and casting the phantom soldiers upward—a singularly vivid delineation live stroke. Faintly rattle the phantom drumbeats, uncannily and creakingly stir the ghostly soldiers (what an instrumental resource is the xylophone)! Far in the east to Oriental melody and rhythm stir the soldiers of Egypt. Nearer at hand are the phantoms of the Grand Army of the Empire. The muted trumpets give their ghostly call; the dead hussars and dragoons answer in fantastic and fantasmal charge. The phantom army is gathered; again the earth heaves; and solemnly comes—the emperor, and as solemnly and weirdly the “midnight review” begins. But France and the glories of France, the glory of the revolution and the emperor and his wars may stir even in phantoms. No ghosts sing the swelling Marseillaise—fugato—with which Ertel almost ends. The hymn of battle mounts to its climax; there is sudden pause, the orchestra shivers; the gong strikes one; and the yawning earth takes emperor and soldiers to itself again. Imaginative and pictorial programme-music throughout, and surprisingly ingenious in the fashion in which Ertel makes his music vividly serve his delineative purpose, and yet keep formal and symphonic.

Emanuel Moor's concerto is short and undivided; in spite of its title it often subordinates the piano to the orchestra; and throughout it stops at no exaction upon the technical address and resources of the pianist to gain its expressive ends. By so much it is in the modern rather than the classic vein. Its melodic ideas are many; often they are individual and once and again they quickly and keenly stir the listening imagination. Mr. Moor treats them in the freest of modern fashion, but usually he is very short-breathed with them. The musical idea stirs in him; a dozen variants of it seem to spring to his imagination; he catches at one, at another, at a third and straightway he is off to a fourth. Sustained progress seems impossible to him; he is all rhapsodic impulses, leaping or laboring to momentary expression. The concerto begins heavily, almost thickly, a little crabbedly. Soon the piano asserts itself against the orchestral mass; the music brightens in mood and color and turns warm with fitful energy. The orchestral timbres are vividly contrasted and combined; the piano has a clear and interesting musical speech with or against them. There is freedom of form, harmony and progression. There is sedulous avoidance of the hackneyed cadence, the traditional musical paragraph. Instead are flowing lines, incisive and emphatic accent, broken utterance and passing suggestions. The music sounds as of no school and of no man but Moor. It is wholly individual and bitter sometimes in its tang to the ear. Come climax and transition and piano and orchestra enter a slow section of mournful and fitful song, shifting through shadowy tonalities and clouded instrumentation, advancing, receding, rhapsodic throughout, yet with a distinctly sombre and meditative beauty of its own—a beauty that is still a little ærid and crabbed and a large rather than a detailed beauty. Inventive felicity in small things is not seemingly in the Moor of the concerto. He seems in this slow movement deliberately austere of speech, preoccupied with a large and rather brusque mood that yet speaks deeply out of deep feeling. The song mounts in sombre musing or shivers into fragments of itself. There is rather an excess of fitful climax, until at last the music swings into the sober rhythmic animation, flashing momentarily into nervous and rhapsodic brilliance, of the finale. Throughout it is curiously interesting and “different” music—the music of a man who has resolved austere to express his own sombre self and no other; yet who cannot quite bring that self to expression, and must now run into over-emphasis; then take refuge in a crabbed reticence, an at last in moments of freedom, as here and there in the piano arabesques of the beginning or in the shadowy gleams of beauty in the slow section, find at last the liberty and the emotion that he would gain and express. But the struggle has made the music of even such release bitter.

H. T. P.

A Concert for Chelsea by the Symphony Orchestra

Following the precedent of the past, the Symphony Orchestra will give an extra concert for the profit of the Chelsea Relief Fund. When the news of the earthquake at San Francisco came almost exactly two years ago, the members of the band promptly arranged a concert that yielded $2500 for the succor of the city. They gave their own services; Mr. Gericke conducted as willingly, and Mme. Samaroff volunteered as the pianist of the occasion. The owners of Symphony Hall were as generous; an appreciative public filled every place in the house; and practically the full receipts of the concert passed to the relief fund. Now, with the disaster and the need nearer home, the orchestra, of its motion and with instinctive regard for its position as one of the institutions of the city, has arranged a similar concert. Dr. Muck has readily promised to conduct and entered heartily into the project, though his work at the end of the season is by no means light. Mr. Bauer, the pianist, though he, too, is at the end of months of travel and recitals, has proffered his services, and he will be the soloist of the concert. Accordingly, it will take place on the evening of Monday, April 27, in Symphony Hall, with a comparatively light programme of familiar pieces. The tickets, at the moderate prices of fifty cents, $1 and $1.50, will go on sale tomorrow (Saturday) morning at Symphony Hall; and the concert will be almost wholly free from expense, so that the proceeds will go to the Relief Fund and nowhere else. There remains the public response, and by every sign of the past it will be generous. Dr. Muck and Mr. Bauer and many a man in the Symphony Orchestra are only incidental and passing Bostonians. Its citizens are in honor bound to be as generous as they, who give their work that the audience may have its pleasure.

It is definitely settled that Willy Hess is to return next autumn to his former post of concert-master in the Symphony Orchestra from which he was released last spring for a leave of absence of a year. There is, moreover, an explicit understanding that Mr. Hess's first concern shall be his regular work in the orchestra, and that he must keep his rehearsals and concerts with the projected Hess-Schroeder Quartet, his teaching and all his private engagements subordinate to it. With all Mr. Hess's ability and experience as a concert master, the drawback to his work here in previous years has been his preoccupation with other ventures and concerns that necessitated frequent absences or brought him back tired to the rehearsals and the concerts of the orchestra. The new arrangement presumably holds Mr. Hess strictly to his duties in the orchestra. But how will this requirement affect the fortunes of the new quartet that, according to the original statement of its plans, was to give concerts in many cities besides Boston? At least Mr. Schroeder has no intention to rejoin the Symphony Orchestra.

Program

SCHUBERT.

SYMPHONY I

D'INDY.

“Jour d'Été à 1.
(First time)

Willy Hess Returns to Boston

Professor Willy Hess, for three years concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been abroad during the past year on a leave of absence, returns to his old post next fall. Mr. Carl Wendling, who has been in Boston as concert master for the past year on leave of absence from the Royal Theatre in Stuttgart, returns to that city at the end of the present season. Post Apr. 17, 1908

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Program Comprised Two New Pieces, with Harold Bauer as Solo Pianist in Moor's Concerto.

On account of today being Good Friday this week's Symphony rehearsal took place yesterday afternoon, with two novelties included in the four selections. Paul Ertel's symphonic poem, “The Midnight Review,” and Emanuel Moor's piano concerto were the new pieces, Harold Bauer being the soloist. Beethoven's first symphony opened the program, D'Albert's overture, “The Improvisatore,” was played for a finale.

Dr. Muck, who led three numbers with his left hand, was relieved by Mr. Wendling in the concerto, and from an inconspicuous seat near the double bass Paderewski was an interested auditor. Moor's piano concerto, coming after Ertel's strenuous and phantom-like “poem,” probably lost some of its effectiveness, for despite the evident interpretative skill displayed by Mr. Bauer, the first part of the work seemed to be vague and monotonous in matter and arrangement, leading up to more brilliant episodes, principally given to the soloist.

And these were ephemeral in character, for there was a constant variation in rhythm and key which the soloist and orchestra, thanks to their abilities, set forth with commendable unanimity of purpose under the guidance of Mr. Wendling.

“The Midnight Review” illustrates a phantom parade of troops who followed the fortunes of Bonaparte. The subject is treated in a vividly impressive manner by Ertel who, in dissonant measures galore for brasses and instruments of percussion, suggests cleverly a weird procession, closing with an ingenious working up of the “Marseillaise” by the different choirs of the orchestra.

The review, which was given with all needful vehemence and military precision, proved to be an interesting number. The Beethoven symphony really gave the most enjoyment of the afternoon, the performance being very fine indeed. And the gavety of the d'Albert overture was demonstrated in the happiest mood of the orchestra.

Next week there are but two works to be played, and both are new to Symphony patrons. The first is Schubert's “unknown” symphony in B minor; the second, Vincent d'Indy's latest work, “A Summer Day on the Mountain.”

Glade Apr. 17, 1908

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

D'Indy's "A Summer Day on the Mountain" to Be Played for the First Time Next Week, and a Forgotten Symphony by Schubert to Be Revived—A Student's Tone-Poem for the Final Cambridge Concert Trans. Apr. 15, 1908

At the Symphony Concerts of next week Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra are to play d'Indy's tone-poem, "A Summer Day on the Mountain," for the first time here. It is at least two years since the piece was originally performed in Paris, and last winter both Mr. Damrosch in New York and Mr. Stock in Chicago put it on their programmes. When it was played in Chicago a long account of it was printed in this place, with the verses by the Provencal poet, de Pampelune, that suggested the pictures and the moods that Mr. d'Indy has woven into his music. He divides the tone-poem in three parts—the long crescendo of the dawn; afternoon, as the dreamer feels its brightness and heat and hears the distant sounds of the life of the valley as he lies outstretched under the great trees of the mountain; and last the fading day and the calm coming of the night. The music in matter and in manner is of Mr. d'Indy, austere, resourceful, and contemplative nativity. The tone-poem is a notable and interesting piece itself; and, its intrinsic merits aside, the distinction of Mr. d'Indy among French composers and among the composers in general of our time and the peculiar prestige he has enjoyed in Boston since he visited us in 1905, doubly warrant the performance of it. With Mr. d'Indy's tone-poem is to go an early symphony by Schubert that has not been played here within recollection. It is the fifth in the ordinary cataloguing of his symphonies; the key signature is B-flat; it was written in 1816; and it long lay unpublished. It runs in an allegro, an andante, a minuet and trio and a finale. The symphony is "full of Mozart," according to the all-knowing Grove; "and is as gay and untrammelled as all Schubert's orchestral music of that day." Curiously, he uses neither trumpets or drums in it. Another new piece that Dr. Muck will put on his programme in Cambridge for April 23 is a distinct innovation in the customs of the Symphony Concerts. Mr. A. T. Davison will take his doctor's degree next summer at Harvard. As his thesis, which academic rule requires for such a degree, has written a tone-poem, "Hero and Leander," after the old Greek legend, and Dr. Muck has undertaken to perform it, which is rare good fortune for Mr. Davison.

Mr. Bauer and Moor Again at the Symphony Concerts—The Handel and Haydn Society Sing "Samson and Delilah"

Trans. Apr. 21, 1908
Mr. Bauer repeated Emanuel Moor's concerto for piano "with orchestral accompaniment" at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening, and the music and the performance renewed the impressions that they made on Thursday. Again the clearest of these was of a strange, solitary and sombre musical temperament seeking to force itself to highly individual expression. When it did fitfully burst its bonds, the concerto had a momentary beauty or a momentary eloquence of its own, but shadowed, brooding, and nervous almost almost always. Oftener the hearer must needs enter with what sympathy and understanding he may into the musical ideas that are stirring obscurely in Mr. Moor and into the devices often of very ingenious and reflective contriving with which he would give them utterance. To share in this labor is to become a little weary and resentful of it and to hear gladly the emphatic passages in which Mr. Moor seems no less to be venting his own impatience. At least he has not spared his pianist. He demanded much more than dexterity and resource of Mr. Bauer. Consciously or unconsciously he bade him make abstruse and laboring music significant and eloquent, and charged him often to persuade his hearers to a new sort of accent and arabesque, and to an occasional beauty that at best is dusky and obscure. So Mr. Bauer fulfilled the task—not as the virtuoso of conquering skill, but as the musician who has found an unusual sort of music and who would open it as fully and sympathetically as he might to his hearers. His audience was warm to him and still warmer to Dr. Muck. It recalled the conductor twice after Beethoven's first symphony, and he in turn brought the orchestra to his feet. Conductors and men deserved it; they had made the symphony alive again—perhaps by weight of numbers and tone, with a more substantial life than Beethoven and his little orchestra had ever dreamed for it.

22D CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Two Pieces Given for First Time Here and Possibly in This Country.

HAROLD BAUER PLAYS NEW PIANO CONCERTO

Ertel's Panoramic "Midnight Review" and Beethoven's 1st Symphony Heard.

Herald Apr. 19, 1908
By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its 22d concert last night in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. The programme was as follows:

Symphony No. 1.....Beethoven
Symphonic poem, "The Midnight Review".....Ertel
Concerto in D flat major.....Moor
Overture to "The Improvisatore".....d'Albert

Two pieces were played last night for the first time in Boston and probably for the first time in this country: Paul Ertel's symphonic poem and Emanuel Moor's piano concerto in D flat major.

Ertel, who lives in Berlin, is a doctor of jurisprudence by title and a composer and music critic by profession. "The Nightly Review," the fifth of his symphonic poems, was played at Warsaw last February and it has also been performed at Berlin.

The music is a translation into tones of Zedlitz's poem, in which Napoleon is represented as holding at midnight a ghostly review in the Champs Elysees of his soldiers who rise from their graves in the farthest north, in Italian clay, beneath the mud of the Nile and the Arabian sands. It is a literal translation, rather than a paraphrase, and to quote the slang of the painter's studio, the piece is frankly "a musing" from the Macabre opening, through the music that suggests the Orient, through the march with its old-fashioned pomp, through the strife between the "Dies Irae" and the "Marseillaise," to the clock that announces the hour of one and the dispersal of the valiant skeletons still ready to pay homage to the Little Corporal. The piece is orchestrally clever and picturesque, and yet there is more cleverness than imagination.

Emanuel Moor, a Hungarian by birth, who lived in this country about 20 years ago, is a man of appearances, disappearances and reappearances. He married a Miss Burke, the daughter of the famous bottler of ale, and has thus been enabled to write much music at his leisure. Whether it would not have been as profitable for him to "tipple his ale in the shade" is a question for posterity to decide. Within the last three years virtuosos of indisputable talent, as Messrs. Ysaye, Thibaud, Marteau and Casal, have played concertos by him; symphonies have been brought out; and now Mr. Bauer, believing firmly in the concerto he played last night, must be added to the list of enthusiastic Moorites.

It is not easy to write fairly concerning this concerto after one hearing. Mr. Bauer gave an impressive performance of the piano part. He played with his customary intelligence—for Mr. Bauer is much more than a brilliant virtuoso, and he thinks of other things than the mechanism of eight fingers and two thumbs—and with even more than his customary clearness in presentation, breadth of conception, tonal variety and amazing gusto. Yet the music left the hearer cold.

This music reminded one now of a Brahms that had gone wrong, and now of a Hungarian endeavoring to be pontifically thoughtful. The opening commands little attention; there are pages here and there that excite admiration by sporadic displays of meditative beauty or captivating capriciousness, but these pages are only too episodic; they throw into strong relief the serious lack of logical continuity.

The concert as a whole is subterranean and the pianist must often work as a mole, so that Hamlet's famous speech to the Ghost is here most applicable. The structure of the work is heavy, sombre, Egyptian. When there is melodic or harmonic beauty it is purely meditative, not sensuous; when there are hints at loftiness or grandeur of thought, no overpowering revelation follows. Page after page seems as contract labor. The admirers of Moor say that he is the one composer who never writes a note too much—a sweeping statement that can truly be said of few, if any. In spite of the devotion of Mr. Bauer, and Moor could wish for no better interpreter, in spite of the earnestness of Mr. Wendling, who conducted this concerto, the composition itself seemed as a whole labored, futile, uninteresting.

Dr. Muck conducted the purely orchestral pieces, but with his left arm, for he is still unable to use his right, and he was warmly applauded after the delightfully clear and sympathetic reading of Beethoven's symphony with its many echoes of Haydn and Mozart.

To say, as some do, that this symphony should not be played, because there is little of the true Beethoven in it, is foolish, for the music, in spite of pages of meek routine, still has a certain freshness and a quaint beauty.

The performance of it also serves a purpose; it reminds the hearer that when the symphony was played at Leipzig in 1801 many found the music confused, discordant, "outrageous effrontery"; that when it was performed the year before at Vienna there was complaint of an abuse of the wind instruments; that there were some who talked freely of the difficulty of performance and also of understanding. And so mature and honest hearers in Boston complain today of works by members of the "ultra modern" school and would fain hear only music that lulled them in their youth.

SYMPHONY TICKETS for sale under cost. Rehearsal $12, Concert $12, one ticket each, for 6 remaining weeks; best location. Address C.F.L., Boston Transcript. 5t(A): mh 12

270

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XXIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 25, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

MENDELSSOHN,

OVERTURE, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage"
op. 27.

SCHUBERT,

SYMPHONY in B flat major, No. 5.

- I. Allegro.
- II. Andante con moto.
- III. Menuetto: Trio.
- IV. Allegro vivace.

D'INDY,

"Summer Day on the Mountain," op. 61.

- I. Daybreak.
 - II. Day. (Afternoon Under the Pines.)
 - III. Evening.
(First time in Boston.)
-

The Pianoforte is a Mason and Hamlin.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Familiar Mendelssohn, Youthful Schubert, and New and Mature D'Indy—His Tone Pictures of "A Summer Day on the Mountain" for the First Time—Music of Mood and Mystery, Emotion and Revery, with the Mountain to Prompt Them All
—A Programme of Contrasts

Trans.

Apr. 25, 1908

Dr. Muck's programme at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon ran to ingenious contrasts. "Felix is writing a great instrumental piece, after Goethe," wrote Fanny Mendelssohn eighty years ago, "and he is going to bring together in it two pictures standing in contrast with each other." The "great instrumental piece" is the familiar overture of the glassy sea and then of the stirring wind and water that speed the ship to port. It began the concert on Friday, but it hardly seems so "great" or so pictorial nowadays as it did to the sisterly Fanny and many another admiring pen of the distant twenties. The art of "tone-picturing" has gone fast and far since those days, and for example of it in its present estate, Mr. d'Indy's "Summer Day on the Mountain" ended the concert. Between these "pictures" stood one of Schubert's early symphonies—the symphony in B-flat "without trumpets or drums," and here were plenteous contrasts—Schubert's little band beside d'Indy's modern orchestra with even a piano added; Schubert's spontaneity beside Mendelssohn's nice precision and d'Indy's reflective and searching pains; Schubert's content with tonal pattern and instrumental song for their own sake and d'Indy's insistent effort for fuller and fuller emotional expression; Schubert's gay innocence, Mendelssohn's consciousness of himself and his effects; and d'Indy smitten with the introspection of our time. Schubert charmed and amused, and the listener cared not a penny how much he had remembered of his Mozart or his Haydn. At least he was enough himself to be gayer than they. Mendelssohn pleased with his water-color in tones. You can paint a water-color with spirit as well as nicety, and it is good in these days of ragged and impatient musical energy to see the means so adroitly fitted to the end. Mendelssohn after all, is the stylist of the "just" musical word. The listener may not be keenly interested in what he has to say, but how completely and surely he says it. The Mendelssohnian sea is certainly far enough from Debussy's, but each has the pliant mastery of his resources and the grasp upon his design that brings his purpose exactly to expression.

And Mr. d'Indy in turn in his three "Symphonic Pictures" writes with a large, sure freedom that is good to feel again. In his second symphony the sheer magnitude of the design, the depth of the thought, the intensity of passion that the composer felt seemed to strive for an expression that even he could not bring to the fulness of his will and ideal. In the "Souvenirs," written since the "tone-pictures" were finished, there is by report a touch of crabbedness as though the reticence of intimate emotions had a little stiffened the composer's hand. "Summer Day on the Mountain" is spacious, free, elastic and eloquent. The score quotes fragments of a "prose poem" by Roger de Parmelonne as the suggestion and the inspiration of the music, but the deeper inspiration was D'Indy's own spirit, expanding and kindling under the spell of his beloved mountains of the Cévennes. There he has felt the creeping dawn and the fading twilight of the beginning and the end of his music. There he has lain "under the pines" of his sub-title and let the distant sounds of the life of the valley break, and then prompt again, his revery. There, above all else, he has gained what twenty "prose-poems" might not give the sense of the strength and the calm and mystery of mountains. He has translated the spell and wonder of them and the answering exaltation of spirit that they stir into tones. Somewhere in the music the birds of dawn twitter for an instant; somewhere toward the end there is the suggestion of the creepy shudder in the timid heart of a child as nightfall comes near the forest. These, and many another like them, are details wrought adroitly and imaginatively. The dreamer under the pines hears fitfully the merrymaking or the whirr of busy life in the distant valley and again the music is vivid with suggestion. But the deep, insistent and aspiring voice of it is the voice of the mountains themselves.

Orchestral dawns on sea or land, over valley or upon mountain have almost become a convention of music from the first flickerings of the strings and the wood winds to the coming light through the full harmonies of the close, with its flooding sunshine. They suggest much or little, according to the imagination and the ingenuity of the composer, but seldom the mystery and the thrill of the advancing light and of the newly created day. Mr. d'Indy is too sincere and self-centred to heed the conventions of orchestral dawns; he is no "realist" to try to make his music more minutely delineative and suggestive. He is poet and idealist, and thus he has sought and translated into tones the thrill and the mystery of the awakening earth. At the beginning he has made sound suggest even a breathless, quivering, expectant, silence. It is no less the silence of the man who looks and feels than the stillness of the mountain and valley awaiting the light. The thrill of the coming of the first rays; the fitful glow, the steadying, warming light, the slow fading and then the swift vanishing of the darkness are in the music not as so many "delineations" in tones, but as so many emotions that stir as the poet sees and feels with all his spirit in the solitude of his mountain. Then as swiftly comes the awakening life in the valley below. The mystery has fled. The world stirs lustily again. Here is no place to discuss the means and methods by which Mr. d'Indy has translated these moods and pictures into communicating tones. They are things for the student. The poet's hearers—and Mr. d'Indy is poet, though his medium is music—heed only his commanding voice.

274

The emotion, almost the passion of the dawn, is in this first "picture," as Mr. d'Indy chooses to call it. The second is music of introspective mood and revery. It is soft and clear with the still air and the still light of the afternoon. To and fro in it go little harmonic flecks, often little dissonances, like the fragments of sound that come vaguely and fitfully to the ear and the fancy in dreamy revery out-of-doors. Then the music clears into the sounds of the valley where life is running its daily and varied course, but the distance softens them and the warm dream-atmosphere idealizes them. The poet wraps himself again in the calm and the peace of his revery, and in the music comes something of the vague longing, the sense of still rapture that spoke so often to beauty in Franck, but that has showed less often in the more intellectual and robust d'Indy. Last, the night, with the brisk, bright stir of the end and the release of the day echoing upward and starting the poet from his dream. Then the stealing tranquillity of the fading light, the gathering shadows, the dying sounds, and then the mystery and the quiver of the darkness as it falls upon height and valley and softly mantles them into silence. And the poetry and the beauty of the music melt into it.

H. T. P.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

D'INDY'S NEW PIECE AT A SECOND HEARING

The Illuminating and Sympathetic Performance That Dr. Muck and the Orchestra Gave It—The Qualities That Set Mr. d'Indy Apart from the Composers of the Hour and Their Play in the "Symphonic Pictures"—The New Freedom and the New Humanity of the Music—The Week-End Concerts—The Same Old Bernhardt in the Same Old Sort of Play—News of New Plays and Departing Singers

Trans.

Apr. 28, 1908

Mr. d'Indy's "Summer Day on the Mountain," repeated at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening, renewed and heightened every impression that it had made on Friday. It came, as well, to still more illuminating, sympathetic and communicating performance. The music asks tonal magnificence when it pictures the dawn and speaks with the emotions of the daybreak, catching each momentary impression of the scene, quivering to the feeling the moments stir in the solitary and poetically minded beholder, and then absorbing each detail of both into its own advancing flood of light and of passion. For Mr. d'Indy has written here with true passion for the awakening light and for the awakening world—for the daily miracle of the re-creation out of dark and stillness of the world of sun and man, as it may stir a lofty and abstracted spirit no less truly than twenty commoner emotions. Again, in the second "picture" of the revery under the pines of the mountain side, with the sounds of the valley and its life below jarring into it and stirring it anew, the music asks a quiet loveliness and intensity of sustained tone that shall weave its own mood, into which the sounds of the external life shall break with the poetic and, in its finer sense, the dramatic significance that the composer designed. As it seemed to us there was no grotesqueness and little obscurity in the poetic content of the music as Dr. Muck and his men played it. They wrought d'Indy's picture. Again beauty of tone—the shadowed, mantling, soothing beauty that Mr. d'Indy seeks in much of his "picture" of the falling night—wrought the mood of his imagining. In a word Dr. Muck discovered and communicated the intrinsic beauty and poetry of the music. It is easy to play Mr. d'Indy's pieces so that they shall seem long and weary exercises in abstruse ideas, strange progressions, recondite orchestral timbres and laborious subtleties of musical thought and expression. Played to the letter, but not with the spirit, they seem to justify many of the reserves and reproaches of those who hear his music without pleasure, understanding or emotion. Then suddenly comes the illuminating performance, that enters into the exalted mind and the truly spiritualizing temperament of the composer; that feels the poetry that stirred in him, the beauty of idea and the loftiness of answering emotion that he would express, and straightway the music is eloquent with that beauty, poetry and feeling, and the means become only means, that justify themselves by what they achieve, that seem sometimes inevitable to the end. Such a performance Dr. Muck gave to the new "symphonic pictures." The listeners heard and felt the spirit, as well as the matter and the manner of Mr. d'Indy.

In this spirit, as it seems more and more to us, lies the peculiar appeal of Mr. d'Indy's music and the peculiar place he has now gained among the composers of our time. Debussy and his brethren would make the vague and the evanescent and the emotions that they stir, tangible. They are concerned with the fitful visions of the dreaming faun with the sea that is never still, with the flitting phantoms of the shadowy Allemonde where Pelléas and Mélisande dwelt and died. Strauss and his followers would make philosophies and sensualities alternately audible in music with Zarathustra or Salome. Or they would search broken minds like Don Quixote's or lusting souls like Electra's. There is music of abnormal mental process applying itself to abnormal things. Puccini and his imitators of the opera house—and Mr. d'Indy writes operas as well as symphonic pieces, though we in America never hear them—are all for effective passion. They write passionately and they never forget their audience. Mr. d'Indy stands apart from all these and the other groups and tendencies of our musical time. The vague does not fascinate him; the abnormal leaves him cold; the effective stirs him to contempt. His is a noble, austere, abstract spirit. It turns instinctively to high, large, and fine emotions. It seeks the detached and distilled essence of them. It would search out the beauty and the power and the purity of this essence and then express it in tones. Mr. d'Indy reflects upon spiritual things; they stir him to emotion as well; and most of all they quicken him to a kind of aspiration. Out of this thought that is so deep, out of this aspiration that is so pure, he would draw a music of new beauties and of new emotions that shall be above all a spiritual voice. He would restore music to the loftier and austere beauty, to the purity and the nobility of spirit that is in his master Franck, and that Franck in turn felt in many a page of Beethoven. Subtle and unusual, strange and irritating may be the means by which d'Indy would accomplish this purpose; he has made them a harmonic and an instrumental idiom evolved out of endless reflection and endless aspiration. Yet they gain his end for those who will understand and feel his goal and thereby are they justified.

"In a Summer Day on the Mountain," as it seemed again on Saturday night, Mr. d'Indy has come closer than he has hitherto to this exalted and spiritualized ideal. In the second symphony the struggle was uppermost; the austerity of the process left the hearer cold; he appreciated the nobility of the ideal; he thrilled to the pursuit of it; but Mr. d'Indy did not quite lead him into the beauty that he sought and into the intensities of the emotion that the ideal awakened. There was too little human quality in the music. It did not quite summon the warmth of the ideal beauty that it sought; it did not quite communicate the emotion of it. The new piece escapes this seeming effort and austerity. It goes farther even than the symphony in recondite process—in the development and the relation of the melodies, in harmonies, in rhythm, in instrumental coloring, but they gain their end so completely that the hearer barely needs them. They bring the beauty and they impart the emotion that they seek. Clearer, too, is the peculiar beauty, intensity and spiritual quality of Mr. d'Indy's melody. There is nothing common or sensuous in it; nothing that is either deliberately graphic or deliberately vague. It is the voice of the pure beauty that he seeks; it has in it, notably in the second and the third of the "pictures," the aspiring emotion that has stirred in him. It is intrinsically spiritual. His feeling has distilled it out of his thought.

275

The peculiar quality of this thought and feeling is its power to idealize. Orchestral dawns are nowadays almost a convention of delineative music. The youth of the conservatories make them from approved patterns. The wonder, the beauty and the power of Mr. d'Indy's dawn is not that his music makes it graphic, stirring from dimness and silence into the light and life of the awakening world. Mr. d'Indy does not write merely delineative music of a miracle of nature. He has written the music of the emotion and the poetry of the dawn in a high and solitary place and in as high and solitary exaltation of mood. It is the emotion that kindles in all of us, unless we are clods and dullards, in such a moment, place and mood that he has brought to expression. He has liberated its essence into his tones. He has spiritualized and idealized it in his thought. Not merely awakening earth and awakening life from valley to mountain top speak in the climax in which the "picture" ends. There is long-pent emotion, universal and human, in it as well.

And so again with the second "picture." Orchestral reveries are as old as orchestral dawns; but not such idealizing reveries as this with its dream-atmosphere of soft clear light and air, and stirring and throbbing through it such a song of aspiration, of spiritualized and idealized longing. Again Mr. d'Indy has sublimated to poetry and to beauty and so released in tones true and deep and universal emotions. He has bound them to earth; for the valley and its life interrupt them; but out of this interruption springs the aspiration anew, the deeper and the warmer. Thus these jangling sounds have their poetic purpose. They keep the essential human quality of the whole tone-poem. It returns again in the joyous tumult of freedom from the day with which the picture of "night" begins. It softens as rest and shadow steal over the mountain and the valleys. And then it merges and vanishes in the music of calm, of stillness, of a soothing and all-enfolding darkness with which Mr. d'Indy ends. Again it is more than music of delineation. It is the music of the emotion of night, of its healing and its peace in a vast and solitary place, of the aspiration that has stilled itself in the universal calm. In many a sense throughout the piece, the mountain has released Mr. d'Indy and humanized him.

H. T. P.

D'INDY'S RARE MUSIC THRILLS AUDIENCE

"Summer Day on Mountain"
Given Here for First Time at 23d Symphony Concert.

IMPRESSIONISM IS OF MOST DARING NATURE

Dr. Muck's Reading of Mendelssohn's Overture Most Effective in 20 Years.

By PHILIP HALE.

The programme of the 23d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage.....Mendelssohn
Symphony in B flat major, No. 5.....Schubert
"Summer Day on Mountain.....D'Indy

Dr. Muck gave a fine reading of Mendelssohn's overture, probably the most effective reading of the first section that has been heard here for 20 years. As descriptive, pictorial music the overture still makes an effect, although last night
I heard for the first time a reasonable objection to the "Sea-Calm"; that the composer gave no hint at the tremendous force that underlies this plausible, treacherous rest.

The symphony by Schubert, composed for a small orchestra, had been played here only once, when it was performed from manuscript at a concert led by Mr. Henschel in 1883. Lovers of Schubert may well question the advisability of reviving the early symphonies, which for the most part are mere echoes of Mozart and Haydn. The greater part of the symphony in B flat major is merely amiable music, characterized by endless repetitions of themes without inherent significance and by rows of cast-iron formulas.
Now and then there is a hint at the later Schubert, the composer of the wondrous "Unfinished," but these hints are feeble and far between. The symphony was performed with much care, and the audience applauded with the fervor which it is safe to show toward one long dead and ticketed among the immortals.

The score of d'Indy's "Summer Day on the Mountain"—composed in 1905 and performed for the first time at Paris early in 1906—contains a prose poem by Roger de Pampelonne, who, I believe, is a relation of the composer, by blood or by marriage. It is fair, then, to assume that musical thought was here suggested by a text; but d'Indy, always a lover of nature, and at home among the barren and forbidding mountains of the Cevennes, did not need a literary stimulus. Perhaps it is unfortunate that the poem is printed in the score, for, reprinted in programme books, it may lead the hearers to look for an interlinear translation into tones, and there is such a mass of detail in the prose poem that the attempt to put it all into music would be absurd and wholly foreign to d'Indy's fastidious taste.

There are beautiful pages in this work, pages that suggest both the in-effable calm that is found only on the heights, and the consolation and the reassurance that come to one in solitude far above the din, the babble, the passions of the burgess-warrens with their fret and fury of seeming importance. Especially beautiful are the pages in the third section, "Evening," which come just before the return to the mood of the first section,
"Daybreak." After the dawn, and even in the "Afternoon under the Pines," sounds and noises of earth arise, incongruous, ridiculous; at last they die away, and again there is only the one idea of illimitable space and communion with the Infinite.

This music is impressionistic, not panoramic, and the impressionism is of the most daring nature. To some it will be mere foolishness. They will remember a night on Mt. Washington and fail to hear their recollections recorded in d'Indy's score. The composer might have said, with the Psalmist: "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help." He had no thought of a convenient railway to the summit, of cars laden with picnickers, who would insult the majesty of the mountain by leaving paper bags, empty cans and bottles on its venerable flank.

The hearer of this music must first of all meet the composer in an imaginative spirit. He must go to d'Indy's mountain—or, at least, meet it half-way.

As a feat of technic, the composition is mirific. The harmonic progressions are daring even for the man who wrote the noble symphony in B flat and the gorgeous "Istar" variations. The instrumentation is marvellously original, brilliant, eloquent. Even those who have not yet fully mastered this great composer's language were thrilled by the triumphant outburst in "Daybreak" and deeply moved by the intimate beauty and tenderness of the latter half of "Evening." The performance by the orchestra was one long to be remembered.

SYMPHONIC PICTURE THE CHARM OF THE CONCERT

D'Indy's symphonic picture, "A Summer Day on the Mountain," was played for the first time at a Symphony concert on Saturday night. It was exquisitely played, too, and after the second movement there was great applause. Certainly in no other city in the country has the rationalistic music of the distinguished French composer received a more appreciative welcome than here in Boston. In this particular instance the reception was deserved, for this tonal description of a day spent on the mountain is vividly true and beautiful. Perhaps in no other composition has D'Indy given a more impressive exhibition of his talents and his ideas. If music is to be stripped of its time-honored euphony, then "A Summer Day on the Mountain" will serve as a perfect example of the new form.

By way of contrast there was also on the program Schubert's symphony in B flat major, which the orchestra had not played for twenty-five years; and, with its reminiscences of Mozart and Haydn, it presented a most pleasing souvenir of the old days, when everything was powdered and sugared. Schubert was only 19 when he wrote it, but genius develops early. The concert opened with Mendelssohn's stereotyped overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage."

This week's concert will be the last of the season. Dr. Muck will then make his farewell. The program will consist of Beethoven's fifth symphony and three Wagner pieces, the "Faust" overture, "A Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg."

MUSICAL MATTERS

Two Novelties at the
Symphony Concert.

People's Choral Union Tonight
---"Pops" Soon to Begin.

Symphony's Chelsea Fund
Benefit—Gossip.

Globe

Apr. 26, 1908

The 23d Symphony program opened with Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage," followed by Schubert's fifth symphony, which has not been played here for a score of years, the final number being D'Indy's new piece, "Summer Day on the Mountain," which was given for the first time at these concerts. Mr. Heinrich Gebhardt played the brief piano part in the D'Indy poem. Dr. Muck was ambidexterous in conducting on account of continuous lameness, but that in no way affected the performance.

Lovers of pure melody must have taken keen enjoyment in the first two pieces. The Mendelssohn overture is gentle and restful with but brief fortissimo outbursts. A delightful picture at first of a dead calm at sea, and later illustrating a fair breeze and prosperous voyage to destination. The master has treated the subject so clearly that the title, in this case, is no misnomer and Dr. Muck's reading was very expressive and exquisitely was it interpreted by the orchestra.

Schubert's neglected fifth symphony omits nearly all the brassy and instruments of percussion, and is scored for strings, two horns and woodwinds, evidently originally written for a small orchestra. The four movements are beautiful examples of Schubert's skill in utilizing melodic forms in expressing his ideas. Also in three of the parts are shown his fondness for the flute, this instrument being allotted many delicate passages.

Beginning with a flowing melody of sampler character, this theme is woven into many different forms throughout the first movement. Each group takes up and develops a same theme which is the basis of the second part, and in the third a broader and resonant orchestration is introduced, the chief material for working out being introduced by the lower register of the violins. In the closing movement lightness and vivacity, melodious always, are the characteristics.

A feature of the performance, aside from precision in all the ensemble work, was the delicacy in piano and pianis-simo passages revealed by the men.
There was nothing uncertain or clouded about the tone, and the instrumental balance was seemingly perfect.

D'Indy's poem is modern in style, though not ultra-modern, and of course complex in the instrumentation, for this celebrated French composer and conductor knows thoroughly the resources of the orchestra of today. The tone pictures are based upon a fanciful impassioned poem by Roger de Pampelonne and typify in imagination, a very imagination, too, emotions and incidents associated with a day on the mountains.

Daybreak, afternoon and evening are the division titles; each skilfully depicted in vivid tonal colors, which though they may not be comprehended by everyone, are nevertheless wonderfully effective.

"Daybreak" opens with one chord long sustained on the lighter strings pianissimo, until the morning mists and phantoms vanish and other visions appear, only to make room for succeeding scenes and incidents conjured up by poet and illustrated by composer. "Day," probably because of "more doing," runs largely to broken phrases, dissonants and other instrumental things suggestive of turmoil, and later of more peaceful episodes. And "Evening" brings forth restful strains from the orchestra, closing the allegory midst a kind of musical tranquillity.

It is difficult to judge fairly of a descriptive work of such big proportions after only one hearing. Splendidly conceived and set forth by one of the foremost musicians of the day it commands attention even from the novice or the prejudiced person in musical affairs. The details evidently are carefully worked up, for many of the climaxes are impressive and all through the poem are evidences of D'Indy's mastery of his subject. The performance was imbued with all necessary dynamic values and significant poetic power, although the players were unable to make clear all the puzzling moments when the composer's intent was vague and seemingly chaotic.

Dr Muck will make his last appearance in Boston this week, and he has chosen for his program the one he used at his first concert in October, 1906. This is Beethoven's fifth symphony, "A Faust overture"; "A Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers," by Richard Wagner. Dr Muck sails May 12 for Bremen and goes directly to Berlin, where he is to direct a number of performances of the Royal opera. At the end of June he goes to Bayreuth for the summer.

A NOTE ABOUT MR. D'INDY'S NEW TONE-POEM

Trans. Apr. 22, 1908
The Account Which a Chicago Reviewer Wrote of "A Summer Day on the Mountain," to Be Played at the Symphony Concerts This Week—A Grim Play of Russian Revolutionists That Is Now Stirring Paris—Local Musical News—Mahler to Conduct at "Festival Concerts" Next Year—The British Censor Finds Unexpected "Vindication"—Passing Items

In October of last year Mr. d'Indy's tone-poem, "A Summer Day on the Mountain," which we in Boston are to hear for the first times at the Symphony Concerts this week, was played by the Thomas Orchestra in Chicago—the original performance of the music in America. The next day in the Chicago Tribune Mr. Hubbard, its reviewer, described the piece fully and clearly, and by way of introduction for the performances in Boston his article is reprinted herewith: The composition (he says) is the latest creation of the eminent Frenchman that has reached this country. It is written in three separate parts, the first representing "Dawn," the second "Day," and the third "Night." It is picture-music in that it paints in tones scenes and conditions in nature, but it is picture-music in a still better sense, for it aims not so much at the depicting of a definite scene as at the reproducing of the emotions experienced by a sensitive person in such surroundings. In aiming thus, it remains within what is believed to be the legitimate province of tonal art and attempts nothing which it is felt music cannot do.

All that modern technic can supply for the painting of scene or the conveying of emotion through the medium of tones, d'Indy has laid under tribute in constructing his work. But the purely technical at no time obtrudes. The mastery of the man in handling his materials is instantly felt, but it is after all the musical idea and the emotional content of the composition that seizes attention and holds it. There are wonderful moments in the score—wonderful from a purely technical point of view, but there is only one of them which left the impression of being written with an eye possibly to the displaying of virtuosity in the writing. This was the more rapid middle portion of the second division of the work. The significance of this bit wholly escaped the comprehension of at least the present reviewer, and it seemed that just here d'Indy had written more to show what he could do with a quaint little theme than to convey any clearly defined condition or mood. But barring this one incident—which may have a meaning that repeated hearings would make clear—the composition impresses more with its musical and emotional values than with the supreme technical mastery which characterizes it throughout.

The opening of the tone-poem is truly exceptional. The "programme" of the whole composition consists of some beautiful lines from Roger de Pampe-lonne's prose poem, "The Hours of the Mountain." The first describes dawn—the coming of light, its touching of the mountain peaks, and its slow, mysterious descent into the valleys, widening and spreading until the whole of the earth and sky are bathed in the glory of the new day. With a technical insight and understanding which amount to something extremely close to genius, d'Indy has succeeded in suggesting in tones the vastness, the mystery and the wonder of the mountains when they stand, still draped in darkness, but subtly vibrant with that breathless hush eloquent of coming day. The first wonderful chord, built up from the strings of the orchestra so divided that they reach from the lowest C of the double basses to the highest harmonic of the violins, gives instantly and with marvelous power the impression of mountains based in depths of night and towering into heights invisible. Gradually over this great tonal peak light begins to break, faintly and almost imperceptibly, just as it does in the actual mountains. It fades away, and the darkness is complete again. Again it comes, this time a slightly stronger pulsation. Again it fades, but now the return is quicker and firmer, and gradually the whole peak takes on brilliancy and glow and the dawn is certain. It intensifies; and at last appears the sun. The whole scene is radiant with color and light, and the emotions which seeling eyes and hearing ears bring to him who stands in the presence of a mystery such as is the dawning of day, are pulsing through the music. The world and all its activities now are suggested there, and yet there is no attempt at picturing definite or particular scene or scenes. d'Indy has caught the mood of the dawn and has expressed it with a skill surpassing that shown by him in any other of his pieces and equalled by but few of the master technicians of the present or past day.

The second division of the piece is no less admirable than the first. It has to speak the emotions of the man who reclines on some sunny mountain side, removed from the world, and yet observant of it. There is in the music all the delicious languor, the undefined longing, the happiness, and the silence which come to him who sits or lies bathed in warm sunlight, and with the physical at peace, lets the mind wander purposelessly and freely whither it will. It is music filled with the soft dissonances that abound at such a time and amid such a scene in nature—harmonies that would have filled the old-time listener with horror and distress, but which to our ears have become eloquent and even beautiful. There then comes the strange portion of the score which has been referred to as not intelligible upon a single hearing, and next follows a wealth of harmony which by its purity, consonance and beauty give to the listener suggestion of all the peace and self-forgetfulness which envelop the dreamer on the mountain side when contemplation of the beautiful and the high in nature has raised him above the actualities of everyday existence.

The third portion of the piece is "Night." The world of commonplace life comes to notice in the song of the peasant distinctly heard, in the quiet animation of the household preparing for rest, and in the fear-someness of the little child who, dreaming of out-door bignesses, shudders slightly—a bit of realism wonderfully accomplished by the composer by employing the tone of the piano, tympani, and just a faint brush of the cymbals. There follow the silences and the mysteries of the night, with all the hint they contain of life throbbing and vibrating beneath them. The movement is one of exceptional beauty, both as regards the excellent thematic material employed—melodies many of them of distinct beauty and appeal—and in the superlative mastery with which every note is scored. The whole tone-poem is one of the notable compositions of the present day, and the impression made by it yesterday was profound.

Hall.

907-08

NY ORCHESTRA.

Conductor.

CERT.

R 26, AT 8, P. M.

me.

"Genoveva," op. 81.

D major, for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA,

o. 3, in A minor, "Scotch." op. 56.

t:

ENDING.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XXIV. CONCERT.

[Last of the Season.]

SATURDAY, MAY 2, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 5, in C minor, op. 67.

- I. Allegro con brio.
 - II. Andante con moto.
 - III. Allegro: Trio.
 - IV. Allegro.
-

WAGNER,

A "FAUST" OVERTURE.

WAGNER,

"A SIEGFRIED IDYL."

WAGNER,

PRELUDE to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

adv: PROGRAMME.

Beethoven—Fifth Symphony.
Wagner—"Faust" Overture.
Wagner—"Siegfried" Idylle.
Wagner—"Mastersingers" Prelude.

"All things have an end, except a sausage, which has two," says Fritz Reuter. On Saturday the short reign of Dr. Carl Muck as our symphonic conductor came to its close. It has been a most brilliant one. Dr. Muck is one of those geniuses who can play upon the orchestra as upon an instrument. He has clear ideas regarding the interpretation of the masters, and he understands how to bring out the spirit of even the compositions that do not appeal to him. He has made some of the greatest successes in interpreting certain works of the most modern school, with which he is not in sympathy.

This is one of the severest tests of the modern conductor. No musician can be cordially in sympathy with all of such diverse works as those of Mahler, Bischoff, Reger, Debussy, Loeffler, D'Indy, the new Russian school, Richard Strauss, etc., etc. Yet it is but right that all of these important factors of the music of the present should have a hearing. Dr. Muck not only gave them a hearing, but it was impossible to tell which of these he disesteemed, so carefully and so sympathetically were all these contrasted works interpreted. It is probable that he took the greatest care in the performance of just those celebrated modern compositions which he liked the least, so that they should not suffer by his personal distaste.

The public showed most demonstratively that they appreciated what had been done for them in the past two years by Dr. Muck, and when he appeared the entire audience rose and burst into vehement applause, while the orchestra joined in the tribute by blowing a "Tusch" in honor of their departing conductor. At the close of the concert the audience again rose, not to depart, but to give another tribute as its farewell.

Under such circumstances one ought not to write a cold-blooded analysis of details of the performance, but join heartily in the ovation extended. Yet a little of comparative criticism may be permitted even on such a festal occasion. There was a quicker tempo taken in the first movement of the Beethoven symphony than we are accustomed to; it was quicker even than Dr. Muck's own reading of it when he made his first appearance here. It may be more than a coincidence, that Dr. Muck began and ended his Boston conductorship with Beethoven's fifth symphony. It was also the work with which Mr. Gericke took his leave of us.

With the reading of the initial phrase, which Beethoven compared to Destiny knocking at the Door, we are cordially in sympathy. Many conductors distort this part of the work by trying to make it too heroic. Beethoven wrote the hold over the chord, not over the eighth rest, and there is no warrant for the separation of the figures in the affected manner in which it is often given. But we do not think the movement gained much by the general acceleration of tempo which was given it on this occasion.

The beauty of the variations of the second movement, the mock heroics of the Scherzo, the bassoon-work in the finale of the second, the contrabass work in the Trio of the Scherzo, and the brilliancy of the Finale, really heroic this time, all call for praise.

The whole programme might be taken as an index of our conductor's personal tastes in music. We fancy that his ideal musical kingdom is bounded by Bach, Brahms, Beethoven and Wagner, for all that he has won great successes in every possible domain of symphonic and orchestral music.

The Wagner works were superbly played. The "Siegfried" Idylle does not grow upon us by repetition. It is greater than Wagner's marches and inferior to his Preludes. The "Faust" overture, on the contrary, gains by closer acquaintance. Yet we do not rank it above Liszt's orchestral portrayal of the Goethe subject.

The end came triumphantly with the best Vorspiel that Wagner ever composed. It was a fitting note of Victory, this ending of the final programme, and it fitted the triumph, too, which Dr. Muck has won in America. There have been very few discordant notes during this consulship. The complaints of some concert-goers, that there was too little of the classics and too much of dissonant and puzzling novelty, was the most unkindest cut of all, for Dr. Muck loved some of these works as little as those who suffered in the audience; but it was a duty to give them.

Our symphony concerts are not merely a passing pleasure, like a comedy at the theatre; the dignity of possessing the best orchestra of America carries some duties along with it. We owe it to musical education that this leading organization of our country should make its programmes an epitome of the orchestral repertoire of the world. Our concerts must reflect not only the acknowledged successes of the past and present, but also the strivings and experiments that are making musical history just now.

We are passing through a transition period in Music as well as in Literature, and must, unfortunately, listen to, and study, many things which we fondly believe the future will discard. Dr. Muck is to be thanked therefore for his broad-minded treatment of this subject and for not limiting the programmes by his likes or dislikes. For this and for the zeal our conductor has always displayed in advancing the cause of American music, for the brilliancy with which he has taught us new points even in familiar works (such as Brahms' C minor symphony), for the faithfulness with which he has sustained the high standard of our Symphony concerts, we lift up "the still, small voice of Gratitude." Louis C. Elson.

254

Globe Last Symphony Concert. May 3, 1908

Dr. Muck's farewell program of the 27th Symphony season was a duplication of the one played at his first concert here when becoming conductor of the orchestra in October, 1906. It comprised Beethoven's fifth symphony and three selections from Wagner's compositions, a "Faust" overture, "A Siegfried Idyl," and the prelude to "Die Mastersinger." The retirement of Dr. Muck as leader of the orchestra has been the cause of such sincere regret that naturally the audience was unusually liberal in its applause, greeting the conductor warmly as he came upon the platform and displaying unwonted appreciation at every break in the program.

The performance of the impressive fifth symphony was one of those occasions when the conductor and players seem to be specially imbued with the spirit and intent of the composer, for Beethoven's grand work was given with all the poignant musical utterances requisite for illustrating the soul mysteries which he is supposed to express in this form.

The wonderful reiterated theme of the first movement which never becomes monotonous; the insistent and simple little phrases of the second part; the savage measures of the double-basses in the beginning of the next movement, and the prodigious finale—all are familiar. But one seemingly never would weary of hearing them as given by the orchestra, with all the shades of meaning set forth in glowing, passionate tonal colorings.

The Wagner pieces were well contrasted in sentiments and due justice was accorded each one in the manner of interpretation. The general somberness of the "Faust" overture enabled the heavier instruments to show their good qualities, and the joyous "Siegfried" Idyl, with its dainty suggestions of motifs from other Wagner operas, mainly enlisted the skill of the performers of the lighter instruments. The pompous "Mastersinger" overture was given with commendable vigor and riotous effect, making a brilliant finale of the program and the season.

In the 24 programs the old and new schools were quite evenly divided in the 32 selections played. Of this number, 20 were given for the first time in Boston and six for the first time at these concerts. The seven works by Beethoven led the list of composers, with Mozart, Wagner and Schubert credited with four each, MacDowell and Brahms with three each, and the balance of the selections, about 57, allotted to 47 other writers.

The pianists, as usual, were first in the soloists, and numbered seven. There were but two vocalists, both contraltos, and both with hyphenated names, Miss Gerville Reache and Mme Schumann-Heink. The members of the orchestra who appeared as soloists were the violinists, Carl Wendling and Richard Czerwonky, Heinrich Warnke, cellist, and Mr Ferir, who played the viola solos in Mr Strube's symphonic poems. Bishoff's symphony and Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" each were repeated.

The 28th season will begin Friday afternoon, Oct 9, with Max Fiedler as conductor and Willy Hess as concert master.

SYMPHONY BIDS GOOD-

BY TO DR. KARL MUCK

Remarkable Demonstration of Sor-row on Part of the Audience. Loving Cup From Players.

People who have followed the Symphony Orchestra from its foundation twenty-seven years ago say that the farewell reception given Dr. Karl Muck on Saturday night was the most impressive on record. In the first place, the audience rose up to greet him when he made his appearance, and no Symphony crowd ever did that before in honor of any man or woman. There was enthusiastic applause after every number—after every movement, indeed; and then at the end the audience stood up again and clapped hands and cheered until the protege of Emperor William had come out to bow again and again. Some cried "Speech," but the most popular conductor the orchestra ever had only bowed the more. Perhaps he was too affected to speak. If he had spoken, by the way, the audience would have found that he can express himself very gracefully in English.

A fanfare from the orchestra was the first sign of the last night of the twenty-seventh season. Then band and crowd joined in a mighty greeting. The people remarked the enthusiasm of the orchestra. The secret of this is that the men of this famous organization have almost idolized Dr. Muck. He was a man whose varied talents commanded the utmost respect, yet he never was dictatorial or inconsiderate. So the men were sorry, indeed, to have him go. They called upon him before the concert and said so and they gave him a loving cup as proof of their affection and esteem. Strange to say, Mr. Wendling, the concert master, who made the speech of presentation, also made his last appearance Saturday night.

The program of this last concert was the same as that which Dr. Muck arranged for his debut a year ago last October. It consisted of Beethoven's fifth symphony and three Wagner pieces—the "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

The opening concert of the twenty-eighth season will be given Saturday, Oct. 10, with Max Fiedler as conductor.

THE LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT OF THE YEAR

The Incidents of Dr. Muck's Leave-Taking in a Programme That Was a Little Epitome of His Own Traits as a Conductor and the New Qualities He Has Infused Into the Band—A Suggestion for Next Season—"Way Down East" in London—A Queer Little English Play—The Hess-Schroder Quartet Completed—Bernhardt and America—A Visit from Siegfried Wagner—Other News of the Day

Trans. — May 4, 1908

Dr. Muck's leave-taking, at the final Symphony concert of Saturday evening, was surely after his own heart. His men gave him a loving-cup in the seclusion of the orchestra room before the beginning of the concert, in intimate, and not in ceremonious, fashion. For two years conductor and band had worked together; and the work had brought a warmer liking and a closer tie between the chief and his men than any previous conductor of the Symphony Orchestra has enjoyed. The cup was the token of this personal relationship and the place to give and to receive it was a public and not a private place. Again, no feminizing and pretty flowers and greenery decorated the conductor's stand. Instead, a sober and masculine wreath of laurel hung in more fitting token from it. The orchestra, when Dr. Muck first appeared on the stage, rose to its feet, and saluted him with a long flourish of trumpets and drums—the "tusch" of orchestral ceremony in Germany. The audience was on its feet as well, and for some minutes the conductor stood, as it were, between the applause of his hearers and the applause of his men. He received it with quiet tokens of answering feeling, but without the slightest suggestion of personal triumph. Again, at the end of Beethoven's symphony, which stood first on the programme, the audience renewed its applause; but the conductor, quite as though he was in the routine of the season, called the band to its feet to share it. At the end of the concert, the audience lingered for two or three recalls, but Dr. Muck was plainly disinclined to prolong the leave-taking. The spirit of it on both sides had already spoken fully, clearly, sincerely.

In itself, the concert was a fitting and sufficient epitome of the traits of Dr. Muck's conducting and of the new qualities that he has infused into the orchestra. Its playing, alike in Beethoven's symphony in C minor, and in the three pieces from Wagner—the "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers"—that made the rest of the programme, had the ardor and brilliancy, the elasticity and freedom, the masculinity and intensity of voice, to which Dr. Muck has brought the band. The richness of its tone, the magnificence of its sonorities, the smoothness and evenness of its phrasing, the energy or the delicacy of its accent as occasion bade; above all, its power not merely to make an effective or an adroit stroke, but to create and sustain a musical and poetic mood were at their fullest, warmest and clearest. It was the playing of an orchestra to whom its conductor had imparted his own quick and nervous susceptibilities and his own cool and ordered control of them. In the symphony Dr. Muck conducted with a truly superb largeness of design, wealth of understanding, and sustained eloquence of utterance that made Beethoven's music epic again. In it played the nobler, the loftier side of the conductor's imagination when exaltation is upon him. Then, forthwith, with the versatile completeness of sympathetic and imparting understanding that is his peculiar trait in his art, he clothed Wagner's "Faust" overture with its moods of romantic gloom and romantic aspiration, its energy and its torture of musical speech. No less he wrought the delicate instrumental tracteries, the pretty sentimental felicities of "A Siegfried Idyl." Even in the great spaces of Symphony Hall, with 2000 listeners to hear what Wagner intended for his wife's ears, the music kept its air of intimacy. Then, for ending, and for glorious and summing ending, came the thrilling prelude to "The Mastersingers" with Dr. Muck weaving all its intricacies and convolutions into what seemed a sustained burst of orchestral song, and song ardent with the beauty, the power, the passion of sound, and still more with the vigor, the joy and the zest of doing and living—the doing and the living, and their rewards, that are in store alike for Dr. Muck, as he goes, and to the orchestra that he leaves.

285
H. T. P.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dr. Muck Begins a Warm Leave-Taking

Trans. — May 2, 1908

Elsewhere in this paper is a review and an estimate of Dr. Muck's work as a conductor in his two years of service with the Symphony Orchestra. Detailed comment, therefore, upon the last afternoon concert of the series, at Symphony Hall yesterday, is superfluous—and the more as familiar pieces made the programme and the very pieces that Dr. Muck chose for his first, as well as for his last, appearances here. They are Beethoven's fifth symphony, in C minor, and from Wagner, a "Faust" overture, "A Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to the opera, "The Mastersinger of Nuremberg." (Thus, perhaps, did the departing conductor soothe at his final concert those who have lamented the absence of Wagner's music in his programmes.) Suffice it for the record, that never before at Symphony will have so many sought admission to the second balcony and waited long and patiently only to find that still earlier comers had exhausted the available seats; that the audience received Dr. Muck very warmly when he took his place to begin the concert; that it applauded him heartily after each number of the programme except the "Faust" overture; and that at the end of the afternoon it had him back to the stage four times to insistent applause; that his men left him there to receive it quite by himself; and that the second balcony had even to waive its handkerchiefs. Tonight, come the more formal leave takings.

286

THE END OF THE SEASON

The Final Symphony Concerts and the Last Choral Concert of the Year

With the final pair of Symphony Concerts for the current season, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Symphony Hall, Dr. Muck will make his last appearances as the conductor of the orchestra. He has chosen, moreover, to repeat the programme with which he began his work in October of 1906 here in Boston. It begins with Beethoven's fifth symphony and then traverses Wagner's "Faust" overture, his "Siegfried Idyl," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Thus Dr. Muck will take leave of his public in a classic masterpiece, a romantic overture, a little tone-poem, and a warm operatic prelude, and in the music of the Beethoven and the Wagner whom he cherishes. Evidently, with the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" for ending, he intends a cheerful farewell.

For the general public, outside the particular audiences of the Symphony Concerts, Dr. Muck conducts for the last time at the exceptional concert that the orchestra will give on Monday evening, at 8.15, in Symphony Hall for the Chelsea Relief Fund. Again, Beethoven and Wagner in familiar music will make the larger part of his programme—Beethoven with the third "Leonore" overture and the "Emperor" concerto, and Wagner with the overture to "Tannhäuser." The fourth number is French, Chabrier's orchestral rhapsody "España," a riot of vivid rhythms and instrumental coloring that has twice stirred the audiences of the regular Symphony Concerts. In the concerto, and for his last appearance in America this year, Harold Bauer will play the solo part. No city in America has received him more warmly than has Boston, and he was quick to offer his services when "benefits" for Chelsea were afoot. The men of the Symphony Orchestra were as prompt with theirs; every expense of the concert will be paid by those who have arranged it; and the receipts to the last penny will go to the relief fund.

DR. KARL MUCK GIVES FAREWELL CONCERT

Closes His Work with Finish
of Symphony Orchestra's
27th Season.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 24th and last concert of the 27th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night in Symphony Hall. With this concert Dr. Karl Muck ended his engagement as conductor. The programme was the same as that chosen by him for his first concert in 1906:

Symphony in C minor, No. 5..... Beethoven
A "Faust" overture..... Wagner
A Siegfried Idyl..... Wagner
Prelude to "The Mastersingers"..... Wagner

It is not necessary in this report of the concert to dwell at length on the characteristics of Dr. Muck as a conductor or as a maker of programmes. The Herald gave editorial expression to its admiration for Dr. Muck as conductor and as man last Friday morning. The character of his programmes and the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the complaints recently made against them were discussed in The Herald last Sunday, and are again discussed elsewhere today.

Nor is it necessary to speak in detail of the conductor's interpretation and the orchestral performance of last night.

The compositions themselves were familiar to all concertgoers. It is enough to say that the interpretation of them revealed the qualities for which Dr. Muck is eminent, or, without exaggeration in speech, pre-eminent, and the orchestra shared with the conductor in the final triumph of an unusually brilliant season. It may, however, be said that seldom, if ever, has the finale of the fifth symphony been performed here in such a fully authoritative manner. For once it seemed superb from the beginning to the end, whereas under conductors of no mean parts, after the opening measures of pomp and jubilation, that which follows has often seemed lame and impotent.

The evening was one that Dr. Muck himself, accustomed as he is to gala nights, will long remember. Before the concert the orchestra gave him a loving cup. When he came upon the stage the great audience arose to welcome him while the orchestral honors of drums and trumpets voiced emphatically the feelings of those that stood and applauded. This applause was ever ready, after each movement, after each composition. And at the end Dr. Muck must have been deeply moved by the manifestations of admiration and affection.

287

SYMPHONY HALL
Monday Evening, April 27, at 8.15

CONCERT

IN AID OF THE

CHELSEA RELIEF FUND

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

Mr. HAROLD BAUER, Soloist

THE ENTIRE RECEIPTS WILL BE GIVEN TO THE FUND

PROGRAMME

Beethoven Overture, "Leonore" No. 3

Beethoven Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 5,
in E-flat major, Op. 73

- I. Allegro.
- II. Adagio un poco moto.
- III. Rondo: Allegro ma non troppo.

Chabrier "España," Rhapsody for Orchestra

Wagner Overture to "Tannhäuser"

THE MASON & HAMLIN PIANOFORTE

Hall have so many sought admission to the second balcony and waited long and patiently only to find that still earlier comers had exhausted the available seats; that the audience received Dr. Muck very warmly when he took his place to begin the concert; that it applauded him heartily after each number of the programme except the "Faust" overture; and that at the end of the afternoon it had him back to the stage four times to insistent applause; that his men left him there to receive it quite by himself; and that the second balcony had even to waive its handkerchiefs. Tonight, come the more formal leave takings.

THE END OF THE SEASON

The Final Symphony Concerts and the Last Choral Concert of the Year

With the final pair of Symphony Concerts for the current season, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Symphony Hall, Dr. Muck will make his last appearances as the conductor of the orchestra. He has chosen, moreover, to repeat the programme with which he began his work in October of 1906 here in Boston. It begins with Beethoven's fifth symphony and then traverses Wagner's "Faust" overture, his "Siegfried Idyl," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Thus Dr. Muck will take leave of his public in a classic masterpiece, a romantic overture, a little tone-poem, and a warm operatic prelude, and in the music of the Beethoven and the Wagner whom he cherishes. Evidently, with the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" for ending, he intends a cheerful farewell.

For the general public, outside the particular audiences of the Symphony Concerts, Dr. Muck conducts for the last time at the exceptional concert that the orchestra will give on Monday evening, at 8.15, in Symphony Hall for the Chelsea Relief Fund. Again, Beethoven and Wagner in familiar music will make the larger part of his programme—Beethoven with the third "Leonore" overture and the "Emperor" concerto, and Wagner with the overture to "Tannhäuser." The fourth number is French, Chabrier's orchestral rhapsody "España," a riot of vivid rhythms and instrumental coloring that has twice stirred the audiences of the regular Symphony Concerts. In the concerto, and for his last appearance in America this year, Harold Bauer will play the solo part. No city in America has received him more warmly than has Boston, and he was quick to offer his services when "benefits" for Chelsea were afoot. The men of the Symphony Orchestra were as prompt with theirs; every expense of the concert will be paid by those who have arranged it; and the receipts to the last penny will go to the relief fund.

DR. KARL MUCK GIVES FAREWELL CONCERT

Closes His Work with Finish
of Symphony Orchestra's
27th Season.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 24th and last concert of the 27th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night in Symphony Hall. With this concert Dr. Karl Muck ended his engagement as conductor. The programme was the same as that chosen by him for his first concert in 1906:

Symphony in C minor, No. 5.....Beethoven
A "Faust" overture.....Wagner
A Siegfried Idyl.....Wagner
Prelude to "The Mastersingers".....Wagner

It is not necessary in this report of the concert to dwell at length on the characteristics of Dr. Muck as a conductor or as a maker of programmes. The Herald gave editorial expression to its admiration for Dr. Muck as conductor and as man last Friday morning. The character of his programmes and the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the complaints recently made against them were discussed in The Herald last Sunday, and are again discussed elsewhere today.

Nor is it necessary to speak in detail of the conductor's interpretation and the orchestral performance of last night.

The compositions themselves were familiar to all concertgoers. It is enough to say that the interpretation of them revealed the qualities for which Dr. Muck is eminent, or, without exaggeration in speech, pre-eminent, and the orchestra shared with the conductor in the final triumph of an unusually brilliant season. It may, however, be said that seldom, if ever, has the finale of the fifth symphony been performed here in such a fully authoritative manner. For once it seemed superb from the beginning to the end, whereas under conductors of no mean parts, after the opening measures of pomp and jubilation, that which follows has often seemed lame and impotent.

The evening was one that Dr. Muck himself, accustomed as he is to gala nights, will long remember. Before the concert the orchestra gave him a loving cup. When he came upon the stage the great audience arose to welcome him while the orchestral honors of drums and trumpets voiced emphatically the feelings of those that stood and applauded. This applause was ever ready, after each movement, after each composition. And at the end Dr. Muck must have been deeply moved by the manifestations of admiration and affection.

SYMPHONY HALL
Monday Evening, April 27, at 8.15

CONCERT

IN AID OF THE

CHELSEA RELIEF FUND

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

Mr. HAROLD BAUER, Soloist

THE ENTIRE RECEIPTS WILL BE GIVEN TO THE FUND

PROGRAMME

- | | |
|-----------|---|
| Beethoven | Overture, "Leonore" No. 3 |
| Beethoven | Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 5,
in E-flat major, Op. 73
I. Allegro.
II. Adagio un poco moto.
III. Rondo: Allegro ma non troppo. |
| Chabrier | "España," Rhapsody for Orchestra |
| Wagner | Overture to "Tannhäuser" |

THE MASON & HAMLIN PIANOFORTE

HAROLD BAUER, THE PIANIST AT TONIGHT'S
SYMPHONY CONCERT

SYMPHONY TO PLAY FOR BENEFIT OF CHELSEA

Herald — Apr. 27, 1908
Dr. Muck Bids Farewell to General Public at Special Concert.
Bauer the Soloist.

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Symphony orchestra, will say farewell to the general public at the Chelsea relief fund concert at Symphony Hall tonight. This will be his last appearance here except when he says good-by to the regular Symphony audiences later in the week. Tonight's concert will also mark the last appearance here for some time of Harold Bauer, the celebrated pianist, who has volunteered his services. He will be the soloist in the performance of Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto for piano and orchestra.

The full program will be as follows: Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, the "Emperor" concerto, Chabrier's "Spanish" rhapsody, and the popular "Tannhäuser" overture. The performance of this last piece was one of the memorable features of the last pension fund concert given by the famous orchestra.

The concert tonight will be voluntary in every respect. Every one connected with it has offered his services free. So every dollar taken in will be turned over to the Chelsea relief authorities. It was just the same two years ago, when the orchestra, under Mr. Gerike's leadership, volunteered its services in behalf of the San Francisco sufferers.

BEETHOVEN—FOR CHELSEA

An Extra Concert by the Symphony Orchestra for the Chelsea Relief Fund, with Beethoven, Wagner and Chabrier to Make the Programme—The "Emperor" Concerto Again and Sundry Morals

Trans. — Apr. 28, 1908
The movement for the relief of Chelsea received an important contribution financially and musically from the concert of the Symphony Orchestra last evening with Mr. Harold Bauer as soloist. With an evening threatening rain, the hall was filled to its utmost capacity by an audience whose insistence in the matter of recalls deserved a better reward. The programme, a comfortable mixture of the tried and tested and the new, was:

Beethoven: Overture, "Leonore," No. 3.
Beethoven: "Emperor" Concerto for Piano and Orchestra.
Chabrier: "España."
Wagner: Overture to "Tannhäuser."

With the exception of Chabrier's "Rhapsody," which kept producing the starts and blinks of a bunch of rockets set off under an unsuspecting nose, the evening was a time for settling back to the enjoyment of three of the traditional favorites of concert programmes—a skimming of the season's cream in what may be termed the classic-popular. The "Leonore" Overture, given with sombre emphasis and great richness of coloring, made an imposing portal through which to enter the more stately edifice of the E-flat concerto which immediately followed. The accents of the hidden trumpet, resolute and yet mysterious, distant but distinct, and the concluding rushes of sounding crescendo courted the mood of the concerto.

Mr. Bauer's performance of this work was not its first in Boston this season. Early in the winter, on an occasion of a somewhat similar character, Mr. Paderewski played the concerto which bears the title of "Emperor," and played it imperially, albeit somewhat as a monarch grown impatient of his realm, as might be inferred from the immense demands he made on the instrument. Beethoven had written a symphony with the pianoforte as an integral part. Mr. Paderewski sought to be symphonic. He was all that and more. He was epic. But incidentally one's sympathies were often with the instrument which was humming, singing, or exulting at a pitch which made its doings orchestral. Obviously no one but a Paderewski could begin in such a vein and carry it off. He did, and naturally his performance was the Iliad of performances of that work. Mr. Bauer, on the other hand, was last night, frankly the pianist, compliantly a part of the symphonic structure where the score called for his subordination, and joyfully the protagonist where it thrust him forward again. The noble first theme was given in heroic, a mood which was sustained throughout the movement without a drop into the theatrical, though nothing, with that constantly recurring phrase, would have been more easy.

It is, as the composer doubtless intended it should be, a never-ending source of regret that the slow movement, the matchless adagio, is so short. Its psalmody is announced by orchestra, finely contrasted by the solo instrument, given a brief development, and concluded by an epilogue in a mood as near to beatific vision as the black and white keyboard has approached. If there was more of the romantic in Mr. Bauer's reading of the first movement, in the second he was the lyricist, fitting his theme to the flutter of nightingale's wings. It is a singular piece of perversity that just at the point in the concerto where the composer designed that the solo instrument should be most completely and most beautifully merged into the symphonic scheme, taking its place as an orchestral instrument, no matter how faithfully the soloist labors to efface himself, it is precisely at this point in the concerto that the instrument most completely and most beautifully asserts its peculiar loveliness, as if the field of morals had invaded music and read a new symbolism of sounds into the precept that he who loseth his life shall find it. Certainly, in the last half of the adagio, the piano loses itself in the orchestra most gracefully, only to find itself in new beauty.

Periodically, also, we are amused by the announcement of a new project in concerted music for piano and orchestra in which the composer proposes to make the piano an integral part of the band, giving it only such prominence as would naturally fall to harp or drums, or again we learn of a piano concerto on a truly symphonic scale (though no one so far, as in the case of Edouard Lalo's thinly-disguised violin concerto, has ventured to call such an essay a "symphony"). Schumann, whose concerto for pianoforte in A minor is ranked next to the concertos of Beethoven, may have had something of this sort in mind when he wrote the charming duet for piano and violoncello in his slow movement. But indeed they all come back to these four pages of the "Emperor" concerto, of which Hector Berlioz, in his treatise on instrumentation says: "On one occasion only has it been deemed well to employ the pianoforte in the orchestra under the same class as other instruments; that is to say, letting it bring to the aggregate its own peculiar resources—which nothing can replace. Certain passages in Beethoven's concertos ought, nevertheless, to have drawn the attention of composers to this point. Doubtless they have all admired the marvellous effect produced in his grand concerto in E-flat by the slow beatings ('batteries') of the two hands on the piano in the high octaves during the air for flute, clarinet and bassoon, and upon the contratempos of the stringed instruments. Thus surrounded, the sonorosity of the piano is of the most seductive kind; it is full of calm and freshness, and is a type of grace itself."

During the Rondo a sprite was in the piano. Incidentally Imps were in the violins, for the moist night had strings snapping, and at least one of the players at the first desk of the violins was reduced to virtuosic shifts on three strings for the rest of the concerto, much to the glee of the adjacent 'cellos. Here, nevertheless, the soloist was at his best—off joyously at the head of an elfin rout, gay, sweet, fantastic, full of pranks. Indeed, throughout the concerto there is something Shakspearean in the gorgeous play of fancy co-existent, with a rigorous adherence to form. A concerto which bears the title of "Emperor" is a perpetual challenge to emulation, but the composition which now lacks but one year of its centenary, with its dominion still supreme and only challenged perhaps twice in that period, has fairly earned the title. And at least Mr. Bauer may be reckoned the crown prince.

NCERT.

reason.]

2, AT 8 P.M.

me.

No. 5, in C minor, op. 67.

o.
to.

OVERTURE.

ED IDYL."

"The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XXIV. CONCERT.

[Last of the Season.]

SATURDAY, MAY 2, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 5, in C minor, op. 67.

- I. Allegro con brio.
 - II. Andante con moto.
 - III. Allegro: Trio.
 - IV. Allegro.
-

WAGNER,

A "FAUST" OVERTURE.

WAGNER,

"A SIEGFRIED IDYL."

WAGNER,

PRELUDE to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

292

Symphony Hall.

Twenty-Eighth Season, 1908-1909.

Boston
Symphony
Orchestra

Max Fiedler, Conductor.

Opening Concert

Saturday Evening, October 10, 1908.

293

DR. KARL MUCK.

Dr. Muck this week ends his engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His going is deeply regretted, for he has endeared himself as man and musician to the people of this city. He has also enlarged the glory of the orchestra in the cities visited each year, and he has been largely instrumental in spreading its fame both in this country and in Europe.

As a conductor he has displayed the highest qualities. As a disciplinarian he has maintained the high standard of mechanical proficiency that has long distinguished the orchestra, but he is neither a martinet nor a pedagogue. He has shown a most catholic taste in his choice of compositions for performance, and he has thus broadened our musical horizon. Whatever his personal taste may be, he has recognized the fact that the audience should be acquainted with the results of contemporaneous musical activity in whatever country, in whatever form, in whatever direction this activity may be exercised. At the same time he has treated with affectionate respect the classic composers who years ago, by their conservative contemporaries, were looked upon as dangerous radicals, if not pestilent revolutionaries. He has been a true interpreter; he has the rare gift of interpreting so that the hearer is face to face with the composer and able fully to understand the musical speech. The music is here not filtered through the individuality of the conductor. And as an interpreter Dr. Muck has been passionate and eloquent without extravagance, without any disturbing self-display.

Dr. Muck is more than an accomplished musician, more than a conductor of the first rank. He is a man of sound parts and brilliant acquirements; a man deeply interested in all that pertains to sociology;

a man of singularly agreeable address and distinguished bearing. Furthermore, he has the great and saving sense of humor.

It would be a pleasure to think that Dr. Muck might sometime return to this city, where he is held high in honor, yet those nearest to him would not expect him to break faith with Emperor William, who has generously denied himself for the last two years. It is not surprising that the Emperor now wishes Dr. Muck to return to the duties of the office that he brilliantly adorns.

Herald May 1, 1908

Looking Forward

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Now that arrangements are being made for the coming Symphony Concerts, it might be well to mention what seems, from several points of view, a very short-sighted policy on the part of the management. It seems an outrage to ask those students who cannot afford to buy season tickets for the Symphony Concerts to arrive two hours early, only to stand in line, often in the snow and rain, in order to gain admission to the gallery. The Chicagoans are much more considerate of their students, and it is possible for them to buy gallery tickets a week in advance, and students attending the Friday afternoon or the Saturday night concerts can buy tickets for the following week's concert. In inclement weather the gallery at our Symphony Hall is often not nearly filled, while the gallery of Orchestra Hall in Chicago is always fully occupied, even in bad weather. Hence it would seem that both the management of Symphony Hall and the public would profit by the adoption of the Chicago system since the inconvenience and possible danger of braving the elements for hours at a stretch (our Boston weather being what it is) would be removed and all seats filled on stormy days. Net results: Full coffers for the management and dry-shod appreciation in the gallery.

ELSIE G. PHELAN

Boston, May 2, 1908

[The objection, of course, to the sale in advance of the tickets to the second balcony at the afternoon concerts is the fact, proved by experience, that ticket speculators and brokers buy them and sell them again at prices that put them beyond the means of those for whom they are intended. The management of the Symphony Orchestra has considered the whole matter often, and no other method than that which it follows at present seems so likely to keep the tickets in the hands of those for whom they are designed and at the nominal price for which they are sold. Editor, Transcript].

CARP AT SUBJECTS OF THE SYMPHONY

Some Baseless Criticism of Programmes Carried Out This Season.

HEAVING SIGHS FOR WORK OF PAST DAYS

Good Omen That the Hypercritics Are Omitting Personalities.

Herald Apr. 26, 1908
BY PHILIP HALE.

Some persons have objected to the programmes of the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts this season. Some of these complainers have voiced their woe by word of mouth. I am told that others have taken the trouble to write to a newspaper or two, asking what could be done—whether the Watch and Ward Society might not be persuaded to interfere. Only yesterday a most amiable man said to me: "We have had hardly anything from the classics this season."

The 27th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra will end next Saturday. The orchestra will then have played a symphony by C. P. E. Bach, and a work of J. S. Bach; five symphonies and two overtures by Beethoven; three compositions by Brahms, who is already classed by the complainers among "the classics"; a symphony by Haydn; a concerto for strings and two choirs of wind instruments by Handel; four compositions by Mozart, among them two symphonies; two works of Mendelssohn, two of Schumann, and an unfamiliar symphony by Schubert.

Twenty-three "classic" works, and yet the complainers have heard them not or have forgotten that they were played. Other composers, who have not the misfortune to be alive and therefore suspicious if not dangerous characters, have been represented at these concerts: Liszt, Wagner, Rubinstein, Lalo, Bizet, Goetz, Rheinberger, Dvorak, Berlioz, Tchaikowsky.

It is useless to argue with these complainers, especially as a few show signs of chronic hysteria. "Beethoven!" and they roll eyes heavenward. One of these complainers wondered recently why the orchestra had not played the overture to "Coriolanus" at a certain concert before the intermission, as was announced. The complaint was made passionately in the corridor. As a matter of fact, the overture had been played, and in the order of the announcement. The complainer had mistaken it for the finale of a little symphony by C. P. E. Bach. The three movements of this symphony were played, as written, without pauses between them, and the complainer lost count. Yes, let us have more Beethoven, so that the overture to "Coriolanus" may be recognized when it is heard.

No conductor, if he should spend anxious nights and laborious days on the task of making programmes, could satisfy everybody. There has always been complaint here about the programmes of symphony concerts, and there will be no doubt as long as the concerts will be given. There are always fanatics who wish to hear only the old; there are always fanatics who turn the back on what has been well done and would fain hear only the new. It would be hard to say which set is the more tiresome, or is the more injurious to the healthy musical condition of the town.

There are some, however, who, willing to know what is now going on in the world, listen patiently to compositions of the modern school and with the best intention are unable to find anything interesting, beautiful or impressive in them. They honestly prefer even a second-rate symphony or overture by some one that died, provided they have heard it before, to a new, brilliant, engrossing work. Their ears are unaccustomed to the more complex sonorous combinations, to the more subtle melodic shapes and disguises.

For first of all an average listener submits himself to the elementary action of sound. As Mr. Lionel de la Laurencie puts it, our sensations possess a tone that is individually affected so that the pitch of sounds, their characteristic qualities, their quick or slow succession, their harmonic quarrels give rise to individual sentiments varying infinitely according to the various combinations to which the preceding factors may lend themselves. Viewed subjectively, these sonorous sensations are far from having the same value. To the average hearer, contact with a musical work is confined to a series of sonorous impressions. Perception of form is to him only a phenomenon of memory. Dr. de Fleury has explained this: "When I listen to a work, if it goes above the level of complexity to which I have attained, the music gives me a feeling of oppression, boredom, almost hostility. Hearing it twice or thrice I distinguish some order in the chaos; certain passages give me pleasure. Now the passages which have afforded me some aesthetic excitement are neither the most uncommon, nor the most characteristic of the composer's genius; they are the least novel; they resemble somewhat musical compositions that are already in the memory."

The emotion results therefore from a recognition, from finding again a sensation known in the past.

This also may be said: "Whoever feels aesthetic emotion in any degree, spectator, hearer, dilettante, re-makes, according to his force, the work of the creator. The spectator will feel nothing unless there be some analogy between his nature and that of the creator, however faint this analogy may be." This is a saying of Ribot and there is a great truth in it, which Walt Whitman knew when he defined all music as "what awakes from you when you are reminded by the instruments."

The fresh gay spirit, the simply and forcibly marked rhythm of a symphony by Haydn are easily understood by any one that is not wholly tone-deaf. Some hearers never get beyond a Haydn symphony. Therefore they clamor for Haydn and more Haydn. The hearer of greater sensibility also likes Haydn in spite of his formalism and endless chatter. The music reminds him of the bourgeois city and period of the composer; he recalls the life; he begins to speculate about the development of the symphony and Haydn's share in this; at the same time the gaiety and the simple sentiment refresh him. He likes to hear a symphony by Haydn now and then; but he derives a higher, more intense, more ennobling enjoyment from the first symphony of Brahms, the symphony in D by Cesar Franck or the superb symphony in B flat by Vincent d'Indy.

Furthermore this hearer does not make the mistake of comparing the composer of 1800 with the composer of 1900; he realizes that the man of 1800 must be compared with those of his own period.

Then there is the good-natured or sentimental hearer who is governed largely by the force of association. We are all more or less thus governed. When I was a boy I used to hear my mother play in the twilight Beethoven's "Spirit" waltz, as the piece was called. I have often looked for it since—it probably was in some old instruction book—and have not found it, but it would be hard to persuade me that this waltz is not one of Beethoven's masterpieces or that the performance was not inimitable. The first orchestral piece I remember was the overture to "La Muette de Portici," played by the Germania orchestra of Boston in a town of Hampshire county. It was a wonderful overture then; it surely is now and I should like to hear it at a symphony concert. Would the audience sit up when the triangle came in as the hearers sat up in the town hall in Northampton? Is there any more impressive funeral tune than "China"?

Why should we mourn departed friends
And shake at death's alarms?

I quote from memory and probably incorrectly, for modern hymn and tune books with their rank sentimentalism and preference for that which is genteel, ignore the sturdy old verses and the fine old tunes. Is there any nobler anthem than the old setting "Denmark" to "Before Jehovah's Awful Throne"?

In this instance judgment is overruled by association. I take the liberty of being personal, for I believe my own case is merely one in ten thousand. In the Symphony audience there must be many who have associations with this symphony of Haydn or that overture of Beethoven, and when they hear a composition the familiar sounds are more than sounds, they have color and form; they are furnished with a text by the hearer; or they are as frames to portraits of dear ones long dead and buried.

Yet, why should any sane person, who is honestly interested in music, be unwilling to learn what composers of this day and generation are doing, how they are thinking and expressing themselves? This unwillingness sometimes turns into open hostility. This is one of the most disagreeable forms of Philistinism. The music is new; it must therefore be ugly or incomprehensible, or both.

The story is a very old one. There were the same complainers, there was the same stupid hostility in the days of Monteverde, Gluck, Beethoven, Schumann, Wagner. Even the first symphony of Beethoven was, in the year of its birth, considered monstrous by many. Strauss, d'Indy, Loeffler and Debussy were never more assailed than was Schumann. But the complainers forget all this or do not know it.

The complainers apparently believe that music is an art that has been determined for all time; that Schumann, or possible Brahms, spoke the last word; that there can be no progress in harmonic scheme, melodic line, form of structure, orchestral color. "Why should we listen to the experiments of audacious innovators?" "This music is not music, it is bosh; it is an insult." And so on, and so on.

They should read a remarkable book, "The Threshold of Music: An Inquiry Into the Development of the Musical Sense," by William Wallace, a composer of symphonies, symphonic poems, suites and songs, a composer of talent, born at Greenock in 1860, a man of much more than ordinary general culture. This book, published by the Macmillan Company, is entertaining and singularly instructive. I have alluded to this book before, and quoted passages with reference to the amazing egotism of virtuosos. Mr. Wallace's contempt for this class of musicians leads him to a violence that is amusing, although it may seem to be exaggeration, as when he speaks of "a clammy breed of youth, long-haired and bottle-shouldered for the most part—lads clamorous for notoriety, eager for the opportunity to dangle themselves (not, unfortunately, from a lamp post) before a gaping public."

Mr. Wallace first describes the ignorant, complacent, or flippant attitude of men of science toward music. The scientific man is easily satisfied with his own conclusions regarding the probable origin of some faculty. "He is content to rely upon his hypothesis without regard to those influences which from century to century may have affected man's intellectual progress. The scientific mind has not been at pains to investigate those psychic manifestations which appertain to music." Music as an expression of mental energy has put forth its activities only within the last 200 years. It is impossible to prove its utility or disprove its non-necessity.

These complainers against Dr. Muck's programmes do not keep the perspective of history in view. "In our own time Wagner may seem as far as in advance of Beethoven as Beethoven was in advance of Scarlatti. Some today may place Beethoven on the shelf among the musical antiques—at a later day others may perceive, with the progress of the musical sense, little difference between Wagner and Beethoven. Already Wagner, the daring revolutionist, seems to many to have gone scarcely a step further than Meyerbeer. In our own time we may be witnessing a strange act of profligacy on the part of nature, the sowing of her wild oats, the purging of mankind as regards his musical sense, so that in time to come, humanity will be the fitter to receive and cherish music in some ampler measure." In a word, Mr. Wallace believes that music is still in its infancy, "and that the utmost effort of the most notable composer of our own time or of past time, will be but an iota in the inscription recording man's endeavor toward its accomplishment."

Nor should it be forgotten that music is the youngest of the arts and that which we call "classical" is the work of men, who, in the flight of time, are really our contemporaries.

The development of music has been so swift, the advance in musical thought and imagination has been so prodigious, that Mr. Wallace sees the explanation only in the supposition that a new faculty has come into existence in recent years. "We may assume that the centre for music in the brain consists of a ganglion of nerve-cells which has remained in an embryonic state for countless centuries until through some stimulus it has acquired characters sufficiently definite to entitle it to be regarded as an accessory sense."

Mr. Wallace studies the primitive conditions—how man first sang in a spirit of mimicry, awakened by "the whirring of the fibre in its socket, the moan of the wind and the whip of the rain." Music has no history to look back upon; its accomplishments are in the last two centuries; but the great pyramid was built 6600 years ago, the Parthenon arose 2500 years ago, and Botticelli, Tintoretto, Paul Veronese, Holbein, Rembrandt, Michael Angelo and Velasquez completed their life work before Bach was born. The Athenian attained his ideal of completeness without music, as music is known to us. This Greek music, a series of notes forming a scale, was enough to satisfy human needs through the early centuries of the Christian era. The scale seemed to be regarded as the finality of musical expression. Centuries passed before there was any craving for what we call harmony. Tunes of the people, of Thessalian shepherds, of Chian wine pressers may have come down to Gregory's time and even now be in cathedral chants. Music remained in an embryonic condition for 1200 years. Even the chord of three notes and the sequence of two or more chords are not much older than Westminster Abbey. The human ear could not for centuries appreciate the sounding of three notes together. When music began to extend its boundaries, it did so in defiance of the theorists. The formulas of church music ruled, and the only difference between the sacred and the secular in the music of Palestrina and others lay in the words. The art was finally carried to the utmost limits that theorists would allow.

Then arose Claudio Monteverde (1567-1643), the first great innovator, the first of a long line of musical reformers "who did not enjoy (if the word is not grotesquely inappropriate) the benefits of a 'sound musical education.'" A few may have foreshadowed some of his innovations, but he is the great ancestor. "He applied himself to an entirely new interpretation of the art, and refused to accept the routine fashion in which words were set. He attempted to illuminate his texts by sounds which were not altogether stereotyped." He and his school attempted to get nearer the human heart. He attempted to find use for every conceivable instrument. Knowing the value of contrasted tone colors, he also knew how to select appropriate combinations of instruments and he endeavored to interpret literally the dramatic situation. He found that by employing a large body of instruments he could give character to his themes. Mr. Wallace also says: "He is castigated by a school, which, while it anathematizes all music evincing the slightest divergence from the 'Sonata form,' or attempting to suggest to the mind of the hearer what was in the mind of the composer, is only too ready to accept, in another art, the drab sermonizings of men who turn their studios into conventicles for the elect—a school, which, while denying to a composer the right to describe in his programme just what he means, scans with breathless awe the painter's typewritten descriptions, issued in hornbook fashion, as if they were the sublimest quotations from Holy Writ."

We must leave Mr. Wallace's book for a week. It will be seen next Sunday that his conclusions bear directly on this subject of Dr. Muck's programmes, which to many of us have been both entertaining and beneficent.

At the same time it is a good sign when there is any discussion concerning music rather than about the personality of its interpreters. Without discussion, however absurd or bitter it may be, there is no progress in art, there is no real interest in art. Where there is no dispute there is stagnation, and stagnation implies complacency that is the child of ignorance and indifference.

Raymond Haven will give a piano recital in Beacon Hall, Harvard street, Brookline, on Tuesday evening.

SYMPHONY HALL
Opening TUESDAY, May 5 Every ev'g except Sunday, 8 to 11
55—ORCHESTRA—55
Gustav Strube, Cond'r.
Cooling Drinks.
Light Refreshments.
Admission, floor and second balcony, 25c. Reserved seats first balcony, 50c. Reserved table seats, floor, 75c.
Now on sale.
POPS
6t(A) ap 27

SYMPHONY MUSIC AND ITS CRITICS

What Appears Mediocre to One Generation May Thrill Another.

DR. MUCK'S SELECTIONS
HAVE BEEN OF BEST

Many Composers Whose Contemporaries Quite Mis-judged Them.

Howard May 8, 1908
BY PHILIP HALE.

Last Sunday we considered the nature of some of the objections against the character of Dr. Muck's programmes and at the same time called attention to Mr. William Wallace's "Threshold of Music," published by the Macmillan Company. Mr. Wallace's argument that the musical sense is at present only in the first stages of development bears with particular significance on the subject of Dr. Muck's programmes, which, as the complainers say, have been "too modern."

We parted company with Mr. Wallace for a week, after he had discussed the endeavors of Monteverde and his school to employ music as a means for getting a little nearer the human heart. They were as unwilling as is Mr. Wallace, to admit that music is "useless" as certain scientific men assert.

Monteverde made music expressive by his direct appeal, without reverence for the established formulas, and by his use of color in orchestration. Bach laid the foundation of our modern system of harmony, and this system, it should be remembered, was in turn formulated for practical purposes only as recently as the latter half of the 18th century. The scope of music was thus enlarged. Bach's musical sense was developed more highly than that of any one of his predecessors; "but, although he was able to assure himself that a hitherto enchanted world of sound lay beyond the horizon, he hesitated to go in search of it. He demonstrated his theorem, but neglected to put it into practice." The organ played an important part in his music, and there were practical difficulties about its tuning. He was obsessed by counterpoint, which repressed much of his own true feeling. "So that a composition often became merely a dissertation in the language of music, amazingly ingenious and intricate, but for the most part devoid of human and emotional purpose."

We must beware, as Mr. Wallace well says, of the enthusiasms that are founded on tradition. "It is not difficult for a man destitute of all creative power to build up by rule a vast and imposing erection of counterpoint. The framework of the contrivance, in the elemental forms which are perpetrated even in our own day, must consist of a series of closely related, interlocking parts, which permit of an unobstructed flow of conventional embroidery." The harmonic base must be of the simplest kind, and today the more chromatic the structure, the less easy it is to apply strict contrapuntal principles. "Hence a choral work carried out on orthodox lines cannot be anything else than a slavish imitation of devices whose possibilities were exhausted years ago."

Nor was Bach's sense of orchestral color developed much in advance of those before him. "Every instrument was treated with the same impartiality, worrying out some counterpoint with a sublime disregard for its appropriateness." The truth of Mr. Wallace's statement must be apparent to all. Rossini has been censured for his "olympian indifference" displayed in the lack of appropriateness of the music he often set to a given text. Bach was as great an offender in this respect. Nevertheless Bach possessed a "fluidity of thought and a swiftness of idea" known for the first time, and this, in spite of the fact that "a close analysis of nine-tenths of his work might show much that is mechanical, possibly even labored." He was the first, says Mr. Wallace, to demonstrate "the intimate yet indefinable association of sound with mental processes." Music to him was a fixed habit of thought rather than an art, and it might be added that Bach thought and moved and lived in counterpoint.

In the chapter "The Luthier and His Art," Mr. Wallace describes the gradual change in orchestral instruments, and notes the time when the ear began to decide which were to survive as fittest. "Beethoven and the composers immediately preceding him owe not a little of their reputation to a refinement of technique and a study of mechanical devices which came into use after they were in their graves. The notes that they wrote had the same theoretical relation then as now, but the actual sounds which they conveyed to the ear of the mind are not the same."

It should be remembered that Bach was neglected by his immediate successors, and this shows that he was in advance of his time; also that "the musical faculty had yet to be developed in order that there should be widespread recognition and appreciation of his genius." In his best choral music he showed that his imagination was influenced by great thoughts.

On the other hand, the instrumental works of Haydn and Mozart show little introspection.

"Obvious, trivial and superficial is their style from a modern standpoint. * * * It is music that saves man the trouble of having to think; it is not music that compels him to do so." Mozart was far ahead of Bach in opening the way for the development of musical forms and the treatment of the orchestra; "he was far behind him in comprehending the vast realities," and it should not be forgotten that Mozart, unlike Beethoven, Weber, Berlioz, Schumann, Liszt, Wagner, Tschalkowsky, Strauss, Loeffler, d'Indy, showed little interest in anything outside his art, or in comprehension of them. Haydn and Mozart possessed chiefly the constructive faculty. When they died, the musical sense, "in comparison with its developments in later years, was still in a primitive state as regards the expression of musical ideas."

Beethoven was a thinker. "It was not till he came that music assumed that wider aspect which we accept so unthinkingly today. Yet we are as far beyond his musical sense in one direction as we are close to it in another." His style is "referable to definite periods of his existence."

Haydn and Mozart trusted more to technique, than to the scope and possibilities of their art. They carried further the principles of design and thus prepared the way for Beethoven, who brought his faculty of music into correlation with other mental processes and seemed to be eternally engaged in a titanic struggle to express the strenuous but inarticulate thoughts to which his humanity and experience gave birth. The earlier style culminated with Beethoven; the modern movement starts with him, for the composer was becoming conscious that his gift had an intellectual value.

"Thus an entirely new aspect of art came into existence after 1830. The reign of the mathematician was over; there was no longer need for that composer, who, without special aptitude, could be so trained in the exercise of rule-of-thumb that he could contrive some kind of music painfully correct, never ugly, but invariably dull. His sovereignty was challenged by a new order of brain."

Berlioz was not blessed with "a sound musical education." Born in a restless age, he thought for himself. He had probably heard little or no music worth hearing until he was 19 years old. "He is the first composer that we meet with whose musical sense arose sporadically, and not only was uninfluenced by surroundings, but also declared itself impetuously in spite of hostile conditions." The Aeneid, Shakespeare, Goethe's "Faust" and the literature of the romanticists impelled him to write music. Had he studied in the orthodox manner "he might have been turned into a fifth-rate violinist or a 'professor' of music at some girls' school; he certainly would never have become our Berlioz." His music even in its earliest stages, is singularly original, individual.

"In his conception of sound, Berlioz put in play three agents: the verbal and visual were combined with the auditory, and the last, in any age that the world has seen, would rightly be regarded as abnormal. His power of realizing sound in silence must have been colossal, for we know that he was too poor an executant to be able to try over his effects on a piano. Yet his ideas occurred to him at a time when orchestral music was in its infancy, when the suspicion of a discord in a score would have caused a strike among the players more swiftly than a trades union manifesto does in modern times. He felt the 'genius' of the orchestra more potently than any one who had gone before him, and, although he had none of the experience of Beethoven, he showed in his first important work a technical mastery which was almost superhuman. We must remember that when Berlioz produced his 'Symphonie Fantastique' he was at an age younger than Beethoven was when he wrote his first Mozartian symphony, and what is still more remarkable, between these compositions there was a space of only 30 years."

Thus Berlioz, with Cellini and Whistler, belong to all countries and to all time, as Mr. Wallace thinks, for the three fought against the obtuseness that enslaved their contemporaries; "each saw that convention was merely transient and arbitrary and a frail obstacle to the march of the human faculties." They will live by their aims, irrespective of the artistic performance of their work.

Wagner was nearly 40 years old before he "found himself," but age in everything is relative. "Verdi, when he wrote his 'Falstaff' was a mere lad of four-score years. Many a modern composer is too much of a centenarian at 20." Wagner's individuality was so strong that he seemed to be the incarnation of all the musical activity of his age.

Since he died music seems to have a new aspect, but it is not safe to assign too definite limits to any stage in its development. "For a mode of musical thought which a more staid contemporary opinion regarded as violent and revolutionary has eventually come to be considered as an advance so gentle and imperceptible that a later generation may well wonder why it ever caused a stir." Music is always in a state of transition.

"We are only on the threshold, and those who bar the way forget that the movement of music has behind it one invincible ally, namely, time. Therefore, in this young and green art, which in the history of man is scarcely in its teens, it would be absurd were any one to take upon himself the duty of guide, since the march of the faculty for music has as yet known no check."

"The new phase of music is seeking new outlets; it is not content with the old narrow limits, and no one can arrive at the 'ethical significance' of any kind of music until all that we today call music has been swept out of existence. We are only paving the way: We are at the stage of the cave-dweller with his tusk of ivory scratched with his flint. When sound has been resolved into terms which, with our ever progressing cerebral development, will convey a definite impression to the brain, and when that kind of music has entered into close and intimate association with reason—when, ages hence, this occurs, it will be time enough to talk of the ethical significance of music."

I have quoted freely from Mr. Wallace's remarkable book for the benefit chiefly of those hearers who are deeply interested in what was done long ago; who are suspicious of what is doing today if it be not along familiar lines; who are hopeless about the future if future music is to follow the various paths indicated by Franck, Gabriel Faure, Strauss, d'Indy, Loeffler, Debussy. I have quoted in the hope that these hearers and complainers will be induced to read the whole of the book, for there are many pages of importance to which I have not referred in any way; that having read this book, they will begin to think for themselves; that thinking they will examine into the history of music even in their own parish. Let them, for example, look over the volumes of Dwight's Journal of Music, which may be done easily in the Brown room of the Public Library. They will then see that here in Boston music that to them is now agreeable and orthodox was described by the hearers as noisy, unintelligible, monstrous, dull, when it was first performed here.

Complainers urged Dr. Muck to put more orchestral pieces by Schubert on his programmes. How many orchestral pieces by Schubert are tolerable today? The "Unfinished" symphony, the great and long symphony in C major, some of the "Rosamunde" music. Have not the two symphonies been played here many times? Dr. Muck led them last year. Must the two be performed at the Symphony concerts every year?

A week ago Saturday night Dr. Muck, with a fine sense of humor, put an early symphony by Schubert on the programme for the enjoyment of the complainers. The symphony is a youthful work that should be buried forever. Repetitions of tiresome formulas, themes of little significance, not one emotional stroke, not one brilliant page! Why should the superb orchestra be asked or expected thus to waste its time? But there is no doubt that some in the audience preferred this instrumental chatter to the poetic and eloquent music of Vincent d'Indy that followed. They were honest in their preference. Were they not prejudiced and intolerant toward music which they made little effort to appreciate?

Perhaps they do read about the history of music. They fail to learn the one great lesson: That there is constant development; that new forms and new combinations which at first surprise and perplex, grow familiar, become classic, and no longer appeal keenly to the next generation. Neither music itself nor the criticism of music is something constant. "When I was a child," said Paul the Apostle, "I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child; but when I became a man I put away childish things." There are hearers who will not pass beyond the state of childish enjoyment. After attending Symphony concerts for 25 years, their receptivity is no greater than it was in 1883. The serious-minded men of great talent, who today are devoting their lives to the full and free expression of their thoughts in music are Nihilists or lunatics, because, forsooth, they do not speak habitually the language that merely as a common medium, without the vivifying power of genius, was outworn long ago.

There will always be some who stand in awe of a name; who believe in the plenary inspiration of a dead composer reckoned by common consent as among the immortals, as immortals are now named, though the immortals themselves are not a fixed or determined body for all time; some have been obliged to put on mortality. Anything by Beethoven must be "satisfying" and noble. Anything by Mozart must be "tender and beautiful." There are always some who might say with the honest bourgeois:

Et vous, gens de l'art,
Pour que j'en jouisse
Quand c'est du Mozart
Que l'on m'avertisse!

An examination of the programmes of the last two years will show that Dr. Muck has at the same time respected the classics and given the contemporaneous composers a hearing. It is not necessary to insist on this point. It would also be unfair to argue concerning his own personal taste from the character of his programme. He has been governed in his choice of unfamiliar works for performance solely by the wish to make the audience acquainted with the purposes, tendencies, endeavors and results of modern, contemporaneous musical activity. He considered it his duty to do this as conductor of a great orchestra in a city that plumes itself on its interest in art.

DR MUCK'S FAREWELL

Loving Cup Presented to Him by Orchestra.

Notable Demonstration on Leader's Last Night With Symphony.

globe — May 3, 1908

Never in the history of Symphony hall, so far as the symphony concerts are concerned, has been seen such enthusiasm as last night when Dr Karl Muck ended his two years of service as conductor of the orchestra.

The ceremonies of leave-taking began before the concert, in the tuning room, when after Maj Henry L. Higginson had made his usual speech to the orchestra, thanking them for their work in the past year, Mr Muck was led to the front by Mr Wendling, the retiring concert master, and received from the orchestra a very handsome loving cup, suitably engraved. He took the gift with signs of deep emotion.

When he entered the hall for the concert orchestra and audience rose simultaneously to greet him and the orchestra gave him a fanfare of trumpets and drums. The applause continued for several minutes. The applause throughout the concert was of the same heartiness, and at the end Dr Muck was called out a half-dozen times.

Dr Muck leaves Boston next Thursday. He will go to Niagara Falls for a day or two, then to New York, whence he sails on the 12th.

DR. MUCK STARTS ON RETURN TO GERMANY

Symphony Conductor and His Wife Have None but Kind Words for Boston.

ARE GOING TO NIAGARA FALLS BEFORE SAILING

Artists and Musicians Unite in Farewells to Departing Friends.

Herald — May 8, 1908

"Auf Wiedersehen" were the parting words of Dr. Karl Muck to musical Boston last night at the Trinity place station. With Mrs. Muck, the late conductor of the Symphony orchestra took the train for Buffalo to have a second glimpse of Niagara Falls, and will sail from New York next Tuesday on the Kronprinzessin Cecille for their home in Germany.

"I am deeply indebted to the people of Boston for their kindness during my two visits here," said Dr. Muck to a Herald reporter, "and hope to be able to return here again soon. Mrs. Muck joins with me in this. We are going to take one more look at the fascinating falls of Niagara before returning home."

F. R. Comee, assistant manager of the Symphony orchestra; Ernst Perabo, one of the oldest pianists in the city, and several other artists and music lovers gathered at the station to bid Mr. and Mrs. Muck farewell. C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, and others bade adieu to the distinguished musician at the Empire Hotel on Commonwealth avenue.

Dr. Muck takes back with him a large packing case filled with music, novelties of the past season which he brought with him last October.

The noted conductor of the Royal Opera House in Berlin was loaned to this country for two seasons, and it was only through inability to secure for him further leave of absence from the German Emperor that the Symphony orchestra allows him to return. After a year's stay here, his leave of absence was extended for another season through the kindness of the Emperor, in recognition of Maj. Henry L. Higginson's conspicuous service to art and as an act of courtesy to the United States.

Dr. Muck's successor as leader of the orchestra for next season will be Max Fiedler of Hamburg.

A. T. DAVISON, JR., WHO IS HONORED BY DR. MUCK

SYMPHONY WILL HONOR COMPOSER

Journal — Apr. 20, 1908

Dr. Muck Selects Archibald T. Davison's Setting to "Hero and Leander" for Performance in Cambridge at Sanders Theater.

His latest work, "Hero and Leander," from the old Greek legend, to be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Carl Muck at Sanders Theater, next Thursday evening. Archibald T. Davison, Jr., one of the most prominent young men of Dorchester, is receiving congratulations from all over the country. The composition will be a rare treat to Boston music lovers, and as Dr. Muck is personally deeply interested in the piece, which he declares of remarkable talent, an exceptionally large audience is expected at the initial production.

302

Mr. Davison, the young composer, is at Harvard, a candidate for the degree of doctor of philosophy, and in addition to the regular thesis required for the degree, an original composition in music is essential. When young Davison had completed his production and had shown it to a few musical critics, the exceptional merits of the composition were immediately perceived and the youthful composer was prevailed upon to turn his work over to the criticism of Dr. Muck.

When that famous conductor went over the entire work he was elated and insisted on Mr. Davison allowing the Symphony Orchestra the first rendering of the music.

Mr. Davison is the son of Dr. A. T. Davison of 394 Washington street, Dorchester, and has been interested in musical affairs since childhood. As an organist he ranks among the leaders in this part of the country and is at present hard at work drilling the various choirs connected with Trinity Church for the great "Choir Festival" to be held at that edifice during the latter part of May. Throughout the entire "Festival," which is to be held under the auspices of the Choir Guild, Mr. Davison will preside at the organ.

In concerts and church musical affairs, Mr. Davison has been a conspicuous figure and his many previous efforts have always met with popular favor in amateur circles.

Would Annihilate The Rush Line

Peggy Urges Its Abolition at the Boston Symphony and Other Concerts.

Journal Apr. 6, 1908
Can it be possible that a faint breath of protest is at last to issue against a cherished Boston custom and the abuses connected therewith—that the privilege so long availed of by maids and matrons of musical taste, the boom of standing in line without the doors of Symphony Hall for hours to make a wild, unseemly rush for the gallery at the opening of those portals, is to have a word of question raised against it?

I gather that this is so. And I advise the young girls who are so angered at the women who hire little boys and messenger boys to do the exhausting work of standing to save their powder. These are the same sort of women who in days gone by ordered a dress sent home for inspection and, after wearing it once or twice, sent it back to the firm with complaints and requests for a refund of money—the sort who will haggle and cheat over a restaurant check. Like the poor, they are always with us. Why not take a somewhat wider range and boldly turn your artillery against the bigger evil? Why not see if the whole rush-line system may not be annihilated?

We know, or ought to know, that superior tactics must be used in such a campaign. A fusillade of angry protests will fall flat and powerless. You will be dealing now with one-man power, and organized, diplomatic suggestion is the most potent weapon in your arsenal.

No one can take and no one wishes to take from the founder and sustainer of the Symphony concerts the enviable distinction that inheres in him as sponsor of the finest orchestral organization in the world. In other ways not a few he has shown his broad mind and liberality and far-sightedness. One can hardly credit the idea that he has never heard the grumblings that from the old Music Hall days until now have followed this rush-line custom. One is forced to conclude that he has known of the protests but has had in his mind some reason why the custom should continue. What that reason can be it may puzzle us to imagine—but it is certainly only justice to presume that a man of his caliber has a reason.

Yours is the task then not to fribble away your time on these genteel frauds, but to marshal your facts, born of inquiry and bitter experience, and present them forcibly and respectfully by means of a well-signed petition.

The experience of people abroad (for not all of your twenty-five-cent rehearsal friends are stay-at-homelings, let it be understood) and the sayso of creditable musical people resident in Vienna and other musical centers for considerable periods, prove that for a nominal sum equal to less than the rehearsal fee one is entitled to a reserved seat; that other concerts of a high order are free as air with no barred doors or rush lines, and that the plain people imbibe the good music proffered them by a paternalistic government as part of their day's routine and unconsciously become musicians and critics in the process.

It remains for America, land of freedom and opportunity, to exercise this bottled-up, dollar-a-drop attitude toward the lovers of music. This attitude is deplored and ridiculed by the foreign musician who, when he is done kow-towing unctuously to the power that is or some other of the powers that be on Manhattan, hies himself to an obscure spot where home customs and viands may be indulged and, taking unto himself a half-score of musicians, comments with freedom, nay, with hilarity, on their snobbish features that act as strangling don'ts on art in America.

Young girls and elderly ladies of refinement anxious to listen to the entrancing strains of the Symphony Orchestra in its final rehearsal ought not to be obliged to wait without, a dismal line of pneumonia-inviting mortals, and finally be constrained, if they would obtain the coveted seat, to emulate the rum-crazed crew of a sinking ship with but one lifeboat. The wrenched shoulders, trodden toes, frayed tempers and dangerously chilled bodies render a proper appreciation of the symphonic poems well-nigh impossible. Even if for some reason not apparent to the lay mind the reserved seat boon may not be granted it would be a welcome improvement if the vestibules might be utilized by the throng of patient waiters, too many of whom are made seriously ill by the present arrangement.

All of the big firms and the Public Library invite suggestion and criticism from the outside. I can hardly believe, therefore, that your request will be greeted by a Jove-like frown and that you will be swept off the map. Rather let us hope that careful consideration of your claims may lead to a freer, happier, safer way of listening to those divine strains that mean to so many of us the highest expression of music.

PEGGY QUINCY.

THE MUSICAL DISCOVERIES OF MR. TARDIEU

The Strange Things He Saw at the Symphony Concerts, and the Strange
Conclusions He Drew About Them, Dr.
Muck, the Orchestra, the Programmes and the Audience—A Striking New Play by Brieux in Paris, with a First Act
That the Reviewers Count a Masterpiece, and a Conclusion That Was Rewritten in a Night

Trans. — May 1, 1908

Mr. Tardieu, the Parisian journalist, who lectured at Harvard last winter, and who is now writing his impressions of American life in his newspaper, Le Temps, certainly saw and heard strange things at our Symphony Concerts. He writes a paragraph or two about them in one of his recent letters, and the reader here in Boston may easily wonder whether he really attended a Symphony Concert, and, if not, where and how he received so much misinformation concerning them. American writers make strange discoveries in France, and

303
French writers apparently are as fortunate—or as unfortunate—in America. Mr. Tardieu, for example, has seen several hundred listeners standing at each Symphony Concert—a sight vouchsafed only to his eyes in recent years on the Saturday nights (that he carefully specifies) in Symphony Hall. He further reports that seats at the Symphony Concerts—"or at least some of them"—are not particularly costly—a statement that is true of the second balcony on Friday afternoons, but that hardly holds of all the other places, alike at the afternoon and the evening concerts, when the premiums of the auctions are added to the fixed prices.

Then, after a sentence about Dr. Muck, as a "well-known German kapellmeister"—tritest of adjectives and title for a conductor who has been distinguished in Europe for a dozen years—the observant and discriminating Tardieu passes to the programmes. Presumably he examined them with care, since he flatly affirms that they are "severe and heavy." Mr. Tardieu is clearly entitled to his opinion, but he quickly leaves that safe ground for what he seems to believe are facts. The programmes, it seems, move in cycles; there are "Beethoven evenings," for example, and "Wagner evenings" with "more Wagner than Beethoven." Like the "standees" of Saturday nights, these "Beethoven evenings" are known exclusively to Mr. Tardieu; and the programme books of the Symphony Orchestra have shamelessly omitted all record of them. The only discoverable "Wagner evening" is the Pension Fund concert of last February, when Dr. Muck made a "Wagner programme," as Mr. Colonne and Mr. Chevillard do—and three or four times in a season—in Paris. And there is "more Wagner than Beethoven"! Exactly four pieces by Wagner—the "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyl," the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and the "Kaisermarch" have stood on the programmes of the regular Symphony Concerts in the two years in which Dr. Muck has been the conductor of the orchestra, and a chief grievance of those who resent his programmes has been his "neglect of Wagner." As for Beethoven, Dr. Muck has played eight of his nine symphonies, at least four of his overtures and two of his concertos.

Even now the discovering Tardieu is not content. "German music," it seems, "enjoys a monopoly with Dr. Muck." It does, indeed, as in the striking instances of Debussy, d'Indy, Franck, Lalo, Bizet, Tchaikovsky, Glazounoff, Smetana, Sibelius, Lindberg, Grieg, MacDowell, Loeffler and Chadwick. Then, to cap the climax, "Dr. Muck hardly practises the policy of the open door" in his programmes. Yet he has opened it so wide that a considerable part of his public has been complaining bitterly for months past of the excess of new pieces in the Symphony Concerts, and the mere figures of the record exceed those of any other conductor, in the whole existence of the Symphony Orchestra, for a similar length of time. Mr. Colonne, Mr. Chevillard and Mr.

Many are able and energetic conductors in Paris; they sprinkle their programmes with new pieces in the course of a year; but they keep no such "open door" to the music of all the schools as has Dr. Muck. We have run over their programmes of the current season as carefully we hope as Mr. Tardieu examined those of the Symphony Orchestra. The number of those new pieces, with each of the three Parisian orchestras, is less than that which our orchestra either under Dr. Muck or in the later years of Mr. Gericke has regularly played. Moreover, French composers have by far the largest share of these new pieces on the Parisian programmes. Here in Boston, for four years past, the door has been open—to keep Mr. Tardieu's figure—to the new music of the world.

Dr. Muck is rather the fashion, thinks Mr. Tardieu, and the "ovations that he receives"—ovations seems a very large word—are partly the conventional thing. Yet he is good enough to admit that one of the ablest and best-esteemed conductors of our time has "fine and nervous" qualities that justify his success, and that one of the finest orchestras in the world is accurate, but a little cold. We poor innocents in Boston have fancied otherwise, especially in the two years of Dr. Muck's leadership; some of us have even heard Parisians, who go oftener to concerts, perhaps, than does the busy Mr. Tardieu, praise its animation beside the indifference and routine of their own orchestras; but we are notoriously a complaisant folk, and as Mr. Tardieu remarks—not less complaisantly—musical taste is not yet as cultivated in the United States as it is in other countries. However, he is good enough to believe that three thousand "snobs" do not go every week to Symphony Hall to applaud music that wearies them; that fashion would not suffice to assemble such numerous and attentive audiences; that the musical taste of Boston is "already" secure; and that, here as elsewhere in America, it will gradually form itself. We have "enlightened amateurs" to help the process, but we have not—it is greatly to fear—such an "enlightened" observer as Mr. Tardieu.

H. T. P.

From / / + / / A Cambridge Concert

The public of the Symphony Concerts in Boston go not to the shorter series in Cambridge. Twenty-four concerts here from October even to May may reasonably suffice it; the programmes in Sanders Theatre usually repeat pieces that have already been played in Symphony Hall and that are oftener classic than new and strange; while the "soloists" of Cambridge are the minor incidents that theoretically they ought to be, though practically they are not, of the concerts in Boston. A smaller orchestra goes to Cambridge than that which weekly fills the stage of Symphony Hall, but the picked men of the band compose it, and its fifty or sixty players sound as no ninety may sound at home. As some say, who believe the acoustics of an auditorium are a happy—or an unhappy—accident, over-much science was applied to Symphony Hall with not altogether fortunate results. At the least, Sanders Theatre is an amphitheatre and not a long, rectangular tunnel. It has walls and a roof of wood and not of that "modern fire-proof construction," which is better for safety, perhaps, than for sound. Above all, its smaller dimensions and its circular shape bring audience and orchestra into pleasant and unusual intimacy. Last Thursday, for example, Mr. Wendling happened to play a violin concerto by Mozart—music written for a small room and a small orchestra. In Symphony Hall, with the parts doubled and with all the accepted devices to make such music "sound," it would have seemed pale and thin. In Sanders Theatre it kept its brightness and crispness, its suavity and elegance. The little felicities of figure and ornament in the music came clear and warm to the ear; Mr. Wendling could play the violin part without a thought of forcing; and the accompanying orchestra could keep an agreeable lightness of tone. Most eighteenth century music sounds inflated and over-emphasized in Symphony Hall, and loses thereby something of its animation and transparency. In the finer acoustics and the closer intimacy of Sanders Theatre, it holds its true qualities and distinctions. Even as small an orchestra as Mozart or Haydn often used could play there persuasively.

And the moderns, the opulent, ardent, incisive and clamorous moderns, gain no less. Another "number" of the concert of Thursday happened to be Tschalkovski's "Pathetic" symphony—music that would "sound" anywhere and that at every turn is familiar. None the less in the clearer and finer acoustics of the auditorium in Cambridge and in the closeness of band and listeners the ear and the imagination caught a store of details that hitherto had passed clouded or unheeded. What the textbooks call the inner voices of the instrumental ensemble were clearer. The melodies themselves stood out more sharply and warmly against the harmonic background. Passages of transition had a new aptness. The finer shadings of tone in the virtuosi of the band were more appreciable. In particular every dramatic stroke of the composer and the conductor told on the instant. Once in the regular concerts of last season and once in a Pension Fund concert of this year Dr. Muck has conducted in the "Pathetic" symphony, and there is little need to recall the dramatizing intensity of the performance. Symphonic music though it is, the dramatic quality is uppermost, and the whole is more truly an emotional and a spiritual tragedy in tones than many an avowed music-drama. It is theatrical music, too, music that "tells" with its hearers swiftly and surely. This dramatic, even this theatrical, quality Dr. Muck has emphasized, until he has been almost the operatic conductor again. And in the acoustics and the intimacy of Sanders Theatre he could fairly smite his audience with Tschalkovski's blows or catch them up into the course and passion of the tragedy in tones. Symphony Hall, it seems, may tame even a Russian.

Moreover, these Cambridge concerts have an atmosphere of their own. Here in Boston the Symphony Concerts come and go plentifully in the weekly routine of the musical year. In Cambridge they come at intervals of a month or of six weeks, and they have more the air of an event and even of festivity. The audience—of Cambridge in general rather than of the University in particular—is pleased with itself, with the occasion, with its momentary sense of proprietorship in the orchestra. The other night, at the end of the concert, it recalled Dr. Muck again and again, lingered for him, even waved handkerchiefs at him, quite as though he were departing for good and all and not going back to Boston for five more concerts. Perhaps, however, it was returning the second of the two compliments the conductor has paid it. Eighteen months ago, when Dr. Muck conducted for the first time in Cambridge, he put three symphonies on his programme. Some of his advisers took alarm. "Where should I play three symphonies, if not at a University?" answered the conductor, and by all accounts his audience enjoyed them. With his leave-taking he paid the University his second compliment—the performance of an overture that one of the students in its own department of music had written. No less than with the three symphonies, and as quietly, Dr. Muck waived custom and precedent, and young Mr. Davison heard his "Hero and Leander" at the hands of an orchestra and a conductor that established composers might have envied. With a classic symphony or a modern tone-poem Dr. Muck could not have taken more pains. He made Mr. Davison's sea-music "sound"; he heightened the tumult of his plausible orchestral storm and he set the broken song of the lovers clear against it. With still finer sympathy he slipped over the occasional redundancies of the music; the momentary laxities of form and clumsiness of means; and whenever the young composer had contrived an ingenious or imaginative instrumental stroke, the conductor made it clear and sure. The music "sounded" for itself—and it is the music of a student of talent who needs widening experience and keener self-criticism—and more, but Dr. Muck would have it that the applause was all for the piece and the composer, and not for the performance and the conductor. There has been no more amiable and characteristic incident in all his stay.

H. T. P.

MR. PADEREWSKI AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Trans. May 7, 1908
The Pianist to Return Next Winter for the Performance of His New Symphony or, Possibly, of a New Concerto—Dr. Muck's Departure and a Clear Statement as to the Possibilities of His Return—The "Soloists" at the Symphony Concerts Next Year—ETRA II

Before Mr. Paderewski left New York on Tuesday, on his return to Europe he made a tentative agreement with the management of the Symphony Orchestra to return to Boston for a brief visit next winter. Then he expects to have fully and finally completed the revision of the symphony, which he has long had in hand. It will be played for the first time, from the manuscript score, at a pair of Symphony Concerts here, and subsequently in New York and, perhaps, in other cities that the orchestra visits. At the same concerts Mr. Paderewski will appear as a pianist and according to his final words on the pier, as his ship was sailing, he expects to have finished a new concerto of his own in time for his visit to America next winter. Thus, if present anticipations are fulfilled, we are likely to hear in the next series of Symphony Concerts a new symphony or a new concerto by Mr. Paderewski, and possibly both, with the pianist himself come to hear the one and play the other. He will remain only a short time in America, and the present plans for his visit do not contemplate any recitals.

Dr. Muck is going from Boston to New York today, and next Tuesday he sails from the latter city on his way to Germany to take up his work again as a conductor of opera at Berlin and at Baireuth. To repeat once more an authoritative statement as to the possibilities of his return to Boston as the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra for a long term; There is no arrangement whatever for the future between Dr. Muck and the management of the orchestra. The management, like the public of the Symphony Concerts here and elsewhere, would be glad to have Dr. Muck as the conductor of the orchestra again. He himself, as his present feelings are, is willing to return to the post, which he has liked more and more as he has continued in it. But, as he himself has also said to his friends here: "The matter is not in his hands." Dr. Muck is under contract to the Royal Opera at Berlin as one of its conductors. That theatre, for several years to come, has full right to his services, and it is an old story that the emperor and his court, the management and the public hold him in very high esteem. What the future may hold as to this contract, what it may bring after the contract has expired, neither Dr. Muck nor the management of the Symphony Orchestra, nor any one else, can now know or even safely conjecture. Long ago Dr. Muck acquired the comfortable wisdom that takes life and the day's work as they come.

For the time, therefore, the orchestra is Mr. Fiedler's, and he enters upon his work at the beginning of next October. Except in the return of Mr. Hess as concert master and in a successor to Mr. Czerwonky at the first desk of the violins, the personnel of the orchestra will be virtually the same as it has been in the season now ended. Next year, moreover, the management will continue its present policy as to "assisting artists," and the more assuredly as the experience of the past two seasons has justified it. The "soloists" will be singers or virtuosi of high rank, and the object in the engagement of them will be quality and not numbers. Presumably the singers will come from opera houses, and the pianists and the violinists from the visiting virtuosi whom next season promises in plenty.

The Final Symphony Concerts and the Last Choral Concert of the Year

Trans. Apr. 25, 1908

With the final pair of Symphony Concerts for the current season, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Symphony Hall, Dr. Muck will make his last appearances as the conductor of the orchestra. He has chosen, moreover, to repeat the programme with which he began his work in October of 1906 here in Boston. It begins with Beethoven's fifth symphony and then traverses Wagner's "Faust" overture, his "Siegfried Idyl," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Thus Dr. Muck will take leave of his public in a classic masterpiece, a romantic overture, a little tone-poem, and a warm operatic prelude, and in the music of the Beethoven and the Wagner whom he cherishes. Evidently, with the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" for ending, he intends a cheerful farewell.

For the general public, outside the particular audiences of the Symphony Concerts, Dr. Muck conducts for the last time at the exceptional concert that the orchestra will give on Monday evening, at 8.15, in Symphony Hall for the Chelsea Relief Fund. Again, Beethoven and Wagner in familiar music will make the larger part of his programme—Beethoven with the third "Leonore" overture and the "Emperor" concerto, and Wagner with the overture to "Tannhäuser." The fourth number is French, Chabrier's orchestral rhapsody "España," a riot of vivid rhythms and instrumental coloring that has twice stirred the audiences of the regular Symphony Concerts. In the concerto, and for his last appearance in America this year, Harold Bauer will play the solo part. No city in America received him more warmly than has

Boston, and he was quick to offer his services when "benefits" for Chelsea were afoot. The men of the Symphony Orchestra were as prompt with theirs; every expense of the concert will be paid by those who have arranged it; and the receipts to the last penny will go to the relief fund.

SYMPHONY BATON IS TO GO TO MAX FIEDLER

Famous Hamburg Director to Succeed Dr. Muck as Conductor. Recommended by the Doctor. Is Favorably Known in America.

Journal Nov. 5, 1908

Max Fiedler of Hamburg has been named to succeed Dr. Karl Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. This announcement was made by the management of the orchestra yesterday and has been received with general satisfaction. Mr. Fiedler was recommended to the Boston men by Dr. Muck himself, and as soon as it was positively learned that the leave of absence of the present conductor—granted by Emperor William—could not be further extended, negotiations were commenced. Mr. Fiedler is looked upon as one of the leading conductors of Germany and was a student with Dr. Muck at Leipzig Conservatory.

Mr. Fiedler was born in Zittau, Dec. 31, 1859, and his whole life has been devoted to music. His first lessons on the piano were given to him by his father, Karl August Fiedler, a music teacher in Zittau, and he studied theory and organ playing under G. Albrecht. Since 1882 he has been in the faculty of the famous Hamburg Conservatory, and since 1905 he has been its director. Since 1894 he has been the conductor of the Hamburg Orchestra concerts and one of the principal conductors of the Hamburg Opera. As "guest conductor" he has appeared in Berlin, St. Petersburg, London, Paris and New York. In the last-named city he conducted the Philharmonic Society, and of the various conductors brought to America by this society none seems to have made a more favorable impression on the musical public of New York.

NEW SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR

Max Fiedler of Hamburg, Who Will Next Season Succeed Dr. Muck. He Was a Fellow-Student with the Latter Who Strongly Recommended Him.

MAX FIEDLER TO SUCCEED DR. MUCK

Hamburg Conductor Engaged to Head Symphony Orchestra Next

308
phony orchestra announced yesterday that arrangements have been completed whereby Max Fiedler of Hamburg becomes the conductor of the orchestra next season.

As soon as it was decided that Dr. Muck could not get further leave of absence from Berlin, negotiations were begun with Mr. Fiedler, who ranks among the leading conductors of Germany, and was highly recommended by Dr. Muck himself as his successor. Dr. Muck knows him well, as they were students together in the Leipsic Conservatory.

Mr. Fiedler was born in Zittau, Dec. 31, 1859, and his whole life has been devoted to music. Before he became conductor he was one of the leading pianists of Germany, and he ranks high as a composer. His first lessons on the piano were given to him by his father, Karl August Fiedler, a music teacher in Zittau, and he studied theory and organ playing under G. Albrecht. From 1877 to 1880 he was a pupil at the Leipsic Conservatory on the Holstein foundation.

Conductor of Hamburg Opera.

Since 1882 he has been in the faculty of the famous Hamburg Conservatory and since 1903 he has been its director. During these years he did considerable work as a pianist, but most of his time has been given to teaching and conducting. Since 1894 he has been the conductor of the Hamburg orchestra concerts, and he has served as conductor at the Hamburg Opera House. As "guest conductor" he has appeared in Berlin, St. Petersburg, London, Paris and New York.

In the last named city he conducted the Philharmonic Society on Dec. 15 and 16, 1905, and of the various conductors brought to America by this society none seems to have made a more favorable impression on the musical public of New York. His compositions include a symphony in D minor, which was produced in Hamburg in 1886, a quintet for piano and strings, a string quartet, songs, piano pieces, etc.

Inspires His Men.

Mr. Fiedler is said to have authority as a disciplinarian and also an emotional nature that inspires his men and vitalizes the works performed. He is catholic in his taste; he respects the masters of the past, and he is deeply interested in contemporaneous tendencies and movements. He is a warm admirer of Richard Strauss, but he is not a partisan in the obnoxious meaning of that word.

When he visited New York to conduct two concerts of the Philharmonic Society his programme was as follows: Prelude to "The Mastersingers," Strauss' "Don Juan," Beethoven's symphony in C minor. The choice of a symphony by Beethoven was not, perhaps, wholly his own, inasmuch as the concerts were commemorative of Beethoven's birthday.

Mr. Fiedler's distinguishing characteristic as a conductor is said to be his power of suggestion, which he exercises quietly on the orchestra.

A PERSONAL IMPRESSION OF MAX FIEDLER

How the New Chief of the Symphony Orchestra Conducted in London Last Summer—His Physical Traits and the Qualities of His Conducting—Two New Germans Whom Boston Is to Hear in April Make Their First Appearance in America—The Passing of the Auditorium in Chicago—A Bit of London Travesty—Concerts to Come and Notes of the Local Theatres—Bronson Howard Writes a New Play

Max Fiedler of the Philharmonic Society at Hamburg, who will succeed Dr. Muck at the head of the Symphony Orchestra next year, is the oldest conductor who has yet come freshly to the post. He will be nearly at the end of his fiftieth year when he begins work next autumn. Unlike any of his predecessors, except Mr. Paur, he has had a considerable career and reputation as a concert pianist in Germany before he passed to conducting, fifteen years ago. Unlike all of them, except Mr. Gericke, he has written music in his time, a symphony, and sundry compositions for string quartet and the piano, but happily neither in Hamburg nor in his visits to other cities, has he shown any eagerness to bring them to performance. Like all of his predecessors, except Dr. Muck, he was educated as a musician, he has lived the life of a practising musician, and he has few interests outside his calling. Again, unlike Dr. Muck and Mr. Gericke, his experience has been that of a conductor of orchestral concerts rather than of opera; while like them—to complete the parallel—he comes to Boston as a man high in the second rank rather than in the very first rank of his calling. Weingartner or Nikisch, Mottl or Mahler—to name the four most distinguished "international" conductors—could hardly be persuaded now to our orchestra. Their engagements in the opera house or in other concerts, the price that they set upon themselves, and the conditions they would impose upon their work are all alike in the way. The recourse of our orchestra is to conductors of less widespread note and exalted notions, but of little less ability and individuality. Such a choice was Mr. Gericke and such in a measure was Dr. Muck. How fully each, and the latter in particular, has justified it is an old story. So in every city in which Mr. Fiedler has appeared, and notably in New York two years, he has much excelled preliminary expectation.

Mr. Fiedler, moreover—and beyond Mr. Gericke or Dr. Muck when they came to Boston—has his reputation as an "international" conductor. For ten years he pursued his work in Hamburg. Then the worth of it began to make him known in other German cities, and he conducted on occasion in them. Next it brought him opportunities at Madrid, Rome and Amsterdam; last summer he appeared for the first times in London and to such acceptance that he returned thither last autumn. It was in one of these concerts in England last May that the Transcript's reviewer happened to see and to hear Mr. Fiedler and to receive an impression, that is still clear, of the man and his conducting. To the eye the conductor was a middle-aged German, rather heavily built, rather loosely jointed and distinctly of large physical authority. A big head rose from broad shoulders, and above the high forehead a brush of iron-gray hair, à la Pompadour, crowned it. His eyes looked brightly out of big, round German spectacles. His nose was strong and full, but a bristling gray mustache hid the mouth and left only a hint of the vigorous chin. Mr. Fiedler does not look the Herr Professor, who happens strangely to be leading an orchestra, as does Mr. Mottl. Nor yet does Mr. Fiedler recall the carriage of a middle-aged German official as did Mr. Gericke. There is a suggestion in his bearing of both, but still more of a man of vigorous physical strength and alert and even fiery spirit. That afternoon at the Queen's Hall he was conducting with the London Symphony Orchestra for the first time. The band was new to him and he to the band. He had had, moreover, to change his programme at the last minute. Perhaps all these circumstances compelled him to a vehemence of gesture, movement and physical emphasis of his intentions with the players that is not usual with him. Certainly he conducted at the two Philharmonic concerts that he led in New York in the winter of 1905-06 with far less bodily effort than he seemed to find necessary in London. His beat and his gestures were then clear and expressive; unmistakably they carried his will to his men; but they had a nervous energy that here in Boston (if Mr. Fiedler continues to practice it) will be a new thing after Mr. Gericke and Dr. Muck's relatively sober conducting. Alike in London and in New York he quickly discovered the traits and temper of his orchestra and put them in effective play. His men felt him. Imperious and nervous will were in him.

The conductor's programme, when he came to New York comprised Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan," and Beethoven's fifth symphony in C minor. In London the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" also stood upon his list along with Brahms's first symphony in C minor and the third "Leonore" overture of Beethoven. The symphony, however, was a hasty substitute for Strauss's "Heldenleben." It was then said in London—how truly it is impossible to know—that Mr. Fiedler was warmly inclined to ultra-modern music of many schools and that he sought and played eagerly. The Beethoven and the Brahms of the two programmes quoted suggest no less due loyalty and liking for the classics, and certainly in Germany Mr. Fiedler has the reputation of a broad-minded and "all-round" conductor who cultivates no "specialty" but duly diversified and fairly wide-ranging programmes. Before long we hope to give our readers some examples of his programmes in Hamburg, where he could choose more freely than in either London or New York.

309

In his conducting in both cities, Mr. Fiedler seemed steadily to seek warmth, beauty and euphony of tone, so that by these tokens we in Boston need have no fear for the standards in such respects of our orchestra. Not once in London was the tone of the band harsh, rough, or careless. Nowhere, however, did the beauty, balance and precision of the tone lessen its vitality or its expressive quality. There was the eager and vivid life in it that Dr. Muck has taught us to expect. In Mr. Fiedler himself was a kindred union of traits. His reading of Brahms's symphony, for example, was altogether clear and straightforward. He sought no finicking or disturbing "novelties" of pace or phrase whereby certain conductors would prove their "individuality." Yet, as clearly, he had thoroughly analyzed the music, in his own preparation for it, and discovered and grasped its substance and spirit. Thus prepared, he was ready to bring it to life, and passionate life, in performance. No less understanding, power and imagination shone in his conducting of the "Leonore" and the "Meistersinger" overtures. In both an ardent, dramatizing but ordered temperament was in commanding play. Contrasts and climaxes told, the music went sweepingly and glowingly forward; and yet throughout it kept its salient traits. Here was clearly a conductor of intellectual penetration and grasp on the one hand, and of vigor and passion on the other; above all a conductor who could characterize his music—each piece in its kind. It is such a success or that Dr. Muck has taught us to expect. H. T. P.

E to "Leonore" No. 1.

loist:

MANN-HEINK.

DR. MUCK IN REVIEW

HIS TWO YEARS OF WORK IN BOSTON

Trans. May 2, 1908.
The Symphony Orchestra as He Received It and the Symphony Orchestra as He Leaves It—The New and Vital Qualities That He Has Infused Into Its Playing—Their Source in the Man Himself—His Distinguishing Qualities of Mind and Temperament—The Standards He Has Set for Himself and the Artistic Honor and Conscience With Which He Has Followed Them—The Broadening Influence Upon Dr. Muck of His Work Here—The Memory That He Leaves His Public

Mr. Gericke left the Symphony Orchestra a perfect instrument; Dr. Muck has given the instrument a living voice. On its technical side, in the widest and the finest—the idealizing—sense of the words, the Symphony Orchestra was, and is, the work of Mr. Gericke's hands. Year after year, in his long service as its conductor, he trained it to the unanimity of attack, the precision of accent, the balance, euphony and beauty of tone, the smoothness and adroitness of phrasing, the sensitiveness to rhythm, the surety and the elegance of utterance, that gradually became its distinguishing and lasting qualities. A band can hardly play more beautifully than did the orchestra in the last years of Mr. Gericke's régime. It passed so to Dr. Muck, and in the two years in which he has been its conductor there has been no lessening of these virtues. There were occasions, in the transitional time, while the orchestra was learning to know its new conductor and he, no less, was sounding it, when these traits seemed to be clouded or even waning. Long before the end of Dr. Muck's first year in Boston they were clear and strong again, and it was no less plain that he cherished them equally with his predecessor. Then by many of the changes that he made in the personnel of the band last autumn he still further strengthened them. From the beginning Dr. Muck has permitted his men a freedom of means and method that they knew not under Mr. Gericke; he has left them as individuals more to themselves; he has never nagged them with his insistence; but the results that he has demanded were essentially the same. The very ends that he would accomplish—the living voice that he would gain—depended on the perfection of the instrument. Again, the orchestra is to pass to a new conductor and again it passes fully clothed with its technical virtues. More: each and all of these virtues has been heightened by the new vi-lality that now underlies and animates them.

Towards the end of Mr. Gericke's conductorship, and in the last year in particular of his work here, he had brought the orchestra to the technical ideal that he had sought. He had, then, only to safeguard it and to use all the excellences that it implied towards a larger eloquence, a warmer feeling and a more intense utterance. Steadily, in his final series of concerts, he heightened and amplified the expressive quality of the band, and there were memorable performances—still easy to recall after two years—of Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," for example, of Tchaikovsky's "Francesca," of Schubert's, Schumann's and Franck's symphonies. Then, at exactly the psychological moment, Dr. Muck succeeded him. Practically Dr. Muck had made his career as an operatic conductor. That career had given him an acute sense of the effect to be gained, of the dramatic quality that stirs in most music, of the necessity that each and every piece shall "sound" and so communicate its own substance, emotion, and peculiar eloquence. In the opera house, the conductor must strike fire, and Dr. Muck had no sooner succeeded to our orchestra than he began to strike fire from it. He made its precision and unanimity more alert; its command of rhythm and of accent more nervous; he warmed and deepened its phrasing; he stirred its elegance into brilliance. Its surety in all things remained, but he made it a bolder and more spontaneous surety. The beauty of its performance was no less; but thereto he added a new power. The results, continuing through the two years of his conductorship, have been a larger, richer and more varied eloquence in the playing of the orchestra; a new ability to characterize with its peculiar traits the music in hand; a new poignancy and intensity of musical speech; a new vividness of impression and a new thrill of answering emotion in us that listened. The orchestra has been more alive, sensitive, dramatic and expressive than it had been before. It has gained a nervous temperament; it has become more emotional; it steadily strikes fire. By the magic that is the secret of a conductor's power over his men, Dr. Muck has remade his band in his own image. Mr. Gericke left it as perfect a technical medium as a human thing can well be. Dr. Muck leaves it as perfect an expressive means.

Dr. Muck has conceived himself no less than his orchestra as a means of expression. One sort of conductor invites his hearers to receive his impressions of the music that he chooses, to listen to Mozart or Beethoven, Tchaikovsky or d'Indy, after they have passed through his temperament. He plays upon his men as some pianists play upon their instruments, in order that the orchestra may express himself quite as much as the composer whose name stands upon the programme. These are the "temperamental," the "interpretative" conductors. Those of another sort regard themselves as only means to an end—and that end is the clearest and fullest communication of the contents of the music in hand as the composer wrought and felt it. These conductors approach a given piece, be it a simple symphony by Haydn or an intricate tone-poem by Strauss, with an eye single to its peculiar traits. They apprehend its structure, assimilate its substance, penetrate its moods, assort and adjust its details to its underlying or dominating musical and poetic content, discover its peculiar traits, accent and eloquence, and then to their utmost seek to communicate all these things to their hearers. They differentiate each piece that they undertake from all the rest. They give to each its individual voice. Dr. Muck has been such a conductor. In his tempi, his accentuation, his phrasing, his rhythm, his contrasts and climaxes, he has sought only the substance, the spirit, the peculiar life of the music as it came from the composer's hand. His personal distinction has been to be impersonal before his music, but not impersonal in the negative sense. Rather, he has had as many personalities as there have been composers and pieces on his programmes. He has made himself and his orchestra the eloquent and the characterizing voice of each. No conductor of our band has seemed to have so few limitations of sympathetic understanding and answering emotion.

312

The secret of this discrimination, this truly interpretative quality, this self-subordination lies, perhaps, in the qualities of Dr. Muck as a man as well as a musician. His work has proved him, as his friends know him to be, a man of strong and fine intellect, of alert, nervous and sensitive mind. He was schooled in the liberal studies; he knows other arts than the one that he practises; he has lived in the world of cultivated men and not merely in the world of makers of music; he looks upon life shrewdly and humorously. He has the penetrating, discriminating and ordering mind that springs from mental organization and mental training. He understands before he feels, and the breadth and the fineness of his understanding he has proved from Bach through the composers of our own particular place and hour. Mental qualities alone make only a dry conductor. He must have emotional understanding and responsiveness as well. On this score, again as his work has proved him and as his friends know him to be, Dr. Muck is no less finely strung. His is the alert, sensitive, nervous spirit that enters into the moods and the emotions of the symphony, the tone-poem, or the concert piece before him, and that seizes and reflects them vividly and vitally. As he has proved time and again, he is sensitive alike to the varied poetry, the varied drama, the whole range of the expressive quality of music. He has kept it an emotional speech. Such a union of mental and emotional qualities do not in themselves round a conductor. He must add to them the intrinsically musical qualities—the feeling for beauty and poignancy of tone, for musical design and form and ornament, for the underlying and characterizing melody, for the songful utterance, for the charm and the power of ordered sound. Dr. Muck has had no less this purely musical sensitiveness. He is the man of intellect, the man of feeling, who has found the conducting of music the normal and instinctive outlet for these qualities. His mental, emotional and musical traits have been so poised in him that he has been at once the most intellectual, dramatic and songful, thus far, of our conductors.

Such a man and musician naturally brought high standards and large open-mindedness to the task that he undertook here. From the beginning to the end he has concentrated himself upon his work. He has trusted to no happy "inspiration" in the performance of new music and none of his predecessors has played so much new music in two seasons as has he. To every piece of it, he has given the closest of study so that he could bring it to performance with the utmost clearness of understanding and imagination. He has studied and restudied music already familiar to him, and no conductor hitherto has marked the parts that stand before the men so fully and minutely as has he. By day and by night he has pursued these and similar tasks—routine tasks indeed—and in the face of twenty opportunities for more amusing and stimulating occupation. He has been insistent that his men should work as diligently and unreservedly as he; he has scrutinized them closely; he has held them to an exacting standard. But he has never "nagged" nor driven, irritated nor exhausted them. He has stimulated them to his own eagerness and buoyancy of spirit, been quick to praise and won and kept them liking. He has required the best that was in them, as he in turn, gave the best that was in him to them and to his audiences. He has kept the discipline of the orchestra, but he has treated it as a body of men, and not as so many levers and wheels in a musical machine. The new vitality in its playing has not been the least of the rewards of this wisdom. Dr. Muck has been no less mindful of his obligation to his audiences. They have the just right to expect the utmost within a conductor's power, but they can neither know nor consider the chance and hampering circumstance, the moment when the flesh and the spirit alike falter, when the vein and the mood will not come. Dr. Muck, like all highly-strung men, has had these besetting and dulling moments. He has oftenest conquered them and he has never spared himself.

Whether Dr. Muck has made his programmes wisely, whether he has put too much new and strange music upon them are matters that it is useless to debate now. In both he has acted according to his understanding, and with the highest of standards. He believes in the unified programme—the programme that has a consistent and continuing character. He likes the classic grouping of overture, concerto and symphony. He does not believe that the music of the opera house, though Wagner himself may have written it, should have much place in the concert-room. He has little liking for the short and fragmentary orchestral piece. He has made his programmes accordingly. His listeners have liked or disliked them, as inclination prompted. The conductor, meantime, has gone his way, justly confident that whatever their shortcomings, they were in accord with the purpose and the quality of the Symphony Concerts. Early he discovered that catholicity had been one of the distinguishing qualities of the programmes in the last years of Mr. Gericke's conductorship. Precedent and expectation, he found, asked no less catholicity of him and thereafter he steadily kept to it.

It is the high standard that Dr. Muck has set for himself and for his audiences that at bottom prompted him to the playing of so many new pieces, especially in the second year of his conductorship. He gave the classics, ancient and modern, their due place and—what is better—set them as living things therein; vital with the qualities that have made them classics and not exhibits in a musical museum. He conceived it, no less, to be the duty of the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra to keep its public informed of the music that living composers of all schools were writing at the moment. He regarded it as a duty he owed to the art and to the progress of music to bring such new pieces to hearing. He believed it incumbent on the Symphony Orchestra, with its established prestige and its ample resources, so to encourage these composers. His own personal taste for the music that he so chose, his own opinion of it, he altogether waived. He was fulfilling, as he rightly believed, an obligation to his position and his public when he brought this new French, German and American music to performance. His fine honor, his scrupulous conscience as an artist bade him choose and hold to the course that he has followed. So convinced, there was for him no other way.

Dr. Muck came to Boston an eminent conductor, leaving for the time one of the distinguished positions of Germany. He came to a no less distinguished position in its kind in America. He returns to Berlin a still more eminent conductor, and, by many a token, of riper, warmer and finer powers. The Dr. Muck whom we in Boston knew first in the autumn of 1906 is not altogether the Dr. Muck who conducts for the last time here, so far as present signs go, tonight. It is in the second year of his service that he has carried our orchestra farthest in its new eloquence, fire and brilliance, and that he has most clearly disclosed the qualities that have individualized him among our conductors, under the quickening of his mind and spirit by new conditions and new opportunities. For his first season here he was a German conductor, borrowed from Berlin, to practise his art in a Boston of which he knew little. For the second season he has been the broader-minded and quicker-spirited, more sympathetic and understanding conductor of the Boston Orchestra, who happens now to be returning to Germany. Dr. Muck's reputation was European when he came; it is international when he goes, and it is a reputation based upon no other thing than the fulness of his achievements and the fineness of his standards. The tall, spare figure, the sharply cut features, the bright, clear eyes, the firm chin, with their mingled suggestion of mental keenness, sensitive feeling and aristocratic poise; the alert and concentrated air; the quiet incisiveness and the clear authority of tense gesture; the absorption in the task in hand and the sincere self-subordination in all things will linger long in the recollection of the audiences of the Symphony Concerts, and in their image of the man and the conductor they will recall his signal traits.

313

H. T. P.

DR. MUCK'S PROGRAMMES

EXPLANATION, COMPARISON AND DEFENCE

No Innovation in the Number of New Pieces That He Has Put Upon Them—The Two-Fold Taste, Desires and Pleasures of the Public of the Symphony Concerts—The Necessity of New and Ultra-Modern Music at Them—The Fulness with Which Dr. Muck Has Done His Duty to the Classics—The Duty That He Has Equally Discharged to New and to Bold Pieces—The Peril of Stagnation in Routine—The More Generous Position of the Partisans of the New Music

Trans. — Apr. 18, 1908
 Of the making of programmes for orchestral concerts there is no end, and debate and dispute over them are as endless. Fifteen months ago a part of the public of the Symphony Concerts was complaining that Dr. Muck was too conservative, and that he put too little ultra-modern and novel music on his programmes. Of late another part of that same public has been repining under the number of new pieces that have stood upon his lists. Fact and figure count for little when individual tastes and prejudices are in play; but the record, none the less, remains—that Dr. Muck in the two years which he has spent in Boston has held the numerical balance almost exactly even between the accepted classics, ancient and modern, and untried, neglected, or novel pieces. The aggrieved, again, have been fond of asserting that Dr. Muck has chosen far more new pieces than Mr. Gericke, for example, "ever dreamed" of picking. As a mere matter of count, Dr. Muck has performed forty-three compositions new to Boston in the past two seasons. In the last two years of Mr. Gericke's conductorship he performed thirty-eight or five less than Dr. Muck has ventured—a trifling discrepancy due probably as much to chance circumstance as to any deliberate "conservatism." Some of the more ill-tempered and presuming disputants—of the sort that have intruded their reproaches even into the privacy of Dr. Muck's life—have charged him with "cramping his new music down the throats of his audiences," because he happened to repeat in the same season Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," Debussy's "Sea-Pieces" or Bischoff's striking symphony. Yet those quiet records note two performances of a new symphony by Mahler in the last year of Mr. Gericke's conductorship, and two of César Franck's symphony in the preceding season. (The custom, by the way, of the repetition of important new pieces is as old as Mr. Paur's time when he played Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony twice in a single winter). The truth is that unless the dispute starts from the premise that much more than half the music played at the Symphony Concerts in a single year should be familiar pieces, classic or modern, the advantage of facts and figures is clearly on Dr. Muck's side and on the side of those that uphold him.

Unfortunately, cool and comparative records have counted far less in the discussion of Dr. Muck's programmes than personal likings, prejudices and impressions. The extreme partisans of the older classics, even those who will go contentedly as far as Wagner or Tchaikovsky—but no farther—cannot see how the rest of us can find keen pleasure and emotion in the hearing of Strauss or Reger, Debussy or d'Indy. Yet the fact remains that a considerable part of the public of the Symphony Concerts does find such pleasure frankly and honestly. The partisans of the old boast of their departures from the hall before some of these newer pieces (which they do not hesitate to judge by reputation if not by hearing) are played. Yet listeners have been known to forsake the concerts because they were weary of Haydn and found no detaining pleasure in Mozart. There are those who listen to Brahms as to obscure and rasping music as well as those who find Mr. Loeffler misty and irritating. All these moods are primarily individual idiosyncrasies or personal prejudices; but of the two factions the partisans of the moderns are much the more generous. If their opponents are to be taken at their somewhat vague and swelling words, they would gladly banish ultra-modern and new music altogether from the Symphony Concerts. The converse purpose has never entered the minds, it is safe to say, of the other side. They love the classics; they hear them gladly and with no less pleasure than they draw from the music of their own immediate time; they heed even the minor classics wherein the giants nodded; and they would not abate the place that established music has always had, and always will have, in the scheme of our concerts. Cheerfully they will agree that it is one of the chief duties of our orchestra and our conductors to keep the classics, elder and younger, steadily before the ears of their audiences in as perfect and life-giving performance as is possible. It is the other side that will not agree that the orchestra, its conductors and its public have an equal duty toward the music of their own generation.

What would we say of a public or a private library that excluded the newer books or the books that departed from accepted literary traditions? What should we think of readers who clamored that they should be so excluded or who reproached the librarian that had put them on his shelves? What would be our instinctive estimate of the literary breadth of view or curiosity of those who declined to open them? Suppose the picture galleries, that were not private possessions to gratify individual tastes, declined all the pictures of our own time, and suppose that visitors refused to look at such pictures or looked at them with disdainful eyes. Now, music is only one of the arts; it has the same privilege to change and growth, innovation and variety as the others. Once upon a time the idiom of George Meredith's novels was as strange and subtle in its kind as the musical idiom of the new Frenchmen. Not so long ago the style of Henry James was as puzzling as that of Reger. Yet some of those who read Meredith gladly and James understandingly would crib and confine the sister are of music. There are those in plenty to whom impressionist or characterizing pictures give no pleasure, which of course is a personal matter. Yet they do not contend that all such pictures should be packed away in the nearest cellar. Give them, however, the musical impressionism of Debussy or the musical characterization of Strauss, and they wonder resentfully why such pieces should be played. Most of us who read at all like to divide our reading between the old and the new. Most of us who look at pictures at all like to see both the old and the new. Why, then in the ancient and honorable name of common-sense, should so many of us resent the mingling of the old and the new in the music that we hear, and particularly in the music of the Symphony Concerts?

The Symphony Orchestra exists to maintain and to foster the art of music, and its active and directing agent in such work is its conductor. From the beginning his discretion and will have been absolute in the choice and arrangement of his programmes, and probably they always will be. It is the incumbent duty of any conductor to bring the elder classics to frequent performance. It is his duty no less to repeat the pieces that have established themselves in the last twenty-five years in the orchestral repertory until they have become the younger classics. Dr. Muck cannot be fairly

Hall.

1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 26, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

SCHUMANN,	OVERTURE to "Genoveva," op. 81.
BRAHMS,	CONCERTO in D major, for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA, op. 77.
MENDELSSOHN,	SYMPHONY No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch." op. 56.

Soloist:

Mr. CARL WENDLING.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 6, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

RUBIN GOLDMARK. OVERTURE, "Hiawatha."

BEETHOVEN. CONCERTO for VIOLIN.

RICHARD STRAUSS, "Till Eulenspiegel."

BRAHMS, SYMPHONY No. 2.

Soloist:

Professor WILLY HESS.

WORKS PERFORMED AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS DURING THE SEASON OF 1907-1908.

Works marked with a double asterisk were performed for the first time in Boston.
Works marked with an asterisk were performed for the first time at these concerts.
Works marked with a dagger were performed for the first time anywhere.
Artists marked with an asterisk appeared at these concerts for the first time.
Artists marked with a double asterisk appeared for the first time in Boston.
Artists marked with a dagger are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

	PAGE
D'ALBERT: Overture to the Opera, "The Improvisatore," April 18, 1908	1686
D'AMBROSIO: Concerto in B minor for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 29  (RICHARD CZERWONKY † ), December 21, 1907	659
BACH, C. P. E.: Symphony in E-flat major, No. 2,  April 11, 1908	1574
BACH, J. S.: Suite in D major, No. 3, for Orchestra, October 12, 1907	7
Toccata in D minor * for Organ (Peters edition, vol. iv., No. 4) (WALLACE GOODRICH), December 28, 1907	731
BALAKIREFF: Symphony in C major,  March 14, 1908	1351
BEETHOVEN: Symphony in C major, No. 1, Op. 21, April 18, 1908	1639
Symphony in D major, No. 2, Op. 36, November 30, 1907	528
Symphony in B-flat major, No. 4, Op. 60, January 18, 1908,	938
Symphony in C minor, No. 5, Op. 67, May 2, 1908	1783
Symphony in F major, No. 6, "Pastoral," Op. 68, October 12, 1907	50
Overture to "Leonore" No. 1, Op. 138, November 2, 1907	287
Overture to "Coriolanus," Op. 62, April 11, 1908	1609
BERLIOZ: Overture to the Opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," Op. 23, March 28, 1908	1465
BISCHOFF: Symphony in E major, Op. 16,  January 4, 1908, February 29, 1908	815, 1254
BIZET: Dramatic Overture, "Patrie," C minor, Op. 19, December 14, 1907	567
BOEHM: "Taormina," Tone Poem, Op. 9,  November 30, 1907,	483
BOSSI, E.: "Goldonian Intermezzi," Op. 127,  December 21, 1907	660
BRAHMS: Symphony in D major, No. 2, Op. 73, November 16, 1907	366
Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Op. 98, March 28, 1908	1423
Concerto in D major for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 77 (CARL WENDLING † ), October 26, 1907	174
BRUCKNER: Symphony in D minor, No. 9 (Unfinished), November 2, 1907	239
CHABRIER: "España," Rhapsody for Orchestra, November 23, 1907	438
Overture to the Opera "Gwendoline," March 14, 1908	1386
CHADWICK: Symphonic Sketches: Suite for Orchestra, * February 8, 1908	1051
CHAUSSON: Symphonic Poem, "Viviane," Op. 5, January 25, 1908	1014
CONVERSE: "Jeanne d'Arc," Dramatic Scenes for Orchestra, Op. 23, * March 7, 1908	1279

DOHNÁNYI: Concert-piece in D major for Orchestra, with Violoncello Obligato, Op. 12  (HEINRICH WARNKE †), February 29, 1908	1222
DVOŘÁK: Overture, "Carnival," Op. 92, January 4, 1908	865
ERTEL: "The Midnight Review," Symphonic Poem for Full Orchestra, after the Poem of Ch. von Zedlitz, Op. 16, April 18, 1908	1652
FRANCK: Symphonic Piece  from the Poem-symphony, "The Redemption," December 28, 1907	768
GLUCK: Aria, "I have lost my Eurydice," from "Orpheus and Eurydice" (JEANNE GERVILLE-RÉACHE *), February 8, 1908. (The recitative announced on the title-page of programme book of February 8 was not sung)	1059
GOLDMARK: Overture, "In the Spring," Op. 36, February 8, 1908,	1096
GÖTZ: Symphony in F major, Op. 9, December 14, 1907	614
HADLEY: Symphony No. 3, in B minor, Op. 60, April 11, 1908,	1614
HANDEL: Concerto in F major for Strings and Two Wind Orchestras (edition of Gustav F. Kogel), December 28, 1907	740
HAYDN: Symphony in G major, "The Surprise" (B. & H., No. 6), January 18, 1908	895
HINTON: Concerto in D minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 24  (KATHARINE GOODSON), March 7, 1908	1306
HUMPERDINCK: Overture to the Opera, "The Forced Marriage,"  December 21, 1907	651
D'INDY: "Wallenstein," Trilogy, after the Dramatic Poem of Schiller, Op. 12, October 19, 1907	83
"Summer Day on the Mountain,"  Op. 61, April 25, 1908,	1755
LALO: Overture to the Opera, "The King of Is," November 23, 1907	403
"Spanish" Rhapsody for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 21 (FRITZ KREISLER), November 30, 1907	491
LISZT: Concerto in E-flat major, No. 1, for Pianoforte and Orchestra (OLGA SAMAROFF), April 4, 1908	1527
Concerto in A major, No. 2, for Pianoforte and Orchestra (RUDOLPH GANZ), October 19, 1907	114
LOEFFLER: "Pagan Poem" (after Virgil), Op. 14, for Orchestra, Pianoforte, English Horn, and Three Trumpets Obligati, † November 23, 1907, March 14, 1908	416, 1376
MACDOWELL: Suite in A minor, Op. 42, December 14, 1907	584
Suite in E minor, No. 2, "Indian," Op. 48, March 7, 1908	1316
Concerto No. 2, in D minor, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 23 (TERESA CARREÑO), January 4, 1908	824
MENDELSSOHN: Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch," Op. 56, October 26, 1907	196
Overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage," Op. 27, April 25, 1908	1711
MOÓR: Pianoforte Concerto with Orchestral Accompaniment, Op. 57 (HAROLD BAUER), April 18, 1908	1666
MOZART: Symphony in D major (K. 504), December 21, 1907	698
Symphony in G minor (K. 550), October 12, 1907	26
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," April 11, 1908	1567
Three German Dances (K. 605), January 18, 1908	904

PFITZNER: Overture to "The Little Christ Elf," a Christmas Fairy Tale by Ilse von Stach, Op. 20, November 16, 1907	319
REGER: Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme of J. A. Hiller (1770), Op. 100, February 14, 1908	1131
REZNICEK: Adagio and Scherzo-finale from Symphonic Suite in E minor, November 23, 1907	434
RHEINBERGER: Concerto in F major for Organ, Three Horns, and Strings, Op. 137 * (WALLACE GOODRICH), December 28, 1907	763
RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF: Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34, February 15, 1908	1159
RUBINSTEIN: Concerto in D minor, No. 4, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 70 (IGNAZ PADEREWSKI), November 16, 1907	334
SAINT-SAËNS: Aria, "My Heart at thy Dear Voice," from "Samson and Delilah" (JEANNE GERVILLE-RÉACHE*), February 8, 1908	1068
SCHELLING: Fantastic Suite for Pianoforte and Orchestra  (ERNEST SCHELLING), January 25, 1908	988
SCHJELDERUP: "Summer Night on the Fiord," February 15, 1908	1150
"Sunrise over the Himalaya," from Stage Music to Gjellerup's "Opferfeuer," February 15, 1908	1150
SCHUBERT: Symphony in B-flat major, No. 5, April 25, 1908	1716
"The Young Nun" (accompaniment orchestrated * by Liszt) (ERNESTINE SCHUMANN-HEINK), November 2, 1907	271
"Death and the Maiden" (accompaniment orchestrated  by Mottl) (Mme. SCHUMANN-HEINK), November 2, 1907	275
"The Erlking" (accompaniment orchestrated * by Berlioz) (Mme. SCHUMANN-HEINK), November 2, 1907	276
SCHUMANN, R.: Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81, October 26, 1907	163
Overture to Byron's "Manfred," Op. 115, February 29, 1908	1207
STRAUSS, R.: "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28, January 25, 1908	975
STRUBE†: Two Symphonic Poems for Orchestra and Viola Solo, "Longing," Fantastic Dance, † March 28, 1908	1451
TSCHAIKOWSKY: Symphony No. 5, in E minor, Op. 64, April 4, 1908	1539
WAGNER: A "Faust" Overture, May 2, 1908	1792
Prelude to "The Mastersingers," May 2, 1908	1815
"A Siegfried Idyl," May 2, 1908	1810
The Emperor's March, October 19, 1907	133
WOLF: Symphonic Poem, "Penthesilea," after the Like-named Tragedy of Heinrich von Kleist, April 4, 1908	1495

SUMMARY.

D'ALBERT	1	HINTON	1
D'AMBROSIO	1	HUMPERDINCK	1
BACH, C. P. E.	1	D'INDY	2
BACH, J. S.	2	LALO	2
BALAKIREFF	1	LISZT	2
BEETHOVEN	7	LOEFFLER	†2
BERLIOZ	1	MACDOWELL	3
BISCHOFF	*2	MENDELSSOHN	2
BIZET	1	MOÓR	1
BOEHE	1	MOZART	4
BOSSI	1	PFITZNER	1
BRAHMS	3	REGER	1
BRUCKNER	1	REZNICEK	1
CHABRIER	2	RHEINBERGER	1
CHADWICK	1	RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF	1
CHAUSSON	1	RUBINSTEIN	1
CONVERSE	1	SAINT-SAËNS	1
DOHNÁNYI	1	SCHELLING	1
DVOŘÁK	1	SCHJELDERUP	1
ERTEL	1	SCHUBERT	4
FRANCK	1	SCHUMANN	2
GLUCK	1	STRAUSS	1
GOLDMARK	1	STRUBE	2
GÖTZ	1	TSCHAIKOWSKY	1
HADLEY	1	WAGNER	4
HANDEL	1	WOLF	1
HAYDN	1		82

* Bischoff's symphony was played twice.
† Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" was played twice.

WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME IN BOSTON.
SYMPHONIES.

BACH, C. P. E.: Symphony in E-flat major, No. 2, April 11, 1908.
BALAKIREFF: Symphony in C major, March 14, 1908.	2
BISCHOFF: Symphony in E major, Op. 16, January 4, 1908.
HADLEY: Symphony No. 3, in B minor, Op. 60, April 11, 1908.	2

SYMPHONIC POEMS, ETC.

BOEHE: "Taormina," Tone Poem, Op. 9, November 30, 1907.
ERTEL: "The Midnight Review," Symphonic Poem, Op. 16, April 18, 1908.
FRANCK: Symphonic Piece from the Poem Symphony, "The Redemption," December 28, 1907.
D'INDY: "Wallenstein," Trilogy, Op. 12, October 19, 1907.
"Summer Day on the Mountain," Op. 61, April 25, 1908.
LOEFFLER: "Pagan Poem," November 23, 1907.
SCHJELDERUP: "Summer Night on the Fiord," February 15, 1908.
STRUBE: Fantastic Dance, March 28, 1908	8

SUITES, VARIATIONS, ETC.

BOSSI: Goldonian Intermezzi, Op. 127, December 21, 1907.
HANDEL: Concerto in F major for Strings and Two Wind Orchestras, as arranged and edited by G. F. Kogel, December 28, 1907.

REGER: Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme of J. A. Hiller, Op. 100, February 14, 1908.
REZNICEK: Adagio and Scherzo-finale from Symphonic Suite in E minor, November 23, 1907.
RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF: Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34, February 15, 1908.
SCHJELDERUP: "Sunrise over the Himalaya," from Stage Music to Gjellerup's "Opferfeuer," February 15, 1908	6

OVERTURES AND PRELUDES.

HUMPERDINCK: Overture to "The Forced Marriage," December 21, 1907.
PFITZNER: Overture to "The Little Christ Elf," November 16, 1907.	2

CONCERTOS.

D'AMBROSIO: Concerto in B minor for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 29 (RICHARD CZERWONKY†), December 21, 1907.
DOHNÁNYI: Concert-piece in D major for Orchestra with Violoncello Obbligato, Op. 12 (HEINRICH WARNKE†), February 29, 1908.
HINTON: Concerto in D minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 24 (KATHARINE GOODSON), March 7, 1908.
MOÓR: Pianoforte Concerto with Orchestral Accompaniment, Op. 57 (HAROLD BAUER), April 18, 1908.
SCHELLING: Fantastic Suite for Pianoforte and Orchestra (ERNEST SCHELLING), January 25, 1908.	5

MISCELLANEOUS.

MOZART: Three German Dances (K. 605), January 18, 1908	1
	26

THE FOLLOWING ARTISTS HAVE APPEARED THIS SEASON.

	PAGE
Mr. HAROLD BAUER, Pianist, April 18, 1908, Moór's Concerto, Op. 57  (Sketch)	1664
Mme. TERESA CARREÑO, Pianist, January 4, 1908, MacDowell's Concerto No. 2, in D minor (Sketch)	822
Mr. RICHARD CZERWONKY,†  Violinist, December 21, 1907, D'Ambrosio's Concerto in B minor, Op. 29  (Sketch),	658
Mr. RUDOLPH GANZ, Pianist, October 19, 1907, Liszt's Concerto in A major, No. 2 (Sketch)	113
Miss JEANNE GERVILLE-RÉACHE,* Contralto, February 8, 1908, "I have lost my Eurydice," from Gluck's "Orpheus and Eurydice"; "My Heart at thy Dear Voice," from Saint-Saëns's "Samson and Delilah" (Sketch)	1058
Mr. WALLACE GOODRICH, Organist, December 28, 1907, Bach's Toccata in D minor (Peters edition, vol. iv., No. 4); Rheinberger's Concerto in F major for Organ, Three Horns, and Strings, Op. 137 (Sketch)	762
Mme. KATHARINE GOODSON, Pianist, March 7, 1908, Hinton's Concerto in D minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 24  (Sketch)	1305
Mr. FRITZ KREISLER, Violinist, November 30, 1907, Lalo's Spanish Rhapsody for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 21 (Sketch)	490

Mme., 844; Göhringer, F., 282; Grassini, J., 844; Grisi, C., 1092; Hamaekers, B., 848; Kilitzky, J., 51; Krebs, M., 334; Laborde, R., 1058; Lalo, Mme., 405; Libussa, 1517 et seq.; Mainvielle-Fodor, 1750; Marguerite (wife of Henry IV. of France), 920; Mars, Mme., 844; Mehlig-Falk, A., 114; Menter, S., 1531; Mercy-Argenteau, 1180; Milder, A., 50; Nilsson, C., 1095; Patti, A., 832 et seq.; Saal, Miss, 1639; Scathach, 1520; Schneider, H., 862; Schröter, C., 276; Scio, J., 291; Silly, L., 859; Stephens, C., 1743; Tautin, L., 858; Topp, A., 1527; Tree, A. M., 1750; Vaucorbeil, Mme., 405; Vestvali, F., 1064; Wagner, Cosima, 1810; Wagner, Rosalie, 1794; Wood, Mrs. John, 1001.

MUSICAL AND POETIC FORMS: Alborada, 1159; Burlesca, 684; Carol, 442; Complainte, 163; Continuo, 9; Noël, 1053; Minuet and scherzo, 702; Parties, 7; Overture (early), 9; Programme music (early), 55; H. Bischoff on programme music, 817; Singspiel, 1144; Suite, 7; Symphony as follower of suite, 701; Toccata, 734.

DANCES: Bourrée, 15; Chaconne, 1442 et seq.; Davis, poem on Dancing, 676; Deutsche, 914; Fandango, 446, 1162; Flamenco, 446; Galliard, 666; Gavotte, 10; Gigue, 16; Jota Aragonesa, 439; Malagueña, 446; Minuet, 662; Musette, 682; Passacaglia, 1442 et seq.; De Quincey on the dance, 924; Reel, 922; Siciliana, 744; Vienna, dancing in 1786, 27, 910; Volte, 919; Waltz, 917 et seq.

INSTRUMENTS: Bagpipe, 207; Bassoon, double, 758; Cymbals (ancient), 418; Drum, 1324, 1681; Horn (post), 904; Horns (Beethoven's), 1683; Indian pipes and whistles, 1328; Musette, 682; Oboe in Bach's time, 24; Ophicleide, 1467, 1682; Sistrum, 1531; Theorbo, 753; Triangle, 1530 et seq.; Trumpet in Bach and Handel's time, 20, 746; Violetta marina, 753.

SONGS AND HYMNS: "All Coons look Alike," 1078; "Ave, Maris Stella," 485; "Bill Simmons," 1083; Browning, Galuppi's toccata, 739; Christy minstrel sentimental songs, 1075; "Color'd Fancy Ball," 1077; Daniel, poem on sorcery by wax images, 429, 1386; Davis, poem on dancing, 676; "Dixie," 994; "Enjoy Yourselves," 1080; "Gilligan's on a Tear again," 1082; Goethe's "Meeres Stille" and Glückliche Fahrt, 1711; "Gwine ober de Mountain," 1077; W. J. Henderson's "Schubert," 1730; "I'm Living Easy," 1080; "I owe Ten Dollars to O'Grady," 1080; "Jasper," 1083; "Jim Crow," 1076; W. L. Johnson's "Longing," 1452, and Fantastic Dance, 1455; "Little Johnny Dugan," 1082; Mackail's translation of Virgil's Eighth Eclogue, 418; "Miss Julia Tanner," 1076; "O'Hoolahan," 1083; "Old Folks at Home," 1003; Saint-Ibald, recommendation to waltzers, 922; Saint-Saëns's sonnet on "Djami-leh," 582; Thackeray's "Red Flag," 1713; "Veni, Creator Spiritus," 1281; Villemarqué, "Submersion de la Ville d'Is," 411; Virgil, excerpts from Eighth Eclogue, 418; Wagner's Dedication of the Siegfried Idyl, 1811; Wagner's "Heil dem Kaiser," 134; "When you ain't got no Money," 1079; "Who dat say Chicken?" 1080; "Yankee Doodle," 1009; Yeats's "Little Isle of Innis-free," 1006; Zedlitz's "Midnight Review," 1652, 1663.

THEATRE AND OPERA HOUSE: "Der arme Heinrich," 322 et seq.; "Angelo, Tyran de Padoue," 1687; "Ascanio," Saint-Saëns's, 1466; Benvenuto Cellini, operas, 1473; Bizet, unfinished operas, 502; Coriolanus, operas, 1612; "The Devil to pay," 1144; "La Flamenca," Lambert's, 446; Geneviève de Brabant, operas, 168 et seq.; "King Lear," 1370; "Manfred" as stage play, 1216; "Mariage de Figaro," Beaumarchais's, 1569; "Namouna," Lalo's, 502; "La Navarraise," Massenet's, 444; Opera, Hazlitt on, 1739; "Patrie," opera and play, 574; "Penthesilea," Kleist's, 1495; "Les Petits Riens," Mozart, 14; Riccio, operas, 196; Singspiel, origin of, 1144; "Song of Solomon," stage play, 1438; "Taming of the Shrew," Götz, 619; "Trip to Japan in Sixteen Minutes" (perfume concerts), 1440.

LEGENDS AND HISTORY: Amazonian women, 1098; "Der arme Heinrich," 322; Erlking, 276; Geneviève de Brabant, 163; Hobgoblin, 1054; Iram, the city, 414; Is, the City, 408; Libussa, 1519; Merlin and Vivien, 1016 et seq.; Penthesilea, 1506; Puck, 1054; Tamara, 1368; Till Eulenspiegel, 977, 984; Tour de Nesle, 410.

1442; Bruneau on Chabrier, 453; Burney on Handel's trumpets, 22, on C. P. E. Bach, 1580; Burton, R. F., on Amazons, 1514; Campion, Major, Spanish dance, 440; Celler, gavotte, 12, volte, 919; Chase, F. E., "The Devil to pay," 1144; Chorley on "Benvenuto Cellini," 1472; Churchill, J., on Coleridge's "Wallenstein," 85; Colombani on Beethoven's First Symphony, 1646; Compan on chaconne, 1448; Converse on stage music, 1282; Cossmann on Pfitzner, 328; Czerwinski on dances, 14, 439, 1449, 1450; Delvau on the musette, 683; Desrat on dances, 18, 447, 921, 1451; Dubor on Libussa, 1517; Dumas's libretto for Rossini, 511; Elson, L. C., 1009, 1713; Fertiault on gavotte, 14; Fletcher on Indian music, 1329; Ford, R., on the Jota, 440; Francee, A., on Jeanne d'Arc, 1284, on symbolists, 1432; Francke, Dr., on Kleist's "Penthesilea," 1497; Gerstner on Götz's "Taming of the Shrew," 619; Ghil, colored words, 1432, 1436; De Gourmont on "Ave, Maris Stella," 485; Gozlan, color suggestions, 1436; Grimm on Beaumarchais's "Mariage de Figaro," 1569; Grove, Mrs., on dances, 446; Hanslick, Brahms's Second Symphony, 367; Hardy, T., sorcery with wax images, 428, 1385; Harris, H. W., analysis of Bruckner's Ninth Symphony, 241, translation of Wolf's "Penthesilea" argument, 1500; Heywood on Penthesilea, 1510; Hruby's "Bruckner," 263; Huysmans, color gustation, 1436; Imbert, d'Indy's "Wallenstein," 85, Brahms's Second Symphony, 369; D'Indy, Franck's "Redemption," 772 et seq.; Johnson's Dictionary, galliard, 668; Kastner, chaconne, etc., 678, 680, 1450; Kelly, dancing in Vienna, 27, 910; Kelterborn, reminiscences of Götz, 615; Klatte, analysis of Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," 977; Kobbé, "Dixie," 997, "Yankee Doodle," 1011; Kufferath, analysis of Prelude to "The Mastersingers," 1816; Loliée, singing women of Second Empire, 837 et seq.; Lumley, colored voices, 126; Mace, dances, 676; Macleod, Fiona, Amazonian women, 1520; Marnold, Rimsky-Korsakoff, 1181; Mattheson, dances, 10, 15, 1447; Matthews, A., "Yankee Doodle," 1009 et seq.; May, Brahms's Second Symphony, 371; Melville, horror of color white, 1434; Morley, dances, 677; Naylor, dances and suite form, 678; Newman, Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, 1546; Newmarch, Mrs., Balakireff, 1362; Oxford English Dictionary, galliard, 670, chaconne, 1451; Parry, C. P. E. Bach, 1575, Schubert, 1730; Pudor, Rimsky-Korsakoff, 1181; De Quincey, splendor of dancing, 924; Reichardt, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, 52, 1783; Reimann, Brahms's Fourth Symphony, 1428; Rimbaud, colored vowels, 1432; Rossetti, "Sister Helen" and sorcery, 1384; Rousseau, chaconne, 1448; Rowbotham, Indian music, 1329; Runciman, Mozart, 29, Schubert, 1735; Schoelcher, defence of Handel, 757; Sonneck, early concerts and musicians in America, 176, 344, "Yankee Doodle," 1009; Tabourot, dances, 673, 675; Tschaikowsky, Balakireff, 1358; Turgenev on Balakireff, 1095; Vuillier, dances, 18, 439, 442, 447, 1451; Wagner, Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture, 1610; Walther, dances, 677, 684, 1445; Weckerlin, chaconne, 1450; Weingartner, Bruckner, 269; White, R. G., on certain singers, 842, 1064; Wilder, Chabrier, 448; Williams, F. H., poetic characterization of instruments, 1434; Zabel, Rubinstein, 341.

MISCELLANEOUS: Biscayan amusements, 1450; Carnival, 865; Curfew, 679; Liszt's hands, 343.

SUNDRY NOTES.

Mr. Carl Wendling, concert-master, conducted the nineteenth and twentieth public rehearsals and concerts; Hadley's symphony, performed at the twenty-first; and Moór's pianoforte concerto, performed at the twenty-second. Dr. Muck's right arm was temporarily disabled.

Mr. Gustav Strube conducted the performance of his two symphonic poems, March 28, 1908.

The concerts in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place on December 29, 1907, and on February 9, 1908, in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. The programme of the first was as follows: Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 6, Op. 74; Beethoven, Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat major, Op. 73 (Mr. Paderewski, pianist). The programme of the second was as follows: Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; Prelude to "Lohengrin"; Overture to "Tannhäuser"; Erda's scene from "Rheingold" and Waltraute's scene from "Dusk of the Gods" (Mme. Schumann-Heink, singer); Funeral Music from "Dusk of the Gods"; Prelude to "Parsifal."

The orchestra gave a concert in Symphony Hall, April 27, 1908, in aid of the Chelsea Relief Fund. Dr. Muck conducted. The programme was as follows: Beethoven, Overture, "Leonore" No. 3; Beethoven, Concerto in E-flat major, No. 5, for pianoforte (Mr. Harold Bauer, pianist); Chabrier, "España"; Wagner, Overture to "Tannhäuser."

ERRATA.

Date of first performance of d'Indy's "Wallenstein" Trilogy in New York, given on p. 83 as December 10, 1888, changed on p. 217 to December 1, 1888.

Correction of date of performance in Boston of Brahms's Violin Concerto at a Symphony Concert by Mr. Heermann "(November 25, 1906)" to November 25, 1905 (pp. 174 and 293). For "Alfred Tagliapietra" (p. 824) read Arthur Tagliapietra.

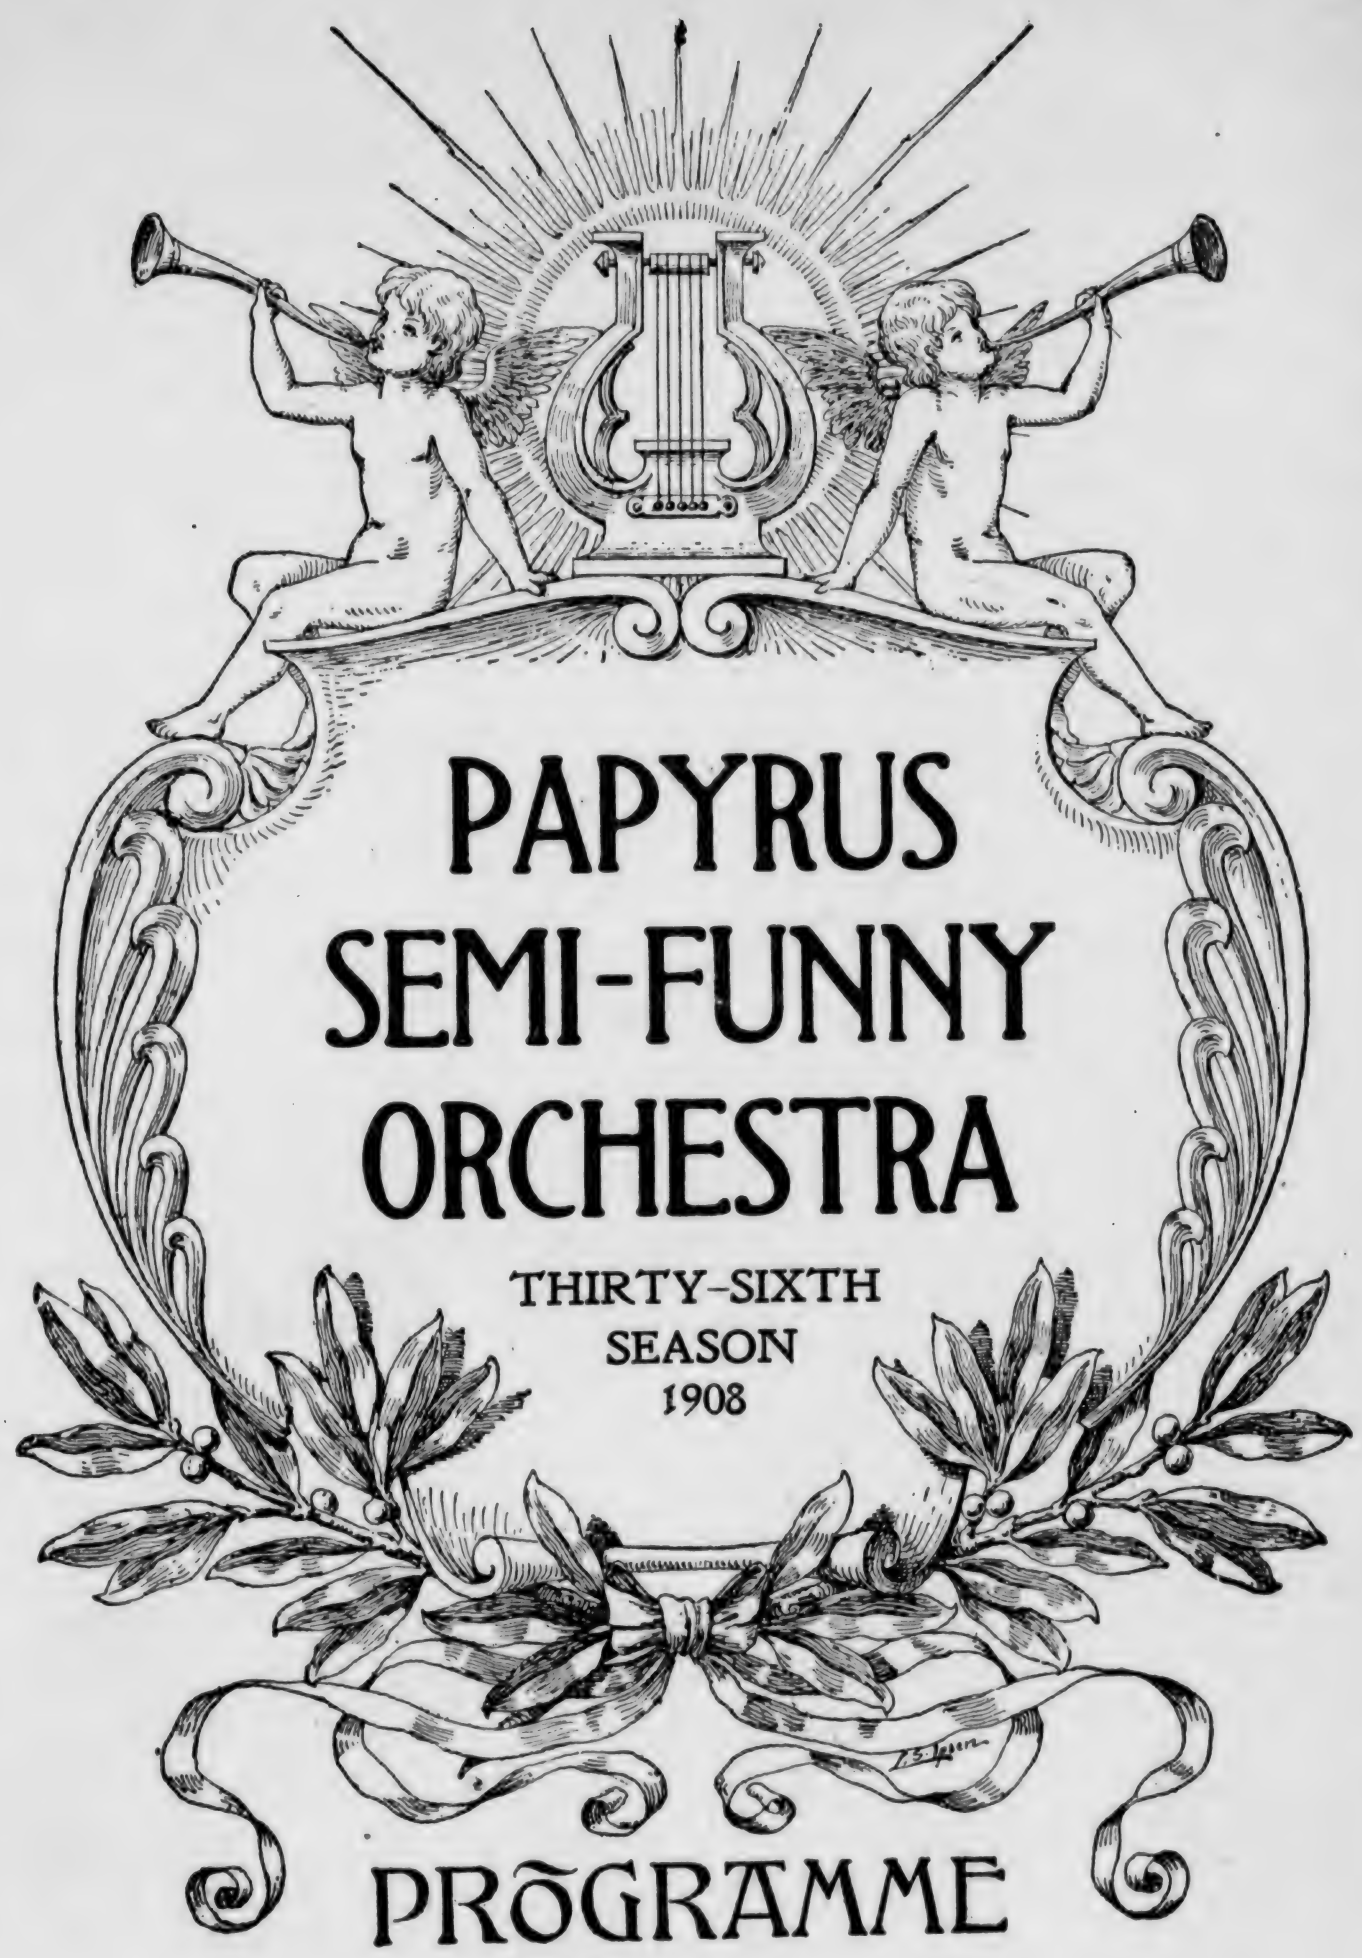

The dog Hylax barked (not "basked") in Virgil's Eighth Eclogue (pp. 420, 1378, 1475).

ADDENDA.

Add a performance of d'Indy's pianoforte quartet at an Eaton-Hadley concert, January 23, 1905, to the list of performances of d'Indy's works in Boston on p. 105.

Add cymbals to the list of instruments in Hadley's symphony given on p. 1615.

Compliments of Charles Warner

PAPYRUS SEMI-FUNNY
ORCHESTRA

THIRTY-SIXTH
SEASON
1908

PRŌGRAMME

Frederic S. Adverse

THE DISTINGUISHED AMERICAN COMPOSITOR

writes as follows concerning the

Chickson and Hamway PIANOS

CHICKSON & HAMWAY CO.

Gentlemen,—It gives me great pleasure to tell you that I consider your pianos equalled only by all the other fifty-seven varieties now being produced to-day. Their quality is equal to the best Munich beer. They respond readily whenever I call to them. They have an exceptionally powerful flavor, and no piano could have a more pleasant disposition. In fact, the Chickson & Hamway Piano is a literary conception which need fear no Boston Herald criticism.

Very untruly yours,

F. S. ADVERSE.

CHICKSON & HAMWAY COMPANY

140 PROVINCE COURT, BOSTON, MASS.

YOUNG'S HOTEL, BOSTON

THIRTY-SIXTH SEASON, 1908

Papyrus Semi-funny Orchestra

MR. CHARLES WARREN, Conductor

Programme of the Second Rehearsal and Concert

WITH HISTORICAL AND DESCRIPTIVE
NOTES BY FILLUP HELL

WEDNESDAY EVENING, APRIL 1

AT 7 O'CLOCK

PUBLISHED BY THE CLUB, ITS OWN MANAGER

Frederic S. Adverse

THE DISTINGUISHED AMERICAN COMPOSITOR

writes as follows concerning the

Chickson and Hamway PIANOS

CHICKSON & HAMWAY CO.

Gentlemen,—It gives me great pleasure to tell you that I consider your pianos equalled only by all the other fifty-seven varieties now being produced to-day. Their quality is equal to the best Munich beer. They respond readily whenever I call to them. They have an exceptionally powerful flavor, and no piano could have a more pleasant disposition. In fact, the Chickson & Hamway Piano is a literary conception which need fear no Boston Herald criticism.

Very untruly yours,

F. S. ADVERSE.

CHICKSON & HAMWAY COMPANY

140 PROVINCE COURT, BOSTON, MASS.

YOUNG'S HOTEL, BOSTON

THIRTY-SIXTH SEASON, 1908

Papyrus Semi-funny Orchestra

MR. CHARLES WARREN, Conductor

Programme of the Second Rehearsal and Concert

WITH HISTORICAL AND DESCRIPTIVE
NOTES BY FILLUP HELL

WEDNESDAY EVENING, APRIL 1
AT 7 O'CLOCK

PUBLISHED BY THE CLUB, ITS OWN MANAGER

THE WEB-FOOT-ER PIANO

used and indorsed by T. Roosevelt, Joseph Smith, Madame Winteroff, H.de Parkman, May Irwin, Emil Schwab, T. Russell Sullivan, and many other noted artists, will be used by

MARY BIER-GARTEN

during her tour of the United States this season. The Web-foot-er piano is particularly renowned for its pedals, and has been hit recently by the bâton of the following famous conductors:—

RAIN CONDUCTOR.

CAR CONDUCTOR.

ELECTRICAL CONDUCTOR.

MAIN CONDUCTOR.

STREET CAR CONDUCTOR.

CONDUCTOR GENERALIS.

REPRESENTED BY

A. SHAMMER COMPANY

KNEELAND STREET, BOSTON.

THIRTY-SIXTH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED and EIGHT

Second Rehearsal and Concert

WEDNESDAY EVENING, APRIL 1, at 7 o'clock

PROGRAMME

Wagner-Fox . . . Overture to "Bridget Maguire in Heaven or Hell," Op. 4-II-44.

1,317,825th time at these concerts

Chadwick Symphony Pathétique in Q-sharp, "Greet the Old Man with a Smile," for Voice, Piano, Orchestra (if present), and (very) Full Chorus, Op. 1.
First time in the World

I. "Introductory Apostrophe to Wives": Moderato mamma non troppo.

II. Andante vivace: "Further Advice to Wives."

III. Scherzo affectuoso flapjackoso: tempo di valse, "Still more Advice to Wives."

IV. Finale, "Apotheosis of the Bar-keeper and Final Advice to Wives":
Con Spirito (frumenti); Presto Prestissimo; Largo; Grand Slambargo; The End of Everything.

Handel Wasser-Musik. [By request this composition will be omitted as inappropriate, and the Stein
Song by Bullard substituted.]

SOLO

[A select selection to be selected.]

Newcomb-Macy . . . Dramatic Intermezzo and Vocalistical Étude,
"Nancy," in C major and C minor, Op. 23.
(An Alexander P. Browne study)

SOLO

[A chaste choice to be chosen.]

Brahms-Koren . . . Latin Cantata, "Papyrus," in A, B, C, D, E, F, G-flat, Op. 100.

MORE SOLOS

[Ad libitum.]

Beethoven-Hopkins, Vocal Sweet, in H(igginson) major, Op. 000.
"Ach du lieber Higginson Symphony Orchestra."

SOLOISTS

Herr A. B.

Monsieur C. D.

Mr. E. F.

Signor M. N.

Dr. P. Q.

Señor X. Y.

The Henry L. Mason-Thomas T. Baldwin Pianoforte.*

There will be an intermission of one hour after each solo, in order to allow time for warrants for disturbing the peace to be sworn out.

The doors of the hall will be opened during the performance of each number of the programme. Those who wish to leave before the beginning of the concert may do so upon payment of the regular fee.

*The sum of $51.27 is due the Club Treasurer for this advertisement.

The

HENRY F. STEINRING

Piano

Bears a name which has become unknown to purchasers as representing the least possible value produced in the piano industry. It has been associated with all that is lowest and worst in piano making since B.C. 4003. Its name is the Tammany Hall mark of piano worthlessness, and is a guarantee to the purchaser that in the instrument bearing it is incorporated (in New Jersey) the lowest inartistic cheapness possible.

STEINRING & SONS

Pianoforte Unmakers

Established B.C. 4003

1234 Dover Street
South Boston.

OVERTURE TO "BRIDGET MAGUIRE IN HEAVEN OR HELL," Op. 4-11-44.

THOMAS WAGNER-FOX

(Place and year of birth of composer unknown; now living at the St. Botolph Club, Boston, Mass.)

"A lady named Bridget Maguire
Had trouble in lighting the fire,
The wood being green,
She employed kerosene.
Now she's gone where the fuel is higher. } dryer." }

Mr. Wagner-Fox composed this notable opera in a moment of absent-minded delirium. It received its first performance in Boston at the Howard Athenæum. The overture has been performed at these concerts in the years 1890 to 1908, inclusive and exclusive. The score has been revised and reviled by all the members of the club. It is now scored for two flutes (one interchangeable with piccolo), two oboes (one interchangeable with English horn), two clarinets, two bassoons, a double-bassoon, four horns, two trumpets (interchangeable with two cornets-à-pistons), three trombones, bass tuba, kettle-drums, snare-drum, bass-drum, cymbals, triangle, glockenspiel, celesta, bells, harp, and strings, organ and pianola.

Mr. Wagner-Fox furnishes the following analysis intended for this programme book:—

Line I. introduces the chief character of this tragic drama, and presents the light-hearted idyllic atmosphere of the kitchen before the subsequent complications arose. The downward progression of the strings signifies the fact that the scene is laid downstairs in the basement.

Line II. The tumultuous arpeggios by the double basses denote the rising trouble, the fuscid notes of the muted English horns forewarn the impending tragedy, while the flickering of the faint and disappearing fire is shown by a motiv outlined in quivering sostenuto by the oboes assisted by the tubas.

Lines III. and IV. A brief suggestion of the old Irish folk-song "Wearing of the Green," in the running accompaniment of the kettle-drums and flutes, here signifies the dampness of the wood, while the mellifluous strains of the triangle, violas d'amour, and bassoon usher in the approach of the Standard Oil and its intended application.

Line V. A cadenza by the full orchestra from the lowest C below the scale to the highest G above the scale denotes the sudden flight of the heroine. Strains of the hand-organ, celesta, and jews'-harp, announce her approach to celestial regions. The Erde motiv suddenly ceases, showing that earthly concerns no longer concern her. Then follows a tragic climax of the Fire motiv, and a sudden return to the pathetic simplicity of the Irish folk-song marks the culmination of Bridget's greenness, and the overture comes to a sudden close with a wail from the vocal strings of the depressed and depressing vocalist.

A list of the more important works based on the Life of Bridget Maguire may be found by consulting the Boston Public Library, the Massachusetts Free Employment Bureau, the Encyclopædia Britannica, vide Ireland and the United States.

SYMPHONY PATHÉTIQUE IN Q-SHARP, "GREET THE OLD MAN WITH A SMILE," Op. 1 GEORGE W. CHADWICK

(Born at go-smith-ville; now living—well.)

"GREET THE OLD MAN WITH A SMILE."

O wives, if you'd keep your dear husbands at home,
Be neat, if you can't put on style;
Put on a clean collar and fix up your hair,
And greet the old man with a smile.

Then greet the old man with a smile,
Greet the old man with a smile,
Put on a clean collar and fix up your hair,
And greet the old man with a smile.

Buy meat that is tender, and cook it as well
As you can, if you can't cook in style;
Keep ev'rything neat as a pin in the house,
And greet the old man with a smile.

Then greet the old man with a smile,
Greet the old man with a smile,
Keep ev'rything neat as a pin in the house,
And greet the old man with a smile.

And do not forget, as heap after heap
Of flap-jacks you on his plate pile,
To say you are happy to see him at home,
And when you are saying it smile.

Then greet the old man with a smile,
Greet the old man with a smile,
To say you are happy to see him at home,
And greet the old man with a smile.

You know there are places and scenes that good men
From home, wife, and children beguile;
Remember the bar-keeper never forgets
To greet the old man with a smile.

Then greet the old man with a smile,
Greet the old man with a smile,
Remember the bar-keeper never forgets
To greet the old man with a smile.

This symphony has never before been performed (except on the occasions when it has been performed).

1. Moderato, Q-sharp, 9-4. The opening pages of the score are devoted to anticipatory treatment of the principal subject. Special attention should be given to the figure of 167 notes of the cymbals, con sardini, with which the work starts. This figure being the germ of the first theme, it plays an important part throughout the movement. The pianoforte enters at the fifth measure, and has two short and partly accompanied cadenzas, which are separated by the announcement of the principal theme, which is given out in full by the whole orchestra. Following the second cadenza, there is further treatment by the orchestra of the principal theme, fragments of which (in the violoncellos and horn) also accompany a new subject on the oboe,—più tranquillo. The solo voice enters with a variant of a section of the first theme, with free treatment of the kettledrum figure in the orchestra, this continues at some length till a ritardando is reached, after which the alleged voice gives out the melodious second subject, in the course of which the time alternates between 9-4 and 7-8. After some discussion of this we have a "poco a poco più animato" with fragments of the first and second themes, leading with a series of brilliant pianoforte passages to an orchestral interlude based on the first theme. The voice enters again with triplet form of the cymbal figure against an augmented disease of the same in the oboe and clarinet. These are the connecting links to the inarticulate development suction which now follows. In this the foregoing material is treated with great variety and effect. A return is made to the opening in a different form and considerably shortened. A passage follows in which the cymbal figure, the first theme, and its subsidiary are heard in combination, and this leads to the final brilliant coda animato, which again contains new treatment of the main theme, and a series of sparkling arpeggio chords, with tutti frutti inversions, brings the movement to a welcome close.

N.B. The editor, after composing the above vividly exciting, lucid, eloquent, and inspired piece of musical impressionistic art, was taken with sudden convulsions, and is now in a sanitarium.

Owing to this unfortunate accident, the audience will be obliged to programmatize the remaining movements for themselves.

"STEIN SONG" FREDERIC FIELD BULLARD

A STEIN SONG

Give a rouse, then, in the May-time
For a life that knows no fear,
Turn night-time into day-time
With the sunlight of good cheer!

CHORUS.

For it's always fair weather
When good fellows get together,
With a stein on the table and a good song ringing clear.

Oh, we're all frank-and-twenty
When the spring is in the air;
And we've faith and hope a-plenty,
And we've life and love to spare.

CHORUS.

And it's birds of a feather
When good fellows get together,
With a stein on the table and a heart without a care.

For we know the world is glorious
And the goal a golden thing,
And that God is not censorious
When his children have their fling.

CHORUS.

And life slips its tether
When good fellows get together,
With a stein on the table and a cheer for everything.

This celebrated song was sung in public for the first time at a Papyrus Club dinner. [Fact.]

ENTR'ACTE.

PAPYRIAN MUSIC.

Catlin says of the vocal music of the North American Papyrians in his well-known book, "For the most part of their vocal exercises there is a total absence of what the world would call melody, their songs being made up chiefly of a sort of violent chaunt of harsh and jarring gutturals, of yelps and barks and screams, which are given out in perfect time, not only with 'method (but with harmony) in their madness.'"

It has been stated plausibly that song in its rudest state was influenced and shaped by the story-teller, who grew excited as he told some legend or warlike adventure or boasted of his own glory; for in his excitement he would begin to intone, and the tonal unsteadiness of speech was thus corrected. There was then one note, and some say that the first musical note was G. "At the present day," as Mr. Rowbotham claims, "the songs of Papyrians are nearly all at this pitch, that is to say, with G for the keynote, and those Papyrians who have only one note in their music always have G for that one note." Chanting in impassioned speech led to isolation of the tone, and the Papyrian, aware of tone apart from speech, sought to vary his pleasure. A two-note period was the next step. Then came a period of three. This little scale was extended, and it was made up of the Great Scale of three notes and the Little Scale of two notes. Thus vocal music passed through three stages in the evolution of the scale, "the Isolating where the Great Scale and the Little Scale remain isolated from one another, as is found in the most ancient music of the nations of antiquity, the music also of many savages, and of the Chinese; the next stage is the Agglutinative Stage, when these two scales are agglutinated by the insertion of the fourth; and the Inflectional Stage, when by the insertion of the seventh the scale is enabled to pass naturally to the octave above, and to modulate to a new scale on the keynote of its fifth." ("A History of Music," by John F. Rowbotham, vol. i. p. 107, and see pp. 70-138.)

"There is no uniform key for any given song, for the Papyrians have no mechanical device for determining pitch to create a standard by which to train the ear. This, however, does not affect their songs or singing; for, whatever the starting note, each individual insists on the correctness of his own version of the melody," says Arthur Farweller. "Emotion also affects the rendering of Papyrian music, notably spirituous emotion. This is especially noticeable in solos, as love-songs, where the singer quite unconsciously varies from a quarter to five whole tones from the true pitch."

DRAMATIC INTERMEZZO AND VOCALISTICAL ÉTUDE, "NANCY, Op. 23."
EDGAR A. P. NEWCOMB-ARTHUR MACY

(Composer Newcomb still living in Honolulu. Composer Macy still living in our hearts.)

This romantic romanza is composed in the free neo-style of an American Liebeslied without coon-song attachment. Originally written for a mezzo-tenor, it has been transcribed for a hybrid-baritone tinged with an imperfect basso, and is performed with marvellous intelligence with occasional foot-notes, cleffs, and bars by a member of the Suffolk Bar.

NANCY.

My Nancy is so proud of me,
Nancy, oh, my Nancy!
And though I may not handsome be,
Nancy, oh, my Nancy!
She says there's something in my face
That makes her long for one embrace:
She seems to understand my case,
Nancy, oh, my Nancy!

Oh, she's a charmer sweet to see,
And to my heart she holds the key,
And Nancy is so proud of me,
Nancy, oh, my Nancy!

When we walk out upon the street,
Nancy, oh, my Nancy!
Oh, she looks good enough to eat,
Nancy, oh, my Nancy!
I see the people wink their eyes
And laugh at me, as each one cries,
"Oh, where did Nancy draw that prize?"
Nancy, oh, my Nancy!

Oh, she's a charmer sweet to see,
And to my heart she holds the key,
And Nancy is so proud of me,
Nancy, oh, my Nancy!

My Nancy ought to be a Queen,
Nancy, oh, my Nancy!
With diamonds bright and emeralds green,
Nancy, oh, my Nancy!
She'd sit upon a golden throne,
And she'd make me a King full-grown,
For she dislikes to sit alone,
Nancy, oh, my Nancy!

For she's a charmer sweet to see,
And to my heart she holds the key,
And Nancy is so proud of me,
Nancy, oh, my Nancy!

My Nancy's going to be my wife,
Nancy, oh, my Nancy!
For what's a fork without a knife,
Nancy, oh, my Nancy!
Her friends are shy and hold aloof;
They say she's crazy,—I'm the proof;
But Nancy says, "Come off the roof!"
Nancy, oh, my Nancy!

For she's a charmer sweet to see,
And to my heart she holds the key,
And Nancy is so proud of me,
Nancy, oh, my Nancy!

LATIN CANTATA, "PAPYRUS," Op. 100 JOHN BRAHMS-KOREN

(Born in an excellent epoch, and now one of the mainstays of the Statistics Department of the City of Boston.)

PAPYRUS.

Papyrus, sancta nomine!
Papyrus, sacre omine!
Poetæ, oratoris dux,
Philistinorum gravis crux.

Papyrus, lumen patribus;
Papyrus, numen fratribus.
In mundo furit vanitas
Hic intus regit sanitas.

Papyrus, auctor joculi;
Papyrus, fautor poculi.
Laudamus te, halleluja,
Per sæculorum sæcula!

This stern old mediæval hymn, with its tonal modes and austere harmonies, is peculiarly appropriate to the semi-monastic manners and rigid rites of a Papyrus dinner.

The words are an awful example of the disadvantages of a classical education.

VOCAL SWEET IN H(IGGINSON) MAJOR, Op. 000.

SAMUEL BEETHOVEN HOPKINS

(Born and still lives.)

"Ach du lieber Higginson Symphony Orchestra,
Ach du lieber Symphony Orchestra fine.
Doctor Muck, none can beat you;
We're glad now to meet you.
Ach du lieber Symphony Orchestra fine.

Ach du lieber Higginson Symphony Orchestra,
Ach du lieber Symphony Orchestra fine.
As we feed a good leader,
We need a loud liede.
Ach du lieber Symphony Orchestra fine.

Ach du lieber Higginson Symphony Orchestra,
Ach du lieber Symphony Orchestra fine.
Here's to Muck and the Major!
None better, we wager.
Ach du lieber Symphony Orchestra fine.

MUSICAL NOTES

It was expected that the Club would perform to-night a new work by Charles Martini Luffer, entitled "A Begun Poem"; but, owing to the unfinished state of the composition, and also to the rumor that the players of the horns, violas d'amour, bones, and xylophones have gone on a strike, the work is to be produced by self-taught stars from the New England Observatory of Music, under the leadership of Mr. Wollis Badwealth.

Giovanni de Biddulph in his work on Cosmogonic Necromantics, published at Ravenna in 1437, speaks of the first day of April as peculiarly suited to musicians, owing to the nature of their trade and the impositions practised by them upon an unsuspecting public in the name of Art. To the same effect that quaint writer, Thomas Tilestun, cousin of Duke Baldwin of the Provinces, breaking forth epistolarily in the year 1591, says, "We have oftentimes mightily marvelled that those yclept musicians could produce sounds signifying nothing, and yet thereat the public would loudly applaud, deceived into the belief that collocated discords evolved with infinite labor must in very fact be music muchly to be liked, because so entitled."

See also Sir George Gruff's Directory of Musicians, vol. xliii., p. 1008.

VOLUME 28

1908-1909

THIS VOLUME CONTAINS MANUSCRIPT MATERIAL.

MANUSCRIPTS MAY NOT

BE REPRODUCED

WITHOUT PERMISSION.

THE PUBLIC LIBRARY OF THE CITY OF BOSTON.
THE ALLEN A. BROWN COLLECTION.

★★M 125.5.28

Max Fiedler

Dec. 26	Dec. 19	Dec. 12	Nov. 28	Nov. 21	Nov. 14	Oct. 31	Oct. 24	Oct. 17	Oct. 10
10	9	8	7	6	5	4	3	2	1

Jan. 2
Jan. 16
Jan. 23
Feb. 6
Feb. 14
Feb. 20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

CONDUCTOR: MAX FIEDLER

CONCERTS:
SATURDAY EVENINGS AT 8 O'CLOCK
TWENTY-EIGHTH SEASON, 1908-1909

11 12
13
14
15
16

15	16	17	18	19	20	21	22	23	24
Feb. 13	Feb. 27	Mar. 6	Mar. 13	Mar. 27	Apr. 3	Apr. 10	Apr. 17	Apr. 24	May 1

SECOND BALCONY

RIGHT
A 6

Max Fiedler

Dec. 26	Dec. 19	Dec. 12	Nov. 28	Nov. 21	Nov. 14	Oct. 31	Oct. 24	Oct. 17	Oct. 10
10	9	8	7	6	5	4	3	2	1

SYMPHONY HALL
BOSTON
HUNTINGTON &
MASSACHUSETTS AVE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MAX FIEDLER,
CONDUCTOR

CONCERTS:
SATURDAY EVENINGS AT 8 O'CLOCK
TWENTY-EIGHTH SEASON, 1908-1909

SECOND BALCONY

RIGHT

A

6

15	16	17	18	19	20	21	22	23	24
Feb. 13	Feb. 27	Mar. 6	Mar. 13	Mar. 27	Apr. 3	Apr. 10	Apr. 17	Apr. 24	May 1

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON

1908-1909.

PROGRAMMES AND COMMENTS
COMPILED BY

ALLEN A. BROWN

L. S. Johnson

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The owner of this ticket will please write name and address on the lines
below as an aid to its recovery in case of loss.

NAME

Allen A. Brown

ADDRESS

*P. O. Box 1802
Boston*

This ticket must be presented to the door-keeper at every performance. Persons neglecting to bring tickets will be admitted to the hall
only by purchasing an evening ticket.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

SEASON

✻ 1908-1909. ✻

PROGRAMMES AND COMMENTS
COMPILED BY

ALLEN A. BROWN

L. S. Johnson, del.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The owner of this ticket will please write name and address on the lines
below as an aid to its recovery in case
of loss.

NAME

Allen A. Brown

ADDRESS

*P. O. Box 1802
Boston*

This ticket must be presented to the door-keeper at every performance. Persons neglecting to bring tickets will be admitted to the hall
only by purchasing an evening
ticket.

Allen A. Brown
November 16, 1909.

TIGHT BINDING

Index

Composer	Name of Work	Concert	Date of Performance
Beethoven	Symphony No. 3 in E flat op 55	III	Oct 24. '08
	" " 5 " C min. 67	X	Dec 26. '08
	" " 7 " A maj. 92	VI	Nov 21. "
	" " 9 " D min. 125	XXIV	May 1. '09
	Chorus from "Cecilia Society"
	Overture "Leonore" No 3. op 72	I	Oct 10. '08 Pennin Apr 4. '09
	" " "Egmont" op 84	V	Nov 14. '08
	" " Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus, ^{op 43}	XXVIII	Mar 13. '09
	" " Coriolanus op 62	XXII	Apr 17. '09
	Funeral March from Symp. No 3	XXIII	" 24. "
Berlioz H.	Concerto Violin & Orch. D maj	Pennin	" 4 "
	Mischael Elman
Berlioz H.	Fantastic Symphony No 1. C maj op 16	XXVI	Mar 6. '09
	Ouv. "The Roman Carnival" op 9	XII	Jan 16. "
	" " "Benvenuto Cellini"	Pennin	Apr 3. "
Brahms J.	Symphony No 1. op 68 C min:	I	Oct. 10. '08
	" " 3 " 90 F maj:	XIII	Jan 23. '09
	Var. on a Theme by Haydn op 56 A	XIX	Mar 27. "
Brimch, Max	Concerto Violin & Orch: No 3 op 58	VI	Nov 21. '08
	Prof. Willy Hess
Bruckner	Symphony No. 8 in C min:	XXVII	Mar 13. '09
	" " " "	XXIII	Apr 24. "
Chadwick, G. W.	"Theme, Var. & Fugue" for organ & orch
	Wallace Goodrich	XXI	April 10. '09
Debussy	Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"	XII	Jan 16. '09
	"Three Nocturnes" with Female Chorus	VIII	Dec 12. '08
Dukas, Paul	Scherzo: "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"	XXII	Apr 17. '09

TIGHT BINDING

10	Dvořák	Symphony No 5. Emin op 95	XXII	Apr 17. '09	Norin H. G.	'Kaleidoscope' for orch. op. 30	VIII	Dec 12. '08
	Elgar E.	Symphony op 55 in A flat maj:	XVI	July 27. '09	Paderewski, Jg:	Symphony in B min: op 24	XV	July 13. '09
	Foote A.	Suite in E maj: op 63 For string Orchestra	XXII	Apr 17. '09	Rimsky-Korsakoff	Symf Suite 'Scheherazade' op 35	II	Oct 17. '08
	Glaatzhoff	'Spring' op 34. For orchestra	XXI	Apr 10. '09	Rubinstein A.	'Fifth Concerto' Piano & orch. op 94 Mr Josef Thevenin	IX	Dec 19. '08
	Grädener	Concerto for Cello & orch. op 48 Heinrich Wasmke	XVIII	Mar 13. '09	Saint-Jean C.	Concerto Piano & orch No 2 in G min op 22. Mlle Germaine Arnaud Concerto Piano & orch No 4. op 44 Ignace Paderewski Intro. or Rondo Capriccioso for Violin & orch. Mischa Elman	XIII XV Pension	Jan 23. '09 July 13. '09 Apr 4. '09
	Grieg E.	Long 'A Dream' with Piano Mme Marie Rappold	V	Nov 14. '08	Sauer, Emil	Concerto No 1. Emin: Piano & Orchestra - Emil Sauer	II	Oct 17. '08
	Kaydn	Symph. in Bb maj. Brt H. No. 12	II	Dec 19. '08	Schneppflug	Overture for orch. op 15	XIV	Jan 23. '09
	Liszt F.	'Les Preludes' Rhapsody No 1. for Orchestra Concerto No 1. Piano & Orch Mlle Germaine Schuetzen	XXI Pension XIX	Dec 13. '09 - Apr 10. '09 Apr 4. '09 Mar 27. '09	Schillings	'The Harvest Festival' from 'Moloch' Hexenlied with Schillings music Recited by Dr. L. Willner	XII Pension	Jan 16. '09 July 28. '09
	MacDowell B. M.	'Lamia' 3 Symphonic Poems op 29	III	Oct 24. '08	Schubert F.	Symphony No. 7 in C maj: Unfinished Symph. in B min Entr'acte No. 2. 'Rosamunde' Songs: 'The Sign Post' 'Sexton at the Spinning Wheel' 'Erl King' Miss Emily Destine Recitation: 'Der Wanderer' 'Der Doppelgänger' 'Erl King' Dr Ludwig Willner	XII XIX XVII VIII Pension	Jan 16. '09 Mar 27. '09 " 6. '09 Dec 12. '08 July 28. '09
	Maquarre A.	Ouv: 'On the Sea Cliffs' op 6	XIX	Mar 27. '09	Schumann R.	Symphony No 4. op 120 in D min:	IV	Oct 31. '08
	Mendelssohn	Symphony No. 3 in A min: op 56 Ouv: 'Fingals Cave' op 26 Scherzo "Mid. Sum. Night Dream" op 61	XIV " "	July 6. '09 " "
	Mozart	Symphony in D maj. K 388 'Masonic Funeral Music' Long 'The Victim' with Piano Mme Marie Rappold	XXIV XXI V	May 1. '09 Apr 10. '09 Nov 14. '08
	Nicolai	Religious Fest Ouv. op 32	XI	Jan 2. '09

Violin

Elman, Mischa
 " " "
 Kess, Prof. Willy

XI
 Pension
 VI

Jan 2. '09
 April 4. "
 Nov 21. '08

Violoncello

Schroeder, Alwin
 Wanne, Heinich

IV
 XVII

Oct 31. '08
 Feb 13. '09

Vocalists

Destine, Miss Emmy
 Morena, Miss Bertha
 Rappold, Miss Marie
 Willner, Dr. Ludwig

VIII
 XVII
 V
 Pension

Dec 12. '08
 Feb 6. '09
 Nov 14. '08
 Feb 28. '09

Quartet of Soloists for the Ninth Symphony

Combs, Miss Laura Soprano
 Stein, Mad. Gertrude May Alto
 Van Horn, Theodore Tenor
 Whitney, Myron W. Bass

Chorus

From the Cecilia for 9th Symph.
 and

Chorus of Female Voices from the Cecilia for the Debussy Nocturnes

Conductor

Max Fiedler

Sept 8. '09
 Oct 13.

16

17

SYMPHONY HALL

TWENTY-EIGHTH SEASON, 1908 AND 1909

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

Twenty-four Concerts and Twenty-four Rehearsals

Auction Sale of Season Tickets for the

FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS

$18.00 tickets, Monday, September 28, 1908, at 10 A.M.

$10.00 tickets, Tuesday, September 29, 1908, at 10 A.M.

SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS

$18.00 tickets, Thursday, October 1, 1908, at 10 A.M.

$10.00 tickets, Friday, October 2, 1908, at 10 A.M.

BOOK ORDERS
NOW WITH . .

HERRICK C O P L E Y
S Q U A R E

' P H O N E S , 2 3 2 9 , 2 3 3 0 , 2 3 3 1 B A C K B A Y

TIGHT BINDING

HERRICK

COPLEY SQUARE

MASSACHUSETTS AVENUE CORRIDOR

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

A NEW SEASON AND A NEW
Trans: CONDUCTOR Sept 19, 08

Dates, Prices and the Annual Details—A Widening of the Work of the Orchestra in New England—No Changes in the Men Except at the First Desk of the Violins—New Names and Young Blood Among the Assisting Singers and Virtuosi—The Coming of Mr. Fiedler—A Hint of the Man and the Impression That His Work Has Made in Europe—His Reputation for Catholicity—His First Programmes and the New Music That He Brings—Deliuss to Have a Hearing

Once in so many years, in the changing round of the calendar, the Symphony Concerts begin exceptionally early, and 1908 is such a year. The first pair of concerts for the new season is only three weeks away, and the sale of the seats only one. The new conductor, Mr. Fiedler, departs from Hamburg for New York next Tuesday, comes thence to Boston and begins his rehearsals with the orchestra on the first Monday in October. The new conductor, the promise of his career in Europe, the hint of his range that his first programme gives, and the new music that he intends to perform, make together the interesting fact of the new season. More particularly, there will be very few changes in the personnel of the band; the policy of fewer assisting singers and virtuosi, but those of high rank, will be continued; and the number of concerts that the orchestra will give in the smaller cities of New England will be considerably increased. Otherwise, the announcements for the new season are substantially those of recent years.

DATES AND DETAILS

The orchestra, now in its twenty-eighth year and rising steadily into the thousands in the number of its concerts, will give twenty-four afternoon and twenty-four evening concerts in Symphony Hall, from October through April, plus the usual two concerts on Sunday evenings for the increase of its Pension Fund. The afternoon concerts will begin on Friday, Oct. 9, and continue weekly thereafter, with the usual break in the series when the orchestra makes its five journeys to New York and the cities southward, and pays its annual visit to chosen towns of the Middle West. The exigencies of the calendar, moreover, will twice vary the sequence. Christmas Day falls this year on Friday, and the afternoon concert of the week will be shifted to Thursday; while Holy Week, as usual, brings a similar change for the concert of Good Friday, April 9. The weeks the orchestra are those in which the concerts here would fall on Nov. 6 and 7, Dec. 4 and 5, Jan. 8 and 9 and 29 and 30, Feb. 19 and 20 and March 19 and 20. With these interruptions, the twenty-four evening concerts will run, undisturbed by the calendar, from Saturday, Oct. 10, through Saturday, May 1.

Inquiry and consideration has confirmed the management in the belief that the present and long-established hours of beginning best please the majority of the public of the concerts. In the afternoon, therefore, they will begin at half-past two, and in the evenings at eight, with such grace to late-comers as a kindly conductor—and Mr. Fiedler's eyes beam behind his spectacles—may allow. In all essential respects, the ordering of details will be that of previous years. Once more the suggestion, quoted from the city ordinances about the removal of hats will stand on the first leaf of the programme, and once more irritated voices and pens will aver that it goes too often unheeded. Again, doubtless, there will be complaint of too loud conversation by belated auditors, waiting in the corridors, while the concert is proceeding within, and on that score another "suggestion" might prudently adorn the programme.

Finally, the seats will be sold at the same prices and under the same conditions as those of last year. The seats at $18 for the afternoon concerts will be offered by auction in Symphony Hall, on Monday, Sept. 28, beginning at ten o'clock. In the same place and at the same hour, the seats at $10 for the afternoon concerts will be sold on Tuesday, Sept. 29. On Thursday, Oct. 1, follows the sale of the seats at $18 for the evening concerts, and the auction ends on Friday, Oct. 2, with the disposal of the seats at $10 for the same series. As usual the seats will be sold in order, and the successful bidder will not gain a general choice. No more than four seats will be sold to any one bid, and payment for seats purchased must be made on the spot.

THE CONCERTS IN OTHER CITIES

Half of the hundred and more concerts projected for the new year will take place outside Boston. Month by month, from November through March, the orchestra will give ten concerts at Carnegie Hall in New York; five in the new Academy of Music in Brooklyn, and five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington—the familiar "trips" of many years' standing. Following the custom that began in Dr. Muck's time, it will go West through the last week of January and play in Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Columbus and Indianapolis. The material change, thus, from the scheme of preceding years is the increase in the number of concerts to be undertaken in the smaller cities within easy reach of Boston. Cambridge and Harvard, where the orchestra has an assured and increasing public, will have eight instead of six; while in Providence, Worcester, Springfield and Hartford

TIGHT BINDING

HERRICK

COPLEY SQUARE

MASSACHUSETTS AVENUE CORRIDOR

A	B	C	D	E	F	G	H	I	J	K	L	M	N	O	P	Q	R	S	T	U	V	W
1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12	13	14	15	16	17	18	19	20	21	22	23
24	25	26	27	28	29	30	31	32	33	34	35	36	37	38	39	40	41	42	43	44	45
46	47	48	49	50	51	52	53	54	55	56	57	58	59	60	61	62	63	64	65	66	67
68	69	70	71	72	73	74	75	76	77	78	79	80	81	82	83	84	85	86	87	88	89
90	91	92	93	94	95	96	97	98	99	100	101	102	103	104	105	106	107	108	109	110	111
112	113	114	115	116	117	118	119	120	121	122	123	124	125	126	127	128	129	130	131	132	133
134	135	136	137	138	139	140	141	142	143	144	145	146	147	148	149	150	151	152	153	154	155
156	157	158	159	160	161	162	163	164	165	166	167	168	169	170	171	172	173	174	175	176	177
178	179	180	181	182	183	184	185	186	187	188	189	190	191	192	193	194	195	196	197	198	199
200	201	202	203	204	205	206	207	208	209	210	211	212	213	214	215	216	217	218	219	220	221
222	223	224	225	226	227	228	229	230	231	232	233	234	235	236	237	238	239	240	241	242	243
244	245	246	247	248	249	250	251	252	253	254	255	256	257	258	259	260	261	262	263	264	265
266	267	268	269	270	271	272	273	274	275	276	277	278	279	280	281	282	283	284	285	286	287
288	289	290	291	292	293	294	295	296	297	298	299	300	301	302	303	304	305	306	307	308	309
310	311	312	313	314	315	316	317	318	319	320	321	322	323	324	325	326	327	328	329	330	331
332	333	334	335	336	337	338	339	340	341	342	343	344	345	346	347	348	349	350	351	352	353
354	355	356	357	358	359	360	361	362	363	364	365	366	367	368	369	370	371	372	373	374	375
376	377	378	379	380	381	382	383	384	385	386	387	388	389	390	391	392	393	394	395	396	397
398	399	400	401	402	403	404	405	406	407	408	409	410	411	412	413	414	415	416	417	418	419
420	421	422	423	424	425	426	427	428	429	430	431	432	433	434	435	436	437	438	439	440	441
442	443	444	445	446	447	448	449	450	451	452	453	454	455	456	457	458	459	460	461	462	463
464	465	466	467	468	469	470	471	472	473	474	475	476	477	478	479	480	481	482	483	484	485
486	487	488	489	490	491	492	493	494	495	496	497	498	499	500	501	502	503	504	505	506	507
508	509	510	511	512	513	514	515	516	517	518	519	520	521	522	523	524	525	526	527	528	529
530	531	532	533	534	535	536	537	538	539	540	541	542	543	544	545	546	547	548	549	550	551
552	553	554	555	556	557	558	559	560	561	562	563	564	565	566	567	568	569	570	571	572	573
574	575	576	577	578	579	580	581	582	583	584	585	586	587	588	589	590	591	592	593	594	595
596	597	598	599	600	601	602	603	604	605	606	607	608	609	610	611	612	613	614	615	616	617
618	619	620	621	622	623	624	625	626	627	628	629	630	631	632	633	634	635	636	637	638	639
640	641	642	643	644	645	646	647	648	649	650	651	652	653	654	655	656	657	658	659	660	661
662	663	664	665	666	667	668	669	670	671	672	673	674	675	676	677	678	679	680	681	682	683
684	685	686	687	688	689	690	691	692	693	694	695	696	697	698	699	700	701	702	703	704	705
706	707	708	709	710	711	712	713	714	715	716	717	718	719	720	721	722	723	724	725	726	727
728	729	730	731	732	733	734	735	736	737	738	739	740	741	742	743	744	745	746	747	748	749
750	751	752	753	754	755	756	757	758	759	760	761	762	763	764	765	766	767	768	769	770	771
772	773	774	775	776	777	778	779	780	781	782	783	784	785	786	787	788	789	790	791	792	793
794	795	796	797	798	799	800	801	802	803	804	805	806	807	808	809	810	811	812	813	814	815
816	817	818	819	820	821	822	823	824	825	826	827	828	829	830	831	832	833	834	835	836	837
838	839	840	841	842	843	844	845	846	847	848	849	850	851	852	853	854	855	856	857	858	859
860	861	862	863	864	865	866	867	868	869	870	871	872	873	874	875	876	877	878	879	880	881
882	883	884	885	886	887	888	889	890	891	892	893	894	895	896	897	898	899	900	901	902	903
904	905	906	907	908	909	910	911	912	913	914	915	916	917	918	919	920	921	922	923	924	925
926	927	928	929	930	931	932	933	934	935	936	937	938	939	940	941	942	943	944	945	946	947
948	949	950	951	952	953	954	955	956	957	958	959	960	961	962	963	964	965	966	967	968	969
970	971	972	973	974	975	976	977	978	979	980	981	982	983	984	985	986	987	988	989	990	991
992	993	994	995	996	997	998	999	1000	1001	1002	1003	1004	1005	1006	1007	1008	1009	1010	1011	1012	1013
1014	1015	1016	1017	1018	1019	1020	1021	1022	1023	1024	1025	1026	1027	1028	1029	1030	1031	1032	1033	1034	1035
1036	1037	1038	1039	1040	1041	1042	1043	1044	1045	1046	1047	1048	1049	1050	1051	1052	1053	1054	1055	1056	1057
1058	1059	1060	1061	1062	1063	1064	1065	1066	1067	1068	1069	1070	1071	1072	1073	1074	1075	1076	1077	1078	1079
1080	1081	1082	1083	1084	1085	1086	1087	1088	1089	1090	1091	1092	1093	1094	1095	1096	1097	1098	1099	1100	1101
1102	1103	1104	1105	1106	1107	1108	1109	1110	1111	1112	1113	1114	1115	1116	1117	1118	1119	1120	1121	1122	1123
1124	1125	1126	1127	1128	1129	1130	1131	1132	1133	1134	1135	1136	1137	1138	1139	1140	1141	1142	1143	1144	1145
1146	1147	1148	1149	1150	1151	1152	1153	1154	1155	1156	1157	1158	1159	1160	1161	1162	1163	1164	1165	1166	1167
1168	1169	1170	1171	1172	1173	1174	1175	1176	1177	1178	1179	1180	1181	1182	1183	1184	1185	1186	1187	1188	1189
1190	1191	1192	1193	1194	1195	1196	1197	1198	1199	1200	1201	1202	1203	1204	1205	1206	1207	1208	1209	1210	1211
1212	1213	1214	1215	1216	1217	1218	1219	1220	1221	1222	1223	1224	1225	1226	1227	1228	1229	1230	1231	1232	1233
1234	1235	1236	1237	1238	1239	1240	1241	1242	1243	1244	1245	1246	1247	1248	1249	1250	1251	1252	1253	1254	1255
1256	1257	1258	1259	1260	1261	1262	1263	1264	1265	1266	1267	1268	1269	1270	1271	1272	1273	1274	1275	1276	1277
1278	1279	1280	1281	1282	1283	1284	1285	1286	1287	1288	1289	1290	1291	1292	1293	1294	1295	1296	1297	1298	1299
1300	1301	1302	1303	1304	1305	1306	1307	1308	1309	1310	1311	1312	1313	1314	1315	1316	1317	1318	1319	1320	1321
1322	1323	1324	1325	1326	1327	1328	1329	1330	1331	1332	1333	1334	1335	1336	1337	1338	1339	1340	1341	1342	1343
1344	1345	1346	1347	1348	1349	1350	1351	1352	1353	1354	1355	1356	1357	1358	1359	1360	1361	1362	1363	1364	1365
1366	1367	1368	1369	1370	1371	1372	1373	1374	1375	1376	1377	1378	1379	1380	1381	1382	1383	1384	1385	1386	1387
1388	1389	1390	1391	1392	1393	1394	1395	1396	1397	1398	1399	1400	1401	1402	1403	1404	1405	1406	1407	1408	1409
1410	1411	1412	1413	1414	1415	1416	1417	1418	1419	1420	1421	1422	1423	1424	1425	1426	1427	1428

20
respectively, there will be a sequence of three. Occasional concerts will fall now and then to other cities hereabouts, and thus, if due response come from the public that are presumed to be ripe for such experiments, the work of the orchestra in New England, will be permanently widened. If it is to be kept employed outside the regular series of concerts at Symphony Hall and the regular Southern and Western trips, the additional concerts must be distributed within easy distance of Boston so that rehearsals shall be undisturbed. This season, the test of New England on that score is to be made in earnest.

THE PERSONNEL

Only at the first desk of the violins will there be any material change in the personnel of the orchestra. In its members, it remains virtually the same band that it became after Dr. Muck's somewhat drastic changes of last autumn. In spite of much gossip to the contrary, Mr. Schroeder, the distinguished 'cellist, will not rejoin the orchestra. He has settled again in Boston; he will be a member of the new Hess-Schroeder string quartet; he will play as a visiting virtuoso in concerts here and elsewhere; but he does not care, with such tasks before him, to resume the exacting routine of orchestral duty. Mr. Hess, on the other hand, returns from work and play in Europe to become again the concert-master of the orchestra; and it is an open secret that the understanding under which he comes binds him, whatever may be his other activities, to give his best and regular service to the band. Mr. Wendling, the concert-master of last winter, has returned to Germany, and Mr. Czerwonky, his companion, has left the orchestra, to follow the career of a virtuoso. In his place, to sit side by side with Mr. Hess, comes Mr. Soma Pick Steiner, a violinist of long experience in orchestral work, and at the first desk, in Leipzig and Vienna.

SINGERS AND VIRTUOSI

With the coming of Dr. Muck two years ago and with the steadily rising prestige of the orchestra, the directors of its fortunes began a new policy in the engagement of "soloists." They were to be much fewer—say, twelve or fifteen for the whole series of concerts; but they were to be singers, violinists and pianists of high rank. No others accorded with the position of the orchestra in its kind or with the just demands of a public that it had cultivated for a quarter of a century. Moreover, that public was now finding the orchestra, the conductor, and the programme sufficiently interesting in themselves for nearly half the concerts. The balance had come at last, and the "soloists" were truly assisting the orchestra. This policy has justified itself, and in the new season it is to be extended in a fresh particular. As Dr. Muck brought new and young blood into the personnel of the band, so next winter there is to be new and relatively young blood in the singers and virtuosos.

For singers the resource of the orchestra is the two opera houses of New York. From the Metropolitan will come Miss Destinn and Miss Morena, and from the Manhattan, Miss Gerville-Réache. Miss Destinn will be wholly new to our public, and since a visit from the Metropolitan company is in jeopardy, her appearances at the Symphony Concerts may be her only appearances in Boston. Her reputation in Europe has preceded her. She is one of the distinguished singers of the Royal Opera in Berlin; in summer of late she has sung much at Covent Garden; Paris knows her Salome, and the Opéra there has coveted her. She is in the prime of her powers and her vitality; her presence is dark and not uncomely; her voice is a full and expressive soprano, guided by artistry and quick with feeling. Miss Morena was the Sieglinde of the performance of "The Valkyr" that the Metropolitan Company gave at the Boston Theatre last April. Her plastic and significant beauty is one of the memories of it; while the quality and the emotional appeal of her singing commended her no less. Miss Gerville-Réache is equally a grateful memory of the Symphony Concerts of last winter, when she brought the warmth of the opera house into the usually chillier air of the concert-room.

Except Mr. Paderewski and Mr. Sauer, the pianists for the concerts are all young—Mr. Gabrilowitsch and Mr. Lhévinne, Miss Schnitzer and Miss Arnaud. Mr. Paderewski returns in January primarily to share in the rehearsals and hear the performance of his new symphony, but also to appear with the orchestra at a pair of concerts. Mr. Sauer comes back, after nearly ten years of absence, almost to a new musical generation that will discover afresh the adroit skill, the fineness and the delicate warmth of his playing. Mr. Gabrilowitsch has been a more frequent visitor, and our public has watched the ripening and the refining of his talents. Mr. Lhévinne is new to the Symphony Concerts, but not new to the audiences that two years ago felt the grave intensity and the unforced power of his playing. In like case is the young and ardent Miss Schnitzer, another distinctly romantic pianist. Miss Germaine Arnaud comes out of Parisian drawing-rooms rather than Parisian concerts, and has her way to make in America. Fortunate the fate, from one point of view, that has opened the Symphony concerts to her.

The visiting violinist is inevitably Mischa Elman, the youthful Russian, who in a few months comes for the first time to America. Young he still is, but no younger than was Henri Marteau when he first appeared here. Marteau looked his youth; Elman is as grave as middle age itself behind his spectacles and in his absorption in the task of the moment. Whatever the number of his years, he is the ripening violinist who stands or falls by his intelligence, imagination and artistry. Long since he put his brief days as a prodigy behind him. The other two violinists are the first and the second concert masters of the orchestra, Mr. Hess and Mr. Steiner, and the brilliancy and the elegance of Mr. Hess's playing are easy to recall. Mr. Warnke, as the first 'cellist of the orchestra, will have his concerto, and Mr. Schroeder will reappear once more on the familiar platform of Symphony Hall.

THE NEW CONDUCTOR

When Mr. Fiedler begins work here in October, he will be nearly at the end of his fiftieth year, the oldest conductor who has yet come freshly to the post. Unlike any of his predecessors, except Mr. Paur, he had a considerable reputation in Germany as a pianist and a teacher of the piano before he passed to conducting, fifteen years ago. Unlike all of them, except Mr. Gericke, he has written music in his time, a symphony, and sundry compositions for string quartet and the piano, but happily neither at home in Hamburg nor in his visits to other cities has he shown any eagerness to bring them to performance. Like all of his predecessors, except Dr. Muck, he was educated as a musician, he has lived the life of a practising musician, and he has few interests outside his calling. Again, unlike Dr. Muck and Mr. Gericke, his experience has been that of a conductor of orchestral concerts rather than of opera; while beyond any of his predecessors, except Dr. Muck, he comes hither with a reputation achieved and acknowledged as an "international" conductor. For ten years he pursued his work in Hamburg, reestablishing the Philharmonic Concerts there in patronage and prestige. Then his abilities began to make him known in other German cities, and he conducted on occasion in them. Next his widening reputation brought him opportunities beyond the frontier, and he began to go to and fro in Europe as a visiting conductor of note. As such, Petersburg and Paris, Milan and Madrid, Budapest and London, and many another city have all heard him.

It was in London, and within easy recollection, that the Transcript's reviewer happened to see and to hear Mr. Fiedler, and to receive an impression that is still clear of the man and his conducting. To the eye, he was a middle-aged German, rather heavily built, rather loosely jointed, and distinctly of large physical authority. A big head rose from broad shoulders, and above the high forehead a brush of iron-gray hair, à la Pompadour, crowned it. His eyes looked brightly out of big, round German spectacles. His nose was strong and full, but a bristling gray moustache hid the mouth and left only a hint of the vigorous chin. Mr. Fiedler does not look the Herr Professor, who happens strangely to be leading an orchestra, as does Mr. Mottl. Nor yet does Mr. Fiedler recall the carriage of a middle-aged German official as did Mr. Gericke. There is a suggestion in his bearing of both, but still more of a man of physical strength and alert and even fiery spirit. That afternoon at the Queen's Hall he was conducting with the London Symphony Orchestra for the first time. The band was new to him and he to the band. He had had, moreover, to change his programme at the last minute. Perhaps all these circumstances compelled him to a vehemence of gesture, movement and physical emphasis of his intentions with the players that is not usual with him. Certainly he conducted at the two Philharmonic concerts that he led in New York in the winter of 1905-06 with far less bodily effort than he seemed to find necessary in London. His beat and his gestures were then clear and expressive; unmistakably they carried his will to his men; but they had a nervous energy that here in Boston (if Mr. Fiedler continues to practise it) will be a new thing after Mr. Gericke and Dr. Muck's relatively sober conducting. Alike in London and in New York he quickly discovered the traits and temper of his orchestra and put them in effective play. His men felt him. Imperious and nervous will were in him.

21

Certainly in Germany Mr. Fiedler has the reputation of a broad-minded and "all-round" conductor who cultivates no "specialty" but duly diversified and wide-ranging programmes. He is admittedly an ardent conductor of the music of Richard Strauss, and before the winter ends "Zarathustra," "Heldenleben" and other of the later "tone-poems," long unheard here, are likely to have a place on his programmes. He has brought the music of the new and struggling generation of German composers to hearing; he is a close friend to Reger; he knows the work of the Bohemians; the music of the Russians appeals to him, and unlike some German conductors he is aware that in France, Mr. d'Indy, Mr. Debussy and sundry others write individual and interesting music. In fine, he is a conductor of broad intelligence and sympathies, and thereby a maker of catholic programmes.

In his conducting in both London and New York Mr. Fiedler seemed steadily to seek warmth, beauty and euphony of tone, so that by these tokens we in Boston need have no fear for the standards of our orchestra. Not once in London was the tone of the band harsh, rough, or careless. Nowhere, however, did the beauty, balance and precision of the tone lessen its vitality or its expressive quality. There was eager and vivid life in it. In Mr. Fiedler himself was a kindred union of traits. His reading of Brahms's symphony, for example, was altogether clear and straightforward. He sought no finicking or disturbing "novelties" of pace or phrase whereby certain conductors would prove their "individuality." Yet, as clearly, he had thoroughly analyzed the music, in his own preparation for it, and discovered and grasped its substance and spirit. Thus prepared, he was ready to bring it to life, and passionate life, in performance. No less understanding, power and imagination shone in his conducting of Wagner's and Beethoven's overtures. In both an ardent, dramatizing but ordered temperament was in commanding play. Contrasts and climaxes told, the music went sweepingly and glowingly forward; and yet throughout it kept its salient traits. Here was clearly a conductor of intellectual penetration and grasp on the one hand, and of vigor and passion on the other; above all a conductor who could characterize his music—each piece in its kind.

PROGRAMMES AND NEW MUSIC

So much for the pleasures of memory. Inevitably, here in Boston, Mr. Fiedler must begin, like each of his predecessors, with the classics. He has his men and his audience to learn. He has need to examine the repertory and the resources of the orchestra and to assimilate the habits and the expectations of his audience. He must impress himself alike upon his forces and his hearers, and the most efficient means to these ends are familiar pieces, old or recent, classic, in the stricter sense, or romantic. Of such are the programmes that he has already sent to Boston for the first four concerts of the new year; but in them he testifies to his liking for Strauss, pays tribute to the memory of Rimsky-Korsakoff, dead a few months ago, and discloses his willingness to take Wagner's music from the opera house to the concert-room. They run:

Oct. 9 and 10:

Beethoven: Overture, "Leonore," No. 3.
Brahms: Symphony in C minor, No. 1.
Strauss: Love Scene from "Feuersnot."
Wagner: Overture to "Tannhäuser."

Oct. 16 and 17:

Rimsky-Korsakoff: Suite "Scheherazade."
Concerto for Piano.
Schumann: Symphony in D minor.
Soloist: Emil Sauer.

Oct. 23 and 24:

Beethoven: Symphony in E-flat, "Eroica."
Smetana: Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau."
Wolf: Italian Serenade.
Wagner: Prelude to "The Mastersingers."

Oct. 30 and 31:

Weber: Overture to "Oberon."
Tschalkovsky: Symphony in B minor, "The Pathetic."
Concerto for Violoncello.
Beethoven: Overture to "Egmont."
Soloist: Alwyn Schroeder.

From Mr. Fiedler has also come a list of some of the music new to Boston that he will undertake in the course of the year. It again attests an alert curiosity, catholic intelligence and sympathy, close watch of the younger men, and a just appreciation of the obligation of the orchestra to keep its public informed of the new things of music, and to remind it of the older that it has overlooked or neglected. Paderewski's new symphony stands at the head of the list, and side by side with it is Reger's new concert overture. Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations that amused German audiences a year ago and sent the satirized and irritated Strauss into the courts, have escaped the perils of litigation; he who will may play them; and Mr. Fiedler will divert us with them—a happy sign that he appreciates the lighter side of his task. He further purposes to increase our pleasure in Sibelius with the tone-poem "Finlandia" and two shorter pieces. In Nicodé's huge orchestral and choral fantasy, "Gloria," performed in Germany last winter, he has found two scherzi, worth the isolating. A suite of the delicate or stately dances of Grétry, who wrote operas for the court of Louis XVI. in France, has attracted him in Mottl's amplified score. He contemplates two suites of Glazounoff's music of the theatre and the ballet—"The Middle Ages" and "Spring"—in which the Russian's lighter qualities have pleasant play. He draws a dance from Max Schillings's opera "Moloch"; he has found a neglected piece of Tschalkovsky; and he purposes to revive Bruckner's eighth symphony hitherto unheard in Boston. Most interestingly of all, he intends to make known, in one or another tone-poem, a new composer, Fritz Delius, whose music, highly imaginative, highly individual, seeking freedom of form, incisive characterization and keen intensity of expression, has begun to be heard in Europe with curiosity and applause. Evidently and happily, our orchestra is not to go backward with the old, the unfamiliar, or the new.

H. T. P.

SYMPHONY SEASON TO START ON OCT. 9

Max Fiedler of Hamburg Takes Dr. Muck's Place as Conductor.

The 28th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra will begin with a public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, Oct. 9, and a concert on Saturday evening Oct. 10. The auction sales of seats for the season will fall on the following days: Monday Sept. 28, the $18 seats for the public rehearsals; Tuesday, Sept. 29, the $10 seats for the public rehearsals; Thursday, Oct. 1, the $18 seats for the concerts, and Friday, Oct. 2, the $10 seats for the concerts. As in former years, Boston will have 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoon, except on Dec. 25 (Christmas) and April 9 (Good Friday), when the rehearsals will be given on the day before, Thursday, Dec. 24, and Thursday, April 8. The 24 concerts will be given on Saturday evenings. These public rehearsals and concerts will be given in successive weeks with the following exceptions: Nov. 6 and 7, Dec. 4 and 5, Jan. 8 and 9 and 29, and 30, Feb. 19 and 20 and March 19 and 20. On these dates the orchestra will be out of town. The last concert will be given on Saturday evening, May 1. The schedule of the orchestra calls for a total of 110 concerts, of which 48 will be given in Boston, 10 in New York, 8 in Cambridge, 5 each in Baltimore, Washington, Philadelphia and Brooklyn, 3 each in Providence and Hartford and the rest in various cities. The annual trip to the West will be made in the last week of January.

A New Conductor.

The coming season brings to the orchestra and to Boston a new conductor, the sixth that has been at the head of the organization. When it became definitely known last year that the services of Dr. Muck could not be retained for another season, a thorough canvass was made of all the great conductors of Europe who were available, and final choice settled on Max Fiedler of Hamburg. Mr. Fiedler has made his career exclusively as a conductor in concert work and his career has been comparatively short, for he was in the prime of life before conditions enabled him to take up the baton. He has been a conductor only 13 years, but his rise in his branch of the art has been extraordinarily rapid, until today he is ranked among the few great conductors of the world, and his services as "guest" are constantly in demand in the musical centres of Europe.

Mr. Fiedler was born in Zittau, Saxony, Dec. 31, 1859. His father, a musician of note and the musical director of the city, gave him his early training with such success that when he was 17 years old he went to the Leipzig Conservatory, the holder of the Holstein scholarship. There he was a fellow-student of Dr. Muck, and worked under the direction of Reinecke, Paul and Jadasson. He was graduated with high honors in 1880.

Like his predecessor, Dr. Muck, he had planned to be a concert pianist, but overmuch practising disabled one of his arms to such an extent that he was compelled to give up his ambition, and two years later he accepted from Ludwig von Bernuth, the founder of the Hamburg Conservatory of Music, the position of teacher of advanced pupils of the piano in the institution. Hamburg has since been his home, and since 1894 he has been the director of the conservatory.

It has seldom been the fortune of a man to exert so powerful an influence over the musical destinies of a city as Fiedler has in Hamburg. When he first went to Hamburg, von Buelow was conducting the Elite concerts there, and it was that great master who inspired in Fiedler the ambition to become a conductor. Therefore, in 1886, Fiedler gave a concert at which he conducted two works of his own, a symphony in D minor and a choral work for women's voices and orchestra. His success as a conductor was instant, so much so that he determined, as soon as conditions permitted, to devote himself to conducting. But it was eight years before his ambition was realized. Von Bernuth, his employer, was the conductor of the Philharmonic concerts, and it was impossible for the young man to start a set of opposition concerts. Nor were the affairs of the Philharmonic orchestra too prosperous. In 1894 von Bernuth resigned his posts, and Fiedler, succeeding him as director of the conservatory, gave at his own risk during that winter an orchestral concert, drawing his men largely from the Philharmonic orchestra. So encouraging was the result that the next season he established the Fiedler concerts, giving four, then six and then eight. In the mean time the affairs of the Philharmonics had gone from bad to worse, and in 1904, as a result of overtures made to him by the old society, the two sets of concerts were amalgamated, and he became the conductor of the Philharmonic orchestra, which position he now holds.

During the last five years his fame has grown greatly. He is a favorite conductor in St. Petersburg and he has refused the conductorship of the Russian Imperial Symphony concerts in that city. Each year for the last several years he has conducted as "guest" in Rome, Turin, Berlin, Dresden, Paris, St. Petersburg and London, and four years ago he made a profound impression in New York when he was the "guest" conductor of the Philharmonic Society in that city.

Mr. Fiedler is famous as a man of catholic tastes. He is a strong upholder of modernism in music, being one of the best and most influential friends the young composers of Europe have. He is also famous as an interpreter of Brahms, Beethoven and Schumann. He is said to be skilled in the making of programmes. He is married—his wife is an English woman—and he speaks English fluently. He sails next Tuesday from Bremen and is due to reach New York on the 29th.

The Soloists.

Following the policy which has been so successful for the past two years, the management will not provide a soloist for every concert, but instead of scattering its allowance among mediocrities will concentrate it on fewer soloists and those of the very highest rank. The list for this year is uncommonly brilliant and there will be also the merit of novelty—not always possible, for solo musicians new to the Boston Symphony audiences are not easy to find. Three important singers have been engaged, Jeanne Gerville-Reache, principal French contralto of the Manhattan Opera House, New York; Berta Morena, of the Royal Opera, Munich, and the Metropolitan Opera House, and Emmy Destinn, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and the Metropolitan Opera House.

Morena is not wholly a stranger in Boston, although she has never appeared here in concert. Last season her voice, beauty and art were fully appreciated by the audiences at the Boston Theatre during the week of the Metropolitan Opera House Company. Miss Morena made her debut at Munich in 1898, when she was 19 years old. A native of Mannheim, she was discovered by von Lenbach, the portrait painter, and until she came to America last year she had been a member of the Munich opera.

Miss Destinn will make her first appearance in Boston with the Symphony orchestra, and it is possible that this will be the only opportunity of hearing her in this city. She was born, Emmy Kittl at Prague, Feb. 26, 1878. Her reputation was made in Berlin, where she has been a member of the Royal Opera since her debut in 1898. The outside world first heard of her in 1901, when she made a great success in Bayreuth as Senta. Maurice Grau tried to bring her to New York, but failed. Three years ago she made her debut at Covent Garden. She is not a Wagnerian singer. Her great parts are Carmen, Santuzza, Madame Butterfly, Suleika, Elsa, Donna Anna, Aida and Salome.

Miss Gerville-Reache came to Boston last winter as a soloist of the orchestra known only to comparatively few who had heard her at a semi-private musicale. Her superb young voice, her temperamental singing, and her diction made a profound impression.

The pianists will be Paderewski, Emil Sauer, Germaine Schnitzer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhevinne and Germaine Arnaud. Of these Miss Schnitzer and Mr. Lhevinne have never been heard here with the orchestra and Miss Arnaud has never been in America. Paderewski comes to America after the first of the year for a brief tour of 30 concerts and it is promised that this year surely he will bring with him his new symphony, which was expected two years ago. He will not give more than one recital in any city. Emil Sauer returns after an absence of 10 years. He was here in 1898, and will be remembered as a distinguished pianist of genuine individuality. Gabrilowitsch is a long established favorite in Boston. Lhevinne has appeared in recital here and lovers of piano music will be more than ordinarily interested to hear him with an orchestra. Germaine Schnitzer will be remembered as having made a decided sensation here two seasons ago when she appeared in recital. Germaine Arnaud is the reigning sensation of Paris, and her successes there have lately been duplicated in Germany. She is a girl still in her teens, the winner of the first prize in piano at the Paris Conservatory and an artist who, despite her years, has accomplished great things.

The list of violinists comprises Mischa Elman, Willy Hess and Soma Steiner, the new second concert-master whom Dr. Muck has selected for the orchestra. Elman is by all odds the most interesting newcomer in the list of virtuosos, and from all accounts is a violinist of extraordinary attainments. He is a Russian, born in 1892, who has been playing in public since he was 5 years old. His first teacher was his father, his second Fiedlermann in the Imperial School of Music in Odessa, and his third was Leopold Auer in the Royal Conservatory in St. Petersburg. His first appearance after his association with Auer was in St. Petersburg in 1904, when he substituted on short notice for his master at an important concert with huge success. In Berlin, the same year, he repeated the success, and since 1905 he has been a regular visitor to England. His technique is said to be extraordinary and his musicianship that of a mature man rather than of a lad.

Mr. Hess returns this season to the position of concert-master of the orchestra, and will be welcomed by many friends. The new second concert-master will be Soma Pick Steiner of Vienna.

The other two soloists will be Alwyn Schroeder, the former leading cellist of the orchestra, and Heinrich Warnke, the present leader of that group of instruments.

Novelties.

Mr. Fiedler has sent over a partial list of the novelties he expects to produce. They are:

- Paderewski—Symphony
- Max Reger—Overture (first performance in America).
- Noren—"Kaleidoscope" variations.
- Delius—"Brigg Fair" or "Paris" or "Appalachia."
- Bruckner—Symphony, No. 8.
- Sibelius—"Finlandia," "Fruehlingslied," "Valse Artiste."
- Niccolò—Two Scherzos from "Gloria." (1), "Durch's Feuer"; (2), "Durch die Schmelde."
- Glazounoff—Suite "Moyen Age," "Printemps."
- Gretry-Mottl—Three Dances.
- Tschalkowsky—"Reve d'enfant" (from Suite, op. 53).
- Schillings—Harvest Dance from "Moloch."

Programmes.

The first four programmes are as follows:

- I.
- 1—Beethoven.... Overture "Leonore," No. 3
- 2—Brahms.... Symphony No. 1, in C minor
- 3—Strauss.... Love scene from "Feuersnot"
- 4—Wagner.... Overture "Tannhaeuser"
- II.
- 1—Rimsky-Korsakoff (died June 21, 1908).... Suite "Scheherazade"
- 2—Concerto.... For Piano
- 3—Schumann.... Symphony in D minor
- Soloist, Emil Sauer.
- III.
- 1—Beethoven.... Symphonie in E flat "Eroica"
- 2—Smetana.... Symphonic poem "Moldau"
- 3—Hugo Wolf.... Italian Serenade
- 4—Wagner.... Prelude to "The Mastersingers"
- IV.
- 1—Weber.... Overture "Oberon"
- 2—Tschalkowsky.... Symphony in B minor "Pathetique"
- 3—Concerto.... For Violoncello
- 4—Beethoven.... Overture "Egmont"
- Soloist, Alwyn Schroeder.

Noren's variations were performed for the first time at a festival of the German musicians in 1907 at Dresden. The composer was then comparatively unknown, and the brilliance of the piece excited attention. In these variations Noren introduced a theme or tow from Strauss' "Heldenleben" as an act of homage, and he printed in the score over the quoted measures: "To a famous contemporary." Strauss was pleased, but the publishers of "Heldenleben" protested against the printing and sale of the "Kaleidoscope," by reason of the section of the copyright law of 1901, which says: "In a musical composition it is not permissible to take a recognizable melody from it and incorporate it in a new work." The Langericht of Leipzig granted Noren permission to publish his work, on the ground that the themes in "Heldenleben" were not melodies in the strict sense! Noren lived and taught for many years in Berlin. He now lives near Dresden. It was the intention of Dr. Muck to produce the "Kaleidoscope" last season. The proceedings in court prevented him.

Fritz Delius, born in Yorkshire, Eng., is a composer of the ultra-modern school. His symphonic works and an opera have aroused lively discussion in Germany. Several years ago, Mr. J. F. Runciman, in articles published both in England and America, praised his rare talent, but he is still unknown in this country. Delius, who has seen many men and cities, sojourned for a time in the southern states. One of his operas is founded on a tale by Cable, and "Appalachia" is said to be inspired by sights and sounds in Florida.

The other composers whose works will be played in Boston for the first time are more familiar to local concert-goers.

CONDUCTOR OF SYMPHONY SAILS FROM BREMEN

Journal FOR BOSTON 24-1908
Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, sailed Tuesday on the Kronprinz Wilhelm of the North German Lloyd line from Bremen. He is due to arrive in New York next Tuesday, and will be met there by C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, who will bring him directly to Boston. On the same ship with him come Edmund Mueller, the new second bassoon, and Oscar Ludwig, the new double bass. Mr. Noack, the new second concert-master, is due to arrive the following week.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

As the Symphony Orchestra will give 10 more concerts this year than it did last, Mr. Ellis, the manager, has found it possible to meet partially the request of Cambridge for more concerts. For the last several years six concerts have been given in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, but this year the number will be eight. The western trip of one week, which has become a regular part of the year's schedule, will come as usual the last week of January. This season the cities to be visited are Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester.

The patrons of the Symphony concerts will give warm welcome to the news that under the leadership of Mr. Fiedler the orchestra will play during the season a considerable amount of Wagner. It is well known that Dr. Muck did not believe in putting excerpts from Wagner's operas into symphony programmes and nearly the only Wagnerian music he conducted was at the Pension Fund concerts. Mr. Fiedler evidently has no such prejudices and in his first few programmes are several Wagner selections—in fact on his first programme he has placed the overture to "Tannhaeuser." He is bringing over with him a number of interesting novelties. Among the new works which he will play is an overture by Max Reger. This will not be published until the beginning of November, and the composer has given Mr. Fiedler the right of first performance in America.

The prospects for the auction sales have never been more favorable than this year. Interest in the concerts seems to be as keen as ever, and with the exceptionally attractive prospectus which is to be announced next week, a most successful sale is anticipated. The days of the auction sales are the 28th and 29th of September, and the 1st and 2d of October.

EIGHT O'CLOCK STILL FOR THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

A Decision Not to Change the Hour of Beginning on Saturdays—Miss Farrar's Summer Play and Winter Work—Blanche Bates Appears in a Piece After Her Heart—"The Fighting Hope" as Washington Saw It—The Wits and "The Devil"—The Coming of Mischa Elman to Boston—Operatic News—"Paid in Full" Liked in London

After some discussion of the circumstances and some inquiry into the wishes of the public of the Saturday-evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, it has been decided to make no change, for the new season, in the hour at which they begin. The advocates of a later beginning proposed 8.15, instead of the established eight, partly because it is the customary hour for concerts in nearly every American city; partly because the tendency with other concerts here in Boston last winter set toward the later time; partly because the dinner-hour among the public of the Symphony Concerts tends to become later and later; and partly because, with those concerts ending at ten o'clock, fifteen minutes of grace was more desirable earlier than later in the evening. All these seemed valid arguments, and the management of the orchestra cheerfully acknowledged that fifteen minutes did sometimes make the difference between a tranquil and a perturbed dinner, and the consequent mood in which the listener, critical or uncritical, came to the concert-room.

On the other hand, inquiry disclosed scarcely less valid objections to the change. An appreciable part of the audience on Saturday nights comes from the suburbs and journeys to Symphony Hall by train as well as by trolley. It happens that the trains upon which these listeners depend are nicely adjusted to the present hours at which the concerts begin and end, and that, unless the railroads altered their schedules they would be put to inconvenience. Moreover, another appreciable part of this suburban public are unescorted women, who wish to be indoors as soon after ten o'clock as may be. The result of the balancing of arguments was a decision to abide by the present hour, because the urban and late-dining part of the audience was likely to suffer less inconvenience under the present arrangement than the suburban part would by the change. In practice, however, there is likely to be a happy compromise. Mr. Gericke was indeed as merciless as the hand of a clock. When his watch said eight, at eight he began. Dr. Muck was more lenient; he liked a leisurely cigarette after dinner, and did not begrudge one to the rest of us, so that it was usually ten minutes past eight before he took up his stick. By all reports, Mr. Fiedler will not be less kind.

Musical News

This season, the Symphony Orchestra will increase the number of its concerts in Sanders Theatre in Cambridge from six to eight. Steadily the public of these concerts has increased, in and out of the university, until there have been more applications for places than seats to be sold. Hence the two additional concerts.

The journey to Western cities at the end of January has now become a part of the annual routine of the Symphony Orchestra, and next winter it goes to Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester.

Reger's newest composition is a concert overture, and he has promised it to the Symphony Orchestra for its first performance in America in the course of the winter.

Mme. Calvé is to sing at least once in Boston this season—at an orchestral concert of French music with Mr. Albert Debuchy conducting and renewing his experiment of last year.

Emmy Destinn at the Symphony Concerts

If the company of the Metropolitan Opera House is finally unable to find room in a theatre here, we in Boston will at least hear in concert the most distinguished of the new singers that join it in November. Miss Emmy Destinn, it is good to announce, has been engaged for a pair of Symphony Concerts in the course of the winter, and there we may at least appreciate the warmth of her voice and the emotional and the imaginative qualities of her singing, if not the force of her acting. Miss Destinn, for ten years past one of the chief singers of the Royal Opera at Berlin, is primarily a singing actress, with parts that range from Butterfly to Salome; but both in Berlin and in London, where she has sung for some years at Covent Garden, she has appeared on occasion in orchestral concerts. To see, she is dark, well-built, and not uncomely, with a hint—and more—of her Bohemian blood in her face and figure. Her voice is a full, warm and expressive soprano, and she uses it with an artistry that makes it serve the emotional ends she would gain. Last year there was new blood—and for the better—among the players in the orchestra. This year there will be as much new blood among the soloists.

Re-enter the Symphonies, with the auctioneer as the impresario.

The Symphony Season

The annual auction sales of seats for the season of Symphony concerts come a little earlier this year than usual. The sale of $18 seats for the public rehearsals on twenty-four Friday afternoons will be on Monday, Sept. 28, beginning at ten o'clock. The $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday, Sept. 29, at the same hour. The sale of the $18 seats for the concerts will be on Thursday, Oct. 1, while the $10 seats for the concerts will be sold on Friday, Oct. 2.

According to the long-established custom, full announcement concerning the season, the works to be presented and the soloists to appear will be made on the second Saturday and Sunday preceding the sales, in the afternoon papers of Saturday, Sept. 19, and the morning papers of Sunday, Sept. 20. This year's announcement promises to be more than ordinarily attractive. The soloists engaged include only artists of the first rank, and several of them have never been heard in Boston with the Symphony Orchestra. Rather more than usual emphasis will be laid on the vocal features of the concerts.

Mr. Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Orchestra, will sail from Bremen on Tuesday, Sept. 22, and is due to arrive in New York on the 29th.

The season will include 110 concerts between the opening in Boston on Oct. 8 and 9, when the first public rehearsal and the first concert will be given, and the close of the season on Saturday, May 1. In addition to the twenty-four public rehearsals and concerts in Boston, the five monthly trips to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, and the week's trip to the West, more than the usual number of concerts will be given in New England.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

AUCTION SALE OF $18.00 SEATS FOR THE FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS AT SYMPHONY HALL THIS MONDAY MORNING AT 10 O'CLOCK, CONTINUING THROUGH THE DAY.

Auction Sale of $10 Seats for Public Rehearsals Tomorrow, TUESDAY. Auction Sale of $18 Seats for Concerts THURSDAY, Oct. 1, Auction Sale of $10 Seats for Concerts FRIDAY, Oct. 2.
(A)

HIGHEST PREMIUM $71

Auction of Seats for Symphony Rehearsals

Last Year's Maximum Was Not Reached

Lively Bidding Throughout the Morning

Sale Is to Be Continued During the Week

Trans. Sept. 28, 1908
Two seats, Nos. 18 and 19, in the centre of Row Q in Symphony Hall, which sold today at a premium of $71, proved to be less by nine dollars than the highest premium paid correspondingly at last season's sale of seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra. The sale opened this morning at ten o'clock, and only the seats for which $18 is the face value were offered for sale. There was about the usual throng of people present as bidders or merely as interested onlookers. The ticket brokers, including Messrs. Herrick, Burke (of Connolly & Burke), Wadsworth, Pratt, Heard and others were all on hand and, as is their custom, were in a group by themselves in the very front row. They were frequent bidders for good places and at times the competition for seats was limited to merely two of these brokers. All evidently had many commissions to execute for regular patrons of these concerts.

As usual, Walter Jackson acted as auctioneer. The opening sale, beginning with seats Nos. 1, 2, etc., in Row A, was made at a premium of $8.50, as against a premium of $5 last year. In this front row the premiums ranged from the first sale up to as high as $19.50. In Row B they ranged from $12.50 to $23 premiums, and in C ran from $10, as the lowest, to $22.50, as the highest premiums. Row D created livelier bidding, and prices secured were from $12 to $41, which was paid for two centre seats, one of which was an end one. First sales in Row E were made at $19, the lowest in this row, in which Mr. Herrick was an active and frequent buyer, and as high as $58 premium was paid for a centre end seat. Row F began with sales at $20.50 for four seats, and prices averaged around $30 to $33, with $43 as the top price. The bidding was brisk and spirited, and after the first sale here the bids started at $25.

At this point one could secure excellent places at prices below some of those previously given, and in Row G the premiums were from $22 to $47 for seats in the centre aisle. For the next row the bids began at $15, instead of $25, which had been ruling, and the sales ranged from $26 up to $57 and then fell off to $23.50. There was sharp competition in Row I, and many places sold at from $43 to $49, although as low as $23 was accepted for some seats. As high as $68 was paid in Row J for a single good seat in the centre aisle, and in this row $26 was the lowest price.

It looked when a man bought seat No. 18 in Row K at $70 as if that would be the top price, and he paid a like premium for the next seat, No. 19, buying them separately. This sale was eclipsed, however, when Row Q was reached and $71 was paid for Nos. 18 and 19, the highest price of the forenoon. Last year $80 was the highest price at the opening sale. Row L is a favorite section, judged from the lively bidding, yet prices ranged only from $30.50 to $45 and back to $25. Rows M, N, O and P seemed equally popular with buyers, and prices were from a little below $30 to as high as $59 in these rows. By this time the hall had thinned out considerably and many ladies, who always predominate over men at these public sales, had left the hall, possibly because it was nearing the usual hour for luncheon.

All in all, the demand for seats was excellent, and the prices seemed to average about those of last year. To each premium paid the face price of the seats, $18, had to be added, it must be remembered. After a recess for luncheon the sale was resumed this afternoon, beginning with places well back in about the middle part of the hall. New bidders assembled, while some of those present at the morning session returned to again try their luck in bidding. The $10 seats for the Friday rehearsals will be sold at the hall on Tuesday, beginning at ten o'clock.

BIG DEMAND FOR SYMPHONY SEATS

First Day's Sale Results in Disposal of 1652 Seats, Two Bringing a Premium of $71 Each, the Highest.

Journal Sept. 29, 1908
When Walter Jackson, auctioneer, "knocked down" the last seat put on sale at Symphony Hall yesterday for the Boston Symphony concerts, he brought to a close the most successful first day's sale in many years. From 10 in the morning until 5.45 in the evening the sale continued, with a half hour's intermission at 1.30, and altogether 1653 seats were disposed of at premiums which averaged about the same as last year.

The highest premium paid was $71 each for two seats, Nos. 18 and 19 of row Q down stairs, which was less by nine dollars than the highest premium paid last season. The day's sale was completed in record time, twenty-three minutes quicker than last year, and a remarkable feature was the smoothness with which it proceeded. Those in charge say that not a single mistake was made throughout the whole day.

Attendance Is Large.

The attendance was, if anything larger than last year, when Mr. Jackson started the sale at 10 o'clock, and it was noticeable that many of the bidders, a large majority of whom were women, stayed until the last seat was sold. The bidding, while at times animated, was not unusually spirited. The usual number of ticket brokers was present occupying seats near the front of the stage, and they evidently had numerous commissions for regular patrons. At times the bidding was confined to two of the brokers, while occasionally an outside bidder had the temerity to stay a broker past his limit and outbid him. At such sallies there was generally a smile of amusement among the other bidders.

A large bulletin board, with sectional plats of all the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals, which were the only ones sold yesterday, was placed on the stage, and as Auctioneer Jackson called the seats sold George Harts-horn, the head usher and ticket taker at Symphony Hall, marked them off the plat, while the buyers stepped to the improvised office at the right side of the hall and secured their tickets.

Bidding Becomes Lively.

The first seat sold, No. 1 in Row A, went at a premium of $8.50, which was $3.50 more than last year. Other premiums in this row ranged as high as $19.50. As the seats further back were put up, the bidding became livelier, reaching premiums of $41 in row D and $58 in row E. One seat in row K brought a premium of $70, which was the top price until the two seats in Q were sold at $71. The bidding was spasmodic throughout, and seats adjoining those which brought a big premium often went at a far less price. There was seldom a hitch in the bidding, and even in the balcony it was lively at times, premiums of as high as $55 being secured for choice seats there.

This morning at 10 o'clock the $10 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals, 412 in number, will be placed on sale. The sale will continue on Thursday and Friday, when the $18 and the $10 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold.

Did you get your symphony seat? And are you proud because you had to bid the biggest premium in the hall, or congratulating yourself because you achieved such a bargain? Trans. Sept. 30/08

$71 PREMIUM PAID FOR SYMPHONY SEAT

Highest Price Bid at Rehearsal Ticket Sale $20 Less Than Last Year.

Herald Sept. 27, 1908
Seventy-one dollars was the highest premium paid for a seat at yesterday's auction sale of rehearsal tickets for the Boston Symphony orchestra season. This premium was bid for an aisle seat in row K by a broker for a Boston man. The amount is less by $20 than the highest premium paid at last year's sale, but the average yesterday was fully as good as that of a twelvemonth ago.

The orchestra this year, as usual, will give 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts, and yesterday's was the first of a series of auctions which dispose of the $18 and $10 seats for both rehearsals and concerts.

There were about 200 present in the hall when Auctioneer Jackson knocked down seat No. 1 in row A. Among them were several well known society people, numbers of musical students, music lovers and well to do persons, sitting beside the footmen or butlers of their neighbors, who had been sent to purchase seats for their employers, together with plainly dressed folks, who probably had saved for months to secure the sum necessary for a ticket with its premium.

If any one supposed that an $18 seat could be purchased for that price he was soon undeceived. The very first seat, undesirable because it was so near the bass instruments, brought $8.50 as a premium.

A small group of men sat on the left hand side of the hall, and these the auctioneer watched sharply. They were ticket brokers, most of them with commissions to purchase certain seats, and some of them purchased for their own profit. A large number of seats were bought in by the brokers, but they were obliged to pay good prices for them.

The first four rows were quickly disposed of, because there was no great desire to be so close to the band. They brought, however, an average of about $18 premium. Seat 19 in row E was wanted by several people, and was quickly bid up to $58. More than 100 seats were sold before that figure was reached again. In rows H, I, J, K, L, M, N, O many seats were sold at between $60 and $70.

Mrs. John L. Gardner visited the hall early in order to see that her agent secured her regular seats. She got them, but paid one of the big premiums. The rows in the centre of the hall brought the highest prices, averaging around $35. The back rows sold at from $20 to $25 premium. Some of the desirable seats in the balcony brought premiums of over $40, and all brought good prices.

Today the $10 seats will be auctioned.

PREMIUMS AVERAGED LOWER

Ten-Dollar Seats for Symphony Rehearsals Sold at Figures Below Those of Last Year

Trans. Sept. 29, 1908
Premiums ranged today from $28, as the highest, down to $9 as the minimum price for the remaining seats for the public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoons the coming season. These prices were lower than the maximum and minimum premiums at last year's corresponding sale, when the prices were $36.50 and $13 as the highest and lowest respectively. Many sales today were made below the premiums secured last year.

The sale which opened on Monday in Symphony Hall was continued there today. Yesterday the higher-priced seats, of the face value of $18, were sold and today those of the face value of $10 were offered. To this price all premiums bid were added. The attendance was far smaller than on Monday and it thinned out noticeably long before the conclusion of the sale. This gave opportunity for those who remained to pick up some excellent seats at fair prices, places fully as desirable, from a music lover's viewpoint, as those for which much higher premiums, comparatively, were paid on Monday.

The $10 seats sold today included eight full rows and one broken row on the floor, all under the first balcony, together with four rear rows in the centre of the first balcony, seats which are under the second balcony. The sale opened with disposal of seats on the floor in row KK. The first sales were made at $24 and in this row the premiums ran up to $27.50 and as low as $20.50. In row LL the prices ranged from $20 to $25, and in the next row, MM, they were from $16, as the lowest premium, to $28 as the highest, and this was the top price of the day's sales. In the row directly behind, NN, the range was from $15.50 to $19, the last figure for seats fully as good as those for $28 in the row ahead. Through succeeding rows the prices fell off some, running from $14 to $17.50 in OO and from $11 to $17 in PP, while in QQ $14 was paid for some seats and others sold as low as $7.50 and $6 in RR, where $11 was the highest premium. This completed the full rows of seats on the floor of the hall, leaving only a half dozen grouped in the extreme right and left-hand corners, in row SS, which ranged from $6.50 to a dollar less.

The first balcony seats brought out more spirited demand, and the ticket brokers, in their accustomed front seats, took a hand here. Row E is the first of the $10 seats, and the sales began at $17, fell to $15.50, reached $24 in the middle of the row, and went down to $18, with final sales at $19. The average was around $21. Row F showed sales as high as $21.50 and as low as $15 for seats in the centre of the row. The next row, G, had a record of sales at $16 and $12.50 as the extreme premiums, with $13.50 as the highest price reached in Row H and $10 as the lowest. This is the last full row in the rear of the first balcony and the odd seats in Row I, six in each corner of the hall, brought for the most part $10, with $8.50 as the lowest price. Last year these same seats did not sell under $20 premium, with $21.50 as the highest price paid, showing a big fall in this part of the hall.

It was in the balcony that last year's top price of $36.50 was reached, as against $24 in Row E today, as the highest premium in the balcony. Last year, the premiums reached $27 in rows KK and LL on the floor, as against $27.50 and $25 respectively this year. The odd corner seats in Row SS, which today sold at $5.50 to $6.50, brought $13, $13.50 and $14 a year ago.

On Thursday morning the $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold and on Friday the $10 seats will be offered.

PREMIUM OF $51 PAID

Sale of Seats for Symphony Concerts

Good Places Obtainable at Fair Prices

Some Ticket Brokers Paid High Rates

Tomorrow Offers a Final Opportunity to Buy

Trans. Oct. 1, 1908
Because two men sitting beside each other in Symphony Hall, this morning, were bent upon securing the same pair of seats, Nos. 18 and 19 in Row N on the floor of the hall, the premium was run up to $51, at which one of the two bought these places. Seat No. 18 is an end one, on the centre aisle. The rival bidders may have been friends and possibly they merely by chance sat beside each other, but their bidding was carried on, dollar by dollar, between the two in a most friendly way. No one else entered into this competition. This was the record price of the premiums paid for floor seats for the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Only the $18 seats were on sale today, hence this price had to be added to all premiums paid. This makes the two seats mentioned at $51 premium stand the buyer at $138, or $69 for each ticket.

The attendance at this sale was larger than on any previous days at the beginning, and it was noticed that far more men hour's intermission at 1.30, and altogether 1652 seats were disposed of at premiums which averaged about the same as last year.

The highest premium paid was $71 each for two seats, Nos. 18 and 19 of row Q down stairs, which was less by nine dollars than the highest premium paid last season. The day's sale was completed in record time, twenty-three minutes quicker than last year, and a remarkable feature was the smoothness with which it proceeded. Those in charge say that not a single mistake was made throughout the whole day.

Attendance Is Large.

The attendance was, if anything larger than last year, when Mr. Jackson started the sale at 10 o'clock, and it was noticeable that many of the bidders, a large majority of whom were women, stayed until the last seat was sold. The bidding, while at times animated, was not unusually spirited. The usual number of ticket brokers was present occupying seats near the front of the stage, and they evidently had numerous commissions for regular patrons. At times the bidding was confined to two of the brokers, while occasionally an outside bidder had the temerity to stay a broker past his limit and outbid him. At such sallies there was generally a smile of amusement among the other bidders.

A large bulletin board, with sectional plats of all the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals, which were the only ones sold yesterday, was placed on the stage, and as Auctioneer Jackson called the seats sold George Harts-horn, the head usher and ticket taker at Symphony Hall, marked them off the plat, while the buyers stepped to the improvised office at the right side of the hall and secured their tickets.

Bidding Becomes Lively.

The first seat sold, No. 1 in Row A, went at a premium of $8.50, which was $3.50 more than last year. Other premiums in this row ranged as high as $19.50. As the seats further back were put up, the bidding became livelier, reaching premiums of $41 in row D and $58 in row E. One seat in row K brought a premium of $70, which was the top price until the two seats in Q were sold at $71. The bidding was spasmodic throughout, and seats adjoining those which brought a big premium often went at a far less price. There was seldom a hitch in the bidding, and even in the balcony it was lively at times, premiums of as high as $55 being secured for choice seats there.

This morning at 10 o'clock the $10 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals, 412 in number, will be placed on sale. The sale will continue on Thursday and Friday, when the $18 and the $10 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold.

Did you get your symphony seat? And are you proud because you had to bid the biggest premium in the hall, or congratulating yourself because you achieved such a bargain? Globe Sept. 30/08

$71 PREMIUM PAID FOR SYMPHONY SEAT

Highest Price Bid at Rehearsal Ticket Sale $20 Less Than Last Year.

Herald Sept. 29, 1908
Seventy-one dollars was the highest premium paid for a seat at yesterday's auction sale of rehearsal tickets for the Boston Symphony orchestra season. This premium was bid for an aisle seat in row K by a broker for a Boston man. The amount is less by $20 than the highest premium paid at last year's sale, but the average yesterday was fully as good as that of a twelvemonth ago.

The orchestra this year, as usual, will give 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts, and yesterday's was the first of a series of auctions which dispose of the $18 and $10 seats for both rehearsals and concerts.

There were about 200 present in the hall when Auctioneer Jackson knocked down seat No. 1 in row A. Among them were several well known society people, numbers of musical students, music lovers and well to do persons, sitting beside the footmen or butlers of their neighbors, who had been sent to purchase seats for their employers, together with plainly dressed folks, who probably had saved for months to secure the sum necessary for a ticket with its premium.

If any one supposed that an $18 seat could be purchased for that price he was soon undeceived. The very first seat, undesirable because it was so near the bass instruments, brought $8.50 as a premium.

A small group of men sat on the left hand side of the hall, and these the auctioneer watched sharply. They were ticket brokers, most of them with commissions to purchase certain seats, and some of them purchased for their own profit. A large number of seats were bought in by the brokers, but they were obliged to pay good prices for them.

The first four rows were quickly disposed of, because there was no great desire to be so close to the band. They brought, however, an average of about $18 premium. Seat 19 in row E was wanted by several people, and was quickly bid up to $58. More than 100 seats were sold before that figure was reached again. In rows H, I, J, K, L, M, N, O many seats were sold at between $60 and $70.

Mrs. John L. Gardner visited the hall early in order to see that her agent secured her regular seats. She got them, but paid one of the big premiums. The rows in the centre of the hall brought the highest prices, averaging around $35. The back rows sold at from $20 to $25 premium. Some of the desirable seats in the balcony brought premiums of over $40, and all brought good prices.

Today the $10 seats will be auctioned.

PREMIUMS AVERAGED LOWER

Ten-Dollar Seats for Symphony Rehearsals Sold at Figures Below Those of Last Year

Trans. Sept. 29, 1908
Premiums ranged today from $28, as the highest, down to $9 as the minimum price for the remaining seats for the public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoons the coming season. These prices were lower than the maximum and minimum premiums at last year's corresponding sale, when the prices were $36.50 and $13 as the highest and lowest respectively. Many sales today were made below the premiums secured last year.

The sale which opened on Monday in Symphony Hall was continued there today. Yesterday the higher-priced seats, of the face value of $18, were sold and today those of the face value of $10 were offered. To this price all premiums bid were added. The attendance was far smaller than on Monday and it thinned out noticeably long before the conclusion of the sale. This gave opportunity for those who remained to pick up some excellent seats at fair prices, places fully as desirable, from a music lover's viewpoint, as those for which much higher premiums, comparatively, were paid on Monday.

The $10 seats sold today included eight full rows and one broken row on the floor, all under the first balcony, together with four rear rows in the centre of the first balcony, seats which are under the second balcony. The sale opened with disposal of seats on the floor in row KK. The first sales were made at $24 and in this row the premiums ran up to $27.50 and as low as $20.50. In row LL the prices ranged from $20 to $25, and in the next row, MM, they were from $16, as the lowest premium, to $28 as the highest, and this was the top price of the day's sales. In the row directly behind, NN, the range was from $15.50 to $19, the last figure for seats fully as good as those for $28 in the row ahead. Through succeeding rows the prices fell off some, running from $14 to $17.50 in OO and from $11 to $17 in PP, while in QQ $14 was paid for some seats and others sold as low as $7.50 and $6 in RR, where $11 was the highest premium. This completed the full rows of seats on the floor of the hall, leaving only a half dozen grouped in the extreme right and left-hand corners, in row SS, which ranged from $6.50 to a dollar less.

The first balcony seats brought out more spirited demand, and the ticket brokers, in their accustomed front seats, took a hand here. Row E is the first of the $10 seats, and the sales began at $17, fell to $15.50, reached $24 in the middle of the row, and went down to $18, with final sales at $19. The average was around $21. Row F showed sales as high as $21.50 and as low as $15 for seats in the centre of the row. The next row, G, had a record of sales at $16 and $12.50 as the extreme premiums, with $13.50 as the highest price reached in Row H and $10 as the lowest. This is the last full row in the rear of the first balcony and the odd seats in Row I, six in each corner of the hall, brought for the most part $10, with $8.50 as the lowest price. Last year these same seats did not sell under $20 premium, with $21.50 as the highest price paid, showing a big fall in this part of the hall.

It was in the balcony that last year's top price of $36.50 was reached, as against $24 in Row E today, as the highest premium in the balcony. Last year, the premiums reached $27 in rows KK and LL on the floor, as against $27.50 and $25 respectively this year. The odd corner seats in Row SS, which today sold at $5.50 to $6.50, brought $13, $13.50 and $14 a year ago.

On Thursday morning the $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold and on Friday the $10 seats will be offered.

PREMIUM OF $51 PAID

Sale of Seats for Symphony Concerts

Good Places Obtainable at Fair Prices

Some Ticket Brokers Paid High Rates

Tomorrow Offers a Final Opportunity to Buy

Trans. Oct. 1, 1908
Because two men sitting beside each other in Symphony Hall, this morning, were bent upon securing the same pair of seats, Nos. 18 and 19 in Row N on the floor of the hall, the premium was run up to $51, at which one of the two bought these places. Seat No. 18 is an end one, on the centre aisle. The rival bidders may have been friends and possibly they merely by chance sat beside each other, but their bidding was carried on, dollar by dollar, between the two in a most friendly way. No one else entered into this competition. This was the record price of the premiums paid for floor seats for the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Only the $18 seats were on sale today, hence this price had to be added to all premiums paid. This makes the two seats mentioned at $51 premium stand the buyer at $138, or $69 for each ticket.

The attendance at this sale was larger than on any previous days at the beginning, and it was noticed that far more men were present than on Monday and Tuesday, when the Friday rehearsal tickets were sold. Except in some instances where ticket brokers desired special places for patrons who perhaps have occupied the same seats many seasons and desire them at almost any cost, the prices paid were not so high, relatively, as those paid for the same places when the rehearsal tickets were offered.

At the opening, in Row A, the first sale was at $4, and $6.50 was the top price here. In B the range was from $3 to $8, centre, and back to $3 at the extreme left hand of the hall. Row C ran from $3.50 to $10.50 and then back to $3, and Row D showed about the same figures. In Row E, good seats went for $3.50, and others brought as high as $13.50, which was the highest price paid, also in the next section, F, where several seats sold at $6 and some as low as $4.

When Row G was reached, the bidding lost some of the apathy which had marked it up to about that time, and here the prices began at $7, reached as high as $18.50 and fell off to $6 at the end of the row. Many good seats sold here at $7 and $9, and thereabout. In H about the same premiums were paid, and in I the range was from $5.50 up to $15.50. Always, the centre seats brought the highest prices, with lower ones at each end of any row. Rows J and K showed good demand for seats, yet prices were on the average below those of preceding rows.

It was noticeable that when a ticket broker purchased, it frequently was at the top price of the row and that private buyers in taking seats immediately adjoining, secured them for many dollars less premium. In Row K this was illustrated when some seats sold for $11.50 and a broker paid $18.50 for the next six, taking four and two seats, and someone, not a broker, secured the very next seats for $13, and equally good ones, too. In Row L the same condition was found in a jump from a sale at $12 for centre seats to a premium of $20.50 which a broker paid for the next four in order with $18.50 for three more, and the next sale was at $10. As high as $28 was paid in M, where the first four seats in the row sold for $9.50. They are considered an excellent location. Other premiums here were $26, $24.50, $18 and less.

It was in Row N that people showed keen interest when the middle of the row was reached. The first seats went for $9, and when four in the centre had sold at $18, the two rival bidders referred to held the bidding to themselves till one withdrew after the other had gone to $51. The adjoining seats, equally good, sold for $16. Others in this section sold as high as $35 and as low as $8, at the extreme left. Row O began at $8, reached $35 in the middle, fell off to $16 and recovered to $31, with adjoining seats going at $9.

The brokers were awake to mind their P's and Q's, to paraphrase the old saying, and they bought many good places. The prices which they and others paid were from $12 to $25 and back to $9 in Row P, and from $8 to $27 and back to $7, in Q. In R the prices ran from $8 at the opening up to as high as $30, and the end seats sold at $9.50. Row S showed a range of from $9 to $25.50 and a fall to $9. At this point the sale progressed with lower premiums on the average, and those still remaining in the hall, which had by now thinned out, could secure excellent seats at moderate premiums. On Friday morning the remaining seats in the hall, the $10 places for Saturday evening concerts, will go on sale.

FINAL SYMPHONY SALES

Tickets for Orchestra's Saturday Evening Concerts Sell at Reasonable Premiums

Trans. — Oct. 2, 1908
It was possible today to buy seats for the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a premium of only fifty cents, which added to the face value of the tickets, $10, makes the coveted card cost the holder $10.50, which for twenty-four concerts is less than fifty cents for each evening. This is all the more remarkable when it is remembered that such soloists as Paderewski, Miss Emmy Destinn, Emil Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Josef Lhévinne, Mme. Berta Morena and others are to be heard the coming season in connection with the world-famed orchestra. The sales at half a dollar were in rear rows of the second balcony, centre.

Today the final one in this season's series of sales by auction took place in Symphony Hall and the attendance was larger than on previous days. The $10 seats for Saturday evenings were the only ones remaining unsold. These began with seats in row KK, on the floor, where the premiums ranged from $12 to $18. In the next row they sold at $10 and up to $15.50, while in MM, a much-favored row for the Friday rehearsals, the premiums were from $7.50 to $10, and in NN from $6.50 to $8. They gradually crept downward, till in row RR many sold for $2.50, and the last row, SS, grouped in sets of half a dozen in the right and left-hand corners, sold for $2. For the Friday performances these brought considerably higher prices.

The places in the first and second balconies aroused more interest and higher premiums prevailed. The centre of the first balcony was sold first, beginning with Row E, where the prices ranged from $10 to $15.50 and back to $9. In F they were lower and in G $5 was the lowest and $8 the highest rate paid. The next row, H, showed sales as low as $3.50 and at this price and $4 fine seats could be secured, as they could in Row I, where sales were as low as $3 for the corner places. This completed this balcony.

The right-hand side seats of the second balcony next were offered and prices took on more activity. Beginning with a sale at $10, prices reached $21, with purchases at that figure and a little below it by ticket brokers. The lowest price in this row was $8.50. The second row began at $8.50, with next sales at $14.50 and a falling off to as low as $4 for the final seat, No. 52. The left-hand of the second balcony showed a range of from $10, as the opening sale for seats directly over the stage, up to $16.50, with final sales at $7. The second or wall row here opened at $7.50, reached $12, and by half dollars fell to as low as $5.

Seats in the centre of the second balcony brought less than those on the sides. The first seat, in Row A, sold for $6.50, and the next pair went for $6, and gradually as high as $11 was reached for centre seats, and at the extreme left of the row $6 was the premium paid. Most sales in this front row averaged about $8. Music lovers, students and the like were ready buyers today at this sale, and the ticket brokers seemed less eager to secure seats than they have been at previous sales this week. When final rows in the centre of the second balcony were reached the premiums dropped to as low as fifty cents. Many music lovers prefer these seats, even if they have to pay higher premiums for them.

SYMPHONY SEAT AUCTION.

Trans. — Oct. 2, 1908
Premiums Fall Below Records for Other Years; Some Seats Unsold.

Premiums for seats at Saturday night concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra fell below the records of other years at the auction yesterday morning, and some seats were left unsold.

The bidding was for the regulation $10 seats, and the highest premium paid during the sale was $21. This did not come up to the premiums paid for similar seats at Friday afternoon concerts, which brought as high as $27.50.

The seats at auction included the rows back of J on the floor, those back of E in the first balcony and the entire second balcony. The sale began with a good number of persons present, but the highest premium paid for a seat on the floor was only $13, and $15.50 was the highest for a seat in the first balcony. Spirited bidding was only seen when the auction of the front row seats in the second balcony began. It was one of these seats that brought a premium of $21.

After the first two or three rows of the second balcony were sold bidding became slower and the crowd melted away. For seats back of row D the bidding did not go higher than $1, and many seats were sold at a premium of 50 cents. When the auction closed, the greater part of rows F and G and the broken row H remained unsold. Walter Jackson was auctioneer.

WADSWORTH SYMPHONY BUREAU

Rehearsal and Concert Tickets For Sale

40 STATE STREET, ROOM 47
Telephone 4684-1 Main.

SMWF(A)

26

SYMPHONY SEAT AUCTION.

Highest Premium Paid Yesterday Was $51, Against $71 Monday.

Trans. — Oct. 2, 1908
The fact that seats for the Saturday night concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, auctioned yesterday at Symphony Hall, brought much lower premiums than seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals, auctioned last Monday, is taken as evidence that the Friday afternoon rehearsals are society occasions, while the Saturday evening concerts are merely musical events.

At Monday's sale the highest premium paid was $71 for two seats. Yesterday morning's highest premium for seats on the floor was $51; and even then two bankers were pitted against each other in the bidding.

The auction progressed at a lively rate. People sat quietly in their seats or tipped about apparently unconcerned, but their eyes were fixed intently upon the large chart upon the stage. The centre of the suppressed excitement was George Hartshorn, head usher at Symphony Hall, who sat at the top of a high step ladder and checked off the seats as they were knocked down to the highest bidder. Walter Jackson was auctioneer.

Symphony Tickets

Orders for season tickets are respectfully solicited, and all such will be executed with utmost care and for a small commission. Diagram of Symphony Hall and all information sent on request.

CONNELLY & BURKE

ADAMS HOUSE PHONE OX. 942

SMW(A)

12

Symphony Orchestra AUCTION SALE TICKETS

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS

Monday, Sept. 28, $18 Seats
Tuesday, Sept. 29, $10 Seats

24 CONCERTS

Thursday, Oct. 1, $18 Seats
Friday, Oct. 2, $10 Seats
At 10 A. M., Symphony Hall.
(A)

The New York Evening Post fancies that it has discovered a secret motive in the recent bestowal of a title, "Generalmusikdirector," upon Dr. Muck in Berlin. "Dr. Muck wants to return to America," it says, "to resume the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Berlin, of course, cannot afford to pay him as much as he gets over here. In such cases the German way is to secure loyalty by the bestowal of titles." Trans. Oct. 5, 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

TICKET
SALES
TODAY

Auction Sale of $18 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at SYMPHONY HALL

This (Monday) Morning, Beginning at 10 o'clock

Auction Sale of $10.00 Seats for Rehearsals, Tomorrow (Tuesday), at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 18.00 Seats for Concerts, Thursday, October 1, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 10.00 Seats for Concerts, Friday, October 2, at 10 A. M.

Soloists who will appear:

Miss EMMY DESTINN
(Royal Opera, Berlin, and Metropolitan Opera House, New York, first appearance in Boston.)

Mme. BERTA MORENA
(Royal Opera, Munich, and Metropolitan Opera House, New York.)

Miss CERVILLE-REACHE
(Manhattan Opera House, New York)

Mr. MISCHA ELMAN
(First appearance in Boston)

Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER

Mr. IGNACE J. PADEREWSKI

Mr. EMIL SAUER

Mr. OSSIP CABRILOWITSCH

Mr. JOSEF LHEVINNE

Miss GERMAINE SCHNITZER

Miss GERMAINE ARNAUD
(First appearance in Boston)

Mr. WILLY HESS and others

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

AUCTION SALE OF $18.00 SEATS FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS AT SYMPHONY HALL TODAY (Thursday) MORNING AT 10 O'CLOCK, CONTINUING THROUGH THE WEEK.

Auction Sale of $10.00 Seats for Concerts TOMORROW (FRIDAY), October 2. (A)

A NEW VIOLINIST

The One Vacancy in the Symphony Orchestra Filled

Trans. Sept. 16, 1906
The one vacancy in the ranks of the Symphony Orchestra for the new season has been filled today. It is that of second concert master—the violinist who will share the first desk with Professor Hess, and succeed Mr. Czerwonky of last year. The new man is Soma Pick Steiner, for six years concert master of the Philharmonic Orchestra at Leipzig, and then for three years with the orchestra of the Concert Verein of Vienna, both noted orchestras.

NEW SYMPHONY LEADER HERE.

Dr Max Fiedler Says His Programs Will Combine Classic and Modern Music.

Globe Sept. 30, 1906

If Max Fiedler, the new leader of the Symphony orchestra, makes as big a hit with the Boston public as he did with the newspaper reporters who met him when he arrived from New York last evening, there isn't any question as to his personal popularity in this city.

This pleasant-faced, amiable, willing and obliging gentleman stood the test of having six different questions, one of them in German, fired at him at once, and did his best to answer each and thereby please all hands.

About 8:25, it might have been a minute or two earlier, the New York train, due at that hour, entered the Back Bay station. On hand to meet it was Fred R. Comee of the Symphony management and the press representatives.

The first to alight from one of the parlor cars was C. A. Ellis, also of the Symphony management, who assisted Mrs Fiedler down the steps. Then came W. E. Walter, publicity man of the Symphony, followed by Dr Fiedler. With them from New York were Edmund Mueller, the new second bassoon, and Oscar Ludwig, the new double bassoon of the Symphony. They hail from Berlin.

Dr Fiedler is about 45 years old, yet you might think him a trifle older. Last evening he wore a suit of dark gray, a negligee shirt, a bright lavender tie, a gray soft felt hat and an overcoat. On his left arm there hung a huge fur coat and a case with canes and umbrellas.

With his right hand he gripped a piece of luggage. Heavily laden as he was he smiled benignly and when he learned the identity of the newspaper men his smile broadened and he stopped, evidently to await their convenience.

Dr Fiedler came over on the Kronprinz Wilhelm, reaching New York yesterday morning. He had not enjoyed the voyage, at least the first part of it, one of the party with him said, and had not proved a very good sailor.

"Have a good trip?" some one asked. "All right, it was all right," came the laughing answer.

Then another wanted to know if Dr Fiedler had heard the Boston symphony orchestra and he replied he had in New York and that he considered it the best in the world.

"Is your wife with you and is she a German?" was another query put.

"My wife is with me and she is English," replied Dr Fiedler, as he laughed and pointed with his forefinger at Mrs Fiedler.

"Got any children?" "Children?" repeated the great musician, and then he laughed again.

"Three, three children,"

"What's their names?" was asked.

"Well, there is Wilhelm—"

"How old is he?"

"Wilhelm is 17, and there is May, she is 13, and the little fellow, Max, he is 10."

"Have you brought them with you, Dr Fiedler?"

"No, the younger ones are at Oxford with my brother, who is a professor of German literature at Oxford university, and my oldest son is studying in Germany."

"Do you play golf?" questioned a reporter, sizing up the case full of umbrellas and canes.

"Golf?" and Dr Fiedler burst into another hearty laugh. "Golf? no."

If you've ever felt sincerely glad of an opportunity of meeting a genuinely good-natured person you will know what a benefit it is to talk with Dr Fiedler. He didn't want to hurry the process of polite inquisition one bit, and chatted all the way up the stairs to the platform above and until the carriage was reached, allowing ample time for everybody to ask anything they could think of.

Dr Fiedler said his program for the symphony concerts would be combinations of classic and new music, and he mentioned Brahms, Wagner, Richard Strauss, Grieg and a number of other composers whose works would be heard in Boston.

It was then explained that Dr and Mrs Fiedler would at once proceed to the Somerset for dinner; they were hungry, but were too considerate of the reporters to intimate that fact, and—well, that was about all.

"O," spoke up one reporter, thoughtfully addressing Mr Walter, "give us some who's who on Dr Fiedler," which request meant a desire for something in the line of a brief biographical sketch.

Then it was told the reporters how Dr Fiedler was director of the Philharmonic society of Hamburg and gave up the directorship of the Hamburg conservatory of music to come to Boston; how he led the chief musical organizations, on different occasions, in the leading cities of Europe; how he had been in the United States once before, directing two concerts for the Philharmonic society of New York, though never before in Boston; how he had married an English woman who formerly lived at Newcastle-on-Tyne, etc. "Is that right, doctor?" asked Mr Walter.

"I guess so," Dr Fiedler laughingly replied, and thereupon the group moved toward the carriage wherein sat Mrs Fiedler. The doctor lifted his hat and the reporters theirs, and with this exchange of courtesies the interview was concluded.

NEW CONDUCTOR OF SYMPHONY ARRIVES

Max Fiedler, Successor to Dr. Muck, Prepares to Begin Work Immediately.

Herald Sept. 30, 1905
Max Fiedler stepped from the train at the Back Bay station last evening eager to begin his work as successor to Dr. Karl Muck in conducting the Boston Symphony orchestra.

"You expected to see me come down the steps waving a baton, perhaps," he said to the reporters. His arms were full of fur-collared coats, umbrellas, and other travelling paraphernalia. The conductor had come prepared for any sort of weather.

Charles A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, was the first to grasp the newcomer's hand and passed on to receive Mrs. Fiedler. Mr. Fiedler declared that they had a fairly good passage, landing in New York in the morning. They came from the metropolis on the 3 o'clock train.

"Now we are hungry," he concluded.

First Visit to Boston.

It was suggested that he try the article that comes first on Boston's bill-of-fare—baked beans.

"What is that? Is it good?" he responded with a ready spirit.

"You have never been in Boston before if you don't know beans."

"No, this is my first visit to Boston. I was in New York two years and a half ago, when I conducted two concerts for the Philharmonic Society. On that visit I heard the Boston Symphony orchestra play, Dr. D'Indy conducting, and I thought then I should like to be its conductor, for it was, and remains, the best orchestra I have ever heard."

"Yes," he went on in answer to another question, "I am a pianist, and possibly I shall give some chamber concerts. I do not know yet. I am anxious to begin work. Possibly I shall hold a rehearsal this week."

He was told that the orchestra was taking part in the Worcester musical festival and was interested to know that Mr. Kniesel was conducting. Learning that Worcester was only 40 miles away, he said he would like to go down, but that he has a great many things to attend to here.

Speaks of His Children.

He turned to see how the others were managing with the bundles and bags and handboxes, and a smile to his wife conveyed his pleasure over his reception. Mrs. Fiedler is taller than her husband, who is not over medium height and boasts the circumference becoming to a man past 40.

"My wife is English," said Mr. Fiedler. "Her home was in Newcastle-on-Tyne. But that is a romance of 20 years ago," he continued, with a laugh. "No, my wife is not musical. She is just—my wife." This with a beaming smile at her. "She was with me before when I came to America. She has travelled almost everywhere with me. We have three children," he asserted, with much emphasis on the number.

"There is Wilhelm, he is a German college boy, 17 years old. Our younger children, my daughter May, 13 years old, and Max, who is 10 years old and named after me—they are with my brother George at Oxford, England. He is professor of German literature in the university. You think I should bring them with me? Next year, perhaps; we shall see. They might become Americans—so?"

Other Musicians with Him.

On the same steamer and train with the conductor came Oscar Ludwig, double bass violinist, and Edmund Meuller, who plays the big bassoon, both of Berlin. They were engaged for the orchestra by Dr. Muck.

In order to become head of the Boston Symphony, Mr. Fiedler resigned the directorship of the Hamburg Conservatory of Music. For the last five years he has also led the Philharmonia Society of Hamburg. Under his leadership patrons of the Symphony here will hear the works of many modern composers, notably Richard Strauss. He was graduated from the Hostein school in Leipzig in 1880, and since then he has conducted in nearly every large city in Europe.

SYMPHONY PLANS.

New Conductor for Orchestra Sails from Bremen Sept. 23.

Herald Sept. 30, 1905
On Tuesday morning Symphony Hall will be invaded for the annual house-cleaning which marks the beginning of every season, and on Oct. 9 the first public rehearsal of the orchestra will be given, with a new conductor, Max Fiedler of Hamburg, on the podium. Mr. Fiedler sails from Bremen on the Kaiser Wilhelm II. on Sept. 22, and is due to arrive in New York on the 29th.

The season will be an exacting one for the orchestra, a total of 110 concerts having been scheduled, to be given between Oct. 9 and May 1. In addition to the usual number of concerts, many more will be given in New England than has been the custom in the last several years. The first rehearsal is called for Monday, Oct. 5.

MAX FIEDLER ARRIVES

Boston's New Conductor in New York

He Talks of His Plans and About Composers

Praise for His Men and a Word for Himself

His Admiration for Strauss, Wagner and Brahms

Special to the Transcript:

New York, Sept. 29—Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived here today on the North German Lloyd steamer Kronprinz Wilhelm. Mr. Fiedler is a quiet man, and that he is without the least ostentation was plain in the lack of knowledge on the part of most of the passengers on the ship who Max Fiedler was in particular. Inquiry of at least twenty of them failed to discover the conductor. Yet he was about the deck most of the voyage with his wife. He is a man easily approached, too, and aside from his knowledge of music, is an interesting talker. According to some of the passengers, however, who afterwards admitted having talked with him, he is not a man who discourses often and exclusively of music.

When Mr. Fiedler was told that the music lovers of Boston were eagerly awaiting his coming he replied promptly: "I am eager to get to Boston to begin my work. I wish I were there now. But everything comes in its own time. I have conducted in many cities in Europe with success, but I believe my highest ideals regarding execution will be reached with the Boston Orchestra. It is the best orchestra I have ever heard, and in its men I shall have a most wonderful instrument under my hand." Mr. Fiedler is a man of medium height, rather stout. His hair and moustache are gray, and glasses cover his quiet, thoughtful eyes. He dresses simply, even carelessly. He speaks English with only a slight German accent, and what he has to say is usually well thought out before it leaves his lips.

The new conductor will put much new music on his programmes. Among the new pieces are an overture by Max Reger, a set of variations by Noren, a symphony and other pieces by Sibellus and an overture by Schelpflug. Then, too, he will play a symphony by Bruckner, the eighth, which he believes has not been done in this country. His programme for the first concerts of Oct. 9 and 10 runs as follows: Overture, "Leonore," No. 3, by Beethoven; Symphony No. 1, by Brahms; Love Scene from "Feuersnoth," by Strauss; Overture to "Tannhäuser," by Wagner.

Mr. Fiedler intends to put Strauss's music often on his programmes. He loves it himself, and he believes Strauss to be the greatest living composer. "In Europe many admire the music of Max Reger," continued Mr. Fiedler, "but they, too, and many more keep their enthusiasm for Strauss's tone-poems. The extreme classic people detest Strauss, but those people believe that when Beethoven died real music ceased to be created. I think they are wrong. Strauss deserves ample place in orchestral concerts. I intend to do at least his 'Heldenleben,' 'Zarathustra' and 'Death and Transfiguration.' I have spoken as I did of Strauss," the conductor went on, "because you asked me about him; but do not think I am all Strauss. Oh, no, I am just as enthusiastic over Wagner. And I might mention I am a great admirer of Brahms."

This is Mr. Fiedler's second trip to this country. He was here two years and a half ago, when he conducted two concerts in Carnegie Hall in New York for the Philharmonic Society. It was during his stay here then that he first heard the Boston Orchestra, and he said today that he felt then he would like to be its conductor. Mrs. Fiedler was with her husband during part of the interview. She is a pleasant-faced woman, and is very fond of her husband and his work. The couple have been married twenty years. When he left the ship Mr. Fiedler said that he did not intend staying in New York, but would go on to Boston immediately.

Mr. Fiedler, finally, added four programmes to those already announced for his first weeks in Boston; and in them he is evidently fulfilling some of the purposes indicated in the conversation just repeated. They are:

Haydn: Symphony.
Brahms: Variations on a theme by Haydn.
Strauss: "Heldenleben."

Elgar: Variations.
Goldmark: Scherzo in A major.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 7.

Schumann: Symphony in C major.
Piano Concerto: Mr. Gabilowitsch.
Strauss: "Death and Transfiguration."

Bruckner: Symphony No. 8.
Wagner: Prelude and Closing Scene from "Tristan."

SYMPHONY CONCERTS Two seats, No. 9 and 10, first row, first balcony, right; best seats in house, $30 each; cost $45.50. Address A.E.L., Boston Transcript. (A):

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS 2 seats in B B centre section, $50 each; 1 seat in M M left, $38. Address M.P.F., Boston Transcript. 2(A): 03

Symphony Seats For Sale Alternate evenings, 2 seats, front row, balcony. P. O. Box 3518, Boston. (D):

FIEDLER ENTHUSIASTIC OVER HIS NEW FIELD

ARRIVES IN BOSTON TO CONDUCT SYMPHONY

Is Very Fond of Strauss and Wagner and Their Compositions are Likely to Figure Largely.

Very enthusiastic over his new field, Max Fiedler, who as the successor of Dr. Karl Muck, is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, arrived in this city last evening, from New York, in company with his wife and C. A. Ellis, representing the Symphony orchestra.

Upon alighting at the Back Bay station the new director of Boston's symphony, exclaimed: "Well, at last, I am in Boston, and now more than ever I am impatient to begin my work as the leader of the finest orchestra in the world."

"No, I have never been in this city before," said Fiedler in reply to an inquiry, "and only once before have I been in this country."

"It was two years ago I conducted two concerts in Carnegie Hall, New York, and it was there that I heard your wonderful Boston orchestra, and I felt then that the proudest moment of my life could come only when I was its conductor. I am overjoyed at the prospect ahead of me, and I am sure I can please these Boston music lovers."

Fiedler is a genial man, yet quiet and unassuming in his manner. His quaint German accent adds a certain charm to a personality which is entirely without ostentation.

When asked whether music interested him to the exclusion of all other subjects, Fiedler replied, "I love music, of course; how else could I be what I am, but I also love my family. Besides my wife here, I have three children, Wilhelm, 17, Max, 10, and May, 13. The two youngest are now in Oxford, Eng., with my brother, Prof. George Fiedler, and the eldest is studying in Germany."

Fiedler has brought to this country two German musicians who were selected by Dr. Karl Muck, and who have been engaged for the present symphony season. They are Edmund Mueller, who is to play the bassoon, and Oscar Ludwig, who is to fill the position of double bass.

"I have already arranged eight programmes for the first weeks in Boston," said the new conductor, "and shall begin with rehearsals at once, possibly Monday."

It is understood that he will put a great deal of new music on his programmes, among which are an overture by Max Reger, a set of variations by Noreh, a symphony and other pieces by Sibelius and an overture by Schelpflug. He also intends to play a symphony by Bruckner, the eighth, which he believes has not been done in this country.

His programme for the first concerts of Oct. 9 and 10 runs:—

Overture, "Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven
Symphony No. 1.....Brahms
Love Scene from "Feuersnot".....Strauss
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner

Strauss and Wagner have always appealed to Fiedler's artistic sense of the truly classical. It is therefore not unlikely that music by these two great masters will often be included in symphony programmes.

Fiedler is a pianist, and in addition to having been affiliated with some of the most famous musical institutions of the old world, has conducted orchestras in nearly every principal city of Europe, although most of his time has been spent in Hamburg.

Mrs. Fiedler is a quiet woman, English by birth, and, although not a musician, is intensely interested in her husband's work.

The Fiedlers were driven to the Hotel Somerset, where they will stop for the present. No programme has been arranged for today, but it is known that there will be a meeting between Maj. H. L. Higginson and the new conductor.

MR. FIEDLER'S COURSE WITH HIS PROGRAMMES

The General Lines He Will Follow for the Symphony Concerts—A Wide Departure from Dr. Muck's Ways of Programme Making—The Difficulty That Besets the
New Conductor—The Musical Festival at Worcester Begins—Mr. Lackaye Acts a New Play That Turns the Tables on the Social Reformers—Assorted Theatrical Wisdom—The Cecilia to Revive Parker's
"St. Christopher"—Other News of the Day

Whatever other changes Mr. Fiedler may bring to the Symphony Concerts, he will follow methods in the making of his programmes that are very different from those of Dr. Muck, and more in accord with the ways of Mr. Gericke. Dr. Muck believed firmly in a "unified" programme that sought continuity rather than contrast, and that aimed to group music of a single time, of a single style or mood or of a single nationality. He liked to place music of the eighteenth century, for example, on a programme by itself, where the larger and more irregular voice of modern music should not disturb. He set Slavs or Czechs in a little company of their own.

He held his romantic composers in one group; his ultra-moderns in another. He would have no fragments of operas, beyond overtures, in a Symphony Concert. Dr. Muck loved style, orderly process, continuity and unity of impression; his is inherently a logical mind; he counted the opera house as one thing and the concert-room as another; and he made his programmes accordingly. Those who disliked them used to say that his methods were too German. In fact, they were less of German than of the man himself.

Mr. Fiedler's aims and methods in the making of programmes are widely different. His guiding principle is not continuity, but contrast; his goal, not unity, but variety. He divides his first programme between Beethoven and Brahms of the concert-room and Wagner and Strauss of the opera house. The classics, in the broad sense of the word, begin; the moderns follow. The little fragment from Strauss's "Feuersnot," has the newness of a piece heard but once in Boston and six years ago. Beethoven and Wagner, Smetana and Hugo Wolf make another programme; Haydn and Brahms share another with Strauss. Operatic fragments stand already on the lists for the first eight concerts, and there will be more on those of the other sixteen. Ballet music, especially such ballet music as the Russians write, seems to Mr. Fiedler to deserve a place at the Symphony concerts for its own musical worth and for the pleasure that it gives, dancers or no dancers, pantomime or no pantomime. Glazounoff's suite, "In the Middle Ages," perhaps Tchaikovsky's "Nut Cracker" and a dance from Max Schullings's opera of "Moloch" are all to exemplify it.

In general the programmes Mr. Fiedler has thus far announced are typical of those that will follow. Classic and modern pieces, the familiar and the unfamiliar, will go to and fro in contrasting alternation. The conductor will be as hospitable to short pieces as to long. He will not shut and seal the book of operatic music. Yet with one difficulty, he still struggles. Custom and the likings of the public of the Symphony Concerts have prescribed an hour and a half as the length proper to them—an hour and three-quarters on occasion; and two hours only in extreme necessity. Perhaps such limitations are necessary in a series of twenty-four concerts to the same audience. Ninety minutes or a little more were enough, perhaps, of a "unified" programme; but variety and contrast are not so easy to gain in so narrow a space of time, especially when the entrance and the recalls of a singer or a virtuoso are devouring the precious minutes. To gain the variety that Mr. Fiedler seeks in the limits the habits of the concerts impose is really the problem of his programme-making. Unfortunately for him Bostonian habits of musical attention and Bostonian musical receptivity at a single draught are not quite those of Germany.

H. T. P.

Trans. Mr. Fiedler Oct. 8, 1908

Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, has now spent a week in Boston and seen something of the city, the public of the concerts and of his men. Of all three he speaks eagerly and warmly. Unlike his immediate predecessors, Mr. Fiedler is expansive in conversation; he likes to talk; he has an excellent command of English, and he talks interestingly. The city has pleased him, as Boston in an October like this and at the end of the town that he most frequents, might well do. More particularly he has found Symphony Hall at first sight and under the test of rehearsal an admirable concert room, and he has followed with curiosity and a little wonder the auction sales of the seats for the season. Seats for series of orchestral concerts are not sold by auction in Europe; the temper and the ways of the public there are different; and Mr. Fiedler was becomingly surprised at the public interest and the public purse that warrants such methods. Until last Monday he knew the Boston Orchestra only by a single hearing a few years ago in New York. He remembered it as an orchestra of such fineness of ability and fullness of accomplishment that he was eager to be its conductor. Recollection familiarly idealizes what we like; but face to face with the band in the rehearsals of the week, he has found the quality and the disposition of his forces all that he had expected. To have such an orchestra to do his will has plainly kindled his ambition the more, and he speaks warmly—and not at all in the fashion of some virtuoso conductors—of his opportunity. Thus in Mr. Fiedler all the circumstances are favorable for his beginnings at the concert of tomorrow.

As interesting and promising is the impression Mr. Fiedler has made upon those who have thus come a little to know him. He is not indeed a man of unusual, distinct or rather remote personality. The impression that he will make upon the public of the Symphony Concerts—it is safe to predict—will be the impression of what he does less than of what he is. Those who cherish a conductor as an individual who happens to touch their imagination and liking will be less drawn to him in all probability than will those who have a more normal interest in a conductor as an achieving musician. By every token that Mr. Fiedler has given to those that have seen him within the last week, he is essentially such a musician.

Mr. Fiedler has made music his profession; the particular branch of it that he has cultivated in recent years has been conducting; in that branch he has attained distinguished eminence. It is an eminence born of able and "all-round" achievement, accomplished by innate and practised talent, by very keen ambition and by fireless work. There have been conductors whose best endowment was an acute and scholarly mind. The chief resource of others has been a poetic and dramatizing temperament. The talent of others still has been primarily an instance that brought its resulting excellence. Mr. Fiedler seems not the scholar, the poet, or the drill-master. He has, of course, a measure of the qualities of all three, because it is essential to a conductor of his rank and attainments. But as he reveals himself, he seems most clearly first the receptive and then the expressive musician, who brings his chosen music as vividly and straightforwardly to utterance as he may—a man who would do his whole work and who sets that work above all else.

H. T. P.

From Here in Boston

The most interesting of the violinists that will play at the Symphony Concerts in the course of the winter is Mischa Elman, who comes to America for the first time in the autumn and who will appear with the orchestra at a pair of concerts in January. Elman began his career as a prodigy when as a boy he came fresh from the teaching of Auer, the Russian. He was intelligent and spirited enough to feel and to resent the silly vaunting and the cheap appreciation that are the usual lot of prodigies. As soon as he had gained a few years he made his escape from this bondage, and since he has appeared in orchestral concerts and given recitals of his own in the length and breadth of Europe. He is now in his twenties—a grave, spectacled young violinist, of quick understanding and warm feeling, who justly asks to be tried by his artistry and not by his years. Henri Marteau was even younger when he came first to America in the nineties.

Mr. Czerwony, the violinist, who shared the first desk in the Symphony Orchestra last season with Mr. Wendling, intends to spend another winter in Boston. He is sailing from Germany tomorrow, and as soon as he arrives here he will put his newly formed string quartet in rehearsal again. Mr. Czerwony will also play in concerts as a virtuoso—the work to which all his talent and accomplishment point.

SYMPHONY'S NEW CONDUCTOR HERE

Max Fiedler Declares Orchestra Is Best He Ever Heard—Will Meet the Players
Next Monday.

Max Fiedler, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in Boston last night at 8.25 o'clock from New York, and was taken to the Somerset Hotel by W. E. Walter, press agent of the orchestra, and Manager C. A. Ellis. Mrs. Fiedler accompanied the new conductor. She is of English birth and a typical blonde of the little island with the big domains.

"Your Boston Symphony Orchestra is the finest I have ever heard," said Conductor Fiedler last night to The Journal. "I heard it in New York city two years ago under d'Indy. I don't know how I like Boston yet, because I have never been here before, and it is hard to tell about a city in the dark."

Four Newest Programs.

"I bring with me Herr Oscar Ludwig, double bass, and Herr Edmund Muller, second bassoon. You know, these men were engaged by Dr. Karl Muck. I am a pianist and will, however, give my time to the orchestra. I may play a little for the pleasure of my new friends this winter. I have about eight concerts already arranged. My four newest programs are:

Symphony.....	Haydn
Variations on a theme by Haydn.....	Brahms
"Heidenleben".....	Strauss
Variations.....	Elgar
Scherzo in A major.....	Goldmark
Symphony No. 7.....	Beethoven
Symphony in C major.....	Schumann
Piano concerto.....	Mr. Gabilowitsch
"Death and Transfiguration".....	Strauss
Symphony No. 8.....	Bruckner
Prelude and closing scenes from "Tristan".....	Wagner

"I am a great lover of the tone poems of Strauss," said the new conductor. "I believe Strauss is the greatest living composer and I do not agree with the more conservative that great music died with Beethoven. I am enthusiastic over Wagner and a great admirer of Brahms."

"Mrs. Fiedler, my wife, is an English woman. No, she is not a musician in the sense that she plays, but she is the finest woman in the world. We have three children, Wilhelm, 17 years old; May, 13 years old, and Max, Jr., who is only 10. My two younger children are at present with my brother, Dr. George Fiedler, who is professor of German literature at Oxford University, England. He succeeded the famous Max Muller."

Meets Orchestra Monday.

"I expect to have the pleasure of meeting with the Symphony Orchestra next Monday, and I shall be very glad to have the honor and pleasure of conducting them, because, as I said before, they are the finest orchestra I have ever heard."

This statement coming from Conductor Fiedler is significant, because he has conducted orchestras in St. Petersburg, Paris, Madrid, Antwerp, Berlin, Leipzig, and other large cities of Europe. He has been conductor of the Philharmonic Society of Hamburg, and a director of the Hamburg Conservatory of Music. He was graduated from Leipzig Conservatory in 1881. Most of his life has been spent in Hamburg.

DR. FIEDLER MEETS HIS MUSICIANS FOR FIRST TIME

(Photo by Marceau.)

DR. MAX FIEDLER.

The new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, from his latest photo.

The Symphony Orchestra had its first rehearsal of the season Monday morning, when Max Fiedler, the new conductor, met for the first time the men who are to work for him during the coming winter. There was little or no ceremony.

Mr. Higginson was at Symphony Hall and introduced the new conductor to the men, who received him standing. Then Mr. Fiedler made a graceful little speech, thanking all for the kind welcome. He said that the orchestra was no stranger to him either in reputation or in reality. He had known of it for many years.

He had heard it play in New York three years ago under Vincent d'Indy and he had carried with him ever since that time the conviction that it was the finest orchestra in the world, bar none.

He believed that during the coming season, with such an instrument to work with, he could approach nearer to his ideals than ever before in his career, if, indeed, he did not entirely realize them. Should things go wrong he already realized that the fault would be his, not the orchestra's.

Mr. Fiedler speaks exceedingly good English. He carries with him an atmosphere of sincerity which is totally devoid of the least suspicion of pedantry. This, indeed, would be impossible in a man who is so fond of a good laugh.

The orchestra was more than favorably impressed with him, the more so when with further graceful remarks he introduced to their colleagues the new members. Then, without further ceremony, the work of the year began.

It is rather interesting to know that Mr. Fiedler uses for the most part English at rehearsals, rarely falling into German. It is also interesting that, although he has such an evident admiration for the orchestra, he is leaving nothing to chance, for he believes that perfection comes only from thorough drill and for two mornings the orchestra has worked very hard under his tireless energy.

At the end of the first rehearsal he thanked the members and said afterwards that it was a great pleasure to have such a body of men to work with. The orchestra, he said, was superb.

MAX FIEDLER, SYMPHONY'S NEW LEADER

Sketched by Herald Staff Artist While the Subject Was Discussing His Plans for Future Concerts.

CONDUCTOR FIEDLER DISCUSSES MUSIC

Hub Symphony Leader Tells
of Orchestral Numbers to Be

Played This Season.

Herald Oct. 1, 1908

By PHILIP HALE.

Max Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra this season, was in holiday mood yesterday afternoon. He had almost recovered his land legs; he was pleased with Symphony Hall; he rejoiced in the weather. He consented without undue haste, without reluctant, amorous delay, to talk about music in al music that ustere, granalready pub-believe. The

ows strength,
It is mobile;
hen the mind
lly when the r Mr. Fiedler grace, a keen ho apparently it of responsi-

ppressing duty
also the mem-work is to be
is a serious
at he is surely e talked with pontifical au-
prima donna,
ed in English,
ce discrimina-
s and phrases.
amme.

much experibelief that any however shrewd
can satisfy approve, how-gramme," one the growth of nor does he
"national pro-

French, Rus-that such promonotonous.

a programme
ell contrasted,
of the hearer
ut the concert.
ks should be
and the conould also be ramme should lliar composi-

any scruples
in concert of ner's music
veben" music,
gfried's Jour-
see how such respect toward y as Wagner allowed con-
in certain in-the fact that when a long series of orchestral concerts is given,

but he does not like to have too many solo players or singers. They often divert the attention of the audience from serious works on the programme.

When, however, a pianist or violinist of the first rank plays a concerto of a master, so that the dignity of the concert is maintained, and there is not undue personal display, there should be no objection. There is probably only one series of concerts
in Germany from which as a rule soloists are excluded, the series given by the Royal Orchestra in Berlin.

Modern Composers.

It has been said that Mr. Fiedler is an ardent admirer of Richard Strauss. The statement is true and yesterday Mr.
Fiedler spoke of Strauss with enthusiasm. He believes implicitly in the artistic sincerity of the man and indignantly defends him from the charge of wishing deliberately to be sensational for the sake of calling attention to himself and thereby gaining money. To Mr. Fiedler the composer of the symphonic poems, the
"Domestic" symphony and "Salome" is a great master. Strauss told him not long ago that the new opera "Electra" would astonish him. Mr. Fiedler knows nothing about a forthcoming opera,
"Tartuffe," by Strauss, except by newspaper report.

When Mr. Fiedler was asked about other German composers now living he had little to say. He mentioned the name of Max Schillings as perhaps the most important, though he recognized
the color in Boeche's symphonic poems.
Nor is there, according to Mr. Fiedler, any German operatic composer today of
marked distinction.

D'Albert in his "Tiefland," which will be produced at the Metropolitan Opera House this season, has shown a certain strength, but he has not struck a truly individual note, and he was fortunate in his libretto. Puccini's operas are popular in Germany, as are "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci," but the influence of these Italians has not strongly affected the German composers. The success of "Cavalleria Rusticana" has led some of them to choose grim subjects and to strive after passionate expression in a concise form, but their music is still inherently German.

Mr. Fiedler is acquainted with the orchestral works of the ultra-modern French composers. While he admires
the talent of Vincent d'Indy he finds that d'Indy is inclined toward an abuse of dissonances. He spoke appreciatively of this composer's "Wallenstein" Symphony and the clarinet trio. He has looked at the second symphony of d'Indy with interest. He admires the color schemes of Debussy, and he spoke in special praise of "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the "Nocturnes." He also appreciates "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"
by Dukas.

Now that Rimsky-Korsakoff is dead
Mr. Fiedler would put Glazounoff at the head of Russian composers; but no Russian, to Mr. Fiedler's mind, approaches Tschaikowsky in wealth of ideas and in power of emotional expression. Rimsky-Korsakoff was a master of orchestral color, a gorgeous painter in tones. Glazounoff is a finished craftsman. Tschaikowsky towers above his countryman through sheer force of musical ideas and intensity of expression.

And what will be the future of orchestral music? Mr. Fiedler believes that there will ultimately be a triumph of ideas over color; that a work
based on strong or beautiful themes
and with skilful, absorbing development will be preferred to an impressionistic sketch. Nevertheless, the future music of more substantial form
will be influenced in its orchestral dress by the impressionists of today.

Personal Likes.

It is not necessary to say that Mr.
Fiedler has the warmest affection and

MAX FIEDLER, S

Sketched by Herald Staff Artist Whi

CONDUCTOR FIEDLER DISCUSSES MUSIC

Hub Symphony Leader Tells
of Orchestral Numbers to Be

HELP V

Cornice a

WANTED, thou enced man; mu handle both me
must be compet
close contracts.
an excellent o
communications
dence. Give fu ences. Address

FOREM

OF McKAY factory; one c help and must pulling over a in running ord
where last emp dress E 5319.

YOUNG MEN

BENCH OPEN
23 yrs' experienc week to start; ei
pay for instruct write. JEWEL
South bldg; posi

Wanted—FI
AND PAINTER
BRIGGS & SO

ARTIST, expe letterer; bring st, room 808.

AUTOMOBILE specialties to ow account; state a 5307. Herald Of

BOY wanted,
printing busines
three months $;
triflers tolerate
Office.

BOY wanted,
yrs, good oppo
ply to VOSE &

BRIGHT MA machines; exce
a salary of $20
required; large ton. MOORE mont st.

CABINET M kinds furniture stock room, ha
must be a hust
CO, 91 Federal

CANDY MAI
making. Addr

DRUG CLERK
perience, good to the best trad
to the right man
with easy hours
POWELL PHA

ELECTRICI
jobbing and wi
tle st, Cambrid
EXPERIENCE

Played This Season.

Herald — Oct. 1, 1903

By PHILIP HALE.

Max Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra this season, was in holiday mood yesterday afternoon. He had almost recovered his land legs; he was pleased with Symphony Hall; he rejoiced in the weather. He consented without undue haste, without reluctant, amorous delay, to talk about music in general and about orchestral music that he will or will not conduct.

His face is less official, austere, granitic than the photographs already published would lead us to believe. The face is also younger. It shows strength, but it is not aggressive. It is mobile;
never dull, it lights up when the mind is interested, and especially when the thought is humorous. For Mr. Fiedler evidently has that saving grace, a keen sense of humor.

There are conductors who apparently are crushed under a weight of responsibility. They feel it their oppressing duty to preserve traditions and also the memory of the composer whose work is to be interpreted. Mr. Fiedler is a serious man in his view of art; but he is surely emotional and human. He talked with conviction, but not with pontifical authority, not as a spoiled prima donna, not as a pedant. He talked in English, fluently and often with nice discrimination in the choice of words and phrases.

His Idea of Programme.

Mr. Fiedler has had too much experience to cherish the fond belief that any maker of programmes, however shrewd and skilful he may be, can satisfy every one. He does not approve, however, the "historical programme," one by which, for instance, the growth of the symphony is shown; nor does he believe in the virtue of a "national programme," Scandinavian, French, Russian, etc., for he thinks that such programmes are necessarily monotonous.

According to his idea, a programme should first of all be well contrasted, so that the attention of the hearer should be held throughout the concert.
The great classic works should be respected; more modern and the contemporaneous works should also be performed; but no programme should consist chiefly of unfamiliar compositions.

Nor has Mr. Fiedler any scruples about the performance in concert of excerpts from Wagner's music dramas, as the "Waldweben" music, the arrangement of "Siegfried's Journey, etc." He does not see how such performances show disrespect toward the composer, especially as Wagner during his life not only allowed concert performances but in certain instances encouraged them.

Mr. Fiedler recognizes the fact that soloists are necessary when a long series of orchestral concerts is given,
but he does not like to have too many solo players or singers. They often divert the attention of the audience
from serious works on the programme.

When, however, a pianist or violinist of the first rank plays a concerto
of a master, so that the dignity of the concert is maintained, and there is not undue personal display, there should be no objection. There is probably only one series of concerts
in Germany from which as a rule
soloists are excluded, the series given by the Royal Orchestra in Berlin.

Modern Composers.

It has been said that Mr. Fiedler is an ardent admirer of Richard Strauss. The statement is true and yesterday Mr.
Fiedler spoke of Strauss with enthusiasm. He believes implicitly in the artistic sincerity of the man and indignantly
defends him from the charge of wishing deliberately to be sensational for the sake
of calling attention to himself and thereby gaining money. To Mr. Fiedler the composer of the symphonic poems, the
"Domestic" symphony and "Salome" is a great master. Strauss told him not long ago that the new opera "Electra"
would astonish him. Mr. Fiedler knows
nothing about a forthcoming opera,
"Tartuffe," by Strauss, except by newspaper report.

When Mr. Fiedler was asked about other German composers now living he had little to say. He mentioned the name of Max Schillings as perhaps the most important, though he recognized
the color in Boeche's symphonic poems.
Nor is there, according to Mr. Fiedler,
any German operatic composer today of
marked distinction.

D'Albert in his "Tiefland," which will be produced at the Metropolitan Opera House this season, has shown a certain
strength, but he has not struck a truly individual note, and he was fortunate in his libretto. Puccini's operas are popular in Germany, as are "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci," but the influence of these Italians has not strongly affected the German composers. The success of "Cavalleria Rusticana" has led some of them to choose grim subjects and to strive after passionate expression in a concise form, but their
music is still inherently German.

Mr. Fiedler is acquainted with the orchestral works of the ultra-modern French composers. While he admires
the talent of Vincent d'Indy he finds that d'Indy is inclined toward an abuse of dissonances. He spoke appreciatively of this composer's "Wallenstein" Symphony and the clarinet trio. He has looked at the second symphony of d'Indy with interest. He admires the color schemes of Debussy, and he spoke
in special praise of "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the "Nocturnes." He also appreciates "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"
by Dukas.

Now that Rimsky-Korsakoff is dead
Mr. Fiedler would put Glazounoff at the head of Russian composers; but
no Russian, to Mr. Fiedler's mind, approaches Tchaikowsky in wealth of ideas and in power of emotional expression. Rimsky-Korsakoff was a master of orchestral color, a gorgeous painter in tones. Glazounoff is a finished craftsman. Tchaikowsky towers above his countryman through sheer force of musical ideas and intensity of expression.

And what will be the future of orchestral music? Mr. Fiedler believes that there will ultimately be a triumph of ideas over color; that a work
based on strong or beautiful themes
and with skilful, absorbing development will be preferred to an impressionistic sketch. Nevertheless, the future music of more substantial form
will be influenced in its orchestral
dress by the impressionists of today.

Personal Likes.

It is not necessary to say that Mr.
Fiedler has the warmest affection and

the highest respect for the great masters of the past, and for Beethoven in particular. The catholicity of his taste is shown by his enthusiasm for Brahms and Strauss alike. Nor does he mention the name of Tchaikowsky without showing his fervid appreciation of the Russian's genius.

The catholicity of Mr. Fiedler's taste is also proved by the respect in which he holds Anton Bruckner. He admits the diffuseness, the irritating repetitions, the seeming lack of form and cohesion, but he puts the highest value on the musical ideas that the symphonies contain and on the occasional sublimity of the expression. The eighth symphony, which is to Mr. Fiedler the strongest, will be performed here this season.

Another composer—and he is living—that appeals to Mr. Fiedler is Jan Sibelius, already known in Boston by two symphonies and a violin concerto. Mr. Fiedler purposes to produce here two or three works of this composer, certainly "Finlandia," which might be described as a musical portraiture of the Finnish revolt against the Russians. The effect of this symphonic poem on the countrymen of Sibelius is so stirring that its performance in Finland has been forbidden by the Russian government.

The orchestral music of Liszt, brilliant, glittering, pompous, as it sometimes is, leaves Mr. Fiedler cold.

A World Citizen.

Mr. Fiedler, as a "guest conductor," has visited many cities, from Rome to London, from St. Petersburg to New York. He has found orchestras of widely differing ability, excellent, as in St. Petersburg, mediocre, as in Rome and Madrid. In the Spanish city the orchestra needed constant encouragement at rehearsal. Any adverse criticism dismayed the players; there was need of constant reassurance.

But he found that audiences were everywhere about the same in appreciation. Russians or Spaniards, the English or the Italians were aroused to enthusiasm when they heard music by Beethoven and Wagner. In the course of years he has noticed a growth of liberality in taste among the English, and he was surprised by the warmth of appreciation in Edinburgh, a city reputed cool in its attitude toward art. In Madrid the hearers dislike the horns because they fear the breaks of the players, and horn passages are sometimes hissed in anticipation.

Mr. Fiedler talked at ease, freely, modestly, as one who had not figured prominently in European musical life for several years. His criticisms were without the flavor of personal prejudice; his views were those of a citizen of the world.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Public Rehearsals and Concerts Open Next Week.

The Symphony Orchestra begins this season's work Monday morning when the first rehearsal is called at 10 o'clock and Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor, is introduced to the men who are to play under him for the next seven months.

concert will be given next Friday afternoon at 2.30 and Saturday evening at 8 o'clock respectively. Mr. Fiedler's first program may be regarded as typical of his breadth of views and catholicity of taste. His first number is Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 3. His second is Brahms' C Minor Symphony. After the intermission will come the "Love Scene" from Richard Strauss' "Feuersnot" and finally the "Tannhaeuser" Overture.

At the second public rehearsal and concert on the 16th and 17th Emil Sauer, the eminent German pianist, will make his first appearance in America after an absence of nine years.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Hints as to Programs Dr. Fiedler Is Making.

The patrons of the Symphony concerts will give warm welcome to the news that under the leadership of Mr. Fiedler the orchestra will play during the season a considerable amount of Wagner. It is well known that Dr. Muck did not believe in putting excerpts from Wagner operas into symphony programs, and nearly the only Wagner he played was at the Pension Fund concerts. Mr. Fiedler evidently has no such prejudices and in his first few programs are several Wagner selections—in fact, on his first program he has placed the "Tannhaeuser" overture. He is bringing over with him a number of interesting novelties.

Among the new works which he will play is an overture by Max Reger. This will not be published until the beginning of November, and the composer has given Mr. Fiedler the right of first performance in America.

Among other changes in the policy of the orchestra will be an increase in the number of concerts given in Sanders Theater at Harvard University. For the last several years six concerts have been given each winter in Cambridge. Last year it was impossible to accommodate all who wanted to go to the concerts, and so Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, has this year put in two more, making eight in all. The orchestra will, as usual, make a trip to the West in the last week of January. This year it will give concerts in Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester.

The prospects for the auction sales have never been more favorable than this year. Interest in the concerts seems to be as keen as ever, and with the exceptionally attractive prospectus which is to be announced next week, a most successful sale is anticipated. The days of the auction sales are the 28th and 29th of September, and the 1st and 2d of October.

WANTED—ONE SEAT

for Symphony concert, rear of second balcony. Address G.F.S., Boston Transcript. (A):

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 10, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

- | | |
|------------------|--|
| BEETHOVEN, | OVERTURE, "Leonore," No. 3, op. 72. |
| BRAHMS, | SYMPHONY, No. 1, in C minor, op. 68.
I. Andante sostenuto.
II. Un poco sostenuto: Allegro.
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso. L'istessa tempo.
IV. Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio. |
| RICHARD STRAUSS, | LOVE SCENE from the Opera "Feuersnot." |
| WAGNER, | OVERTURE to "Tannhäuser." |

the highest respect for the great masters of the past, and for Beethoven in particular. The catholicity of his taste is shown by his enthusiasm for Brahms and Strauss alike. Nor does he mention the name of Tschaiikowsky without showing his fervid appreciation of the Russian's genius.

The catholicity of Mr. Fiedler's taste is also proved by the respect in which he holds Anton Bruckner. He admits the diffuseness, the irritating repetitions, the seeming lack of form and cohesion, but he puts the highest value on the musical ideas that the symphonies contain and on the occasional sublimity of the expression. The eighth symphony, which is to Mr. Fiedler the strongest, will be performed here this season.

Another composer—and he is living—that appeals to Mr. Fiedler is Jan Sibelius, already known in Boston by two symphonies and a violin concerto. Mr. Fiedler purposes to produce here two or three works of this composer, certainly "Finlandia," which might be described as a musical portraiture of the Finnish revolt against the Russians. The effect of this symphonic poem on the countrymen of Sibelius is so stirring that its performance in Finland has been forbidden by the Russian government.

The orchestral music of Liszt, brilliant, glittering, pompous, as it sometimes is, leaves Mr. Fiedler cold.

A World Citizen.

Mr. Fiedler, as a "guest conductor," has visited many cities, from Rome to London, from St. Petersburg to New York. He has found orchestras of widely differing ability, excellent, as in St. Petersburg, mediocre, as in Rome and Madrid. In the Spanish city the orchestra needed constant encouragement at rehearsal. Any adverse criticism dismayed the players; there was need of constant reassurance.

But he found that audiences were everywhere about the same in appreciation. Russians or Spaniards, the English or the Italians were aroused to enthusiasm when they heard music by Beethoven and Wagner. In the course of years he has noticed a growth of liberality in taste among the English, and he was surprised by the warmth of appreciation in Edinburgh, a city reputed cool in its attitude toward art. In Madrid the hearers dislike the horns because they fear the breaks of the players, and horn passages are sometimes hissed in anticipation.

Mr. Fiedler talked at ease, freely, modestly, as one who had not figured prominently in European musical life for several years. His criticisms were without the flavor of personal prejudice; his views were those of a citizen of the world.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Public Rehearsals and Concerts Open Next Week.

The Symphony Orchestra begins this season's work Monday morning when the first rehearsal is called at 10 o'clock and Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor, is introduced to the men who are to play under him for the next seven months.

The first public rehearsal and first concert will be given next Friday afternoon at 2.30 and Saturday evening at 8 o'clock respectively. Mr. Fiedler's first program may be regarded as typical of his breadth of views and catholicity of taste. His first number is Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 3. His second is Brahms' C Minor Symphony. After the intermission will come the "Love Scene" from Richard Strauss' "Feuersnot" and finally the "Tannhauser" Overture.

At the second public rehearsal and concert on the 16th and 17th Emil Sauer, the eminent German pianist, will make his first appearance in America after an absence of nine years.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Hints as to Programs Dr. Fiedler Is Making.

The patrons of the Symphony concerts will give warm welcome to the news that under the leadership of Mr. Fiedler the orchestra will play during the season a considerable amount of Wagner. It is well known that Dr. Muck did not believe in putting excerpts from Wagner operas into symphony programs, and nearly the only Wagner he played was at the Pension Fund concerts. Mr. Fiedler evidently has no such prejudices and in his first few programs are several Wagner selections—in fact, on his first program he has placed the "Tannhauser" overture. He is bringing over with him a number of interesting novelties.

Among the new works which he will play is an overture by Max Reger. This will not be published until the beginning of November, and the composer has given Mr. Fiedler the right of first performance in America.

Among other changes in the policy of the orchestra will be an increase in the number of concerts given in Sanders Theater at Harvard University. For the last several years six concerts have been given each winter in Cambridge. Last year it was impossible to accommodate all who wanted to go to the concerts, and so Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, has this year put in two more, making eight in all. The orchestra will, as usual, make a trip to the West in the last week of January. This year it will give concerts in Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester.

The prospects for the auction sales have never been more favorable than this year. Interest in the concerts seems to be as keen as ever, and with the exceptionally attractive prospectus which is to be announced next week, a most successful sale is anticipated. The days of the auction sales are the 28th and 29th of September, and the 1st and 2d of October.

WANTED—ONE SEAT

for Symphony concert, rear of second balcony. Address G.F.S., Boston Transcript. (A):

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 10, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN,	OVERTURE, "Leonore," No. 3, op. 72.
BRAHMS,	SYMPHONY, No. 1, in C minor, op. 68. I. Andante sostenuto. II. Un poco sostenuto: Allegro. III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso. I. istessa tempo. IV. Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
RICHARD STRAUSS,	LOVE SCENE from the Opera "Feuersnot."
WAGNER,	OVERTURE to "Tannhäuser."

DR FIEDLER WINS AUDIENCE.

Max Fiedler Greeted With Tremendous Applause on His First Appearance as Symphony Conductor.

WAITING IN THE "RUSH LINE" FOR THE OPENING OF THE FIRST PUBLIC REHEARSAL OF THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. SOME OF THE EARLIEST ARRIVALS SAT ON THE SIDEWALK FOR HOURS YESTERDAY IN ORDER TO BE AMONG THE FIRST TO ENTER WHEN THE DOORS SHOULD OPEN

Patrons of the Boston symphony orchestra concert yesterday afternoon had their first opportunity to pass judgment upon the capabilities of the new conductor, Max Fiedler, and the first impression inspired spontaneous enthusiasm. Mr Fiedler, the latest in the succession of distinguished musicians who have directed this famous organization, satisfied and pleased those who for so many consecutive seasons have occupied the same seats on Fri-

Ma

FLOOR

2nd FLOOR

STREET FLOOR

BASE-MENT

WAITING
OF T
ENTE

DR FIEDLER WINS AUDIENCE.

Globe

Oct 11, 1908

His Masterful Leadership at First Symphony
Rehearsal Augurs Well For Season.

DR MAX FIEDLER.

Patrons of the Boston symphony orchestra concert, yesterday afternoon had their first opportunity to pass judgment upon the capabilities of the new conductor, Max Fiedler, and the first impression inspired spontaneous enthusiasm. Mr Fiedler, the latest in the succession of distinguished musicians who have directed this famous organization, satisfied and pleased those who for so many consecutive seasons have occupied the same seats on Friday afternoons. He was pronounced a worthy successor to the baton of Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, Dr Muck and others who have promoted the reputation and character of the orchestra from its earliest days in the old Music hall.

It was a typical "rehearsal" audience that greeted conductor Fiedler yesterday afternoon. It was, in fact, with some modifications, identical with the gathering that a year ago listened and looked with friendly favor upon the first appearance on the conductor's stand of Dr Muck. Like the office-holders, few of the attendants at the Symphony rehearsals die and none relinquishes the seats to which he has become accustomed. So yesterday afternoon, with memories of the great ones who had been tested, the rehearsal audience extended the open palm to director Fiedler.

Like a Reunion.

There is an intimacy between the Boston symphony orchestra and the audience that director Fiedler will learn in a few weeks, and doubtless he discerned a little of the spirit yesterday. The first rehearsal of the season is a sort of a reunion. Women and the sprinkling of men found on the floor and in the first balcony on Friday afternoons troop in for the first rehearsal, look around, bow and smile as this or that familiar face is detected in the spot where the same agreeable countenance beamed a year ago and a year before that, and so on.

In the preconcert talk are snatches of reminiscences of the North and South shores, allusions to Europe, the Berkshires, the Adirondacks, White mountains and scores of other places where city folk seek recreation. They are all so glad to be back and they wonder if the new season is to be as delightful as the previous winter in musical offerings. The atmosphere of Symphony hall is vitalized with conversation and the area is occupied with little receptions.

Just before 2:30 p m the members of the orchestra appear on the stage in twos and threes. The musicians look across the hall, see a friend here and there, smile and bow. Women return the salutations and there is a glad-to-be-back-again expression upon the faces of both.

When each of the players has taken his seat and acknowledged the greetings from the hall, Willy Hess strolls in, violin in hand, and takes the chair of the concert-master. Everybody feels the possession of a share in Mr Hess, so when that modest gentleman appears he receives just the kind of a welcome he would be conscious of getting if every individual grasped his hand and told him that it was just like being home again to see him with his violin in the old place within reach of the conductor's left hand.

Now up to this time when Willy Hess sat down and tickled the strings of his instrument to see that none was sharp or flat, it was a gathering of old acquaintances, of old rehearsal friends. Then entered the stranger, Max Fiedler, the new conductor. Perhaps Mr Fiedler felt like an intruder upon this family gathering as he walked across the stage to the director's dais, possibly he believed he was introducing an unknown personal element.

But it did not take long to disabuse his mind of the fear of obtrusion. He must have realized very soon that he had been taken into the fold, that he was a member of the big Symphony party, with all the agreeable privileges that go with that association. Mr Fiedler's credentials had preceded him; he had been properly presented. Sponsors had established him in favor and ere he tapped his baton to command attention he felt the cordiality of his audience.

Directs Without Score.

Outside of Mr Fiedler's appearance and the performance of the band under his direction the opening of the 28th season of the Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon was very like that of other years. The season seats, if it were not for the newest gowns and the latest millinery, would have held occupants identical in appearance of those a year ago.

Outside there was that familiar line of young persons seeking the limited number of places in the second balcony. There were many new faces in that line, of course, for the students of last year have departed and now are training other minds, fingers and voices in the art in distant places. But other embryonic virtuosos have taken their places and yesterday afternoon there was the same overflow, the same disappointment when the ticket taker announced that he had collected the last quarter the seating capacity permitted.

Attention was turned to Mr Fiedler as he appeared clad in dark trousers, a frock coat, white waistcoat and dark tie. He seemed at ease even before such an expectant audience. He bowed an acknowledgement of the applause and faced the orchestra.

The conductor had elected to open the program with the "Leonora" overture No. 3 of Beethoven. Before him was a bare music stand, for Mr Fiedler did not require a score to conduct this, to him, familiar composition. There was a very respectful whisper at the significant absence of the score.

Mr Fiedler tapped the wooden frame of his stand and bowed his head for a moment. Then he raised his arm, made a sharp, incisive stroke at the air and the orchestra responded with the notes of the opening bars. The new conductor carried his men along for many bars with the easy, graceful movement of the right hand and occasionally a twirling of the fingers of his left hand. He rested his left hand in his waistcoat pocket, then hooked his thumb in his trousers pocket, and for a change gently stroked his chin.

"He is a phlegmatic German," was the audible comment. But that opinion was based upon immature reflection, upon inadequate observation. Mr Fiedler is anything but phlegmatic. He is vigor, he is action, he is inspiration, he is a stimulant and a dominant force.

Forceful, Never Grotesque.

When the fortissimo passages of "Leonora" were reached Mr Fiedler demonstrated that he is about the most forceful, power-compelling conductor who has ever led the Boston Symphony orchestra. None but Emil Paur, whose regime began with the last seasons in Music hall, has equaled Mr Fiedler in dynamic force.

Mr Fiedler in the moments when he demanded strength and volume was a very fighting machine, yet never grotesque, never eccentric, never unreasonably prodigal in his use of baton and arms. But he worked all over. As he demanded that the horns and trombones respond to the requirement in one product he thrust his right and left arms out; he pointed his baton at the musicians and reached for them as if he were saying, "You! you! I mean you!"

Calling the whole orchestra into action, he extended both arms, and swinging them like the projections of a windmill, he seemed to imbue each individual player with the earnestness he displayed. There must be tone, tone, tone, and volume and greater volume, and there was; for with every semicircular sweep of those arms the men came into action with greater vigor. But there must be more emphasis, so the conductor shook his head, thrust it forward and jerked it backward, threw himself to the left and the right. Then a more subdued passage being written in the score, Mr Fiedler dropped his left hand, resumed the gentle rhythmic gyrations of the right hand, rested his left in his pocket or stroked his mustache and chin alternately.

He was calm, dispassionate when he was thus delivering the message of the composer, but the personification of animation when the gigantic themes and emotions were to be depicted.

Three Minutes of Applause.

When he turned to the audience at the close of the "Leonora" overture, Mr Fiedler must have appreciated that he had "arrived" in Boston. The applause was so hearty, so liberal, that the modest German felt he was getting too much and deferentially waved his hand toward the orchestra, indicating that they, not he, were entitled to the plaudits. But the men of the orchestra were clapping, too, so what could Mr Fiedler do but smile and bow and hasten to begin the next number?

Brahms' symphony No. 1 was the heavy part of the program and this long composition Mr Fiedler directed without the score. During the performance of the symphony the new director more than confirmed the first impression of power, of grace and of delicate discrimination. When he turned for the second time to the audience it required three minutes for the rehearsal through to express its approbation.

The love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot," was the third, and the "Tannhauser" overture the concluding number on the program. Long before the two had been played Mr Fiedler had established himself among the favorite conductors of the Symphony orchestra.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS Two seats, No. 9 and 10, first row, first balcony, right; best seats in house; $30 each; cost $45.50. Address A.E.L., Boston Transcript. (A):

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS 2 seats in B B centre section, $50 each; 1 seat in M M left, $38. Address M.P.F., Boston Transcript. 2(A): 03

FOR SALE—ONE SEASON TICKET FOR SATURDAY EVENING SYMPHONY CONCERTS; front row of first balcony; price $25. Address S.C.W., P. O. Box 3075, Boston. 2(A): 08

MR. FIEDLER CONDUCTS

THE FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT OF THE YEAR Oct 10. 08

The Incidents of the Afternoon—A Familiar Programme—The New Leader's Manner and Traits—The Physical Energy of His Conducting—His Liking for Big Tone, Emphasis, Effects and Precision—How He Exemplified These and Other Qualities in His Chosen Pieces—The Temper of His Hearers

The first concert of this, the twenty-eighth year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took place yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. As usual at the beginning of the series, there was a sprinkling of empty seats, unsold by the dealers or as yet unoccupied by absent owners. At a glance, however, the audience seemed to fill the hall, and in the chatter of the lobbies in the intermission there was less complaint seemingly than a year ago over obscuring hats. Almost to a man and woman, the listeners did Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor, the courtesy to remain to the end of the concert. They applauded him heartily when he first took his place. The applause was still warmer after Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture with which the programme began. It was scattering and cool after the first three movements of Brahms's symphony in C minor that followed, but more general and eager after the fourth. Rather unexpectedly, the excerpt from Strauss's "Feuersnot" seemed to make little impression—one more proof that opera is of the theatre and not of the concert-room. Clearly, however, the audience was glad to hear the overture to Wagner's "Tannhäuser," unplayed for at least three seasons at the regular Symphony Concerts. It liked the piece, and Mr. Fiedler's conducting and the band's playing of it were stirring. Thus the concert ended in a pleasant glow of satisfaction and applause. Mr. Fiedler was as prompt in beginning as Mr. Gericke used to be; his pauses between the successive pieces were very short; and he kept the long intermission rigorously within the prescribed ten minutes. By notable exception in the custom of the concerts, he conducted from memory in the symphony and the two overtures. In the fragment of "Feuersnot," a score was open on his desk, not at the level of his eyes, but far below him so that his music-stand did not come between him and his men. As for them, the newcomers were Mr. Noack of the first desk of the first violins; Mr. J. Warnke, among the cellists; Mr. Ludwig, in the basses, and Mr. Mueller in the bassoons. Mr. Marble has returned to his place among the second violins; and when all the orchestra but the concert master were in their place, Mr. Willy Hess, who returns to that post, came by himself to his chair. He was readily recognized and applauded, and after sundry bows he seated himself. Of harmless vanities there is no disputing. So much for the incidents of the day. In the long intermission, the corridors buzzed with comment on the new conductor and the comparisons with his predecessor that a silly etiquette is supposed to deny to print, but that every human being in the house probably made in thought and talk. There the record ends.

The manner and the method of a conductor as he faces his men and as his audience sees him, is usually an index of the less tangible qualities of his conducting. Mr. Weingartner seems to fling himself deeply and bodily into his work, and the audiences of half the world know the intensity and the vitality of performances under his hand. Mr. Mahler sits tranquilly, waving a little stick, lightly, surely, easily, and thus he brings transparency of flowing tone, aptness and finesse of expression, and inevitable and unforced climax. Mr. Gericke's manner was elegant exactitude itself, and it gained exceeding polish and firmness of execution. Dr. Muck commanded to brilliancy, to fire, to subtlety or to beauty, in a fashion that was instinct with communicating authority. His manner and his method seemed an integral part of the music of the moment. Mr. Fiedler's way is very different from that of these conductors. He is tall and he is large, broad of shoulders and substantial of flesh, of vigor and weight rather than of polished and distinguished presence. He comes loosely and quickly to his place; but from the moment he lifts his stick he seems tense with muscular alertness and energy. Often he conducts with a physical exuberance that was almost a new sensation to the audience of yesterday, but never with any token of physical strain. With outstretched arms and clenched fists, he beat out the thundering climax of trombones and trumpets at the end of the overture to "Tannhäuser." His motions were as nervous and titillating in the music of the Venusberg as the music itself. He swung his stick in great half-circles at the close of Brahms's symphony, his head flung back, his whole body taut with the energy and the power with which he would propel the music. He seems almost to spring to a detail that he would make salient, or a contrast that he would heighten; he almost drives his intent into a particular group of his men; his stick seems to hew a chord at a stroke as though it were the sharpest of orchestral axes; when he seeks lightness or flow of tone his beat turns duly light and caressing. Such graphic and muscular, hammering and thrusting, conducting is a new thing at the Symphony Concerts, and it bids fair to be a nine weeks' wonder. Mr. Fiedler drives his will home to his men and to his audience, and neither may mistake the process. The results that this manner and method achieve are precisely in accord with them.

Throughout the concert the tone of the orchestra had large, forceful and sustained sonority. At moments it was magnificent, as at the close of the overture to "Tannhäuser"; time and again it was thrilling, as in the exclamations of the "Leonore" overture; and it may in turn have been rather coarse at the end of the scene from "Feuersnot." Always it had weight, depth, aptitude and force. Our strings have familiar virtues. Mr. Fiedler has added muscularity to them. Our brass has been rich and mellow; Mr. Fiedler loves to hear it swell to new amplitudes. His adjustments, his euphonies of tone, especially as they affect the wood winds, are on a large scale. He does not, so far as the concert of yesterday disclosed him, court subtlety or elegance. He does court and gain "the big tone." Thereby he commands oftener than he charms.

In all things, seemingly, Mr. Fiedler loves emphasis. If the pace is slow, he makes it very slow indeed, as at the beginning of the "Leonore" overture. If it is furious, as at the end of that piece, he plies the whip unsparingly. The triumphant "Pilgrim's Chorus" fairly strode down the music of the Venusberg through the close of the overture to "Tannhäuser." The long, sweeping melodies, the broad phrases of Strauss's music were the longer and the broader under Mr. Fiedler's handling. Now passionate and now graphic is this music of the lovers' chamber, and of the city without waiting for light and fire. Mr. Fiedler took it with large vigor and made it as graphic as it can be without the setting and the action it really enhances. On the other hand, if the mood of the music was elegaic, as it is in the slow movement of Brahms's symphony, he emphasized insistently the gravity of the musical thought and its expression. He would not let Brahms muse pensively; he set him to very serious thinking. Again in the finale of the symphony Mr. Fiedler seemed rather to burst his way from passage to passage than to let the music mount in the mighty crescendo that can be made and has been made, here in Boston, out of it.

Loving emphasis, Mr. Fiedler drives home contrasts, courts the rhetorical pause, points and makes precise his details. His whole conception of the "Leonora" overture seemed a study in dramatic and musical contrasts. The return of the Pilgrims' song, with the revelry of Venus's train shrilling and quivering under it in the overture to "Tannhäuser," was tone-painting of the vividest. Long was his rhetorical pause after the sounding of the distant trumpet in Beethoven's overture, but he gained the end he sought in the following burst of Leonora's song. He flung the trombones into the finale of Brahms's symphony till their entrance seemed a magnificent stroke of sonorous solemnity. He pricked and pointed each detail of Strauss's picture of the still, fireless, lightless, bewildered and expectant Munich. Mr. Fiedler, moreover, accomplished all these things with a full surety and an absolute precision. Evidently he is wholly clear as to his own intentions. He imposes them forcefully and rigorously upon his men. He drills them to a minute exactitude in the execution of them. The orchestra has never seemed a more certain and precise instrument. It has seemed a more supple one. By so much at least the new conductor recalled Mr. Gericke.

The conclusions are almost obvious. So far as Mr. Fiedler disclosed himself yesterday, he seems a conductor of emphasis and effect, of power and precision. He loves the big thing done in a big way. He loves to make all things tell vigorously and vitally. If the passage is songful, he drains it to the last drop of sustained melody. If the music happens to be formal and expository as more than a little of Brahms's symphony may be, he gives it the utmost clearness and seeks a kind of large and precise beauty. If the music is inherently dramatic, like the two overtures, his is a large and lusty dramatization. He sweeps home, he hammers home, his Strauss. Straightforwardly Mr. Fiedler has conceived his effects; he accomplishes them passionately. They are firmness and surety themselves. Certainly it is too early, perhaps it is unfair, to say that he loves effects for the effect's sake; but his tendency to seek them one by one rather than to fashion them into a whole, rising inevitably out of itself was clear in the "Leonora" overture. He gave his hearers thrilling moments in his reading of Brahms's symphony; he kept it at a level of large power; but less than usual they might feel the architectural quality of it as a nobly and finely proportioned musical structure wherein the beginning anticipates the end and mounts to it. He seems less a conductor to lead his audiences into a new understanding of the music that he chooses than one to give new emphasis and vitality to what it obviously imparts. He seems puissant, orotund, precise rather than sensitive, subtle or supple. He bids fair to stir his hearers oftener than to charm them. He is likely to heighten the force, though he may lessen the fineness of the orchestra. He may drive all things hard each in its kind, but he will drive them no less surely home. His temperament seems as big and lusty as his tone.

H. T. P.

Post BY OLIN DOWNES Oct 11/08

At exactly 2:30 yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall Max Fiedler took his stand for the first time as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra before an audience as critical as any in the world.

As he entered, bowing deeply to public and orchestra, the atmosphere, which had been charged with tense anticipation, was cleared by a great burst of applause from those on the floor and lower balcony who were present in unusual numbers for this time in the year, and the expectant hundreds in the upper balcony who had been awaiting this moment since early morn-on the stone steps outside.

Mr. Hess, the concertmeister, returned from a season's vacation, had been also greeted when he entered a few minutes before.

The conductor's stand was upon the rostrum, but the rack was lowered. The leader heeded it not. He interpreted the Beethoven Leonore overture No. 3, the Brahms C minor symphony, the Tannhäuser overture—everything, in fact, on the programme, with the exception of the excerpt from Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot," from memory, without score.

Less Formal Than Muck

Mr. Fiedler is far in appearance and manner from his predecessor, Dr. Muck. Of about the same height, but thicker build, he is less formal in demeanor, and he gives the impression of a musician absorbed in his task with little or no thought of himself as others may see him. A man of much nervous force, he expends his energy without stint. His gestures are, to say the least, enthusiastic.

The sustained C which opens the overture floated out upon the air. He waved his arms, soothingly, flowingly. He caressed certain phrases which occur early in the introduction; he shook with galvanic fury, and the instruments vomited blasts of heaven-storming tone.

Mr. Fiedler conducted with splendid authority and freedom. He was clear of a score, and there are many who benefit by such liberty. He turned from group to group of instruments as they required his attention. Sometimes his left hand rested for a moment in the vicinity of the trousers pocket, but it never stayed for more than an instant, being required elsewhere. Sometimes the head was lowered, as if listening acutely, confidentially, lovingly, to the sounds he evoked; at other times, face upraised, it was thrown back, as one who should say, "Cheerfully, haughtily, I take these sounds and pass them forward."

He apparently required all his members to express his wishes, but—let us be exact—most of his gestures were made with the right hand and arm, and these ranged from an almost imperceptible beat to threatening jabs at various instrumentalists.

No conductor makes greater demands upon himself and his orchestra than Mr. Fiedler. He watches each instrument as he might his own child. He exacts the limit of capacity from each player. He is insistent to an extreme degree upon every possible gradation of tone, from the subtlest nuances, as in the Leonore overture, to the great, flaring climaxes of Strauss' orchestral tableau.

If he was, to the eye of the educated Bostonian, accustomed to the staid Mr. Gericke and the courtly Dr. Muck, somewhat unnecessarily emphatic, he gained his effects superbly, and the orchestra has rarely played with more vim. Small wonder, then, that, when the new conductor, his face working with emotion, turned to acknowledge the plaudits, he was discovered to be in lively perspiration, or if, in lieu of Dr. Muck's famous cigarette, we shall talk, in the future, of Mr. Fiedler's fresh collar.

The performances throughout were very tense. It was as if conductor and men were keyed up to a supreme point. Strange to say, that fine, gray film, which too often seems to come between the listener and the music on Friday afternoon, subduing any impertinent fortissimo, taking the edge from the brass, and generally interfering in some imperceptible way with abandoned enjoyment, had disappeared. More than once the audience was surprised into applause of astonishing volume.

Days of the Virtuoso

These are the days of the virtuoso. The experienced concertgoer begins to distrust the man of reputation who appears for the first time as leader of an orchestral concert. He knows that he will probably have to endure little affectations, little insincerities from these great men which are the more revolting on account of their source and the jarring sensation that they bring in the midst of a performance that may otherwise be of exceptional merit.

The attitude of Mr. Fiedler is gratifying. His earnestness, his absolute sincerity, are beyond question. His manner of conducting is his own, but it does not, let us be thankful, smack of the prima donna. His modesty approached deprecation yesterday, and almost as often as the occasion arose he transferred the approval of the audience to the orchestra which had so nobly seconded his endeavors.

He is evidently a man of strong convictions. He has searched his scores to the very last note for their innermost meaning. He breathed life into every phrase.

Fiedler's Interpretations

Of his interpretations, which, whether you agreed with them or not, were without exception strikingly individual, more will be said tomorrow. They were the expression of a passionate, reverent student and a distinctive personality. He views music, apparently, from the standpoint of a man who is a modern of moderns in his thought and feeling, in the best sense of the word.

The Beethoven overture, that classic which has inherently the quintessence of dramaticism and the roots of the modern romantic school in its measures, was radically individual and overwhelmingly dramatic yesterday.

The applause that greeted the new conductor on his entrance was unmistakably hearty and spontaneous, but it did not equal the tribute tendered him after his performances. We look forward to a season of unusual interest.

FIEDLER STOPS TO LISTEN TO MUSIC

Journal Oct 12, 08

Max Fiedler bids fair to prove one of the most popular conductors the Boston Symphony Orchestra has ever had. The greeting he received when he made his appearance at the first concert Saturday night was most cordial and hospitable; and the outburst of enthusiasm that followed the performance of the "Tannhaeuser" overture at the end of the concert was one of the most unrestrained ever heard in Symphony Hall. The handclapping was topped with shouts of pleasure—and that is going some for a Symphony audience.

There was hearty applause after the first number, the Beethoven "Leonora" overture, No. 3; but after the next number, Brahms' first symphony, matter-of-fact pleasure gave way to genuine enthusiasm. The conductor was recalled several times. He bowed and smiled; and he did what his predecessors often did—waved his hand appreciatively toward the orchestra. Part of the success he took for himself; the rest he gave to his men. As usual they deserved it. Indeed, during the performance of the Wagner overture there were times when Mr. Fiedler almost paused. It was as if he wanted to get full enjoyment of the splendid artistry of the band himself; and unquestionably he must have felt that nothing he could do would enhance the power and beauty of the performance. For generally the new conductor is vibrant with energy. He makes the modest baton look sometimes like the famous Big Stick.

Mr. Fiedler is a big man physically—the biggest the Symphony concert patrons have seen, with the possible exception of Mr. Paur. Off his little platform he suggests the soldier, his movements are so rigid and precise. But his movements when conducting are free and lively, though never spectacular. When approaching a climax he reinforces his baton with his clenched left fist, which he holds high in the air; and he courts sweet gentleness with a bow. His beat is nervous, but expressive. On the whole, a manly, unaffected musician, vigorous but dignified; a man who, in spite of his attainments, is not afraid to take pleasure in applause. By his straightforward manliness and musicianship he won popularity at the start. He conducted the entire program, which also included the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot," without a score.

There have been few changes in the orchestra since last season. Willy Hess returns as concert master. His admirers applauded him when he came out. And there is a new man by his side, S. Noack, who takes the place of Mr. Czerwonky. At the next concert will appear the first soloist of the season, Emil Sauer, who will play one of his own piano concertos.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT

Post ——— Oct 11, 08
Max Fiedler Makes First Appearance as Leader of the Orchestra

Mr. Max Fiedler was greeted with more than cordiality when he made his first appearance as conductor of the Symphony orchestra in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon. Many of those present rose to receive him, and in his acknowledgment of this welcome by audience and orchestra he was perceptibly touched.

Mr. Fiedler is serious, but unstudied in his manner. His hair is combed straight back from the temples, as is the habit of many German professors. He wears, or gave the shortsighted observer the impression that he wears, glasses, but in appearance he is far from the pedagogue. At a rapid glance certain photographs published early in the season might have given the impression of a pedant, but this was quickly seen to be erroneous; his personality savors far more of the dreamer.

He had chosen for the opening programme of the season, music with which he is evidently very familiar; the Beethoven Leonore Overture No. 3, the Brahms C Minor Symphony, the love scene from Strauss' early opera, "Feuersnot," and the Tannhaeuser Overture. Three of these scores, the Leonore overture, the symphony, and the Tannhaeuser overture, he conducted from memory.

A man of unusual energy, Mr. Fiedler made urgent motions with his hands, arms, head and torso. He conducted with surprising authority at a first performance, and he secured immediate response to every wish. His beat was very elastic; his conceptions notably individual. The orchestra played with magnificent verve in his behalf.

As a matter of course, from a technical standpoint, there were many rough places in this initial concert. Yet, to the writer, the introduction of the overture was never so mysterious, so subtly, joyfully prophetic of what was to come.

Beethoven, from the very first, was a man of startling vitality. He had a disturbing habit of upsetting both acquaintances and the musical public by explosive outbursts of fervid emotion and elemental strength; he dismayed the casual by disturbing appeals to emotions that they would fain ignore. That torrential spirit is still alive, though we are not often permitted to realize this today. There have come to be accepted certain formulated interpretations of the great classics. We speak reverently of their "formal strength," etc., but we forget that, certainly in the case of Beethoven, they were surcharged with romanticism, and are today potent with never-dying fire. Then, once in a while, a conductor who stands on his own feet comes, pulls off the shroud, and, lo and behold, the lion roars again. Again the voice that cannot be ignored or silenced makes its way to the innermost recesses of the spirit.

Mr. Fiedler's reading was by no means in strict conformance with tradition. Would Beethoven, were he alive today, read his compositions as certain "authorities" would have us believe? There were many details which were open to discussion, as heard at the rehearsal and concert, and which it would be unfair to criticize at this time, but the performance as a whole was overwhelmingly dramatic. How good it was to hear a real choleric Beethoven fortissimo, as for instance in the great A flat chords of the introduction, and how splendid the cumulative force with which the final climax was prepared! The members of the orchestra could probably ride this old war horse in their sleep, but they played it yesterday as musicians in the first flush of a new enthusiasm.

The Brahms symphony, too, an epic which is only comparable with the sublimest masterpieces in any art, was given an interpretation that only a man of wide humanity and rich inner experience could have compassed. Why should a title or a programme interfere with the effect of pure music? Why not put lines from Ossian on the fly leaf of this score?

Do any but the Germans possess the depth of nature, the spirituality that he should have who would approach this masterpiece? I believe that the third movement could have more humor, Homeric humor, than any conductor that I have heard has ever given it, and the last movement could have been more steadfast in rhythm. Mr. Fiedler here and there lingered by the wayside, as it were, to pluck a flower of a phrase, or to secure the best possible representation for some especially telling passage. But, again, to listen to this symphony was an intimate and searching experience. The introduction was Titanic in its striving, the second movement supremely exalted. The introduction to the finale—how wonderfully it would accompany the scene in Faust's study—was profoundly introspective. The pizzicato of the strings became extraordinarily significant. Mr. Fiedler put their question, asked their riddle, I say, as Hamlet questioned the universe, "To be or not to be"; and the concluding pages were glorious in sweep.

The finest performance of the afternoon was that of the Strauss' excerpt. The music is not legitimately for the concert room, and its reason for being should be known for the piece to be truly appreciated. It serves as an accompaniment to a tableau in the opera. The theme of this opera is based on a legendary tale. Kunrad, a passionate lover, has humiliated his affianced, Diemut. The latter, to revenge herself entices her lover into a basket which is suspended from her window, and raising the basket leaves him hanging in midair. Kunrad, who knows magic, extinguishes all fire in the village and there is a terrible outcry. Soon Diemut repents, draws up the basket and the neighbors ask for fire. The tableau is this: In the darkness a light shines from Diemut's window. The music, at first faintly heard, soon swells with passionate longing. Finally fire bursts forth from the piled wood in the street and lights gleam in the houses. The children join hands and dance, the voices of the lovers are heard from the window and there is the song of praise for the midsummer night.

The melodies of this intermezzo are of little value, but they are sensuously pleasing, and the climax is splendidly constructed. The orchestra fairly dripped color, and at the magnificent outburst at the end the tone seemed to refract from group to group of instruments as blinding light might from mirror to mirror.

The Tannhauser overture was conspicuous for the justness of the tempo and the constructive skill with which its component parts were contrasted or welded together.

An ardent student, a strong personality, spoke at this concert. Mr. Fiedler's tremendous earnestness and vital enthusiasm communicated themselves to the players. He is a modern of moderns, and, in spite of his modesty and a praiseworthy objectivity, he conceived his music from a highly individual standpoint. He impressed his conceptions with exceeding force upon his men, who, in turn, transmitted them with splendid emphasis to the listening audience.

So much for the present. The Scheherazade suite, which will be given at the next concert, is a test that calls into play every capacity and the whole dynamic range of an orchestra. It's adequate performance necessitates extreme finish. We may surely expect a season of great brilliance and interest.

First Symphony Concerts

As it has already been many times announced, the first pair of Symphony Concerts for the new season falls on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week in Symphony Hall. At them Mr. Fiedler will make his first appearances in Boston as a conductor, and his first in America as more than a passing visitor of a single week. As usual on such an occasion, the conductor and the orchestra have the concert to themselves, and familiar music, with a single exception, makes the programme. The exception is a fragment of Strauss's opera "Feuersnot," the climax of a scene of passion, which Strauss characteristically allots to the orchestra while the lovers themselves are invisible. It has not been played here in six years. The other pieces on the programme are Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, the overture to "Tannhäuser" out of Wagner, and Brahms's symphony in C minor. In all three Mr. Fiedler has proved his mettle in many concerts, and they are tokens as well of the range of his programmes and his powers. The minor arrangements for the concerts remain practically as heretofore, with a beginning at 2.30 on Friday afternoons and at eight on Saturday evenings.

FIEDLER MAKES HIS DEBUT IN BOSTON

Herald — Oct 10. 08
New Conductor of Symphony Orchestra Receives Warm Welcome.

By PHILIP HALE.

The first public rehearsal of the 28th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Max Fiedler, the new conductor, led for the first time in this city. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "Leonora," No. 3....Beethoven
Symphony No. 1 in C minor.....Brahms
Love scene from "Feuersnot"....R. Strauss
Overture to "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner

It has often been said that the first concert given by an orchestra with a new leader serves chiefly as a means of introducing the conductor to his audience. The public rehearsal yesterday seemed more than this, for the enjoyment of the audience was evident. Seldom, if ever, has there been more spontaneous or more hearty applause at any public rehearsal in the history of this orchestra. Mr. Hess, returning after a year's absence to take his place as concertmaster, was warmly greeted, and when Mr. Fiedler came on the stage for the first time before an audience in this city his welcome was as one given to a familiar, long-established favorite.

Nor did the audience seem critically disposed during the concert. It was not disposed to be impatient when there was occasionally sluggishness and irregularity of attack or when horns were overblown or uncertain in solo passages. The applause, except that after the third movement of the Symphony, was unusually warm, at times enthusiastic, and Mr. Fiedler was recalled more than once.

We all have a right to infer from what Mr. Fiedler has said that he is especially drawn toward the orchestral music of Beethoven, Brahms, Richard Strauss, Wagner and Tschalkowsky. A conductor chooses naturally for his first programme music with which he is in fullest sympathy, music that appeals to him, compositions that have already served him as battle horses to ride to victory.

Four of Mr. Fiedler's favorites were represented. It was his intention at first to conduct Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," but a performance of this impressive work would have made the programme too long, so the "Love Scene" from "Feuersnot," that strange opera founded on a grotesque, or, as some might say, porcine legend, was substituted, a scene that in the concert room excites surprise and makes no deep, no lasting impression. Nor is it too much to say that this music in concert shows Strauss at his feeblest.

Mr. Fiedler's programme pleased the audience, for the three important pieces were well known. The hearers were not obliged to question themselves as to the intrinsic worth of the music. They were not forced to hear a musical speech that was strange to them, perplexing, disquieting. In thus choosing familiar compositions Mr. Fiedler was eminently wise.

It is not necessary to speak in detail of Mr. Fiedler's interpretation of the compositions. The orchestra has been only a week under his direction. No matter how honestly the players may already respect him no matter how eagerly they may anticipate his wishes, it would be too much to expect at present the close relationship that insures performances of flawless mechanism and highly poetic interpretation.

Yet it may be said that Mr. Fiedler revealed certain qualities that will undoubtedly make him popular. He conducts with a gusto that is unmistakable. He is not afraid of stormy crescendos and clashing climaxes. He is eminently virile. Whether he be a master of finesse; whether he be endowed with an exquisite sense of proportion; whether he delights in delicate nuances as well as in primitive and strongly opposed colors: these are questions not now to be answered jauntily.

There were admirable features yesterday in his reading of the overture to "Leonora" and in the first two movements of the symphony. Certainly his interpretation throughout was sturdy and its stirring effect on the audience was indisputable. His manner of conducting is more exuberant in the matter of gestures than that of his two last predecessors, but he did not indulge himself in mere callisthenics, nor was there any suspicion of a desire on his part to affect the audience through the eyes. His sincerity and his absorption in the appointed task are unquestionable.

The programme of the concerts next week will be as follows: Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite "Scheherazade" (in memory of the composer's death, June 21, 1908); Sauer's piano concerto No. 2 (Emil Sauer, pianist); overture to "Oberon."

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Globe — Oct 11. 08
First of the Season's Symphony Concerts.

New Conductor Presents a Program of Standard Works.

Coming Recitals and Notes of Current Interest.

The 28th season of the Boston Symphony concerts opened under the direction of the new conductor, Max Fiedler, with a conservative program comprising four selections, more or less familiar to the patrons of these annual affairs. Beethoven's third "Leonora" overture, Brahms' first symphony, the "Love Scene" from "Feuersnot," the Richard Strauss opera, and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture made up the group arranged by Mr. Fiedler in a kind of fortissimo crescendo.

The director and the orchestra were on safe musical ground, for he led part of the time without using a score, and at no time did he appear to read much when the book was before him. The men, of course, were familiar with the works, and this enabled them to follow easily the baton. The result was a fine performance, running smoothly, as usual, and a very satisfactory debut of the able gentleman selected to lead the orchestra during the next six months.

Mr. Fiedler's manner of conducting has already been described in the Globe, so a brief review of the first program is all that is requisite now. There were no innovations introduced by him. He had nothing new to say in the Beethoven overture. The somber C minor symphony by Brahms was given with the looked-for dignity and general gloomy impressiveness.

In the latter number the wonderful finale, especially in the horn phrases, was seemingly about as near perfection in execution as one would wish to hear. In justice to the brasses high praise is due for the uniform excellence of work which was mellow and harmonious even in the greatest musical stress demanded by the score.

The contrasts in the Strauss "Love Scene" were properly accentuated, but there is so much that suggests the chaotic in the piece that it isn't very effective as a program number. The "Tannhauser" overture went admirably and closed the concert in brilliant style.

Mr. Fiedler leads in an energetic manner and with something of a military poise, he gives his cues plainly and enters into his work with evident enthusiasm. He was cordially greeted, and Mr. Hess, who has returned to the first desk, was also heartily welcomed.

Emil Sauer will be this week's soloist, playing his second piano concerto. The program will open with Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" and close with Weber's "Oberon" overture.

WOULD like to make even exchange of seats 25 and 26 LL for the SYMPHONY REHEARSALS for seats in the Balcony. Address W.K.M., Boston Transcript. 31(A) o 12

EXCELLENT DEMAND FOR SYMPHONY SEATS

Prices Begin to Go up About Row E, but Row Q Came High, With a $71 Bid.

The auction sale of rehearsal seats for the 28th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened at 10:15 a.m., bids for seats from rows A to JJ inclusive being for premiums over the regular $18 price per seat.

As not more than four seats could be sold to a single purchaser, it was 11:30 before the two first rows had been auctioned off.

Seat No. 1, in the front row, started at $5 premium, finally selling at $8.50 premium. For seats 2, 3 and 4, the next three, $12.50 each was the highest bid.

In the center of row A, $11.50 was the highest bid. For seat 14 in row A, left of the center aisle, the bid was $19.50, the high bid for that row.

In B row, $22.50 was bid for seats 17 and 18 together on the left of the center aisle; and for four seats in C row, right of center aisle, $22.50 each was the high bid.

In E row $30 per seat was the high bid for 10 and 11, near the right center aisle; $22.50 each was the highest bid for the next four seats, while for 18, on the center aisle, $42.50 was received, and for 20, the second seat from that aisle, $52 was the highest bid.

The highest in F was $43.50 for 19 on the center aisle; $39.50 was the highest bid for 9, on the right center aisle in G row, and $47 for seat 8, on the center aisle in the same row.

For seats in the center of row H bidding started at $25, Nos. 15, 16, 17 and 18, near the center aisle, commanding a premium of $50 each. No. 26, at the end, sold at $23.50, the lowest in that row.

In I row the bidding ruled well above $30.

The high bid for seat number 18 on center aisle of K row was $68, while for the next seat $62 was received.

The seat on center aisle in M row went at $68, while $54 was the high premium for the next seat in from the aisle.

It looked for a time as if row K would bring the highest figures.

This sale was eclipsed, however, when row Q was reached, and $71 was paid for Nos. 18 and 19, the highest price of the forenoon.

Last year $80 was the highest price at the opening sale.

SMART SET OVATION FOR LEADER FIEDLER

Amesbury Oct. 11, 1908

Mrs. Jack Gardner Among Society Leaders at First

Symphony Concert.

All there is of smart society in town turned out last night for the first of the season's Symphony concert under the leadership of Max Fiedler. Though it is so early in the season, there were enough of fashionables present to make a handsome showing, and the gowns, the music and the general greetings after the summer's absence and the interest in the new conductor combined to make last night the most interesting event of the season.

Though there were many who still seemed unreconciled to the loss of Dr. Muck the general impression gleaned was that Mr. Fiedler at the start, gained the sincere admiration and good will of his critical Boston audience.

The programme consisted of Beethoven's overture "Leonora," Brahms' Symphony No. 1, in C minor, the love scene from Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot" and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser." It was splendidly rendered and roused the audience to unusual enthusiasm.

Fiedler Proves Mastery.

"Leonora," which is known as one of Beethoven's most emotional utterances, was played by the orchestra with the intensity of feeling and the rich coloring so necessary to its true interpretation. It was in this, the first number, that Mr. Fiedler proved his mastery, and at its conclusion the applause was almost deafening.

In Brahms' symphony the sympathetic warmth of tone, fluent, brilliant technique and exquisite coloring, combined with a thorough understanding of the spirit of the work, stamped the orchestra's rendition well high perfect.

The love scene from Strauss's opera "Feuersnot" was played with fine spirit and a keen sense for the fantastical contents of the work. Mr. Fiedler's conception was broad and masterly and he led his men to certain triumph. It was brilliantly, skillfully and cleverly scored.

The performance of Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser" was especially brilliant and fine; the interpretation was both poetic and truly musical. The orchestra played with splendid vigor and dash, interpreting the stirring music with all the skill and enthusiasm with which Mr. Fiedler seems able to infuse those under his leadership.

Mrs. Jack Gardner Present.

Among the most enthusiastic women in the audience was Mrs. John L. Gardner, who occupied her usual seat in the first balcony, and was profuse in her praise of the new leader. Mrs. Gardner wore a handsome gown of black lace, trimmed with touches of coral velvet about the bodice and a large black hat trimmed with black plumes.

Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, accompanied by Mr. Higginson and her pretty granddaughter, was another enthusiast. Mrs. Higginson was, as usual, all in black.

Mrs. Charles Charles Storrow was in gray satin, Mrs. Gordon Abbott in mauve chiffon, and Mrs. Arthur Lyman in black.

Mrs. Neal Rantoul was in light tan cloth; Mrs. J. L. Bremer in black, and Mrs. Nathan Matthews in a handsome directoire creation of light gray cloth trimmed with lace and velvet.

Mrs. J. Murray Forbes was in black, as was also Miss Mary Forbes. Mrs. F. L. Dabney was, as always, handsome, well gowned and distinguished in appearance, and is still very much like the Miss Fay of other days.

A WARMER RECEPTION FOR MR. FIEDLER

Trans. Oct. 12, 1908

The Incidents of the Symphony Concert of Saturday—Mr. Gatti-Casazza Announces Notable French Operas for the Metropolitan—Debussy's Pieces After Poe—Mr. Pinero in Paris—How French Players Acted and a French Audience Received "His House in Order"—That Night of Brogue in New York—News of Local Concerts and Plays—Miss Marlowe's Return—Bourget Turns Playwright Again

Mr. Fiedler was still more warmly received and steadily applauded at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening than on that of Friday afternoon. The audience, which left empty only a few scattered seats, welcomed him cordially, warmed to him after the performance of the "Leonore" overture, and at the end of Brahms's symphony fell to hearty and insistent applause. Mr. Fiedler's satisfaction was unmistakable. He seemed on the point of calling the band to its feet; but he contented himself with a warm grasp of Mr. Hess's hand, as though by this proxy he was congratulating the whole orchestra. The little fragment of Strauss's "Feuersnot," which the audience scarcely noticed on Friday, was applauded heartily on Saturday and at the end of the concert, with the overture to "Tannhauser," the listeners lingered until Mr. Fiedler had his men on their feet to share his own reward. At the beginning, Mr. Hess invited and received a similar welcome to that of Friday, and it was a pleasure to hear and to feel again the individuality of his tone and its fine clear brilliance, notably in Wagner's overture and Brahms's symphony. Mr. Grisez, too, excelled himself in the smooth beauty of his tone and the loveliness and warmth of his phrasing when the clarinet sings Venus's appeal to Tannhauser. Happy the singing actress who as Venus may sing so well and so feelingly! The conductor and the orchestra were less nervous than they had been at their first appearance together; Mr. Fiedler seemed surer that the band would do his will, while the men themselves were more confident of his wishes. Thus the symphony and the fragment of "Feuersnot" went more firmly and vividly than on Friday, heightening, rather than altering in any material respect, the traits that Mr. Fiedler then disclosed as a conductor.

In particular, Mr. Fiedler's purpose was clearer in his reading of Brahms's symphony in C minor. Throughout he seemed to seek and to gain an exceeding largeness, richness and warmth of expression. He would have none of Brahms the formalist, of Brahms the reflective composer, of the Brahms in whom thought and endeavor seem in some performances of his music and in some of the music itself, to have dried the springs of emotion. Admire as you will, Mr. Fiedler seemed to be saying to his hearers, the mastery of form and development that have shaped this music, appreciate to the full its profound seriousness of idea, of treatment, of evolution. But it is so profound and so rich because of the warmth and depth of the feeling that underlies it. The warmth of it, the richness of it, and not its subtleties or its profundities, its seriousness or its scholarship, need the discovery and the magnifying hand of the conductor. It is for him to proclaim these qualities by the opulence and the beauty of the tone that he draws from his men and by the sustained emotional force of his own reading. Notably in the first and in the final movements Mr. Fiedler gained such ardor, while in the slow movement he maintained such opulent beauty. Moreover, when once the listener had grasped what seemed the conductor's purpose the performance of the symphony had the unity that it seemed to lack on Friday.

A considerable part of the public of the Symphony Concerts would gladly hear again the fragments of operas which Dr. Muck rigidly excluded from his programmes. Mr. Fiedler is disposed to undertake such pieces; but the final episode of Strauss's "Feuersnot" seemed none too well chosen for a beginning. At the outset, it is vivid enough anywhere in its picturing of the still, dark, expectant, nervously anxious city. The ensuing music of the passion of the lovers, hidden within the glimmering chamber, has stirring sweep and intensity. Thus far the musical tissue of the piece, its atmospheric suggestion and its emotional effect alike bring response. The power, the pictorial quality, the passion of Strauss are all in it. Thereafter, and to the close, it is intrinsically music of the scene—music to accompany and enhance the visible acting upon the stage, the return of light and fire, the rejoicing of the townsfolk and all the rest. It is part and parcel of what the eye first sees, and to which through the eye rather than the ear the spectator answers. Heard apart from these rekindling lights and this joyous bustle, it must seem as it did on Friday and Saturday, only baffling and exaggerated orchestral clamor.

H. T. P.

in Boston.

"España."

LAUD DEBUT SYMPHONY'S NEW LEADER

Max Fiedler Warmly Greeted at the Opening Concert. Franklin Oct 10 '08

VOLCANO IN ACTION.

Max Fiedler, the new director of the Symphony orchestra, has every reason to feel perfectly satisfied with his Boston debut, which affair took place yesterday in Symphony Hall, the occasion being the first public rehearsal in the 1908-1909 series of 24 concerts. It was an eminently successful appearance from every point of view. Mr. Fiedler has taken kindly to Boston, having nothing but praise for the city, its orchestra and its people, and yesterday Boston, or as much of it as could crowd into Symphony Hall, reciprocated in unstinted measure. It was the most enthusiastic, most sincerely enjoyable opening concert in the record of the orchestra.

The programme was a happy choice, with its Beethoven "Leonora" overture, Brahms No. 1. Symphony, the love scene from Strauss' "Feuersnot" and the "Tannhaeuser" overture. It breathed at once of that democracy in programme making so ardently desired but so seldom granted. It was a happy augury for the season. Then there was the undisguised enthusiasm with which the members of the orchestra greeted their new leader. It was contagious and fairly on a par with the enthusiasm that swept in tremendous waves over the house.

More than one of the fair sex caught her breath on the appearance of the new conductor as she noted the absence of angles and creases and in its place a sort of free-for-all, happy-go-lucky style. But then a glance at the programme should have told all that Mr. Fiedler is not hide bound in any sense of the word. In personal appearance and in action as in his programme there is a delightful freedom, something that bespeaks a season of music for the Symphony patrons that will eclipse all in novelty and attractiveness.

The reading of yesterday's programme calls for no special comment, it being the first public appearance for the season of the orchestra and that under a new leader. There was, however, a fire and dash coupled with fine consideration for contrasts that promises well for the season. The new leader is a veritable volcano in action, once the concert is on. Additional interest was imparted to yesterday's concert from the fact that the favorite concert master, Mr. Willy Hess, was once again at the first desk.

NEW SYMPHONY LEADER GAINS HEARTY PRAISE

Adv: Oct 10 '08

FIRST CONCERT CREATES

FAVORABLE IMPRESSION

Strong Readings of Beethoven,
Brahms, Strauss and Wagner—
Few Changes in Orchestra.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven....."Leonora" Overture, No. 3
Brahms.....Symphony in C minor, No. 1
Strauss.....Love-scene from "Feuersnot."
Wagner.....Tannhaeuser Overture

A concert of good augury! Brilliantly interpreted from first to last and a dignified and worthy letter of introduction for the new conductor, who was greeted most cordially. Orchestras change, and we change with them. But there was the minimum of change in the personnel and in the programme, from those of the recent past. The chief change was the reappearance of Prof. Willy Hess as Concertmeister. This is a distinct advantage to the orchestra, for he is a much stronger first violinist than his predecessor. There are few orchestras who can show as well-equipped a chief violinist at their head as the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have this season. Prof. Hess was greeted with applause as he took his seat at the first desk.

Another change, of slightly less importance, was the appearance of Mr. S. Noack as second concert-meister, in the place of Mr. Czerwony, who leaves the organization. Of the value of this change we cannot yet speak; we shall wait with interest for the appearance of the new artist in solo work. He will need to be a very thorough violinist to replace Mr. Czerwony, who was second among the violins, last season, only in name. The change of second bassoon is naturally of minor importance. We are heartily glad that so few changes were deemed necessary, for we hold the orchestra, as it stands, to be about as well chosen as it could possibly be without extravagant expenditure.

Becoming reminiscent regarding conductors, we recall the first conductor of this orchestra, Mr. Georg Henschel, as very radical for his time; giving model programmes, with many novelties, yet without dullness and the torture of much of the prolix new school,—and having some ill-balanced ideas about the placing of the orchestra. Then Mr. Gerlicke, the man whose drill-mastership made the preeminence of the orchestra possible,—from a technical standpoint the founder of the orchestra. Then Mr. Nikisch, an orchestral virtuoso, who played upon his instrument as none other could, but allowed the technique of the band to fall away in some degree. Then the brusque and hearty conductor, Paur by name and powerful by nature, who taught us the modern school with an enthusiasm that was contagious. Then the great Dr. Muck in whom we expected a Chesterfield but who was virility personified and who gave us some lessons in Brahms and Beethoven that we would not have deemed possible after his great predecessors. Of all these we think Mr. Max Fiedler most resembles Emil Paur.

It is no slight task to come after such men, it is most difficult to follow immediately after such a predecessor. That Mr. Fiedler feels entirely equal to such a task was evidenced by his choosing the Brahms first symphony as his first great "piece de resistance," for it was just this work with which Dr. Muck made us sit up. It was a symphony which we thought we all knew, and Dr. Muck proved to us that we didn't. We doubt whether any conductor in the world can go beyond the breadth and nobility with which this symphony was given last season, especially in its very intricate finale.

Bearing this in mind, it is sufficient praise to say that the interpretation of yesterday afternoon was one that showed Mr. Fiedler an earnest and intelligent Brahmsite, a leader who suffered no point of the subtle and complex work to be lost. There is figure development in this symphony that goes beyond Beethoven, and the finale becomes an epitome of the whole work, reintroducing much from the preceding movements. It was just in this difficult movement that Mr. Fiedler won his chief success in the work, and it was no small thing that, with the memory of an absolutely phenomenal performance still with them, the audience recalled the new conductor with much fervor. The applause continued long enough for Mr. Fiedler to point to the orchestra as being partners in his triumph.

The reading was virile and thoroughly dramatic, not drily academic. There are some conductors we wot of who place a periwig on Brahms and stuff him with sawdust and imagine that they have caught his spirit. Let us be grateful that Mr. Fiedler is far removed from these. He gave the intricate work entirely from memory. In fact, he only used a score once, we believe—in the Richard Strauss number. The fire of the climaxes in the Finale of the symphony burned brightly and the breadth and victory of the Coda were grand enough.

Mr. Fiedler is a graceful conductor. His beat is decisive and his gestures very expressive. He seldom makes any body movements and is far removed from the St. Vitus Dance school of leaders. Often at the final chord of a powerful coda he holds his baton pointing directly heavenward, with an inimitable gesture of triumph.

The concert began with Beethoven's "Leonora, No. 3" overture, of which we adore everything except the title, which only suggests a fire-engine, or a tug-boat.

or that Florestan had three wives. It was evident that Mr. Fiedler is not likely to go to the extreme of slow tempo in which Dr. Muck sometimes dragged out his overture introductions. The trumpet call might have been a trifle louder on its second fanfare, but it is not our purpose to speak of technical defects in commenting on the rehearsal performance, for the Saturday night's interpretation has always an advantage in orchestral routine over the Friday afternoon rehearsal.

Especially brilliant was the finale of the "Leonora No. 3" overture. When Beethoven gets thoroughly joyous the temperature rises to 100 in the shade, as witness the end of the Ninth symphony or of the opera of "Fidelio," or of this overture. This was performed with a delirium of joy, a frenzy of happiness.

As regards the "Tannhauser" overture, our orchestra has played it so often that they could almost perform it with their hands tied behind their back. There was one new point in it, however: the cymbal clash at the end of the Venus music, just before the apotheosis of the Pilgrim's Chorus, became a cataclysm! If ever the cymbalist earned his salary he did upon this occasion. The final appearance of the chief theme, when the tired pilgrims sing their theme with a power that proves that their lungs at least are not fatigued, became a trombone gale and a violin hurricane. Again and again was the conductor recalled and his success was confirmed with this work.

But to our mind the nub of the concert was the absolutely noble performance of the love scene from "Feuersnoth." "Fire Famine" this may be entitled, but there was no lack of fire in the performance. The excellent reading of the Strauss number was the best that Boston has yet had of it. And the work gives Strauss at his best, in a scene where passion has its legitimate play, and where intensity is entirely in place, which it is not in weaning a baby or soothing its colic—vide "Sinfonia Domestica." Strauss here plays a rhapsody upon that great instrument which he has made so peculiarly his own—the modern orchestra—and the effect is thrilling. The audience was quick to understand that it was hearing a masterly interpretation, and the applause was great and spontaneous.

Altogether, then, the first impression of Mr. Fiedler is more than satisfactory; he is to be a worthy figure in famous list of great conductors who have led our symphony orchestra.

MUSICAL NOTES

In response to urgent requests received from patrons of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge, the management this year has arranged to give eight concerts in Sanders theatre, Harvard, on Thursday evenings, Oct. 22, Nov. 19, Dec. 10, Jan. 21, Feb. 11, March 4, April 1 and April 29, and these soloists are announced: Miss Lilla Ormond, contralto; Miss Germaine Arnaud, Miss Laura Hawkins and Mr. George Proctor, pianist; Miss Nina Fletcher and Mr. Willy Hess, violinists.

Mr. Fiedler has felt compelled to make a considerable change in the second programme of the series, which will be played on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He originally had on it Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite "Scheherazade" and Schumann's Symphony in D minor, with Emil Sauer as soloist, but Mr. Sauer has elected to play his own "Second Concerto" for piano, and in order to bring the programme within reasonable length Mr. Fiedler has taken off the Schumann symphony and placed in its stead Weber "Oberon" overture.

OVATION FOR MAX FIEDLER

Ref. 6414.08
(By OLIN DOWNES.)

If Mr. Fiedler's reception was warm when he conducted for the first time in Boston at the public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra on Friday afternoon, it was exceeded by the enthusiasm displayed yesterday evening. The attitude of the audience, which at the beginning of the concert was merely one of good will, grew more appreciative after each performance, and at the close of the Brahms symphony the conductor received an ovation.

Owing probably to the fact that Mr. Fiedler felt surer of his men at the second concert, and relied more upon their knowledge of his wishes, he was, though forceful, less vociferous in his manner, being often content to simply remind them of his desires.

The performances were superior to those of the previous occasion, and they demonstrated the folly of pronouncing judgment after a single hearing. Both in the Beethoven overture and the Brahms symphony the rhythmic current, and as a consequence, the musical thought, were more sustained. Both were nobly read. The third movement of the symphony had now the requisite lightness of touch.

The introduction of the finale was again a profound experience, though Mr. Fiedler demands too much tone of the solo horn—that horn that comes straight from heaven—with the consequence that its tone was lamentably coarse. The last pages were borne along with a splendid sweep and cumulative power to the conclusion.

The "Tannhauser" overture underwent the same transformation in the writer's consciousness that the "Leonore" had at the first performance. It was essentially new and intensely convincing in its message.

A well-satisfied audience wended their way homewards.

PROGRESSIVE IDEAS FOR SYMPHONY CONCERTS PROPOSED BY MR. FIEDLER

EMIL SAUER

BERTA MORENA

MAX FIEDLER - THE NEW CONDUCTOR of the BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PADEREWSKI

GERMAINE SCHNITZER - PIANIST

LHÉVINNE

EMILY DESTINN

With the annual auction sales of seats for the Symphony concerts but a week off it may be said that Boston is on the threshold of the new season. So far as the Symphony Orchestra is concerned, it should be one of the most brilliant in its history, for not only is there a new conductor coming, but the management has provided the most brilliant list of soloists that it has had in many years. Moreover, there are few familiar names in the list. Many of those announced have never appeared with the orchestra here, and some at these concerts will make their Boston debut, notably Emmy Destinn, Mischa Elman and Germaine Arnaud.

The annual auction sales will take place on Monday, Sept. 28; Tuesday, Sept. 29; Thursday, Oct. 1, and Friday, Oct. 2. As in past years, the $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold on Monday, the $10 seats on Tuesday, the $18 seats for the concerts on Thursday and the $10 seats on Friday. There will be twenty-four rehearsals and twenty-four concerts on successive weeks until May 1, with the following exceptions: Nov. 6 and 7, Dec. 4 and 5, Jan. 8, 9, 29 and 30, Feb. 19 and 20 and March 19 and 20. In these weeks the orchestra will be out of town. The public rehearsals to be given on Friday afternoon, Dec. 25, and Good Friday, April 9, will take place on the day before.

The management is confident that in Mr. Fiedler they have found a great man, who will worthily continue the brilliant achievements of Dr. Muck. He comes here from Hamburg, where for the last fourteen years he has been director of the Hamburg Conservatory, one of the most celebrated institutions of its kind in Germany, and for four years the conductor of the Philharmonic concerts. Unlike his predecessors, with the exception of Henschel, he is essentially a concert conductor, never having had anything to do with opera. He is known and admired from Rome to St. Petersburg, from Vienna to London. In St. Petersburg he has been offered the conductorship of the Russian Imperial Symphony concerts, which he has refused. He was one of the "guest" conductors brought to New York by the Philharmonic Society four years ago, and he made a deeper impression than any of the others that year.

Fiedler is known as a man of catholic tastes. He is celebrated as an interpreter of Beethoven, Brahms and Schumann. He is an ardent believer in progress, and is one of the most influential friends the young composers of Europe have. He has done more probably to popularize Russian, Bohemian and French music than any other man in Germany, and the younger Germans swear by him. He is said to be skilled in the making of programs.

The list of soloists comprises three singers, six pianists, three violinists and two cellists. The singers are Jean Gerville-Reache of the Opera Comique, Paris, and Manhattan Opera House; Emmy Destinn of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, and Berta Morana of the Royal Opera, Munich, and the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. The pianists are Paderewski, Emil Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhevinne, Germaine Schnitzner and Germaine Arnaud. The violinists are Mischa Elman, Willy Hess and the new second concertmaster, Soma Pick Steiner. The cellists are Alwyn Schroeder and Heinrich Warnke.

Emmy Destinn of the Royal Opera, Berlin, is expected to be one of the sensations of the year. She is coming to America for the first time, a dramatic singer of the lighter roles, who is regarded in Berlin, Paris and London as one of the highest artists now before the public. For the past ten years she has been a member of the Royal Opera in Berlin, and for the past four seasons she has been one of the principal features of the season of opera at Covent Garden. Last spring she created the role of Salome in Paris.

One of the most interesting features of the season will be the coming to Boston for the first time of Mischa Elman, that astonishing Russian lad of 17, who is not only a marvel in the technique of the violin, but plays his instrument with a skill looked for in a great artist in the full maturity of his mental powers.

Mr. Fiedler has sent over a partial list of the novelties he plans to perform. They are:

Symphony Paderewski
Symphony, No. 8 Bruckner
Overture (first time in America) Reget
Variations "Kaleidoscope" Noren
"Brigg Fair" or "Paris" or "Appalochia" Dellus
"Finlandia" "Frühlingssied" and "Valse
Artiste" Silbellus
Two scherzos from "Gloria" I. "Durch's
Feder" II. "Durch die Schmelde" Nicoda
Suite "Moyen Age" and "Printemps" Glazounoff
Three Dances Gretry-Motte
"Reve d'enfant" (from Suite, Op. 53)
"Harvest Dance" (from the opera "Mo-
loch" Schillings

Saturday's Symphony.

The opening concert Saturday evening of the local symphony season brought out another big audience, fully as large as that attending the opening rehearsal and released a whole lot of enthusiasm, so that Mr. Fiedler cannot have the slightest doubt of being in the home of friends, and those friends are certain that they are going to like their new director more and more as the season progresses.

The "Leonora" overture was well received, but Brahms' first symphony got a rather chilly reception. On the other hand the Strauss "Feuersnot" selection scored instantly, with the "Tannhaeuser" number closing the concert in one great burst of enthusiastic approval.

For this week's rehearsal and concert the programme calls for the Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite "Scheherazade," Sauer's Second Concerto for piano and Weber's "Oberon" overture, Mr. Emil Sauer being the soloist.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 17, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF, SYMPHONIC SUITE, "Scheherazade." (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night"). op. 35.
(In memory of the Composer, who died June 21, 1908.)
I. The Sea and Sindbad's Ship.
II. The Story of the Kalandar-Prince.
III. The Young Prince and the Young Princess.
IV. Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to pieces against a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior.
Conclusion.

SAUER,

CONCERTO No. 1, E minor, for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA.

I. Allegro patetico.
II. Scherzo: molto vivace; Andante con moto, quasi Allegretto.
III. Cavatina: Larghetto amoroso.
IV. Rondo: Tempo giusto.
(First time in Boston.)

WEBER.

OVERTURE to the Opera "Oberon."

Soloist:

Mr. EMIL SAUER.

The Pianoforte is a Knabe,

Journal Sept. 19, 1908

With the annual auction sales of seats for the Symphony concerts but a week off it may be said that Boston is on the threshold of the new season. So far as the Symphony Orchestra is concerned, it should be one of the most brilliant in its history, for not only is there a new conductor coming, but the management has provided the most brilliant list of soloists that it has had in many years. Moreover, there are few familiar names in the list. Many of those announced have never appeared with the orchestra here, and some at these concerts will make their Boston debut, notably Emmy Destinn, Mischa Elman and Germaine Arnaud.

The annual auction sales will take place on Monday, Sept. 28; Tuesday, Sept. 29; Thursday, Oct. 1, and Friday, Oct. 2. As in past years, the $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold on Monday, the $10 seats on Tuesday, the $18 seats for the concerts on Thursday and the $10 seats on Friday. There will be twenty-four rehearsals and twenty-four concerts on successive weeks until May 1, with the following exceptions: Nov. 6 and 7, Dec. 4 and 5, Jan. 8, 9, 29 and 30, Feb. 19 and 20 and March 19 and 20. In these weeks the orchestra will be out of town. The public rehearsals to be given on Friday afternoon, Dec. 25, and Good Friday, April 9, will take place on the day before.

The management is confident that in Mr. Fiedler they have found a great man, who will worthily continue the brilliant achievements of Dr. Muck. He comes here from Hamburg, where for the last fourteen years he has been director of the Hamburg Conservatory, one of the most celebrated institutions of its kind in Germany, and for four years the conductor of the Philharmonic concerts. Unlike his predecessors, with the exception of Henschel, he is essentially a concert conductor, never having had anything to do with opera. He is known and admired from Rome to St. Petersburg, from Vienna to London. In St. Petersburg he has been offered the conductorship of the Russian Imperial Symphony concerts, which he has refused. He was one of the "guest" conductors brought to New York by the Philharmonic Society four years ago, and he made a deeper impression than any of the others that year.

Fiedler is known as a man of catholic tastes. He is celebrated as an interpreter of Beethoven, Brahms and Schumann. He is an ardent believer in progress, and is one of the most influential friends the young composers of Europe have. He has done more probably to popularize Russian, Bohemian and French music than any other man in Germany, and the younger Germans swear by him. He is said to be skilled in the making of programs.

The list of soloists comprises three singers, six pianists, three violinists and two cellists. The singers are Jean Gerville-Reache of the Opera Comique, Paris, and Manhattan Opera House; Emmy Destinn of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, and Berta Morena of the Royal Opera, Munich, and the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. The pianists are Paderewski, Emil Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhevinne, Germaine Schnitzner and Germaine Arnaud. The violinists are Mischa Elman, Willy Hess and the new second concertmaster, Soma Piek Steiner. The cellists are Alwyn Schroeder and Heinrich Warnke.

Emmy Destinn of the Royal Opera, Berlin, is expected to be one of the sensations of the year. She is coming to America for the first time, a dramatic singer of the lighter roles, who is regarded in Berlin, Paris and London as one of the highest artists now before the public. For the past ten years she has been a member of the Royal Opera in Berlin, and for the past four seasons she has been one of the principal features of the season of opera at Covent Garden. Last spring she created the role of Salome in Paris.

One of the most interesting features of the season will be the coming to Boston for the first time of Mischa Elman, that astonishing Russian lad of 17, who is not only a marvel in the technique of the violin, but plays his instrument with a skill looked for in a great artist in the full maturity of his mental powers.

Mr. Fiedler has sent over a partial list of the novelties he plans to perform. They are:

Symphony Paderewski
Symphony, No. 8 Bruckner
Overture (first time in America) Reger
Variations "Kaleidoscope" Noren
"Brigg Fair" or "Paris" or "Appainchia" Delius
"Finlandia" "Frühlingslied" and "Valse
Artiste" Sibelius
Two scherzos from "Gloria" I. "Durch's
Feuer" II. "Durch die Schmelde" Nicode
Suite "Moyen Age" and "Printemps" Glazounoff
Three Dances Gretry-Motte
"Reve d'enfant" (from Suite, Op. 53)
Tschalkowsky
"Harvest Dance" (from the opera "Mo-
loch" Schillings

Saturday's Symphony.

The opening concert Saturday evening of the local symphony season brought out another big audience, fully as large as that attending the opening rehearsal and released a whole lot of enthusiasm, so that Mr. Fiedler cannot have the slightest doubt of being in the home of friends, and those friends are certain that they are going to like their new director more and more as the season progresses.

The "Leonora" overture was well received, but Brahms' first symphony got a rather chilly reception. On the other hand the Strauss "Feuersnot" selection scored instantly, with the "Tannhaeuser" number closing the concert in one great burst of enthusiastic approval.

For this week's rehearsal and concert the programme calls for the Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite "Scheherazade," Sauer's Second Concerto for piano and Weber's "Oberon" overture, Mr. Emil Sauer being the soloist.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 17, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF, SYMPHONIC SUITE. "Scheherazade." (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night"). op. 35.
(In memory of the Composer, who died June 21, 1908.)

- I. The Sea and Sindbad's Ship.
- II. The Story of the Kalandar-Prince.
- III. The Young Prince and the Young Princess.
- IV. Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to pieces against a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior.
Conclusion.

SAUER,

CONCERTO No. 1, E minor, for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA.

- I. Allegro patetico.
- II. Scherzo: molto vivace; Andante con moto, quasi Allegretto.
- III. Cavatina: Larghetto amoroso.
- IV. Rondo: Tempo giusto.

(First time in Boston.)

WEBER.

OVERTURE to the Opera "Oberon."

Soloist:

Mr. EMIL SAUER.

The Pianoforte is a Knabe.

Emil Sauer, the pianist, has been giving concerts in Spain. The accompanying picture represents Sauer as a prominent Barcelona caricaturist sees him. London News 14 1906

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

From ——— Oct 17, 08

THE THREE INTERESTS OF THE AFTERNOON

The New Traits in Mr. Fiedler's Conducting—A Finer Quality of Tone and in Two Pieces a More Tempered Exuberance—The Arabian Nights to the Memory of Rimsky-Korsakoff—Mr. Sauer, the Pianist, Reappears with His Own Concerto—A Performance of Polished Poise and Fascinating Style—The Incidents of the Day

Again the interest—or rather the interests—of the Symphony Concert of yesterday, the second in the series, was largely personal. Mr. Fiedler's traits and deeds as a conductor were still novel; the major piece on the programme, the familiar "Scheherazade" of Rimsky-Korsakoff, who died last June, was played to honor the composer's memory; and the pianist of the afternoon, Mr. Sauer, reappearing after nearly ten years of absence, chose a concerto of his own. There remained, to end the programme, Weber's overture to his opera of "Oberon," but in the inevitable mood with such a repertory piece, it was more the conductor's than it was the composer's. Empty seats were much fewer than they were a week ago; and the audience received Mr. Fiedler cordially, and was long and hearty in its applause at the end of Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite. Again the conductor was quick to share this reward with the orchestra, took Mr. Hess warmly by the hand, and had the men on their feet. There was more effusive handshaking at the end of Mr. Sauer's concerto, and a truly German good-fellowship seems likely to become for this season one of the ways of the concerts. The house seemed a little restless under Mr. Sauer's concerto, which is long, but not under his playing, and at the close it applauded him with just warmth. Then came a few departures—far fewer than is the custom of Friday afternoons—and while Mr. Fiedler is still novel, he holds nearly his whole audience to the end. It had its reward in his reading of the overture to "Oberon" and again there was no mistaking the liking of his new public for him.

For the most part Mr. Fiedler conducted with less physical exuberance than he did a week ago, and once and again in the broad climaxes of Rimsky-Korsakoff's music his gestures had a large and sweeping quality that was pictorial in itself. Moreover, until he came to Weber's overture, he showed much less propensity for telling and calculated effects. There, however, he was conductor of a week ago. He subdued the introduction to the pianissimo of Weber's bidding and kept the tonal coloring duly mysterious and remote. Then he held the rhetorical pause long, and fairly flung the orchestra upon the first fiery measures of the allegro. The effect was electrical; it was as though Weber's music had been suddenly charged with the dramatizing intensity of the conductor's temperament. Thus he swept through the rest of the overture. He gave the music much more than the chivalrous flourish and accent that make traditionally its characteristic speech. He made it sound like the romantic poetry, everyone who could was writing in the Europe of these days of the twenties and the thirties. It sounded as big, as rich, as changeful, as rhetorical and resonant as a clangorous tirade in Victor Hugo's plays. Weber ought to have lived to write an overture to "Hernani." It was easy to look up curiously to see whether Mr. Fiedler was wearing the red waistcoat that was the badge of the romantics. But the old, the hackneyed overture to "Oberon" had vitalizing glow and sweep under such treatment. It had found its true voice again, and Mr. Fiedler magnified it.

Here was the robust, dramatizing, exuberant Fiedler of last week. Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite and Mr. Sauer's concerto disclosed other and more novel sides of his conducting. In particular in the concerto he adjusted very adroitly and very smoothly the relative shares of the piano and the orchestra. Pianist though Mr. Fiedler was before he was a conductor, he nowhere subordinated the band to the virtuoso. No more did he count Mr. Sauer as one more player in the ranks of his men. He held the piano and the orchestra now in fusion, now in balance, and again in contrast, with justice and without forcing. The blending and the shading of the tonal coloring, the euphony of the solo and of the instrumental voices persuaded and delighted the ear. A similar finesse and euphony ran through the performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite. Mr. Fiedler sought no stirring bigness of tone. He was content now with richness, now with iridescence, now with suavity and softness of tonal coloring. The music depends much upon rhythm alike in the play with the sea and the ship of Sindbad and in the revel of the Caliph's city. Mr. Fiedler was alert to it with quick elasticity, but without exaggerated stress. He made no "effect" in the crash of the cloven ship. The song of the prince and the princess sounded as dreamy and songful as though it were drifting through an Oriental lattice on a quivering hot afternoon. Other conductors have made parts of "Scheherazade" more thunderous. Evidently aptitude for finesse and feeling for tone of beautiful texture dwell side by side with Mr. Fiedler's energy and amplitude.

The drowsiness of the close, still afternoon seemed by some freak of chance to suit Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite. In spite of tempest and revel the music was lulling, vaporous, like the aroma of some Oriental drug. Through the droning bassoon that tells the Kalendar's tale and through the suave, bright and insinuating violin that is Scheherazade's voice, the listener saw the big, spectacled, bearded head, the peering, kindly eyes, the loose-jointed, stooping figure of the Rimsky-Korsakoff that Paris knew in recent years when he came to conduct at Russian concerts there. His air was professorial. He looked as though he had grown old in teaching and not in the composing of tone-poems redolent of the West Asia that is so close to Russia—"Antars" and "Scheherazades"—and of operas in which the voice of Russian folk-song and legend sings and the spirit of simple Russian life, when there was no Europe to trouble, sings and dances. The music—oftenest—went languorously on. The Oriental sea lapped or swayed; the Kalendar stayed or quickened his changeful tale; the little love-song of the royal children pulsed or tinkled along; Bagdad whirled in its fete. And what manner of man and composer had wrought it all?

Let the pedagogue say in his surety that Rimsky-Korsakoff was summoning the music of the Orient from the West to save his Russia from the German musical invasion from the East. Let the analyst point out that here is music that has no development and evolution in the academic sense of the words, that is a thing of strokes and touches in harmony, in rhythm, above all in instrumental device and coloring—a thing of aroma and atmosphere and not of body or substance, outline and idea. It is such music, and Rimsky-Korsakoff may have written it when he was full of the anti-German spirit of the "Invincible Five." Yet it is no less the music of the Arabian Nights that he would distill into his tones. The means justify themselves because they accomplish their ends; the purpose, the matter, the manner are perfectly fused. And out of the fusion rises the insinuating magic, the shifting moods, the changing pictures, the strangeness, the sultriness, the sensuousness, the sheer enchantment of Scheherazade's tales. He distills them into the liquor, sirupy or fiery, of his tones, and the drink provokes to dreams and visions. "Scheherazade" is one face of his monument; the other of Russian folk-song and legend is hidden from us of the Western world in his unknown operas.

Mr. Sauer, as he came to the piano, suggested the distinctive qualities of his playing—its surety and continence, its sensitiveness and eloquence. The poise, the fineness, the sense of style in the virtuoso spoke in the face and the figure of the man. Though he turned his forty-sixth year only last week, he suggested the virtuoso of an earlier day. The smooth, clear-cut face, the high forehead, the aureole of thin hair, the sensitive features, the deep eye, the air half of the man of a cultivated world; and half of the absorbed musician, somehow suggested an idealized Liszt. Instinctively, sympathetically, the listener expected qualities of mind as well as qualities of emotion in his playing. There was no thought of the virtuoso come to display himself or his own music. In a moment the orchestra had embarked on the concerto "to the memory of his master, Nicolas Rubinstein." A little further, and the piano was entering in full chords. Thenceforward to the end there was no mistaking, no doubting. Mr. Sauer played with ample, sure and elastic technical mastery. He seemed unconscious of it; his hearers unaware of it. It was too sufficient, too poised, too certain to emphasize. His tone had the same fitness, the same surety. Always it was eloquent with the particular quality he would summon and that the music asked. It was broad and deep; or it flowed in sustained song; or it played lightly in ornament or fancy; or it was quick of movement, elastic, sparkling. There was not a hint of mechanism or of effect in it. The piano was a musical instrument; the virtuoso a transmitting musician. Whatever beauty of sound, whatever musical thought, whatever quality of mood Mr. Sauer would bring seemed altogether inevitable. There was no thought of process in the fineness and the fulness of the result. His playing was perfectly ordered to a perfect eloquence. The sheer completeness of it was its fascination. Its poise made a mental satisfaction; its eloquence stirred to emotion; its beauty was untroubled pleasure. The peculiar delight and emotion of music—of ordered, expressive, disembodied sound—ran high in it. The concerto might have had much or little to say; at the least it never fell away into a mere virtuoso piece; it had ideas and feeling as well as scholarship and skill; but the perfection of the saying conquered all else. The style was not only the man, but the music.

H. T. P.

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS

Two exceptional seats in BB, near centre; reasonable price. K.O.S., Boston Transcript. 2t(A): 0 14

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS

Two exceptional seats in BB, near centre; reasonable price. K.O.S., Boston Transcript. 2t(A): 0 14

SYMPHONY TICKET

One seat in MM left, for Friday afternoon Address W.D.B., Boston Transcript. (A):

SHOULD like to make even exchange of seats 25 and 26 LL for the SYMPHONY REHEARSALS for seats in the Balcony. Address W.K.M., Boston Transcript. 3t(A): 0 12

MR. SAUER FOR THE SECOND TIME

Trans. Oct. 19, 1908
The Remarkable Qualities of His Playing on Saturday Night—Mr. Fiedler and His Men Carry "Scherherazade" to Glowing Performance—A Glimpse of Mme. Chaminade as She Landed in New York—Annette Kellermann and the Unusual Impression That She Makes—A Tear for Topsy—A Prospect of Miss Duncan in Boston—Grieg's Posthumous Quartet—Maude and Robertson to Come to America—Operatic News

The heat seemed to play its part in the Symphony Concert of Saturday night. The hall was as comfortable as it might be when midsummer returns in mid-October, but the warmth made the audience rather restless and what was more to the point—sent the pitch of the orchestra, which had been playing for an hour in the close air, perceptibly above that of the piano which Mr. Sauer used in his concerto. None the less, his performance of it won even heartier applause than it had on Friday. The concerto came and went; Mr. Sauer, the composer—if he will pardon us—seems in it unusually cheerful for Mr. Sauer, the pianist, writing to the memory of his dead and beloved master. But the music and its ostensible purpose vanished in the delight of the playing. It was sufficient for the moment that Mr. Sauer was clothing it with the virtues of his artistry. To the eye came the charm and the fineness of the man who sat at the piano with a face that might be looking from some gilt-framed portrait in a room that smelt of lavender in an old still house. To the ear came the delight of a tone that was clearness, crispness, undulation, depth, lightness or softness as the mood and the substance of the music changed—a tone that could subdue itself to the orchestra, and yet remain a bright thread in the whole musical tapestry; that could dissolve into gossamer-like ornament, as though it were flocks of sound, that yet could sing warmly and broadly. Mr. Sauer's playing was beautiful precise and edgeless, and it never hardened. It could be beautifully crisp and sparkling, and it never of itself turned metallic. Mr. Sauer persuaded the piano, as every virtuoso of the first rank, woos his instrument. It gave back an unforced voice for him to caress and shape into what mould he would. The man, the music, the performance seemed wholly blended. The fusion of all three had a sure and rounded perfection that was style itself.

Did the heat play upon Mr. Fiedler so that he overdrove the orchestra at moments through the light texture of Mr.

Sauer's concerto and so that he laid on the instrumental coloring of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" more warmly and richly, gave its rhythm sharper play, and marshalled its climaxes more broadly than he had on Friday? The Russian wrote with a kind of passion for the orchestra and for what its endless resources might yield him. The changing masses of its tone thrilled him. The voices of individual instruments went almost like fumes to his head. Mr. Fiedler, as all his performances have shown, loves the big and stirring orchestral tone, seizes the salient detail, seeks the long sweep or the telling emphasis. Our band is a band of virtuosos, masters of their instruments even when a Rimsky-Korsakoff is setting the tasks, and capable under such impulse as came from him and from Mr. Fiedler on Saturday, of vivid and thrilling eloquence. To particularize of Mr. Hess's violin, of Mr. Schücker's harp, of Mr. Longy's oboe, Mr. Grisez's clarinet, or Mr. Sadony's bassoon were almost invidious. Every man in the band spun his particular thread of shimmering color in this orchestral fresco of the Orient that Rimsky-Korsakoff was painting. He may have been playing only the notes on the paper before him; but the two-fold impulse of the composer and the conductor had stirred him to the imagination behind them and to the eloquence that they brought. The breadth and the emphasis of Mr. Fiedler's methods, the intensity of his feeling, magnified the music as it had magnified Weber's on Friday. Details curled out of the mass of glowing tone and were caught into it again. Its passing languors, its momentary melancholy only made the music the more rhapsodic. Played as it was on Saturday, "Scheherazade" seemed equally a rhapsody of the Orient and a rhapsody of the orchestra. No wonder Mr. Fiedler could not quite carry the overture to "Oberon" to the excitement of his first performance of it.

H. T. P.

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS—Part of season ticket, 10 concerts, $15.00, floor, end seat, right, Mass. Ave. side, Row H.H. Address H.K.F., Boston Transcript. (A):

SYMPHONY TICKETS FOR SALE

Alternate Saturday evenings; front row, 1st balcony, A 28, 29 left. P. O. Box 3518, Boston (A):

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS

Two good seats for sale; price $28 each. (A): Box 250, Sharon, Mass.

SAUER AND FIEDLER DIVIDE HONORS AT SYMPHONY

9 mil Oct 19. 08

Two features made the second concert of the Symphony Orchestra uncommonly interesting. One was the beautiful piano playing of Emil Sauer, who on this occasion performed for the first time in the United States his Concerto No. 1, in E minor. The other was the revelation of new and attractive qualities in the conducting of Mr. Fiedler.

When Mr. Sauer made his original appearance in Boston in 1899 he gave promise of developing into one of the great pianists of the times. The promise has been fulfilled. He is more than a brilliant performer, however; he is a splendid musician. His concerto held the interest of the large audience Saturday night from first to last. After each movement there was great applause, and at the end he was recalled several times. His concerto is simple in form and generally melodious; therefore, it made an instant appeal to most of the people in the audience. It must have given particular satisfaction to those who last season complained of the musical puzzles which now and then were presented to the Symphony patrons. The question is whether in the last movement it did not go a bit too far in the other direction and become rather conventionally romantic. However, the main point is that it gave much pleasure and that the soloist and the orchestra played it delightfully.

The magnificent virtuoso resources of the orchestra were fully displayed in the first number on the program, Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," presented by Mr. Fiedler in memory of the famous composer, who died in his native Russia last June. Each of the many solo passages was charmingly rendered, and at the close of the number, after responding himself to the enthusiastic applause, Mr. Fiedler made his players rise and receive their share of the tribute. The last number, the "Oberon" overture by Weber, was also greatly enjoyed by the lovers of old-fashioned euphony.

There will be no soloists this week. The orchestra will play Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," and a newly published symphonic poem by the late Edward MacDowell, based on Keats' "Lamia."

Boston Symphony Concerts.

Mr. Fiedler has felt compelled to make a change in the second programme for the concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The original programme was: Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite "Scheherazade" and Schumann's Symphony in D minor with Emil Sauer as soloist; but Mr. Sauer has chosen his own Second Concerto for piano, and in order to bring the programme within reasonable length, Mr. Fiedler has taken off the Schumann Symphony and placed in its stead Weber's "Oberon" overture. Mr. Fiedler has placed the "Scheherazade" Suite on the programme as a memorial tribute to Rimsky-Korsakoff, who died on June 21 last. This particular Suite is a remarkable illustration of the brilliance of the composer's orchestration and of his feeling for the Orient. Mr. Sauer, who visits America for the second time, will make here his first appearance, as far as this season is concerned, in this country. He is justly ranked among the leading pianists of the world.

In response to urgent requests received from patrons of the Symphony orchestra in Cambridge, the management this year has arranged to give eight concerts in Sanders Theatre, Harvard, instead of the six that has been the rule for the past several years. Last year there was not a concert when all who wished to attend could be accommodated. The concerts will be given on Thursday evenings, Oct. 22, Nov. 19, Dec. 10, Jan. 21, Feb. 11, March 4, April 1 and April 29. The hour of beginning the concerts, as last year, will be 8 o'clock. The following soloists are announced: Miss Lilla Ormond, contralto; Miss Germaine Arnaud, Miss Laura Hawkins and Mr. George Proctor, pianists; Miss Nina Fletcher and Mr. Willy Hess, violinists. The renewals by last year's subscribers must be made on or before next Wednesday, Oct. 14, at Kent's University bookstore, in Harvard square. The public sale of season tickets will open at Kent's University bookstore, in Harvard square, on next Saturday morning, Oct. 17.

FOR SALE

Two seats, 3 and 4 D, for Symphony Rehearsals; price $30. D.D.D., Boston Transcript. 3t(A) 20

Musical Comment

Post

EDITED BY OLIN DOWNES Oct 16. 08

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Pianist-Composer — A Great Composition and a Little One

The programme of the second Symphony concert, season 1908-9:

- I. Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night"), op. 35 Nicholas Rimsky-Korsakoff (In memory of the composer, who died June 21.)
- II. Piano concerto No. 1, in E minor. Emil Sauer (First time in America.)
- III. Overture to the Opera, "Oberon".... Weber Soloist, Emil Sauer.

Yesterday the Post commented with naive enthusiasm upon the inexhaustible treasures of Rimsky-Korsakoff's astounding score, a score that should be a lexicon convenient to the hand of every student of the orchestra. A score which, from the standpoint of style, at least, is unsurpassed, and which—these comments could be multiplied a thousand-fold, but let us point one great moral which adorns this tale, and then, if possible, rest content.

There is an old saw: "Scratch a Russian and catch a Tartar." No man was ever more truly, inevitably, one of his own people than Rimsky-Korsakoff, but let us thank the gods that, if you scratched his hide, you found—an artist! One who was never content with anything short of the utmost perfection attainable by mortal, who early in life saw the error of the ways of his youthful colleagues, Cui, Borodine and Company, they who espoused the theory—the fallacy—that study and the engendering of technical skill are the enemies, the shackles, of the inspired artist.

And so he grew head and shoulders above the false prophets. His inborn sensuousness, his ardent study and kinship with the works of Liszt and Berlioz, gave him knowledge of the souls of instruments; but his keen esthetic perceptions never permitted any inherent love of rhythmic orgies and barbaric gorgousness to degenerate into vulgarity or disproportion or "splurge."

No doubt he believed to a large extent in the impersonality of great art. He was a wonderful narrator of fairy tales. The gloom that is popularly supposed to be a characteristic of the Slav temperament, and often is, does not appear disproportionately in his creations. His music, with all its individuality, is never obtrusively personal. In his operas as in his instrumental expressions he preferred discoursing in an exquisitely finished manner of those subjects which permitted such treatment, to wallowing in the depths of vodka-ridden emotionalism—as witness certain of the terribly human pages of his immortal compatriot, Tschalkowsky.

Our composer kept himself largely in the background, and he discovered to the world new vistas of beauty. This is not a little thing. A Russian to the backbone, he was first of all, praise be, an artist! Take heed, young America!

And he died full of honors.

We know that there have been composers who played the piano, and pianists who have composed. In the latter class belong Mr. Paderewski, who has produced a passable piano concerto; also Mr. D'Albert, who at a Symphony concert some three years ago gave evidence of an idea or two, and by his performance left the hearer with the sensation of having been knocked down by an automobile. Brahms was one of the former. He played the piano, they said, like a hog, though, whatever the indiscretions he may have committed, we believe we should have preferred that style of performance. Then there is a third class, to which Mr. Sauer belongs—pianists who write notes on paper.

Let us not deny our ignorance! There are two things that we have a distinct recollection of in this concerto. One is the sentimental theme of the second movement, of a Chopinesquely sick character, and the other is a tune in the finale, which has a jingle to it, albeit a silly jingle.

Mr. Sauer, according to a statement by the press, considers that there has been no technical advancement in piano music since the days of Chopin and Liszt. His concerto bears evidence to this belief. It is the same old thing, which often displays the piano at its worst, and the work is, as a whole, colorlessly scored. Oh, for even a technical figure that is novel or interesting. No, Mr. Sauer flourished his paws, and joyfully, innocuously, gambolled up and down the keyboard arp-eggio-wise. It was a pity. A great artist, we should judge, this pianist surely is, from an interpretative standpoint. His tone is unusually beautiful and full, when the demands of the miserable composition did not oblige the performer to force it. He played throughout with the splendid authority and aplomb of a great virtuoso, but this concerto is not for the lone, cruel world. It should go to home and mother.

Weber's overture is glorious in this, its perennial youth. Old-fashioned today it yet is alive with the loveliest poetry, fiery romanticism and inextinguishable ardor. Again there were rough details in its execution, and again Mr. Fiedler triumphed by his sincerity and enthusiasm in a glowing performance.

THE TRAITS AND OPINIONS OF MR.

SAUER

His Present Return and His Ideas of Modern Music—Brunhilda, Horses and a

Today and tomorrow, at the Symphony Concerts, Mr. Emil Sauer, one of the truly eminent pianists of our time, reappears in America after nearly ten years of absence, and in the ripeness of his powers, while later, no doubt, he will return to Boston for a recital or two. He is tall, thin, quick of speech, nervous of movement. His eyes look keenly out of his irregular face; his mouth is sensitive, his forehead high, and a rather sparse shock of gray hair falls loosely around it. He looks the pulsant and ardent virtuoso, as Liszt looked it. Of his ancestry, so to say, as a pianist, Mr. Huneker writes as follows: "Sauer is that rare bird, a pianist who boasts not only of the solid science of the German school, but also has a subtle Slav strain in his playing. He played Bach, Beethoven, Schumann and Brahms with deep unaffected sentiment, healthy Teutonic sentiment; but let him loose in Liszt, Chopin or the Russians, and a second temperament came to view. I puzzled over this anomaly for years, wondering how a North German—a hard-headed Hamburger—could spin a many-colored web of exotic music. After I finished the Sauer memoirs I understood. His mother was born in Russia, and he received at the hands of Nicolas Rubinstein the fiery baptism of a piano virtuoso. Add to this erudition and wide knowledge of men and things in many lands, and we may reach a fair guess of the complicated psychology of Emil Sauer."

As a musician—for Mr Sauer is a composer as well as a pianist—his cast of mind and taste seems clear in these two recent sayings: "Technically, further advance in piano playing, seems impossible, except in the direction of complexity, intricacy and overelaboration. However, as those things do not make for beauty, and I consider beauty indispensable in art, I feel justified in believing that no real progress has been made since the time of Chopin, Liszt and Rubinstein. Simple art suits me best, if that is the only kind which speaks from the heart and reaches the heart. In composition, too, mere complexity is only a matter of skill, of mathematics. Strauss is a genius, of course, but many of his followers and imitators are nothing but musical engineers."

And here again of modern music: "As to my attitude toward modern music—that which is the work of genius I respect, because of the courage that must have been necessary to present such revolutionary matter. But much that has followed merely because it is the fashion to revile anything that has melody is very objectionable, I think. The creations of the impressionists who are geniuses are one thing—their imitations are another. But after all the whole matter is one of sincerity or non-sincerity. If one is divided between the thought of that financial success a work will have, and how it will effect the public, there is little room left for inspiration—without which it can be but tinsel."

Emil Sauer. 6.16.08

Emil Sauer, who will play his second piano concerto at the Symphony concerts this week, played for the first time in Boston at a Symphony concert Jan. 14, 1899, when he chose Henselt's concerto. He was then so heartily applauded that he was encouraged to break the traditional rule by adding an "encore piece"—theme and variations by Schubert-Tausig. He gave afterward three recitals in the city.

Not long ago Mr. Sauer contributed to "M. A. P." a chapter of autobiography, in which he told of his trials and tribulations when he first visited London in 1882. "I do not think there was a musical celebrity, a conductor, an agent, whom I did not approach, and approach in vain. None would even hear me play. I had to live, though there were times when I began gravely to doubt the necessity, and so I took to teaching the English 'mees' at five shillings the hour, sometimes less. * * * Not without bitter feelings does Mr. Sauer recall also his early London experiences as an artist invited to play at private houses. It was 'even worse than giving lessons.' Sometimes he came away from these functions 'with the tears streaming down his face, humiliated to the depths by the treatment he had received.' The pianist added: 'To this day, if I ever have nightmare it takes the form of sitting in a London drawing-room playing the great masters, while in my ears there roars and reverberates a veritable Niagara of talk.'

Nor does Mr. Sauer think that the life of a virtuoso is necessarily a happy one. He said recently to a reporter of the Daily Chronicle in London: "I can assure you it means tremendous hard work. Take the travelling. You rarely spend more than 30 hours in a town before you return to the railway station to go on another journey. The actual physical strain, due to the incessant moving, with no proper rest, is surprising. You have to practise in the morning, just to keep your fingers supple, and you spend what spare time you may have in studying new works, for a pianist must always be increasing his repertory. And then comes the performance! How seldom does an audience think how easily a sensitive artist may be upset, and consequently unable to do his best. A little noise—some people talking, a door banging, a draught, a bad light, these are some of the trifles that annoy a highly-strung pianist. But the poor fellow has to get through his programme."

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT IS GIVEN

Harold 6.18.08

Tribute Paid to Late Rimsky-Korsakoff in Excellent Performance.

By PHILIP HALE.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, M. Feidler conductor, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

"Scheherazade"..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Piano concerto in E minor, No. 1..... Sauer
Overture to "Oberon"..... Weber

"Let us now praise famous men, and our fathers that begat us * * * Such as found out musical tunes, and recited verses in writing."

"Scheherazade" was played in memory of Rimsky-Korsakoff, who died last June at St. Petersburg. As composer, man and Russian, he deserved the tribute, and on the whole the "Scheherazade" suite is the orchestral work that reveals fully his peculiar and indisputable talent. There may be in "Antar," here and there, a higher flight of imagination, and there is beyond question in "Antar" nobler poetic thought, as becomes the subject; but in "Scheherazade" we see the magician with colors, we hear the voice of the Oriental rhapsodist singing of eastern love and particularizing the beauties of his adored one—at the mere thought he swoons; we know the lover of wild, fantastical tales.

Was Rimsky-Korsakoff the last of the great Russian "cabinet" although Cui and Balakireff still live? There was a time—and it was a little over a dozen years ago—when some feared that, owing to Russian influence, music would become Cossack. The cry was raised, even in New York: "Ware the Muscovite, 'ware his Tsar, and 'ware his chromatic scale." Tschalkowsky, usually a cosmopolite, and the unflinchingly "national" composers were feared alike. It was said that they would drive out Brahms, other orthodox Germans, heretical Germans, and the French that were modern in 1895; that Stcherbutcheff, described by Mr. Huneker in his lush days as one "writing small dangerous things for the piano," music that made the hearers mad as grow the devourers of mandrake, would with his lulling and poisoning rhythms cause Chopin and Schumann to be forgotten. This fear is over, and the ultra-conservative now shudder at the bitter-sweet dissonances and the eluding modulations of the Sieur Debussy.

In Paris neither the conservatives nor the radicals have accepted heartily Tschalkowsky with his amazing revelations of his tortured soul, with his iteration of despair that vainly seeks relief in vodka and peasant dances. Rimsky-Korsakoff had been put at the head of Russian composers, until Moussorgsky's "Boris Godounoff," performed by a Russian company, startled Paris last spring by its ruthless and gorgeous barbarity. Cesar Cui is to occidental only a name, and Glazounoff, whose savagely beautiful and impressive "Stenka Razin" gave rare promise, is now unfortunately fertile and orthodox, given over to the construction of works with thin material and sumptuous colors. There are other "offs"; there are "skys" and "ines"; their music is heard and it is as though it never was. But Rimsky-Korsakoff is still praised.

It is true that Mr. Jean Marnold is almost stupefied by the pungent oriental odor of "Scheherazade." To quote his words, in this suite "the benzoin of Arabia sends forth here and there the sickening empyreuma of the pastilles in the harim." In order to enjoy thoroughly "Scheherazade" the hearer must be filled with the spirit of the "Thousand Nights and a Night." He must have sported with the porter and the ladies of Bagdad, gone with the wandering prince into the underground chamber and witnessed the blazing vengeance of Allah, sailed the seas with Sindbad, been shaved by the barber who was the wonder of his generation, shadowed by the wing of the mighty bird, rowed over waters forlorn and perilous by men of bronze. He must have wept in the palace chambers of the deserted City of Brass, escaped from the cruel Fire Worshipper and trancedly gazed on the Persian girl alone.

Serene with argent-lidded eyes
Amorous, and lashes like to rays
Of darkness, and a brow of pearl
Tressed with redolent ebony,
In many a dark, delicious curl,
Flowing beneath her rose-hued zone;
The sweetest lady of the time,
Well worthy of the golden prime
Of good Haroun Alraschid.

Surely he that translated into haunting tones pages of

The Book of rocs,
Sandalwood, ivory, turbans, ambergris,
Cream tarts, and lettered apes, and calendars,
And ghouls, and genies was something more than a decorator in music, a juggler with colored phrases. Rimsky-Korsakoff left behind him no more deeply versed theorist, no greater master of contrapuntal schemes and stratagems, yet in "Scheherazade" he depends for effects, for the maintenance of the fitting mood, on repetition of themes with varied dress, on metamorphoses of themes, on the suggestion of an exotic, languorous atmosphere. The seas of the world were not unknown to him, yet in the superb tonal fury of his ocean he avoided the reproach of bald, panoramic realism. This ocean is Sindbad's, and it is without an official chart.

Putting the moods of many of the wondrous Arabian tales into a suite of four movements, turning the thought of the hearer to the marvellous portrayal of an oriental life when Jinns and Ifrits still fearing the name of Solomon aided or thwarted mortals in their desires, when mortals themselves were enchanters or enchanted, when the slave suddenly had boundless wealth and the magnificent Caliph could not sleep from boredom, when mad mirth alternated with groans and weeping and the perfume of boudoirs was blended with the reek of victims' blood. Nicolas Rimsky-Korsakoff displayed an imagination that the unknown story-tellers might have envied and a richness of eloquent expression that rivalled the wealth in Aladdin's palace. Imagination and eloquence are among the highest qualities of a composer, if not the highest. And Rimsky-Korsakoff left no colleague, no successor among his countrymen endowed with like qualities.

I dwell on the work itself rather than on the performance for two reasons: The performance was a memorial tribute, and when a work has supreme and abiding qualities, it remains in spite of this or that performance. Last night the interpretation did honor to the composer and to his suite. The performance was always engrossing; it was at times extraordinarily effective, as in the shipwreck episode. Mr. Fiedler's reading was highly colored and broadly dramatic. The performance of the orchestra was eminently virtuosic and in ensemble and in solo detail an eminently memorable one. The theme of Scheherazade with the cadenza, whenever it was given to the solo violin, was played with unusual skill and sympathy by Mr. Hess.

Mr. Sauer played his piano concerto in E minor, which was heard here for the first time. It is said that the performance was the first in America. The concerto is a frankly virtuosic piece, and its brilliance and sentiment are of the virtuosic order with which players of high rank make an irresistible appeal to general audiences who do not inquire too curiously into the inherent worth of the musical contents. This concerto is an undeniably honest work; it was intended that it should give pleasure and provoke stormy applause.

When the concerto was first played before a critical audience in Bremen eight years ago it made a sensation and Mr. Sauer was obliged to repeat the finale. At the concerts here last week it evidently pleased the hearers, who were enthusiastic over the pianist. Mr. Sauer is a pianist of the very first rank. He gave an admirable model of legitimate piano playing. A faultless technique artistically displayed; beautiful singing of melodic phrases; a brilliance that glowed and was not metallic; fine taste and musical intelligence—these, indeed, merited the hearty applause that the performance called forth.

Second of the Season's Symphony Concerts.

Notes ————— 6th 18.08

Emil Sauer the Piano Soloist
of an Interesting Program.

Unusual enthusiasm was shown at the second Symphony concert, and all the applause was deserved for, in the first place, the celebrated artist, Emil Sauer, returned after an absence of nine years and demonstrated again his wonderful ability as a pianist. Then conductor Fiedler gave a splendid reading of the stirring "Scheherazade" suite, by the Russian composer, Rimsky-Korsakoff, and closed with an admirable performance of the "Oberon" overture by Weber.

Mr Sauer played for the first time in America his piano concerto in E minor, a work in four parts, the first of a passionate and somewhat dignified nature, and the remaining three generally of a lighter character, combining brilliant figurations and delicate melodic forms which call for technical skill more than for emotional expression.

The artist certainly is one of the foremost among pianists of the present day. He seemingly has every requirement of his profession, strength, virility, powers of expression, a touch that is crystalline and technique that makes light of difficulties of the keyboard. Of course, as interpreter of his own work there is no need to speak. He is his own authority. His dramatic power, shown chiefly in the first movement and at the finale of the fourth, is of a high order, and in fortissimo passages and chord runs his skill was as great as that shown in the dazzling pyrotechnics of the scherzo and parts of the rondo. The plaudits showered upon the artist between divisions culminated in repeated calls to the platform after the concerto was finished.

Mr Fiedler's vigorous and pleasing personality seems to suit symphony patrons, for he was heartily greeted when he first appeared, and at each break in the "Scheherazade" suite there was a mild tumult on account of the way the composition was treated. The different stories of the "1001 nights" were vividly related, and all the ingenious melodies were given with proper effect. Very amusing was the work of the wood winds in the story of the prince; piquant and weird the combinations, melodic and otherwise, in the third part, and all the chaotic suggestions of the last movement were given with due musical hurly-burly.

The orchestral association with the soloist was thoroughly good, and the Weber overture went as delightfully elf-like as one need desire.

Boston will hear this week at the symphony concert for the first time an unknown work by the late Edward A. MacDowell, a symphonic poem entitled "Lamia," the score of which was sent to Mr Fiedler a few days ago. This poem dates back to MacDowell's early period, being the third work of this form that he wrote, having been preceded by the "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine."

The program will open with the "Eroica" symphony, by Beethoven, and close with the prelude to "The Maestersingers."

Yours truly
Emil Sauer

the slave suddenly had boundless wealth and the magnificent Caliph could not sleep from boredom, when mad mirth alternated with groans and weeping and the perfume of boudoirs was blended with the reek of victims' blood, Nicolas Rimsky-Korsakoff displayed an imagination that the unknown story-tellers might have envied and a richness of eloquent expression that rivalled the wealth in Aladdin's palace. Imagination and eloquence are among the highest qualities of a composer, if not the highest. And Rimsky-Korsakoff left no colleague, no successor among his countrymen endowed with like qualities.

I dwell on the work itself rather than on the performance for two reasons: The performance was a memorial tribute, and when a work has supreme and abiding qualities, it remains in spite of this or that performance. Last night the interpretation did honor to the composer and to his suite. The performance was always engrossing; it was at times extraordinarily effective, as in the shipwreck episode. Mr. Fiedler's reading was highly colored and broadly dramatic. The performance of the orchestra was eminently virtuosic and in ensemble and in solo detail an eminently memorable one. The theme of Scheherazade with the cadenza, whenever it was given to the solo violin, was played with unusual skill and sympathy by Mr. Hess.

Mr. Sauer played his piano concerto in E minor, which was heard here for the first time. It is said that the performance was the first in America. The concerto is a frankly virtuosic piece, and its brilliance and sentiment are of the virtuosic order with which players of high rank make an irresistible appeal to general audiences who do not inquire too curiously into the inherent worth of the musical contents. This concerto is an undeniably honest work; it was intended that it should give pleasure and provoke stormy applause.

When the concerto was first played before a critical audience in Bremen eight years ago it made a sensation and Mr. Sauer was obliged to repeat the finale. At the concerts here last week it evidently pleased the hearers, who were enthusiastic over the pianist. Mr. Sauer is a pianist of the very first rank. He gave an admirable model of legitimate piano playing. A faultless technique artistically displayed; beautiful singing of melodic phrases; a brilliance that glowed and was not metallic; fine taste and musical intelligence—these, indeed, merited the hearty applause that the performance called forth.

Second of the Season's Symphony Concerts.

Soloist ——— 6th 12.02
Emil Sauer the Piano Soloist
of an Interesting Program.

Unusual enthusiasm was shown at the second Symphony concert, and all the applause was deserved for, in the first place, the celebrated artist, Emil Sauer, returned after an absence of nine years and demonstrated again his wonderful ability as a pianist. Then conductor Fiedler gave a splendid reading of the stirring "Scheherazade" suite, by the Russian composer, Rimsky-Korsakoff, and closed with an admirable performance of the "Oberon" overture by Weber.

Mr Sauer played for the first time in America his piano concerto in E minor, a work in four parts, the first of a passionate and somewhat dignified nature, and the remaining three generally of a lighter character, combining brilliant figurations and delicate melodic forms which call for technical skill more than for emotional expression.

The artist certainly is one of the foremost among pianists of the present day. He seemingly has every requirement of his profession, strength, virility, powers of expression, a touch that is crystalline and technique that makes light of difficulties of the keyboard. Of course, as interpreter of his own work there is no need to speak. He is his own authority. His dramatic power, shown chiefly in the first movement and at the finale of the fourth, is of a high order, and in fortissimo passages and chord runs his skill was as great as that shown in the dazzling pyrotechnics of the scherzo and parts of the rondo. The plaudits showered upon the artist between divisions culminated in repeated calls to the platform after the concerto was finished.

Mr Fiedler's vigorous and pleasing personality seems to suit symphony patrons, for he was heartily greeted when he first appeared, and at each break in the "Scheherazade" suite there was a mild tumult on account of the way the composition was treated. The different stories of the "1001 nights" were vividly related, and all the ingenious melodies were given with proper effect. Very amusing was the work of the wood winds in the story of the prince; piquant and weird the combinations, melodic and otherwise, in the third part, and all the chaotic suggestions of the last movement were given with due musical hurly-burly.

The orchestral association with the soloist was thoroughly good, and the Weber overture went as delightfully elf-like as one need desire.

Boston will hear this week at the symphony concert for the first time an unknown work by the late Edward A. MacDowell, a symphonic poem entitled "Lamia," the score of which was sent to Mr Fiedler a few days ago. This poem dates back to MacDowell's early period, being the third work of this form that he wrote, having been preceded by the "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine."

The program will open with the "Eroica" symphony, by Beethoven, and close with the prelude to "The Maestrosingers."

Yours truly
Emil Sauer

STRIKING FEATURES OF SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Adv: ————— July 1909
NEW CONDUCTOR'S ABILITIES
ARE ABUNDANTLY PROVEN

Symphonic Suite by Rimski-Korsakoff, Sauer's Second Piano Concerto and "Oberon" Overture.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Rimski-Korsakoff—"Scheherazade," Symphonic Suite.
Sauer—Second Concerto for Piano.
Soloist, Mr. Emil Sauer.
Weber—"Oberon" overture.

The suite by Rimski-Korsakoff (the reader may pronounce the name with accents on the first syllable of each name) was performed as a tribute to the memory of the Russian composer who died last June. The old saying, "De Mortuis nil nisi Bonum" (which the school-boy translated—"Of the dead there is nothing but bones") need not be applied in this case, for the "Scheherazade" numbers are intrinsically interesting, well constructed and magnificently scored. The work does not belong to the mystifying or crabbed modern school. It has clear melodies, sometimes even of the folk-song type, but there is a sufficient display of learning in the development of these themes.

There are many "obbligati" in the work, giving chances for several instruments to display themselves in temporary solos. Best among these were the violin passages of Prof. Hess, the flute work of M. Maquarre, and the oboe themes by M. Longy. The Oriental flavor was excellently preserved. "Scratch a Russian and you find a Tartar," is probably an ethnological truth; it is certain that there is enough of the Oriental in the true Russian to make him very successful in his Eastern sketches, whether in music or in literature, the Finale thoroughly suggested Bagdad, and the Caliphs, and the merry-making of the Orient.

When the "Arabian Nights" are thus turned into music, there is no need of a Burton to elucidate, or of a Comstock to expurgate. Only in the Story of the Kalendar Prince we could have borne with a little excision on account of the length. We are quite sure that Scheherazade would not have dared to have been quite so long-winded in her tale to the sultan Schahriar. Had she been so, that impatient monarch would have cut off both the narration and the narrator. However, the fair story-teller seems never to have lost her head.

The Scheherazade figure was excellently given as a violin solo (obbligato) by Prof. Hess. Only once, in a high position, was there a suspicion of a break. Mr. Fiedler's reading of the difficult score was throughout praiseworthy. We were not greatly impressed with the contents of the first movement, which pictures the sea and Sinbad's voyage. It was scarcely more marine in character than Debussy's portraying of old ocean. These two composers might use as a motto upon their sea sketches, the old rhyme,—

"I love the sea, as I said before,
But I love it chiefly from the shore!"

The Kalendar story, as above intimated, was rather long, but it had many striking passages and gave opportunities to many instruments to come into the foreground separately. The bassoon was notably effective here. To us the finest part of the work was the third movement, a most tender love scene. It often presented monody, and in this discarding of harmony it became more graphically oriental.

Many are the mistakes that have been made in the reproduction of oriental music by great European masters. Beethoven's Turkish March is about as Turkish as the fig paste sold at our confectionery shops, and Mozart's sonata which end "Alla Turca," is also innocent of going any further east than Vienna. But David's "Desert," St. Saens' "La Brise," and this "Young Prince and Princess" are really of oriental tenderness. The eastern music is by no means clatter and bang.

Our annual procession of solo pianists began on this occasion with Mr. Emil Sauer. Mr. Sauer appeared both as soloist and as composer. It is pleasant to note that the composer-pianist has not gone over into the camp of the modern dissonancers. He may be Sauer by name, but he is evidently sweet by nature, for his music is not a zigzag puzzle, but an intelligible, beautiful and sane work. It is rather long, having four movements—one more than is usually accorded to the concerto form.

Before speaking of this we may be permitted to say a word which is pertinent to the piano situation, as regards our concerts and recitals. It is concerning the succession of instruments which are now to pass in review in the concert rooms, but far more prominently in the press. One after another the different makes of pianos will have their stage exhibition, and bills, posters, programmes, advertising columns, will be flooded with the fact that Prof. Heavyfist believes the Mudditone piano to be the greatest achievement this side of Heaven, and that he never, no never, would allow his fingertips to rest on the keyboard of any other.

There is a shade too much of advertising on this side of art, and the pianists lend themselves to it too readily.

As regards the instrument used at any concert, the reviewer is always expected to be mute, although if a violinist's instrument were of poor tone, or if a violoncello sounded scratchy or dull, it would at once be recorded. We do not apply these remarks to yesterday's rehearsal concert, for the piano was a good one, but to the entire system, which seems to us too commercial and too often brings instruments into our greatest concerts that scarcely belong there, as will readily be perceived by our readers if they sit in judgment on the pianos that are to be heard in some future symphonic and recital programmes.

The pianist scored a decided success and there was nothing to mar the charm of his playing. His concerto is a most musicianly one, rising at times to the height of a master work.

The concerto is the freest of sonata forms, and one may not cavil at any liberties that a composer takes in it. But Sauer has not followed the freedom of Liszt; he holds well to shape and does not disdain clear tunes at times. The work is unequal, however, and its first movement seems a trifle forced. Its final rondo also could be made more of. But its second movement is a gem of purest ray serene.

This second movement is (an unusual order) the Scherzo. Its contrasts are splendidly effective. Its chief theme is a very original staccato subject, while its subordinate theme is a beautiful legato. Finally there comes a climax of fugal treatment of which Mr. Sauer may be proud. This is the glory of the concerto.

But the slow movement which follows is even more popular. It is a Cavatina of direct and appealing beauty. We had believed that beauty and tune had been abolished in modern music. We are very glad to find ourselves mistaken. The Cavatina is almost Mendelssohnian in sweetness, but has something of Schumannesque depth.

The performance was artistic from first to last. The clear, crisp "non legato" that permeated the finale was a good climax, and there was a rococo style that was charming in its interpretation. Mr. Sauer was recalled over and over again, and the tribute may be divided between the worth of the executant and the worth of the composition. It was therefore a double triumph.

We have not heard the introduction of the "Oberon" overture for a long time. A couple of years ago Dr. Muck whispered it to us, but in such a confidential manner that it did not become public. The great conductor also made the tempo so slow that by the time a chord arrived one had forgotten what the preceding one had been. There was some warrant for this slowness of beginning, but we confess that we like the less extreme reading of Mr. Fiedler better. Only, just before the final crash of the introduction which ushers in the chief theme, was there a suspicion of exaggeration. The trombones, too, at times were allowed to cover up the delicate violin figures.

The second concert, however, abundantly proves the abilities of our new conductor and it is a striking proof of the high-minded character of Dr. Muck that he selected so good a successor.

Louis C. Elson.

The Symphony Orchestra in New England

It is part of the plans of the Symphony Orchestra for the current year to increase the number of its concerts in the cities of New England outside Boston. Mr. Fiedler is willing to undertake the additional work; his fashion of conducting and his programmes are likely to commend him to occasional audiences; and there is reason to believe that a numerous and an eager public awaits such concerts. The orchestra made a beginning with them at Springfield, last Monday, and the result justified the experiment. The audience was large and interested, and programme and performance were well received. The Springfield Republican writes warmly of the concert, and the article is interesting in particular for its statement of the likings of these audiences in the smaller cities, and of the satisfaction Mr. Fiedler as conductor and programme-maker, may give them. Brahms's symphony in C minor, the orchestral scene from Strauss's "Feuersnot," the overtures to "Oberon" and to "Tannhäuser" and sundry songs with Miss Ormond for the singer made the programme. Says the Republican: "The concert last night came very close to the ideal for a city which hears little orchestral music, and feels disappointed if what it hears is not of the best. The programme represented old and new, and contained nothing that was merely curious or novel. This is well; what the public just now needs most of all is vital, interesting music, regardless of period, regardless of nationality, regardless of familiarity. The work of a great orchestra cannot be made too broad in its appeal. Metropolitan conductors, constantly saturated with music, are apt to become at once blasé and arrogant, disdaining to consider what the public needs, and making up their programmes to fit their own whims. From this self-centred habit Mr. Fiedler seems fortunately free. His conducting, too, is of a sort to hold the interest and inspire the confidence of the public. He is downright, positive, tremendously emphatic. He does not scorn obvious effects. How a conductor will 'wear' can never be told in advance of experience; it is like judging a preacher by one sermon. But the first impression of Mr. Fiedler confirms the fine things that have been said of him abroad, and he is unquestionably fitted to make the Boston orchestra more widely popular and therefore more useful than it has ever been before. It was good judgment to return to the earlier practice of supplying a soloist. Ideally, there is much to be said for Dr. Muck's theory that the orchestral sequence should be unbroken. Practically, this is a refinement in advance of the present stage of musical culture in America. A concert with solo numbers attracts more people, is listened to with closer attention, and does more to awaken musical interest. The change is one of the hopeful things in the present situation."

Trans. Oct. 29, 1909

Mr. Fiedler Compelled to Alter Symphony Programme

Trans. — Oct. 12, 08

Appearance of Emil Sauer at Next Recital Responsible
for Revision.

Mr. Fiedler has felt compelled to make considerable change in the second programme of the series which will be played on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He originally had on it Rimsky-Korsakoff's Suite "Scheherazade" and Schumann's Symphony in D minor with Emil Sauer as soloist, but Mr. Sauer has elected to play his own "Second Concerto" for piano, and in order to bring the programme within reasonable length, Mr. Fiedler has taken off the Schumann Symphony and placed in its stead Weber's "Oberon" overture.

Mr. Fiedler has placed the "Scheherazade" Suite on the programme as a memorial to this, after Tschalkowsky, the most brilliant composer of Russia, who died on June 21st, last. This particular Suite, which finds its inspiration in the familiar "Tale of the Three Calendars," is a remarkable illustration of the brilliancy of the composer's orchestration and of his feeling for the Orient. It was introduced to Boston by Mr. Paur in the spring of 1897 and has been on the programme since then four times.

Emil Sauer, the soloist, will make his first appearance in America at the second public rehearsal and concert since he visited this country nine years ago.

New that the Symphony orchestra management has succeeded in making the women take off their hats, perhaps the managers at other halls will take courage and push along the reform. Our theaters have for a long time set an excellent example in this respect. The women who go merely to show off their millinery can stand in the lobby.

EMIL SAUER.

Mr. Fiedler's First Journey to New York
—Mr. Sauer's Recital and Its Novel Programme—The Annual Return of Mme. Sembrich

Trans. — Oct. 31, 1908

Tomorrow evening, the Symphony Orchestra departs on its first regular journey of the year to give concerts in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore. In each city Mr. Fiedler will appear for the first time as the conductor of the orchestra, and in all but New York he will be wholly new to his audiences. At five of the six concerts, he will repeat the programme for his first appearance here—Brahms's symphony in C minor, Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, the orchestral fragment of Strauss's "Feuersnot" and Wagner's overture to "Tannhäuser." In New York where the orchestra gives two concerts he will divide the second between Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," MacDowell's new tone-poem, "Lamia," and Schumann's symphony in D minor. It will be interesting to see how his audiences and the reviewers in New York receive him. Before it returns to Boston on Nov. 11, the orchestra will give concerts also at Princeton College and at Hartford.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 24, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF, OVERTURE to "The Betrothed of the Czar."

TSCHAIKOWSKY, CONCERTO for VIOLIN.

GLAZOUNOFF, SYMPHONY No. 5.
(First time.)

Soloist:

ALEXANDER PETSCHNIKOFF.

Mr. Fiedler Compelled to Alter Symphony Programme

Traveler — Oct 12, 08

Appearance of Emil Sauer at Next Recital Responsible
for Revision.

Mr. Fiedler has felt compelled to make considerable change in the second programme of the series which will be played on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He originally had on it Rimsky-Korsakoff's Suite "Scheherazade" and Schumann's Symphony in D minor with Emil Sauer as soloist, but Mr. Sauer has elected to play his own "Second Concerto" for piano, and in order to bring the programme within reasonable length, Mr. Fiedler has taken off the Schumann Symphony and placed in its stead Weber's "Oberon" overture.

Mr. Fiedler has placed the "Scheherazade" Suite on the programme as a memorial to this, after Tschalkowsky, the most brilliant composer of Russia, who died on June 21st, last. This particular Suite, which finds its inspiration in the familiar "Tale of the Three Calendars," is a remarkable illustration of the brilliancy of the composer's orchestration and of his feeling for the Orient. It was introduced to Boston by Mr. Paur in the spring of 1897 and has been on the programme since then four times. Emil Sauer, the soloist, will make his first appearance in America at the second public rehearsal and concert since he visited this country nine years ago.

New that the Symphony orchestra management has succeeded in making the women take off their hats, perhaps the managers at other halls will take courage and push along the reform. Our theaters have for a long time set an excellent example in this respect. The women who go merely to show off their millinery can stand in the lobby.

EMIL SAUR.

Mr. Fiedler's First Journey to New York
—Mr. Sauer's Recital and Its Novel Programme—The Annual Return of Mme. Sembrich

Trans. — Oct. 31, 1908
Tomorrow evening, the Symphony Orchestra departs on its first regular journey of the year to give concerts in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore. In each city Mr. Fiedler will appear for the first time as the conductor of the orchestra, and in all but New York he will be wholly new to his audiences. At five of the six concerts, he will repeat the programme for his first appearance here—Brahms's symphony in C minor, Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, the orchestral fragment of Strauss's "Feuersnot" and Wagner's overture to "Tannhäuser." In New York where the orchestra gives two concerts he will divide the second between Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," MacDowell's new tone-poem, "Lamia," and Schumann's symphony in D minor. It will be interesting to see how his audiences and the reviewers in New York receive him. Before it returns to Boston on Nov. 11, the orchestra will give concerts also at Princeton College and at Hartford.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 24, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF, OVERTURE to "The Betrothed of the Czar."

TSCHAIKOWSKY, CONCERTO for VIOLIN.

GLAZOUNOFF, SYMPHONY No. 5.
(First time.)

Soloist:

ALEXANDER PETSCHNIKOFF.

76

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica," op. 55

I. Allegro con brio.

II. Marcia funebre; Adagio assai.

III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio.

IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

MACDOWELL,

"Lamia," third SYMPHONIC POEM, (after Keats.)
op. 29. First performance.

WAGNER,

PRELUDE to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

77

THE REMARKABLE LIKING FOR MR. FIEDLER

He Departs from Nearly All the Ways of Conducting at the Symphony Concerts for Ten Years, He Substitutes Conducting of Another Sort, Makes It Admirable in Its Kind, and His Public Receives Him More Warmly Than It Has Any of His Predecessors—The Hats of Friday Afternoon Once More—Miss Verne and Her Recital for a Beginning with Pianists—Mme. Chaminade Appears in New York—More Intimate Tales of Mansfield—Mr. Edeson to Act Here Next Month—Mr. Jones's New Comedy Announced in London.

Trans. Oct. 26, 1908
Again, on Saturday evening at the Symphony Concert, Mr. Fiedler's audience received all that he did with spontaneous, warm and insistent applause. It recalled him twice or thrice after the performance of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony; it lingered at the end of the concert to have him back after the playing of the prelude to "The Mastersingers." It was cordial after the hearing of MacDowell's "Lamia," though evidently the music a little puzzled it. At least twice Mr. Fiedler called the orchestra to its feet; the talk of the corridors in the intermission ran loudly in his praise; and the audience dispersed in the zest of full satisfaction. There have been similar applause and similar testimony to the general pleasure at the preceding pairs of concerts, and each week the flowing tide runs higher. Across the dinner table, over the teacups, in club and in drawing-room, praise of Mr. Fiedler comes from almost every side and at every turn. No new conductor, it is safe to say, that has come to the Symphony Concerts has been so quickly and so eagerly liked, so generally and so warmly praised as he.

And that is the wonder of it all. For eight years, from 1898 to 1906, Mr. Gericke was the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. Then for two years Dr. Muck succeeded him. They had many differing traits, but they each sought in their performances the utmost beauty, balance and euphony of tone. They heeded warmth; they gained poetry and emotion of expression; but they never attained it at the price of over-emphasis, or at the cost of the quality of tone that they treasured. Similarly they studied the nicest adjustment of details, the broader proportioning of each part to the whole; they were masters of orchestral design. They cultivated breadth and vigor where the music asked those qualities; they cultivated no less elegance and adroitness where these were its seeming traits. They aimed and they often attained a singular justice of performance that should impart the letter, the spirit, the individuality of the music that they had in hand, that should be vital with them, and be the more persuasive and vital for the fine and nervous qualities of orchestral style that animated it. These ten years were a long education for the public of the Symphony Concerts in these things. Perhaps it was too long.

Comes Mr. Fiedler and reverses nearly all the methods that his predecessors, since Mr. Paur's time, have followed. He conducts with the utmost physical exuberance. He seeks and he gains a big and sweeping, or an incisive and penetrating, tone. He moves from broad effect to broad effect. He heaps emphasis upon emphasis; he intensifies contrast with all the arts of the orchestral rhetorician. He hurries through grandiose climaxes. He achieves a rigid precision, a hard exactitude of detail. Everything that he does is bold and bare, obvious and emphatic. He steadily seeks bigness—bigness of tone, bigness of effect, bigness of mood, bigness of power, bigness of response. His conducting is as clear in purpose, as able in execution, as full in achievement, as admirable generally in its kind, as was Mr. Gericke's or Dr. Muck's, but it is conducting of an entirely different sort. Theoretically, by all the precedents of the past, it seemed to be conducting for which his audiences would not care. In fact, they have received it with an eagerness and a fulness of response such as none of his predecessors so quickly gained. At each concert Mr. Fiedler has conquered his hearers. Had they had enough of the other school of conducting and thus welcome the more warmly so decisive a change to the opposite sort? It is very human to do so.

H. T. P.

Hats and the Suburbs

To the Editor of the Transcript:

The recent change at the Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoons and the request to have ladies' hats removed calls forth such praise that it seems time for someone to speak on the other side. People come long distances in trains and cars to the afternoon concerts, a great many "suburbans" spending the day in town. It is impossible to have the hair in perfect order and to remove the hat is often a serious inconvenience. In the theatres there is reason for the rule, as there the audience comes to see, as well as to hear, but at a concert what does it matter whether one can see the conductor and the orchestra? The more musical people often wish that the orchestra could be invisible, so that they could enjoy the music without having the mind distracted by watching the motions of either conductor or players. It seems to many of us that a distinction should be made in favor of small hats and that the rule should not be made too rigid.

A CONSTANT ATTENDANT

Boston, Nov. 3.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT From 6:34.08 MACDOWELL'S LONG WITHHELD "LAMIA"

An Early Tone-Poem That Belied Anticipations and Disclosed Some of the Finer and More Characteristic Traits of the Composer—The Audience and Keats—Mr. Fiedler's Grandiose and Eloquent Beethoven—A Surprisingly Disappointing Performance of the Prelude to "The Mastersingers"—The Roughening of the Orchestra's Tone

Even the best of programme-books have their perils. Yesterday afternoon, at the Symphony Concert, Mr. Fiedler and his men played the late Edward MacDowell's "Lamia," suggested by the like-named and familiar poem of Keats. (Familiar, as it will soon appear, is purely a conventional adjective.) The learned compiler of the programme book, dutifully and "spacefully" reprinted almost the whole of Keats's verses. They fill twenty pages in Palgrave's closely printed edition of Keats's poetry. They meandered over almost as many pages of the programme book. To turn its leaves at the beginning of each concert is a weekly pleasure, and there yesterday, and at a glance, was "Lamia." One scanned the verses with cursory eye; another dipped deeper and longer into them; a third began deliberate reading. The process and every variation of it became tempting, infectious, as such things do in large assemblies. On and on went Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony; and on and on went the general reading of "Lamia." Look up into the balconies, and many a head was bent over Keats's verses. Look around the floor, and on every side were the upraised programme books open at the poem. The music to which it stirred MacDowell followed, and for the moment the audience was content to supplement its reading with his imaginings. The prelude to "The Mastersingers," irresistible, intoxicating, ended the concert; but for many an auditor there was "Lamia" still to finish. Sachs and the masters walked in unheeded procession; Evchen and Walther wooed unheard; and apprentices danced and townsfolk sang their chorals in vain against the fascination of Keats. In theory the concert was devoted to Beethoven, MacDowell and Wagner. In actual fact a considerable part of the audience spent the afternoon in the discovery of Keats and his poem of "Lamia." There was almost more reason to reflect upon the reading of poetry by this, our generation, than upon the music and the performance. At the least nothing so amusing as this general preoccupation with a poem has happened at the Symphony Concerts in many a day.

As the event proved, there was little need for the scrupulous explanations that have accompanied the posthumous publication of MacDowell's tone-poem, and none at all for the anticipatory objections and regrets at its performance. Unrevised as MacDowell left it, youthful work, as it is, in his progress as a composer, "Lamia" justified itself. It has its perceptible—or rather its audible—blemishes—the things that he would have uttered differently, more vividly, poignantly, magically, with the larger and finer understanding of the orchestra that the ripening years brought to him. Here and there in the music is the obvious impress of susceptible and unconsciously imitative youth. He says this or that musically, or he says it in a certain fashion because such was the way of youthful composers in the Germany of the eighties, when their minds and fancies were quivering to the kindling examples of Liszt and of Wagner. Much more pervasive in the music, as it seemed at a single hearing, were traits that are clearly and intrinsically MacDowell's own—the romantic glamour and the magical atmosphere of the tone-poem, its essentially "impressionistic" quality, and its continence of means and methods. "Lamia" is "programme music" in the sense in which, in these modern days, most of us are agreed that it is just and reasonable. MacDowell does not seek to follow and suggest in tones the detail of Keats's tale of the shimmering and undulating serpent of the Cretan woods, who loved with bitter and consuming passion young Lycius of Corinth; who prayed Hermes to make her no less beautiful a woman than she was serpent; whom the god so transformed; who wooed and won the youth; who went to dwell with him in the soft and ambient luxury of his palace; who withered at the bridal feast before the glance and the words of the hard sophist Apollonius and was a serpent again, gone into space, and young Lycius dead behind. An ambitious young composer of this 1908 might essay the vain task for music of following closely Keats's endlessly detailed verse. MacDowell, writing in 1888, was wiser and in the large sense more imaginative. He sought to suggest in his tone-poem the pervading mood of Keats's poetry and the answering mood that it stirred in him, and the music truly awakes the listener to understanding of both and response to them.

The music of "Lamia" is, thus, more than music of romantic glamor and of sensuous warmth. They, so to say, are the immediate qualities, the easy reflexes of Keats's poem. MacDowell penetrates deeper into the spirit and the atmosphere of the verse and gives his music singular body and color from the sensitiveness of his response to them. The passion of Lamia and Lycius was a passion of enchantment; naught in it in a sense was real and human; the sensuous joys in which they lived, the dreams in which they swam were as the fumes of magic. Passion and palace, love and life vanished at the touch of reality. Theirs was an uneasy, unreal, uncanny passion—"rueful" is one of Keats's words for it. MacDowell's music by no slight achievement of imaginative understanding and imaginative expression is no less of such a passion and such a tale. Recall for a moment the middle section of Hugo Wolf's "Penthesilea." It is music of the dreaming queen and unmistakably and insistently the dream atmosphere shapes and colors it. No less unmistakably, insistently and imaginatively, the atmosphere of an enchantment unreal, uncanny, of a passion uneasy and rueful, a sense, so to say, of actual or impending magic, pervades MacDowell's music. It is intrinsically music of vision, with far more suggestion of mystery than has Keats's comparatively straightforward narrative. In the vision swims the fascinating enchantress and the ardent lover and the paradise of the senses in which they dwell. But she is still serpentine; that which makes the serpent uncanny and unclean to a human abides in her. And then at the touch of the more potent magic of reality she withers and is gone in rueful end.

Of such seems the poetic and the communicating quality of the music, and MacDowell gains it by dint of imagination in musical thought and in musical means by a clear command of his medium and by a sense of form that keeps it everywhere unforced and unwrenched. His melodies and his development of them shape impart and sustain the mood that he would bring to the music and kindle in his hearers. His orchestral voices intensify and color it. His means achieve his end. Unrevised as "Lamia" was, unpublished till a fortnight ago, unperformed until yesterday, it seemed to come nearer its purpose, to have in it more of the finer qualities of MacDowell than his relatively completed and familiar "Lancelot and Elaine."

The qualities that Mr. Fiedler disclosed in the performance of the "Eroica" symphony were easy to anticipate and are easy to appraise. His is intrinsically a grandiose and a dramatic Beethoven. Oftenest the conductor sought a large, sonorous and emphatic eloquence. Usually, as in the first and the final movements, he gained an exceeding amplitude of utterance, a bigness of tone, a richness of contrast, a broad sweep to large and clamorous climax. He magnified; he emphasized; he was vigorous, insistent, strenuous, oratorical. The strenuousness of the performance fairly matched the physical strenuousness of the conductor's methods. Mr. Fiedler's Beethoven was clearly a mighty Beethoven. With the middle movements—the funeral march and the scherzo—he wrought his dramatic contrasts. He seemed to have tempered the scherzo in proportion as he magnified the following finale. As he had wrought the first movement with vigorous and sweeping breadth, so he shaped the funeral march with an exceeding and subtle calculation. He seemed to try to miss not a poignant accent, not a searching contrast. He dramatized it imaginatively; he fairly wrung it out emotionally. He strove to do his utmost; he did his utmost, and the resulting effects were often stirring. Yet effects they remained and somehow something of the loftiness, of the epic quality of the music vanished in them. Mr. Fiedler's Beethoven was indeed eloquent, but systematically and strenuously rather than in spontaneous and commanding exaltation.

The methods that thus served Beethoven and the "Eroica" symphony vitally and well, Mr. Fiedler carried to such excess in the prelude to "The Mastersingers" that they defeated his purpose and marred Wagner's music. Again he sought the utmost bigness of tone, but in the strenuousness of the pursuit the tone turned hard and coarse—an unusual thing from our orchestra. No less strenuously the conductor sought the utmost precision of accent, and again excess of zeal turned hard and sharp. Episode followed episode, clear, firm, exact; contrast made emphasis, and emphasis contrast; climax rolled up from climax. But gone was the glow of golden tone that Wagner shed over his prelude, its poetry and its voice of romance; its long, steady advancing sweep like a great and changeful song from the first measure to the last. The sheer joy, the glorious intoxication of the music were lacking in Mr. Fiedler's performance. It caught all the tangible qualities of the music; it missed almost all the intangible. H. T. P.

"LAMIA" FOR THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT

Herald ————— 6-25-08

First Performance of Posthumous Work of Edward MacDowell.

INSPIRATION FOR SCORE FOUND IN KEATS' POEM

Vigorous, Even Boisterous, Interpretation of the 'Eroica' by Mr. Fiedler.

By PHILIP HALE.

The programme of the third Symphony concert, given last night in Symphony Hall, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, was as follows:

"Heroic" symphony..... Beethoven
"Lamia" (after Keats)..... MacDowell
Prelude to "The Mastersingers"..... Wagner

Edward MacDowell's "Lamia," a symphonic poem suggested by the "Lamia" of John Keats, was performed for the first time. It was composed at Wiesbaden in 1888; it was published a few weeks ago by Arthur P. Schmidt of this city. The publication and the performance have already provoked discussion concerning the consequent effect on the composer's reputation. Some, before the performance and without intimate knowledge of the score, were sorely grieved and would not be comforted.

It is a fact that MacDowell, when he honored Boston by choosing it as his dwelling-place, spoke of "Lamia" as a work that he would fain revise; that he was not then willing to publish it; but at the same time he talked of re-writing his "Lancelot and Elaine" and certain other compositions; and he half-regretted that they had been published. All this was natural. Other composers, poets, essayists, novelists, painters, have at times wished to call back that which has gone forth and been accepted gratefully by the world. MacDowell had the noble discontent of the true creative artist. He toiled after perfection, and the fastidiousness of his self-criticism was perhaps at times a stumbling-block in the way of progress. Whenever he spoke of "Lamia," he showed a peculiar affection for it, as though it were as a favorite child.

Even though this symphonic poem had waited long for a performance, any reproach brought against Mr. Schmidt for publishing it or Mrs. MacDowell for allowing the publication would be unjust. I happen to know that Mr. Schmidt was jealous for MacDowell's reputation; that he consulted musicians as to the wisdom of publishing "Lamia," that he showed the manuscript to them, lest by a rash act he might harm the dead man's fame. Mrs. MacDowell gave her reasons for wishing this publication. These reasons were published in the programme-book of the concert, and no one, even though he had not personally known the composer, could read her letter and remain unmoved.

Amplly Justifies Publication.

"Lamia" performed amply justified its publication. There was much more than a sentimental interest in the performance. Higher feelings than that of curiosity were gratified. For this symphonic poem has fancy and color, and it was evidently written with the enthusiasm of youth. As it is today, unrevised by the composer, the music has more individuality than has "Lancelot and Elaine," and had MacDowell died shortly after the completion of "Lamia" the world might have mourned a musician of more than ordinary promise. It is easy to see why MacDowell was not satisfied with his score. He would no doubt have enlarged certain episodes, altered measures here and there that are according to pattern rather than significant, and I believe that he would not have been satisfied with the present ending. I also believe that he would have kept the general outline and that much of the orchestration he would not have bettered.

This symphonic poem is absolute music in the sense that it needs no programme whatever for enjoyment. The disbeliever in the ability of music to express any ideas save those that are musical—What's Lamia to him, or he to Lamia?—the disbeliever might say with reason: "This is a movement with an introduction and episodes. It contains effective measures. It is music that sets one adreaming. Pray tell me, you who insist on its connection with Keats' poem, how can music portray the change of a snake into a woman, or how can it express the detection of the sorcerers by Apollonius and the disappearance of the enchanted palace, with plate and furniture of every kind?"

And, indeed, it would be difficult for the most prying inquirer into the "meaning" of symphonic poems to name beyond doubt and peradventure the pages of the score that might correspond to episodes in the poem of Keats. MacDowell himself never stood decidedly on the side of either programme or absolute music. A title was enough for him. This or that poem moved him to write music, not to furnish an inter-linear translation in tones.

Mr. Fiedler is to be thanked for making the audience acquainted with this work of the lamented composer of the noble "Indian" suite. The performance had a more marked feeling of bodement; reading was broadly romantic. The first measures of the introduction might have had a more marked feeling of bodiment; there was faint light instead of haunted shadow.

Recalled with Enthusiasm.

The audience, which heartily applauded "Lamia," recalled Mr. Fiedler with enthusiasm for his unusually vigorous interpretation of the "Eroica." Vigorous was in this instance at times synonymous with boisterous; yet Beethoven, according to Mr. Aphorpe's phrase, was on occasions given not only to shouting but to tossing his hat in the air in the frenzy of physical emotion, and sturdiness rather than finesse and a delicate sense of proportion, finds a host of palpitating admirers.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Beethoven: Symphony No. 3, Eroica.
MacDowell: "Lamia," Symphonic Poem (after Keats); first performance.
Wagner: Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Such was the programme of the third Symphony rehearsal and concert. The performance for the first time in public of MacDowell's early tone poem, which was in direct opposition to the wishes of the composer during his lifetime, need hardly dismay those who hold his memory in deepest reverence.

MacDowell, in the first place, was invariably his own severest critic. It is said that very few of his published compositions would have ever appeared in print had they awaited the process for three or four years. The composer, as it was his intention before his death to do with the "Lamia," was constantly revising his manuscripts, and the work has far more than an historical interest. It was written under the strong glare of those suns which developed so rapidly the fragile genius of the tone poet—Wagner, Liszt and Raff, though already, while thrilling with outside impulses, the composer says his own say, albeit sometimes in a foreign idiom.

In his treatment of the new, free form in his transformation and metamorphosis of two themes, which are the germs of the work, MacDowell is closely in touch with Liszt and his mentor, Raff. Whatever his ultimate place in the history of music the American composer was a pioneer, a creator of remarkable individuality, one of those who broke through. The influences that he obviously welcomed and that are to be felt between the lines of "Lamia" are strongly to his credit, and one is filled by an evident flaming sympathy with the spirit of the times. There is, as well, the unmistakable expression of a poet and a rare romancer in tones. In spite of clumsy workmanship he has succeeded to a great degree, and with characteristic refinement, in expressing the atmosphere of unreality, of unearthly beauty and passion and poignant sorrow that pervades Keats' poems. The applause, which resulted in calls for conductor and orchestra after the performance, was more than a tribute to the memory of a great man.

The Post spoke yesterday in praise of Mr. Fiedler's splendidly virile reading of the "Eroica" symphony. This need not be repeated, but a word of protest should be voiced against this conductor's unscrupulous forcing of tone when his enthusiasm carries him away. The playing of the "Meistersinger" prelude, yesterday, was a joy to the heart. It glowed with youthful ardor and divine fire. The lyric passages were sung with a noble fervency, and the stocky march themes were splendidly vigorous and sturdy in their delivery, while the quality of tone in these passages was enough to make the patrons of the finest orchestra in the world break out in blasphemy.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

An Interesting Programme for the Fourth Symphony Concert—Schumann, Smetana, Wolf and Tschaiakovsky—Mr. Schroeder to Reappear—Arthur Hartmann's Return

Schumann, Smetana, Tschaiakovsky and Hugo Wolf divide the programme for the fourth pair of Symphony Concerts—the last before the orchestra departs on its first journey to New York and the neighboring cities—at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week. Dr. Muck, if memory does not slip, played only one of Schumann's symphonies in the two years of his conductorship. Mr. Gerlicke put them comparatively often on his programmes and Mr. Fiedler has no less liking for them. His first choice is the highly romantic symphony in D minor, last heard here in the spring of 1906. From Smetana comes the tone-poem, "The Moldau," the second of the six in which the Bohemian sought to celebrate the natural beauty, the ancient legends, the historic glories and the racial spirit of his country. He wrote it in complete deafness, and on the fly-leaf of the score he put this note: "Two springs pour forth their waters in the shade of the Bohemian forest, the one warm and gushing, the other cold and tranquil. Their rippling, gaily flowing over rocky beds, unite and glisten in the morning sun. The forest brook, rushing on, becomes the river Moldau, which hurrying through Bohemia's valleys, grows into a mighty stream. It flows through dense woods, where the joyous noise of the hunt and the tones of the hunter's horn resound nearer and nearer. It flows through verdant meadows and lowlands, where a wedding-feast is celebrated with song and dance. At night the wood and water nymphs revel in its glistening waves, which reflect many fortresses and castles—witnesses of the past splendor of chivalry and the vanished martial fame of bygone ages. At the rapids of St. John the stream speeds on, winding its way in cataracts, and cutting a channel with its foaming waters through the rocky chasm into the broad river bed in which it flows on in majestic calmness toward Prague, welcomed by time-honored Vysehrad [the citadel], whereupon it disappears in the far distance from the poet's gaze." Wolf's piece is the little "Italian Serenade," written in the years of his finest work and one of his compositions for orchestra. "Wolf," says Mr. Newman writing of the serenade in his life of the composer, "had something of Nietzsche's aspiration towards the South, which meant for both of them sunlight and color, wit, charm and exhilaration of spirits. The serenade has all the fine-nerved delicate poetry of the Italian songs, with the added fragrance and warmth of atmosphere that the orchestral coloring gives." From Tschaiakovsky comes the one novel piece of the programme, his variations for violoncello and orchestra, upon a rococo theme, and it brings back Mr. Alwin Schroeder to the stage of Symphony Hall for the first time since he left the orchestra of which he was for many years the first cellist. Now he has newly settled in Boston to lead the life of a virtuoso, a teacher and a player in a string quartet. Eighteen months ago, he took leave of his public here for what seemed a long absence. He has returned betimes, but he will not be the less welcome. Scanty as is the repertory for the violoncello and entertaining as Tschaiakovsky's variations are, they are seldom played. A short, expressive prelude leads to the statement of a droll melody by the 'cello. From this melody—"the rococo theme"—spring seven variations which are worked out with Tschaiakovsky's familiar ingenuity and animation.

M'DOWELL'S 'LAMIA' BY THE SYMPHONY

Journal Oct. 26. 08
Musical Story of the Enchantress Feature of the Third Concert.

A work composed by the late Edward MacDowell when he was only 26 years old was the novel feature of the third Symphony concert. It is a symphonic poem entitled "Lamia," suggested by Keats' poem of the same name. In this work MacDowell undertakes to tell the story of an enchantress, Lamia, who, falling in love with a Corinthian youth, has herself transformed by Hermes from a serpent into a lovely maiden, who then lives with the youth in an enchanted palace, but who is transformed back into her first shape by the magician Apollonius, whereupon the palace vanishes and the youth dies.

Though MacDowell finished the work twenty years ago it was not heard of until lately, when it was published here in Boston. Mrs. MacDowell, writing to the editor of the Symphony programs, explains that it was not published until this year for the simple reason that when her husband "would have been glad to see it in print, he did not have the money necessary, nor had he the opportunity of hearing it played." Then when "the money was there for the necessary expense, or when he might have been able to have it printed for nothing, it was too late. Edward felt then that the 'Lamia' belonged to a period quite different from the work he was doing, and he was most critical about work he had finished."

But in this case MacDowell was surely supersensitive. "Lamia" is a work of genuine power and beauty, skillfully done and imaginative, and its performance Saturday night—the first concert performance on record—was heartily applauded.

However, the most impressive number on the program was Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, written when the great symphonist was under the influence of Napoleon. Its performance was remarkably stirring, and at the end the orchestra, as well as Mr. Fiedler, had to respond to the applause. The same scene occurred when the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," which was last on the program, was played.

FIEDLER AT HOME WITH BEETHOVEN AND WAGNER

adv.
LATTER'S "MASTERSINGERS"
PRELUDE GIVEN GLORIOUSLY

Beethoven's Heroic Symphony
Conducted From Memory—MacDowell's "Lamia" Given.

By Louis C. Elson.
PROGRAMME.

Beethoven.....Heroic Symphony.
MacDowell....."Lamia," Symphony Poem.
Wagner.....Prelude to "The Mastersingers."

Mr. Fiedler proved in the first concert of this season that he knew his Brahms; yesterday afternoon he demonstrated that he was also quite at home in Beethoven and Wagner. The Heroic symphony is a work which gives plenty of scope for the individuality of the conductor to show itself. We may have advanced in the art of orchestral scoring since Beethoven astonished the conservatives with this symphony, but even Richard Strauss's hero, with his self-glorification, his fragmentary themes, and his battle in which every key is hit on the head the moment it shows itself, does not give as heroic a result as the stormy gusts of passion, the noble rage, which rules the first movement of the Beethoven work.

Besides, one can remember that Beethoven was idealizing a character (Napoleon) that he revered, while Strauss ("Heldenleben") and Wagner ("Mastersingers") were worshipping themselves. For the benefit of such modern phases of self-praise one might alter the old saying, "No man is a hero to his valet," into "No man should be a hero to himself!"

In the midst of all the tempest of the first movement there is no departure from form, in this "Heroic Symphony." When the modern composer wants to picture carnage, or stormy passion, the first thing that he demands is a total abolition of the laws of form and often of harmony as well. But here we have chief theme, subordinate theme, closing theme, development, return of themes, coda, each in its recognized shape, relationship and key, and Mr. Fiedler generally brought out the contrasts of these divisions in a manner that left nothing to be desired.

Only once does Beethoven plunge into the modern iconoclasm, when, at the end of the development, the horn comes in in the tonic key, while the violins are still muttering in the dominant. This defiance of harmonic rule is generally softened down by conductors by hushing the strings to an inaudible pianissimo, while the horn pushes it entirely into the background. Mr. Fiedler, on this occasion, followed the usual precedent. The violins are marked "pp," but we always feel that we should like a little emphasis of this dissonance.

As regards the development, which, while picturing the storm and stress of war, holds clearly to treatment of figures of the themes, Beethoven seems not to hold to Strauss's idea that a battle should carry out Sherman's celebrated statement—"War is Hell"—but rather to Mozart's sentence—"Even in the most terrifying moments music must never offend the ear." Even a battle scene need not be absolute realism, but rather suggestion. Mr. Fiedler did not make a repeat of the exposition—an advantageous cut in so long a work.

The funeral march, which Coleridge so aptly described as "a funeral in purple," was rather slowly carried out. The contrast between the tearful, feminine grief, upon the oboe, and the more masculine brooding, upon the violoncellos, was finely drawn. The infinite tenderness and consolation of the trio, with its major key, was also given in sharp relief with the body of the movement, and the final sobs of the orchestra, heavy-hearted and broken, made a coda that no one could excel in the construction, and no orchestra in the performance. The oboe work in the chief theme deserves especial recognition. But the tempo might have been accelerated to advantage.

To us the scherzo, in spite of its rattling, gossip character, has an occasional clang of swords. Berlioz's idea that it pictures the world rattling gaily along and forgetting its hero must be somewhere near the truth. At any rate it may be considered the first real scherzo ever composed, for the first symphonic scherzo (in the second symphony) written two years earlier, is much more of a Minuet than this. The horn trio in this was beautifully given, and it may be mentioned "en passant" that the brasses were never too loud in any of the movements.

The finale, with its first application of symphonic variations as an ending of the cycle-form, was effectively given. It scarcely suits to the "heroic" idea of the work, but it shows Beethoven endeavoring to do away with the rondo-like, jovial ending which Haydn and Mozart had saddled on the symphony as finale and which was a bad inheritance from the Gigue which had formerly ended the suite. When the modern composer intimates that, in order to express deep emotion he must discard musical form, we would ask him if he hopes ever to equal the intensity of those two models of good form—the "heroic symphony" and the "sonata pathétique."

That there are no trombones (next to the trumpets the most heroic of instruments) in this symphony, may be explained by the historical fact that they were not at this time (1804) admitted to the symphonic orchestra. They were first introduced in such a score, by Beethoven, in the finale of his fifth symphony, a finale which has always seemed to us a most fitting end for the "heroic."

But Mr. Fiedler made all that was possible out of this finale and gave a very fiery reading of it. He conducted this symphony, and the Wagner prelude, from memory. His beat was very decisive and, as before, he did not give the impression of spasmodic effort but of authority and reserve force.

The evil that men do lives after them; the good is oft interred with their bones.

We are glad that this has not been the case with the poetic and earnest MacDowell, for this composer has left a noble legacy to his country. But when we remember his second piano concerto, and his "Indian suite," we wish that "Lamia" had been left in the retirement that the composer designed for it. One cannot class it with his greatest works and we would wish to recall this great American only at his best.

The subject is taken from Keats, and it reminds us that another prominent American composer, Mr. Frédéric S. Converse, also found much orchestral inspiration in the works of this delicate poet. But Converse has taken up the pastoral side of Keats, while in "Lamia" he is the poet of passion. The story of the lady who is constantly turning into a snake, who weds Lyceus in her human form, but is finally turned by Apollonius back into snake-hood, is dramatic enough, but we do not find a very graphic presentation of the programme in the music. One can note, however, the moment of Lamia's becoming a woman, and also the instant of her return to the ophidian kingdom. But one senses little of the wedding festivities, the uninvited entrance of Apollonius, or the pleading and terror of Lamia.

At the beginning there is a serpentine figure as marked as the motive of the dragon in "Siegfried," that "worm" that was beyond the reach of any vermifuge whatever. One can recognize the sinuous style again when Lamia gets back to the soil, at the end.

There are wailings and lamentations and some moments of impressive fury. There is much that is fragmentary, and considerable monody. The work seems more near to the modern French impressionist school than MacDowell usually ventured. It has many strong passages and it is (which modern Frenchmen very seldom are) brief and concise. It was brilliantly conducted and could scarcely have had a better performance. But it is not the MacDowell that America (and Europe, too, for the matter of that) knows and delights in.

The glory of the concert was the Wagner prelude which ended it. Here Mr. Fiedler shone pre-eminent. Every sub-theme was conserved to the ear, the balance of parts was excellent, yet there was a virility and an abandon that made the performance memorable. At the very end the brasses were allowed to dominate everything, but we fancy that Wagner himself wished it so, for it is a most stirring and triumphant conclusion. We think that this prelude to the "Master-singers" is the best thing that Mr. Fiedler has yet done in Boston, in conducting.

MacDowell's Work to Be Played By the Symphony

Transcript
Oct. 19, 08

An Unknown Symphonic Will Be Heard in This Week's Programme.

THE chief point of interest in the third programme that Mr. Fiedler has prepared for the Symphony season is an unknown symphonic poem by the late Edward A. MacDowell.

This work has just been printed and was sent to Mr. Fiedler by the publishers, and in order to present it at once he changed his original scheme of programme which called for the "Eroica" Symphony by Beethoven, Smetana's Symphonic Poem "Moldau," Hugo Wolfe's "Italian Serenade" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The programme now calls for the "Eroica" Symphony, the MacDowell Symphonic Poem and the "Die Meistersinger." The Poem is called "Lamia" and is MacDowell's third work of this form, having been preceded by his "Hamlet and Ophelia" and his "Lancelot and Elaine." It is his Opus No. 30.

Mr. Fiedler thinks very highly of it and is rejoiced at the opportunity to give it the first performance it has ever had in this country.

The Hats of Friday Afternoons

To the Editor of the Transcript: Oct. 21, 1908

Is it not possible to arouse public opinion to such a pitch that the large hats may be absolutely tabooed at the Symphony Rehearsals? I paid over fifty dollars for an end seat, in the body of the house, and yet I can see only a fringe of the orchestra in the higher rows. I cannot have the interest and pleasure of watching Mr. Fiedler lead, nor will any soloist be visible to me. And this because of row after row of big hats, forming a solid wall between audience and performers. Besides the lack of musical enjoyment which comes from these conditions, there is added the irritation which springs from the thought that some people are permitted, through their inconsiderateness, to mar the pleasure of so many others. One cannot believe that a true lover of music would go in such apparel. Nor is there true breeding, which allows such indifference to others, and to the purpose of the occasion. At the first rehearsal, in my hearing, a lady asked the usher to have a monstrosity, two rows in front of her removed. His astonishing answer was: "I can't do it; she would not do it for me." And this in face of the notice at the bottom of our programmes. I trust other protests may arise, so that we may succeed in getting the due enjoyment of these concerts throughout the winter.

Friday Afternoon.

[The notice at the bottom of the programme to which "Friday Afternoon" refers runs: "City of Boston, Revised Regulation of Aug. 5, 1898.—Chapter 3, relating to the covering of the head in places of public amusement: Every licensee shall not, in his place of amusement, allow any person to wear upon the head a covering which obstructs the view of the exhibition or performance in such place of any person seated in any seat therein provided for spectators, it being understood that a low head covering without projection, which does not obstruct such view, may be worn." The five principal theatres of the city, frequented by the public from which the audiences at the Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon come, do not print this regulation on their programmes. But they do enforce it strictly, and they have so enforced it for years. Moreover, their audiences submit to it without demur. It is natural to ask why, if such conditions are possible at the theatres, they should not also be possible at Symphony Hall.]

Here in Boston

At the Symphony concerts of Dec. 11 and 12 the orchestra will have the assistance of a choir of eighteen women from the Cecilia to sing the voice parts of Debussy's third nocturne, "The Sirens," and thus enable Mr. Fiedler to perform the three pieces exactly as Debussy designed them. Many of the women are those who sang the music when the nocturnes were first made known here at the Chickering concerts under Mr. Lang.

SYMPHONY A single floor seat for Friday afternoons for balance of season; very cheap. Address C.T.G., Boston Transcript. 2t(A): n 10

SCHROEDER BACK AGAIN.

Note July 5, 1908
Former Symphony 'Cellist Will Settle in Boston Permanently.

ALVIN SCHROEDER.
Cellist.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 31, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

SMETANA,

"The Moldau." SYMPHONIC POEM No. 2 of the Cycle "My Country."

The source; the hunt; the rustic wedding; moonlight and dance of the nymphs; the St. John Rapids; the broad river; Vysehrad motive.

HUGO WOLF,

ITALIAN SERENADE for SMALL ORCHESTRA.

TSCHAIKOWSKY,

VARIATIONS on a Rococo Theme for VIOLON-
CELLO with ORCHESTRAL accompaniment, op. 33.
First time at these concerts.

SCHUMANN,

SYMPHONY in D minor, No. 4, op. 120.

- I. Ziemlich langsam; Lebhaft.
- II. Romanze: Ziemlich langsam.
- II. Scherzo: Lebhaft! Trio.
- IV. Langsam; Lebhaft.

Soloist:

Mr. ALVIN SCHROEDER.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

86

SCHROEDER BACK AGAIN.

Notes July 5. 1908
Former Symphony 'Cellist Will Settle in Boston Permanently.

ALVIN SCHROEDER.
Cellist.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 31, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

SMETANA,

"The Moldau." SYMPHONIC FORM No. 2 of the Cycle "My Country."
The source; the hunt; the rustic wedding; moonlight and dance of the nymphs; the St. John Rapids; the broad river; Vysehrad motive.

HUGO WOLF.

ITALIAN SERENADE for SMALL ORCHESTRA.

TSCHAIKOWSKY,

VARIATIONS on a Rococo Theme for VIOLON-
CELLO with ORCHESTRAL accompaniment, op. 33.
First time at these concerts.

SCHUMANN,

SYMPHONY in D minor, No. 4, op. 120.
I. Ziemlich langsam; Lebhaft.
II. Romanze: Ziemlich langsam.
III. Scherzo: Lebhaft; Trio.
IV. Langsam; Lebhaft.

Soloist:

Mr. ALVIN SCHROEDER.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

FREDERICK SMETANA.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. SCHROEDER AND A LIGHT PROGRAMME

Drawn, ——— Oct. 31, 1908

A Symphony by Schumann for the First Time in Two Years—Smetana's "Moldau" and Wolf's "Italian Serenade"—Mr. Fiedler Conducts with a Less Heavy Hand—Mr. Schroeder Plays Tchaikovsky's Variations for Violoncello—The Episode of the Hats—A Courteous and Reasonable Attempt to Enforce the Long Neglected Rule

In the ideal concerts of a musical Utopia the mood of the audience should match the mood of the programme, and yesterday afternoon at the fourth Symphony Concert Mr. Fiedler began tranquilly enough. The first piece was Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau," his picture in tones of the changeful flow and the changeful banks of the chief river of his beloved Bohemia. Lightly the stream begins its course in the bright, smooth tone of the flutes and the ripple of the violins. The denoting melody of the Moldau shapes itself gently and slowly. The audience, however, was in no such mood, and its evident excitement had no musical cause. All unexpectedly, the day had brought a little revolution in the manners and customs of the afternoon concerts, and satisfaction or irritation over it was keen. On every door stood a placard clear and unmistakable. Large placards hung from the walls of the corridors and the balustrade of the stairs. They asked courteously but firmly for the removal of the long-obstructing, the long-offending hats. Complaining letters had come in numbers to the management; oral protest had been as frequent and emphatic. The matter was indeed delicate; but the demand for action was no less imperative. The result would test the discretion of the managerial appeal, and in the main it justified it. Many hats were removed willingly; some were laid aside reluctantly; a considerable number remained obstinately fixed in their places. There were promises to put them by when the wearers, at future concerts, came prepared for the new dispensation. There were audible retorts of feminine petulance, selfishness and self-will. There was wordy protest—and gradual submission which after all was the main thing. Oftenest, however, a courteous and necessary request was courteously and considerably received. At no afternoon concert in years have the orchestra and the soloist been so generally and easily visible. Some, as the talk of the lobbies ran in the intermission, saw Mr. Fiedler clearly for the first time.

On the floor and in the balconies the general satisfaction seemingly exceeded the passing annoyance, and for a week at least the management had the victory of courage and courtesy. What the theatres have long and effectively done, Symphony Hall had at last begun to do.

Mr. Fiedler, in the good fashion that Mr. Gericke sometimes followed and that a series of twenty-four concerts plausibly warrants, had made a short and a light programme. It began with Smetana's tone-poem; proceeded with Hugo Wolf's "Italian Serenade" and Tchaikovsky's variations for violoncello and orchestra, and ended with Schumann's symphony in D minor, the first of his symphonies to be played at the concerts in two years. In all Dr. Muck's conductorship, he put only three pieces by Schumann on his programmes—the symphony of the spring and the overtures to "Manfred" and to "Genoveva." Perhaps, like Weingartner and other conductors with the ultra-modern instinct and eagerness for incisive and colorful instrumentation at their finger-tips, he counted Schumann's orchestral scoring thick, muddy, and inept. Perhaps, he believed that Schumann's truer and finer traits play more freely and characteristically in the smaller musical forms. Mr. Gericke, on the other hand, was plentiful with Schumann, and Mr. Fiedler, to whom his symphonies warmly appeal, bids fair to restore them to their old place in the repertory of the orchestra. Certainly, the symphony in D minor was good to hear again. Mr. Fiedler, as Schumann wished, led it without pause. He took it as well with a gusto that often suited the romantic energy of the music. Here and there he might have been clearer of outline, smoother of phrase, more adroit of tonal coloring; and the performance little lessened Schumann's familiar orchestral shortcomings. On the other hand, Mr. Fiedler did not overdrive his men or force their tone. The slow movement kept its wistful and dreamy beauty. The finale began in broad declamation and proceeded with stirring rhythmical energy; the trio in the scherzo was warmly sung, and throughout the symphony Mr. Fiedler kept the intensity of mood, the eagerness of expression that are vital qualities in Schumann's music to us of another generation. How Schumann believed in it with his whole heart, and yesterday we listeners believed as well.

The rest of the concert was amiable pleasure and agreeable diversion, less or more, as music and performance went. The melody of the Moldau returned as captivatingly and as graphically as of old, and Smetana's series of little tone-pictures ran their enticing and illusive course. In a sense "The Moldau" is simple-minded music, as much delineative music goes nowadays; but it is none the worse for such moderation and reticence. It accomplishes its end fitly and fully. It gives the pleasure it would impart. It has a freshness, almost an innocence, of its own. It is a kind of a musical picture book, and its quickly turning leaves are more alluring than the ponderous paragraphs of many a graver musical treatise. Happily Mr. Fiedler took it with thoughtful lightness, and he was as free from undue emphasis with Wolf's "Italian Serenade." Perhaps he missed something of its nervous elegance, of the emotional quiver that is in the music, of its quick flashes of white fire, but he wrought it, as he had wrought "The Moldau," with a clear sense of design and detail, of curve and shade. The heady zest, the tremulous intensity and the racing fancy of the music spoke for themselves, and there are pretty feats of virtuosity in it for such an orchestra as ours.

Tschaikovsky's variations for violoncello and orchestra in turn brought two sorts of pleasure—the light charm of the piece itself and the deeper delight of Mr. Schroeder's playing. A "rococo" theme, Tschaikovsky calls his principal melody, meaning thereby a simple, graceful, frankly pretty musical thought meet for light and supple play. Mozartian might have been a clearer epithet, and Italian might almost have been the word, so lucid, songful and frankly engaging are the melody and the seven variations that spring from it. When Wolf turns Latin, he is nervous, fiery, tautly strung. When Tschaikovsky forgets that he is a Slav, he is playful, gay, elegant and adroit. The music runs with light-fingered dexterity; it has little quaintnesses, almost affectations, as in the ritornello that separates the variations; it is as changeful as fancy itself and as spontaneous. It is steadily and delicately sympathetic to the just quality and the range of the violoncello, and all these traits together make a smiling mask for its insistent and intricate demands on the skill of the violoncellist and on his finer feeling for his instrument. It were a late day to note and to applaud these qualities in Mr. Schroeder. Again, he played with an endless and effortless skill. He neither commanded nor constrained his instrument. His virtuosity hid its finesse, its surety, its adroitness in its perfect fusion with the music that it would impart. It left only the impression of its poised elegance, its just sense of style. Mr. Schroeder's 'cello neither capers heavily nor sings thickly. He persuades it to sensitive and elastic brilliance. He caresses it into undulating and transparent song. He justifies the 'cello as a solo instrument, and the 'cellist outside his choir in the strings. At the beginning, his hearers welcomed him anew to old and familiar place. At the end they were warmer still to his present achievement.

H. T. P.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Fourth of the Season's Symphony Concerts.

Alwin Schroeder the Cello Soloist of an Interesting Program.

Recitals by Sembrich, Sauer and Others of Note.

Mr Alwin Schroeder was given a flattering reception on his appearance as soloist with the Symphony orchestra at the fourth rehearsal and concert, a greeting which carried with it a tribute of appreciation for the man as well as for the musician. The popular 'cellist was so long identified with the musical life of this city that his departure from Boston was sincerely regretted by a large circle of friends.

It is gratifying to know that he has reconsidered his intention of making his home in Germany and will again take up his residence in this country. His contribution to the Symphony program was Tschaikowsky's variations on a rococo theme, given for the first time at these concerts.

The Russian composer, who has taken a simple old-time melody and varied it in seven ways for solo instrument and orchestra, has rather held himself in reserve, for there is very little of the so-called Slav characteristic harshness in any of the movements. And in all the variations Mr Schroeder showed the same artistic poise and ability that has made him one of the foremost 'cellists of the day.

His impeccable fingering and rapidity of execution, splendid bowing and perfect command of the instrument's resources enabled him to do full justice to the showy composition and won the usual hearty plaudits that have been showered upon him in times past. He was recalled a half dozen times at least.

The remaining selections were "The Moldau," a part of Smetana's symphonic poem, entitled "My Country"; Hugo Wolf's "Italian Serenade" and Schumann's fourth symphony. "The Moldau," or river, as a pastoral picture suggesting rippling waters, the hunt, a wedding of rustles, wood and water nymphs, etc., and giving opportunities mainly for delicate and buoyant work by the orchestra.

Mr Fiedler again showed his talent for what might be called the gentler forms of musical art, for the contrasts were beautifully brought out, each one proportioned to the other, and the fortissimo moderated to its proper relation with the whole subject.

Wolf's "Italian Serenade" has been heard in both forms here, as a string quartet and for small orchestra. It is a brilliant little piece, a vivid tone picture delightfully naive and fantastic. The themes by the viola, flute and 'cello deserve mention, being prominent though the whole work was played with charming grace and abandon. The "small orchestra" was called upon to rise in acknowledgment of plaudits. An admirable performance of Schumann's fourth symphony, which Mr Fiedler conducted from memory, closed the program.

At last the complaints about the enormous and view-obstructing headgear worn by some of the fair sex at the matinees have been heeded by the management, and at the last rehearsal there were numerous cards placed conspicuously in the corridors, requesting ladies to remove their hats during the concert. There was a general, but not universal, compliance with the request, and it is to be hoped that in a short time the former inattention to a regulation of the city of Boston will be a thing of the past.

The orchestra leaves tonight on the first of its monthly trips to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Brooklyn and Washington and will not return until Wednesday, Nov 11. Monday night, Nov 9, it will give for the first time in its history, a concert in Princeton, and Tuesday, Nov 10, it will give the first of its three concerts in Hartford. At the next Boston concerts, Nov 13 and 14, the soloist will be Miss Jeanne Gerville-Reache.

"HATS OFF" ORDER AT SYMPHONY

Record — Oct. 31, 1908
New Regulation Causes
Some Mutterings

The musical worm hath turned and hereafter feminine head gear must be removed at the symphony concerts and rehearsals according to ordinance "in such case made and provided."

The management issued the order yesterday, and it was quite generally obeyed, but not without protest. It is expected that hereafter all ladies will be prepared to remove their hats, as no excuses will be accepted.

What happened at the rehearsal yesterday is thus described by Louis C. Elson in his critique in this morning's Advertiser:

But there was something of far more import than Schumann, or Smetana, or Wolf, or Schroeder at this concert. There was revolt!! The gentle male who had been gazing at the back of a millinery cart-wheel during the last three rehearsals, suddenly rebelled, and a request to remove feminine head-gear was visible at all the doors! Not that this disturbed the minds of all the top-heavy ones present. One gentle dame sat sturdily near the storm centre beneath an inverted bath-tub, and enjoyed (doubly enjoyed) the entire programme. But the event might give a good subject for some of our native composers who are languishing for American subjects. The new work might be entitled "Hatzoff. An American Tone-poem."

It might begin with the "request-motif," followed by deep mutterings in the woodwind. A very long round might typify a Merry Widow hat and the trombones might give the Theme of Defiance. The approach of the usher might now be depicted ("Timoroso e tremolando") and the defiance theme might respond to it—"Allegro Feroce." A final apotheosis of the hat-theme smothering a feeble flute theme in minor might indicate the retreat of the usher.

And the trombones loud blare,
And the trumpet's fierce air,
Gave proof, at the end, that the hat was still there.

A few fragments of the "request-motif" might portray an unfortunate auditor (by no means a spectator) tickled in the nose by the waving feathers and vainly endeavoring to peep beyond the obstruction.

WOMEN REFUSE TO REMOVE THEIR HATS

Many Are Indignant at Request by Management at Symphony Rehearsal.

PARTIAL COMPLIANCE
GIVES HOPE FOR FUTURE

Ordinance Has Been Disregarded, but Hereafter Will Be Enforced.

Herald — Oct. 31, 1908

When the woman patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began to arrive for the public rehearsal yesterday afternoon, and after they had shown their tickets and passed into the corridor, they were confronted by a huge white placard with black lettering on it, and it said:

"Ladies are requested to remove their hats during the concert to obviate the cause of many complaints by subscribers whose view of the stage has been obstructed."

To say that some of the ladies were annoyed is putting it mildly. These did not even consider the polite tone of the notice. They did not know that in New York the management would simply have said: "Hats off," and let it go at that.

It appears that the management, who are mere men, had not considered a phase of the situation, which a woman would have understood instantly. When a woman puts her hat on she has to keep it on unless she is forewarned that it will be necessary to take it off. The reason has something to do with hair.

It did not take the management long to find out that they couldn't just put up a sign and then stand aside and watch the women obey it. No, indeed.

Disregarded Request.

"Why, the very idea!" said the vanguard of women ticket holders. "We won't do it." And they didn't.

The house filled up rapidly and the hats were all upon the heads except in a few cases. Some of the strong minded sisters looked daggers at those who obeyed the ordinance and made audible remarks.

However, there was a shot left in the locker of the management. The ushers passed along the aisles distributing cards which bore the same humble prayer as did the big placards.

"How unfortunate. I did not bring my glasses," said one woman, and carefully laid the card away. "I'll read it when I get home," she said to the usher.

There were many timid women, however, who hastened to obey the request, and some, to their credit be it said, who did it to be obliging. But the anti-hat crusade did not win a complete victory. Fully half the ladies in the audience persisted in wearing their hats and these were usually owners of monumental headgears in colors which deflected the tones of the orchestra and nearly turned them into discords.

Ordinance Will Be Enforced.

A reporter found the manager of the hall jubilant over the success of the placards.

"Have you seen all the women who have taken their hats off?" he said joyfully. "Why, there are as many as two in that row and three in the row in front. I tell you we are winning. Great reforms move slowly, but I think that in the course of a few weeks nearly all the ladies will come prepared to remove their hats."

The men who attend the Friday afternoon rehearsals were willing to be interviewed and all were favorable to the removing of the hats. "I don't take much personal interest in the matter, though," said one man, "because I know that nothing will make the woman in front of me take her hat off."

There has been a city ordinance against wearing hats in places of amusement for a number of years, but nobody has ever paid any attention to it at the Friday afternoon rehearsals. In the future it will be different. The ordinance will be enforced.

4th Symphony Rehearsal

Post By Olin Downes Oct. 31, 1908

After an absence of nearly six years, Alwin Schroeder, the veteran 'cellist and former member of the Symphony Orchestra, returned yesterday afternoon to appear as soloist with that body at the fourth rehearsal of the season in Symphony Hall.

Programme: "The Moldan," symphonic poem (No. 2 of cycle, "My Country"; Smetana; Italian serenade for small orchestra, Hugo Wolf; variations on a rococo theme for violoncello, with orchestral accompaniment, Tchaikowsky; symphony in D minor, Schumann.

This programme, tactfully constructed, containing nothing to rouse the ire of conservative or ultra-modern, or cause the esthetic to tremble, gave much pleasure to an attentive audience.

Smetana, an ardent patriot, wrote his cycle of Symphonic poems that his country might be immortalized in tones. The work heard yesterday speaks of the mighty river "Moldan," its origin in the two springs that "gush forth in the shade of the Bohemian forest," and its historic shores. The genuineness, the warmth and the fervor of this music, its naive, ancestral simplicity, characteristic color and panoramic style—these things could not, and did not, fail in making a marked impression upon the auditors, an impression which was enhanced by a graphic performance.

The "Italian Serenade" and the 'cello concerto are both pleasantly entertaining, if small. The former is thin spun in places, but it is piquant, both harmonically and in its scoring, and it was, moreover, a great treat to the ear, if only on account of the superb manner in which several virtuosos of the orchestra, notably Mr. Ferir, the first viola, played their solo passages.

Mr. Schroeder as he entered was given the heartiest of greetings by orchestra and audience. Who, among the 'cellists of today, have such a mature grasp of everything that they play, such a virile tone, such fresh enthusiasm tempered by both breadth and finesse of style? The Tchaikowsky variations, played for the first time at these concerts, are pleasing trifles. The theme has flavor; the variations are many, but rarely unindividual or uninteresting. The instrumental accompaniment is sketched in with a light and dextrous hand. The piece was interpreted con amore, and again the beloved virtuoso was applauded and recalled a number of times.

Mr. Fiedler's conception of the Schumann Symphony is not without fault. The introduction of the first movement, the transition from the scherzo to the finale, and some pages in that section, were very telling, but during the entire opening movement there was the suggestion of roughness and physical force utterly at variance, to our mind, with the characteristic speech of a tone poet who was a disciple of beauty and whose emotions were of the spirit. The sentiment was often exaggerated. The second theme of the finale, especially, was woefully sentimentalized.

There will be no rehearsal and concert next week.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

SCHUMANN, MR. FIEDLER AND APPLAUSE

Trans. — Nov. 2, 1908
The Incidents of the Symphony Concert—

Thanks for the Banished Hats—Niren's Much Heralded "Kaleidoscope" Is Played in Chicago and Justifies Curiosity Over It—Quality and Not Quantity in Plays—A Warm Word for Romantic Melodrama—Mr. Fiedler's Venture Into Ballet-Music—Miss Gray to Appear Here in "The Thief"—Mr. Lhevinne Returns to America—Miss Anglin's Katharine in "The Taming of the Shrew"

There was less applause at the fourth Symphony Concert on Saturday night than at any of its predecessors, and it was easy to wonder whether the music interested the audience less than had Mr. Fiedler's previous programmes, or whether it was becoming used to the conductor himself. Mr. Schroeder, almost needless to say, was warmly applauded when he first appeared, and no less heartily at the end of his playing of Tchaikowski's 'cello variations. On the other hand, Smetana's tone-poem of his beloved Bohemian river, transparent, gracious and animated as the music is, brought little response, and Wolf's "Italian Serenade" had only the poor reward of courteous and unmoved attention. In both pieces, Mr. Fiedler was far less strenuous than he has been at the previous concerts—and fittingly so—and there were cynics to say that the audience missed its weekly dram of tonal and rhythmic excitement.

Perhaps the conductor himself felt vaguely the conditions around him, and in the first and the final movements of Schumann's symphony in D minor, he was not content with the more temperate eloquence of Friday afternoon. In the first movement and in the finale he laid on and spared not until the brass lost all mellowness, the strings turned muscular, the whole orchestral stream became thick and turbid, and the high, clear passion of the music was strained almost to bursting. Mr. Henderson, in the essay on the symphony that he printed years ago, when he loved music more and controversy less, will have it that Schumann was writing his "nuptial hymn, the 'Io triumphe' of love victorious and manhood blessed." The idea is poetic, the substance and the structure of the symphony bear it well, and so heard the music touches the listening imagination warmly and keenly. With Mr. Fiedler it was indeed a thunderous triumph, the broadest of victorious hymns, but somehow such a version clogged the sheer soaring rapture of the music. It pegged it to the earth and made the listener think too often of too thick instrumentation. And then the inevitable contrast which is the essence of Mr. Fiedler's conducting—the warm, tender and intimate beauty that he and his men infused into the romanza which is the lover's serenade, and into the trio of the scherzo which is the voice of his longing so deep that it is almost pain. Here were compensation indeed. They opened a new side of the conductor's temperament. Evidently he loves Schumann because he feels his fine intensities. H. T. P.

"For This Relief Much Thanks"

To the Editor of the Transcript:

The inevitable has come to pass, the cloud has burst, and those women of the Friday afternoon audiences who are sorely grieved have only themselves to blame that the blow, unexpectedly radical, has fallen. It is hard upon her who has no "mote in her own eye," but the large majority has gone, week after week, utterly regardless of the wishes or the comfort of the reasonable subscribers as regards small hats, entirely ignoring the ordinance (a fair and timely warning) printed on the programme, and with a selfish disregard of the rights of others; and when the spirit of complaint was stirring in the air, entirely blind to the writing on the wall, writing which each week has grown more vivid and luminous. Possibly, if it ever be our privilege to patronize concerts in Mars, we shall look back to this stormy preexistence, and, chastened in spirit, voluntarily go hatless to our weekly musical feast. F. S. S.

Oct. 31.

To the Editor of the Transcript:

If you will allow me space again, I should like to express the satisfaction of many frequenters of the Symphony rehearsals, at the management's request to have ladies remove their hats. The results last Friday could only be called a beginning; but I trust the slight benefit received may be increased, until it has become as familiar to obey the rule of the house as at a theatre.

Though the hats last Friday still obstructed my view of Mr. Hess, and of half of the first violin, I was able to watch Mr. Fiedler, and could let my next neighbor, by exchanging seats with her through the symphony, follow him for the first time. I was touched to hear her say that the music last Friday sounded very different, and vastly better, from not having to penetrate a mass of felt, silk and straw before reaching her ears. If the still persistent wearers of the large hats realized that they actually kept the sound from other purchasers of tickets, they might more readily conform to civilized custom.

FRIDAY AFTERNOON

Nov. 1.

MOLDAU IS FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Programme of Romantic Works Under Direction of Mr. Fiedler.

ALWIN SCHROEDER, 'CELLIST, RETURNS

Comments on Talent of Hugo Wolf Suggested by His "Italian Serenade."

Herald Nov. 1, 1908
By PHILIP HALÉ.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, gave its fourth concert last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau".....Smetana
Italian Serenade.....Wolf
Variations on a Roccoco Theme for 'cello, Tschaikowsky

Symphony in D minor, No. 4.....Schumann
Smetana's "Moldau" had not been played here for nearly 10 years. It was a pleasure to hear again this music by a Czech who for a time was underestimated out of his own land, if not ignored, while his fellow-countryman Dvorak was overpraised. Of the two, Smetana was the musician of the greater imagination. Dvorak made a more direct appeal to popularity. His earlier and better music was irresistibly tuneful in folk fashion. It had the impetuous dash and swing of the peasant dances. It sparkled and glowed with color, for Dvorak was a born colorist in tones. Like Antaeus of old, he refreshed himself by touching the soil. When he would fain soar in singing robes, his flight was labored and he was quickly weary.

A simple, wholesome man, he was musically ill at ease when he was not moved to compose by the thought of Bohemian songs and dances. An abstract idea, a poetic thought led him into contract labor. He wrote cantatas for English festivals. He wrote serious and perfunctory works. Lured to New York and at the head of a conservatory he was urged to found, forsooth, an American school of composition by writing a symphony and chamber music based on negro tunes, and some now insist that there will be no "American music" worthy the name until our composers use Congo, Indian, Creole, Mexican tunes for thematic material.

Dvorak was a picturesque apparition in the musical work, a composer of indisputable talent in his early and creative years, a name to be mentioned always with respect, but Smetana had a broader vision, and his flight was far higher and more sure. He, too, was a sturdy patriot, and he wished to serve Bohemia and extol her through his music, but as a "national" composer he was neither chauvinistic nor a bore. He and Dvorak wrote symphonic poems suggested by natural scenery, historical episodes or legends of their country, and in these works Smetana is disclosed as the more poetic, the more dramatic, the man of firmer grasp, of more skillful arrangement of detail.

"The Moldau" has an argument, but the title is enough to put the hearer in a receptive mood. The argument is minute; the music is something more than panoramic. The hearer is not obliged to identify this or that passage with a hunting scene, a rustic dance, moonlight. The music starts with the source and flows with the river. And now the citadel Vysehrad is passed. What wonder if Smetana bethought him of the motive of his first symphonic poem and introduced it, haughty and sonorous! "The Moldau" was finely played, and it deserved warmer approval.

Hugo Wolf's "Italian Serenade" is more effective in the quartet version. He was not a master of orchestration—his "Penthesilea," in other respects an amateurish composition, shows this. His ambition to construct works of breadth and importance overleaped his technical ability, and hence his enthusiasm seems now, in these instances, impotent. His talent—truly his own and conspicuous—was in setting music to songs. Give him verses, a voice and a piano, and he could express that which is tender, beautiful, noble. He was especially fortunate in his treatment of the piano accompaniment, so that Mr. Spanuth had good reason to protest when Julia Culp sang recently in Berlin some of Wolf's masterpieces with the piano accompaniment orchestrated.

The serenade gave opportunity for exquisite solo work, and thus it afforded pleasure.

Mr. Schroeder, who has not played here with the Symphony orchestra for over five years, was welcomed most heartily. The welcome was a tribute of respect and affection. There was the thought of his long and honorable service as a member of the orchestra; of his never-failing art, displayed as leader of the 'cellos, or in the incidental solo work, or in the triumphant performance of a set and appointed concerto. He chose last evening Tschaikowsky's variations on a roccoco theme, which, dated the year of the same composer's "Francesca da Rimini," had not yet been played at these concerts.

The music is not characteristically Tschaikowskian, and when Tschaikowsky is not himself, his music is ordinary. No doubt he was moved to write these variations for his friend Fitzenhagen, the 'cellist, who perhaps importuned him for a display piece. The piece is dull. The theme is roccoco by courtesy and the variations are for the most part toll and trouble. The most interesting portions are the orchestral interludes. Mr. Schroeder's tone was generally full and rich and the audience was generous with applause.

There were some fine moments in the performance of the Symphony, especially in the three last movements. On the other hand the brass was often coarse and blatant in the first movement and in the finale. There has been no truly memorable performance of this symphony here since Mr. Nikisch left the city. The music of Schumann appealed to him singularly. It awakened his better, and sincere musical nature. In those days he was too often inclined to read Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven after the Hungarian manner; to be intensely emotional when the music called for sobriety of treatment or a rapture that was only moderate; to be careless and indifferent when the composition did not interest him.

But certain performances led by him, as those of Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" and this symphony, still haunt and delight the memory, quicken the pulse, stir the innermost being. Never shall I forget the manner in which he interpreted by subtle control of the rhythm and by nuances of sentiment the trio of the scherzo, this trio charged with the indescribable tenderness of longing peculiar to Schumann, with passages of twilight romanticism that do not end in a despairing cry and yet at the climax are "wild with all regret."

In his reading of the Romanze and the Scherzo, Mr. Fiedler came nearer the interpretation of Mr. Nikisch than did any one of his three predecessors.

There will be no concerts this week. The programme of the concerts of the 13th and 14th will be as follows: Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. Three Dances from "Cephele et Procris." Grieg-Motil: Beethoven, overture to "Egmont." Miss Jeanne Gerville-Reache of the Manhattan Opera House will sing two arias.

The Symphony Concert

The fourth Symphony concert of the season afforded much entertainment to those who attended, for Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist, the beloved veteran of a thousand concerts, appeared on this stage as soloist after some six years' absence; and the programme, skillfully constituted, was not one calculated to agitate or vex the sensibilities. Also, let it be said, it showed Mr. Fiedler in his strength and in the abuse of his strength.

One could hardly help warming to the simple and nobly sincere music that Smetana has given us in his symphonic poem: "The Moldau." Its fervor and good faith go straight to the heart. On the surface, in the depiction of the growth of the mighty river Moldau, and the historic scenes through which it passes, the piece might be called panoramic, were it not for the deep note of strong emotion that is always to be felt; the impressive speech of ancestral memories, the finished workmanship, the felicitous art of an inspired melodist. This is music by a Bohemian composer in praise of Bohemia, but it has its origin in the touch of nature that makes all mankind akin. It was, we should judge, music that made a strong appeal to the conductor. Its performance was full of color and splendidly eloquent.

Mr. Schroeder's greeting was only warmer than that accorded him on Friday afternoon; and Tschaikowsky's entertaining variations proved a toothsome novelty. It was good to give Wolf's ingeniously scored Italian serenade, for it called into play the prowess as soloists of various of the great virtuosi of the orchestra. Scored for small orchestra, it was played with more finesse and sheer beauty than the band had yet exhibited this season.

But the Schumann Symphony was far from an unalloyed delight. Yes, Schumann was a flaming romanticist, and he is not to be interpreted by rule of thumb, but we feel that he conceived one of his most romantic creations in vastly different spirit from that in which it was given yesterday. The agitated measures of the opening movement were played with harshness and physical violence. That is not strength, and Schumann in his most intense mood would fain keep within the limits of beautiful music. The Romanza was beautifully sung. The introduction to the first movement and the transitional measures from the Scherzo to the finale have been praised before today. The last movement—the tempo and the spirit of it were exhilarating. Pulses beat to the joyous rhythm until the second theme arrived. Then, miserable man, you slackened the tempo, you mooned and maundered. This alone would have been enough, but why such a triumph of brutal force at the conclusion? Why such exaggerated sentiments—and this last remark applies to the performance as a whole—why such shouting from the housetops, when we would but celebrate the joy of a poet come into his own?

FOR SALE—SYMPHONY REHEARSAL season tickets, 2 together on floor, row H, for $55 each. Also 1 central, floor, $55. Address V.S.O., Boston Transcript. 6t(A): d7

MR. SCHROEDER'S TRIUMPH IN THIS WEEK'S SYMPHONY

Adm: ————— G431.08
RECEIVES WARM WELCOME AND PLAYS MAGNIFICENTLY

Mr. Fiedler's Conservative Reading of Schumann's D Minor Symphony—"Hats Off."

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Smetana—Symphonic Poem, "Moldau."
Hugo Wolf—"Italian Serenade."
Tschalkowsky—Variations for Violoncello and Orchestra.

Soloist, Mr. Alwyn Schroeder.
Schumann—Symphony in D minor.

The chief triumph of the concert was won by the soloist. This is not to be wondered at, when one remembers all that Mr. Alwyn Schroeder has been to Boston in the past. As orchestral player, as chamber musician, and as soloist, he has won his laurels, and municipalities are not, like republics, ungrateful. Mr. Schroeder was welcomed as if he had been the prodigal son. He has tested Europe, and made German triumphs recently, but he prefers Boston (around which orchestral America revolves) and has come back to us with undimmed powers, wherefore the audience killed the fatted calf with much applause before and after the work.

The theme which Tschalkowsky treats is quaintly antique in flavor and is easily followed through its transformations. It is one of the prime requisites of a theme used for variations, that it should have some ear-marks which lead to its identification under all disguises, and this "rococo" theme had many such. It was besides, very well-suited to its instrument; it was a true 'cello theme, and its variations displayed most of the technical points of the instrument. There was broad work for the C string, there were high positions and harmonics: there was double-stopping and pizzicato, and everything else that goes to make up violoncello pyrotechnics. But the work remains rather a virtuoso piece than great music, and one has learned to expect much greater orchestral results from the composer of the "Symphonie Pathétique," which we are to have in the next concert.

The theme itself was a square-cut "two-period with partial return" melody, which kept its prim shape through all the variations. But Mr. Schroeder played it without the slightest effort, and overcame all technical difficulties without turning a hair. Small wonder that he was recalled three times after the close of the work.

The name Smetana (accent on the first syllable) is Bohemian for "Cream," and Smetana is certainly the cream of Bohemian music. His pupil Dvorak may have attained greater orchestral routine and more contrapuntal skill, but in intensity and fire Smetana is his superior, and on the altar of the latter the fire of patriotism is never extinguished. Mr. Fiedler brought out the rippling wave figure with much delicacy, and his shading at the end was masterly. His unaffected catching-up of the folk-melodies in the work deserves especial praise. These ought always to be given in a simple, straightforward fashion, as they were on this occasion. The ripple of the river makes almost as persistent a rhythm as the Rhine in the beginning of "Rheingold," and this pleasant monotony was also well portrayed.

The excellence of the work makes us long for a performance of some of the less known numbers of this national set of symphonic poems, for this is but one number of a set of six. Bohemia deserves noble music if the old saying that "Music is the child of Sorrow" is true, for no land has been scourged as this country has been in the past. Poor Hugo Wolf! His history is so tragic and pathetic that one can scarcely shake off the feeling of sadness in listening to any of his works. But this "Italian Serenade" is not intrinsically sad; nor is it as marked a stroke of genius as many of the songs of the unfortunate master. He could not swing the orchestra as Richard Strauss and the great modern symphonists (or "symphonic poem" makers) do. Yet the work is much better as an orchestral piece than as a string quartette. When the Kneisels gave it in the latter guise, it resolved itself into an accompanied violin solo.

In the orchestral version one can hear birds singing and peasants dancing. Yet there is nothing so graphic in it as we find, for example, in Charpentier's picture of Italy, while Strauss' "Aus Italien" is much stronger in spite of its distortion of "Funicoli-Funicola," its serving macaroni with Rhine wine. The work is fragmentary and often bizarre. It does not gain on repeated hearing. But it was so delicately performed that Mr. Fiedler was recalled and the orchestra forced to rise.

Schumann's D minor symphony is less strong, to us, than his first, or second, or his "Cologne" symphony. But it served to show Mr. Fiedler, our new conductor, in a new light. He has been growing a trifle too emphatic in some of his work. An Arabian steed needs no whip and spurs, and our noble orchestra requires no such lashing on as it has once or twice received at its conductor's hands. A little more reserve, a little less dynamic force, would be a move in the right direction.

And this Schumann reading was more conservative, less extreme, than some of Mr. Fiedler's interpretations. There was no such attempt, for example, to spin out sorrow (in the Romance) as in the Funeral March of the preceding concert; (that corpse must have been rather gamey before the procession reached the grave); there was no such forcing of brasses as we have at least once noted. All through the concert there was this welcome repression and subtlety. A little more of shading within the phrase, and we shall have all the subtlety of the pristine days of our orchestra.

Mr. Fiedler, as above intimated, did not dawdle the Romance, one period of whose 'cello theme was worth the whole Tschalkowsky work. The Scherzo too was given with Schumannesque earnestness, for that composer wrote more than one serious scherzo and could not be as light-hearted as Mendelssohn or as grotesque as Beethoven sometimes became in such movements. It was a good reading of a fine work, for Schumann at his symphonic weakest is still a glorious composer.

But there was something of far more import than Schumann, or Smetana, or Wolf, or Schroeder at this concert. There was revolt!! The gentle male who had been gazing at the back of a millinery cart-wheel during the last three rehearsals, suddenly rebelled, and a request to remove feminine head-gear was visible at all the doors! Not that this disturbed the minds of all the top-heavy ones present. One gentle dame sat sturdily near the storm centre beneath an inverted bath-tub, and enjoyed (doubly enjoyed) the entire programme. But the event might give a good subject for some of our native composers who are languishing for American subjects. The new work might be entitled "Hatzoff. An American Tone-poem," poem.

It might begin with the "request-motif," followed by deep mutterings in the woodwind. A very long round might typify a Merry Widow hat and the trombones might give the Theme of Defiance. The approach of the usher might now be depicted ("Timoroso e tremolando") and the defiance theme might respond to it—"Allegro Feroce." A final apotheosis of the hat-theme smothering a feeble flute theme in minor might indicate the retreat of the usher.

And the trombones loud blare,
And the trumpet's fierce air,
Gave proof, at the end, that the hat was still there.

A few fragments of the "request-motif" might portray an unfortunate auditor (by no means a spectator) tickled in the nose.

The players in the Symphony Orchestra are still telling with amusement the novel experience that befell them when the band gave a concert at Princeton in the course of its recent journey. Never before had the orchestra appeared at the college, and the students filled the balcony of Alexander Hall. No sooner were the players seated on the stage than the youngsters rose as one man and shouted the Princeton yell. The orchestra has had many sorts of greeting, but never before such an one.

SCHROEDER AND HIS 'CELLO AT SYMPHONY

He Returns to Boston to Receive a Fine Greeting.

Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist, was the hero of the fourth Symphony concert. Out of compliment to him gathered the biggest audience seen so far this season. Warm applause greeted him when he came out to play the Tschalkowsky "Variations on a Rococo Theme," and as he sat down, smiling and blushing with pleasure, what a long train of recollections must have flashed across his mind. For twelve years, from 1891 to 1903, Mr. Schroeder was the solo 'cellist of the orchestra. Then he went to New York with Franz Kneisel. Then, last year, he decided to spend the rest of his days in his native Germany, and so, a year ago last April, Boston farewelled him in grand style. But last summer came the reaction. After all, there was no place like Boston. And so this admirable artist is back again upon the scene of his most numerous and most memorable successes. With Mr. Hess, the concert master of the Symphony Orchestra, he has organized a quartet, and from now on he will be on Boston's roll of distinguished residents.

This was the first performance of the Tschalkowsky variations at a Symphony concert, but the work of itself is not impressive. The chief interest of the audience lay in the beautiful playing of the soloist.

The other numbers on the program were Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau," which might be called an exhibition of musical moving pictures; Hugo Wolf's "Italian Serenade," which may seem Italian to those who have had chianti for dinner, and the Schumann symphony in D minor, which was played with no pauses between the movements. It was a light and short entertainment. Hearty applause indicated that the audience relished it.

MARIE RAPPOLD AS CLEOPATRA.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

TSCHAIKOWSKY,
Died Nov. 6, 1893.

SYMPHONY No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetic." op. 74.

- I. Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
- II. Allegro con grazia.
- III. Allegro molto vivace.
- IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.

WEBER,

SCENE, "How Tranquilly I Slumbered," and ARIA
"Softly Sighing," from the Opera "Der Freischütz."

GRÉTRY,

THREE DANCE PIECES, from "Cephalus and Procris," Heroic Ballet.

- I. Tambourin.
- II. Menuet. "The Nymphs of Diana."
- III. Gigue.

Freely arranged for concert use by FELIX MOTTI.
(First time in Boston.)

a) R. STRAUSS,
b) MOZART,
c) GRIEG,

SONGS with PIANOFORTE.

"ALL SOULS' DAY."

"THE VIOLET."

"A DREAM."

BEETHOVEN,

OVERTURE to Goethe's "Egmont," op. 84.

Soloist:

Mme. MARIE RAPPOLD.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

MARIE RAPPOLD AS CLEOPATRA.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

TSCHAIKOWSKY,
Died Nov. 6, 1893.

SYMPHONY No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetic," op. 74.

- I. Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
- II. Allegro con grazia.
- III. Allegro molto vivace.
- IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.

WEBER,

SCENE, "How Tranquilly I Slumbered," and ARIA
"Softly Sighing," from the Opera "Der Freischütz."

CHÉRY,

THREE DANCE PIECES, from "Cephalus and Procris," Heroic Ballet.

- I. Tarentine.
- II. Menuet. "The Nymphs of Diana."
- III. Gigue.

Freely arranged for concert use by FELIX MOTT.
(First time in Boston.)

a) R. STRAUSS,
b) MOZART,
c) GRIEG.

SONGS with PIANOFORTE.

"ALL SOULS' DAY."
"THE VIOLET."
"A DREAM."

BEETHOVEN,

OVERTURE to Goethe's "Egmont," op. 84.

Soloist:

Mme. MARIE RAPPOLD.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans. — Nov. 14, 1908

A Strangely Tempered Mr. Fiedler Gives a Just Performance of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony and of Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont" — Grétry's Eighteenth-Century Dances and the Peril of Modernizing Them — Mme. Rappold's Coolly Pleasant Singing

Seemingly it was a tempered Mr. Fiedler that came back to the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon after ten days of wandering to New York and to other strange cities. In all his preceding concerts here the conductor has not been so sparing of energetic gesture, so little disposed to write his musical and emotional purpose graphically on the air. He was content to trust instruments and groups of instruments to make their entry for themselves. He marshalled his climaxes without sweep of arm or curve of back. He cut out no rhythms with sharp and cleaving blow. He underscored no precision of chord or accent. By every sign Mr. Fiedler had imposed his will upon his men at rehearsal and was content to let suggestion recall it at the due moment. He was content even that his audience should hear rather than see it. This new temperance of gesture was more becoming, if less exciting, than his ways at previous concerts, and so restrained, the manner of his conducting gave the pleasure and gained the response of unforced and continent, but no less clear and firm authority.

This new temperance was the more remarkable, because it was in Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony that Mr. Fiedler first disclosed it. For a fortnight it has seemed easy to anticipate what a delirium of excited rhythm and thunderous sound he would turn the movement of march, battle and triumph, and to hear in a kind of vision of the ear the frenetic outbursts to which Tchaikovsky himself seems to whip his band in the first movement. In similar fancy, the expectant listener heard the rhythm of the scherzo sharply cut and the redoubled energy of woe in the finale. Yet in actual performance of the symphony, Mr. Fiedler did none of these things. The music is so familiar; our conductors have so often shown their skill and power with it that comparisons may not be avoided. At one extreme stands the passionately eloquent Paur, who first made the symphony known to us; next comes Dr. Muck, who made the nerves of his hearers leap and tingle to the music, and so to the other extreme of the much too reticent and self-possessed Gericke. Between Dr. Muck's and Mr. Gericke's readings Mr. Fiedler's seems fairly to stand. He missed the penetrating neurotic thrill, the tonal and rhythmic excitement—mounting, receding, mounting again—with which Dr. Muck used to play in the symphony upon his hearers. He was far from the over-continence Gericke and he was no less removed from the impassioned Paur. Mr. Fiedler read the symphony, as it seemed in a single hearing, justly and intently, over-emphasizing and under-emphasizing nothing. He followed now and then his own peculiar ways as in the elaborate and obvious preparation for the entrance of the songful melody of the first movement; but once he had brought it to utterance, he neither manipulated its curve nor underscored its intensity. Similarly he courted occasionally his cherished contrasts of pace, side by side with little variation of it, while Tchaikovsky's outbursts of tumultuous sound were now and then too precise for excitement. He lessened the saliency of some details like the iterated drum beat under the restless rhythm of the scherzo, and he made others more salient than some conductors have shaped them. Yet the whole impression was of a just reading of the symphony that escaped alike excess and tameness; that imparted its contents with intent understanding and duly answering feeling rather than with any individual eloquence; and that in the last movement attained an amplitude of general and encompassing despair rather than the poignancy of individual woe.

Then, with Mme. Rappold's singing and with the three dances out of Grétry's "heroic ballet" of "Cephalus and Procris," the middle part of the concert ran lightly. Mme. Rappold's singing gave pleasure in its kind. Her voice is light, cool and clear. A little forcing of it and it would turn hard, but almost always Mme. Rappold avoided that peril. The clear quality of her tones served much of Agretta's familiar air from "Der Freischütz" agreeably. The brightness of them sorted well with Mozart's "Veilchen," but the ardor of the close of Agatha's air and the passion of Strauss's song of "All Souls" are not for its coolness. Like Mr. Fiedler's reading of the symphony, the pleasure of Mme. Rappold's singing was a tempered pleasure. And the charm of Grétry's dances as Motte has rescored them was a measurable charm. Of course, Grétry's instrumentation was too light and, as some will say in these days, too routine for a modern concert-room and for the endlessly tempting resources of a modern orchestra. Wisely then did Motte rescore and enrich them. Granted; but the instrumentation that Grétry, then, pale, amateurish even as it might sound, was the instrumentation, after all, that may best impart the spirit of these eighteenth-century dramas. They have an archaic mood, an archaic charm, a suggestion that is of themselves and no other music.

Last spring when Mr. Messager revived Rameau's "Hippolytus and Aricia" at the Opéra in Paris, he avoided so far as he might under the new conditions of performance this amplification and enrichment of the dances that sprinkle the piece. So treated they kept their stately yet flowing line, their formal grace of rhythm, their air of triumph in brocade and swans in perinigs. Grétry enriched and amplified by Mottl and played by a relatively large orchestra, tuned around him heavy and thick even in spite of the lightness of the tambourine and the idealized jig that make two of the dances. In the minuet, where Mottl's amplifications are fewer, Mr. Fiedler with sensitive imagination and insight came to the rescue, and at the part at which he took the music it regained the sober charm of line and rhythm, the cool elegance that are of the very nature of the dance itself and of the courtly nymphs whom Grétry would have rustling through it. So to the end the concert ran in this cool justice of performance, and Mr. Fiedler's reading of Beethoven's overture to "Egmont" was neither less nor more than the composer and the musical speaking unaided for themselves. They are quite capable of it, in spite of the dramatizing mood in which most conductors approved the overture, and in the dramatized fashion in which audiences have come to like it. Evidently Mr. Fiedler has his days of impersonal justice as well as those of highly personal excitement.

H. T. P.

At the Symphony Concerts of next week, Mr. Hess will revive Bruch's third concerto for violin, unheard in Boston for sixteen years and neglected everywhere in comparison with the other two that have been played to stale repetition. Though it is one of the pieces of Bruch's later years, Mr. Hess has warm faith in it. Age after all could not much dim Bruch's instinctive feeling for the qualities of the violin.

After offending hats, offending hair, and a correspondent has discovered that the coiffures of the hour may be as obstructive in the concert room or the theatre as is the millinery of the moment. She writes amusingly: "I sat behind two 1908 coiffures at the theatre last night, and all that I saw of the stage was an occasional glimpse when one of these veered a bit. Each was built on a 'roll' which protruded eight inches on either side, and on this rose puff on puff, until the result was larger than any theatre bonnet. Now, I am not a weak-minded member of the strong sex, nor yet a strong-minded member of the weak one, but simply a young woman content to wear my own hair sans additions of any kind, but while I am getting no end of fun out of the weird things that my sisters are doing with their hair, I do think that the kindest way would be to check all this superfluous hair and to have each check-room supplied with a corps of expert hair-restorers to facilitate a quick exit."

For the first time this season, Mr. Craig will be out of the bill next week at the Castle Square, and the part of Brown, the glorious, in "Brown of Harvard" will fall to Mr. Meek. It will be interesting to see whether the public of the "stock theatres" likes the play better than did that of the "down-town theatres" a year and a half ago, when the piece was first tried here.

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT IS GIVEN

'Pathetic' Symphony in Commemoration of Tschalkowsky's Death.

OLD BALLET MUSIC
IN MODERN GUISE

Mme. Rappold Sings in Boston for the First Time.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, gave its fifth concert last night in Symphony Hall. Mrs. Marie Rappold of the Metropolitan Opera House, soprano, was the soloist. The programme was as follows:

'Pathetic' Symphony.....Tschalkowsky
Scene and aria from "Der Frieschuetz" Weber
Three dance pieces from "Cephalus and Procris"; Tambourin; Minuet, Gigue
Songs with piano: Strauss' "Allerseelen"; Mozart's "Das Veilchen"; Grieg's "Ein Traubel."

Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven
Tschalkowsky died 15 years ago this month (Nov. 6) and Mr. Fiedler conducted the "Pathetic" Symphony in memory of him. When this symphony was first performed at St. Petersburg about a week before its composer died, it made little impression on the audience and the critics were cool. Before this performance, Tschalkowsky expressed himself as sure of the first three movements but he was doubtful about the finale and thought he might write a different one. After the performance, and when his brother had given the title "Pathetic" to the work hitherto known only as "No. 6," Peter wrote: "This symphony met with a singular fate. It has not exactly failed, but it has incited surprise. As for me, I am prouder of it than any other of my works." Tschalkowsky was ever alternately dejected and enthusiastic over his important compositions.

The history of this symphony is familiar to all. It made a sensation in city after city. Whenever it was announced for performance the hall was crowded. Its popularity was ominous to its life. It became a battle horse for virtuoso conductors. Rhapsodic critics, who heard in the symphony an excuse for a memorable article, quoted from "Adonais" and wrote prettily about death, the grave, and the tragedy of annihilation. Yet there were doubters in those perverted days.

Some had the courage to say that Tschalkowsky's fourth symphony is a more individual, original work and that the fifth is a superior composition in structure and in aesthetic contents. One man in Boston had the audacity to declare that much of the "Pathetic" was to him "obscene." He did not mean by this that the Watch and Ward Society should interfere with proposed performances; he used the word in the now somewhat archaic sense "offensive to taste or refinement, disgusting, abominable." He had no thought of likening the symphony to John Cleland's masterpiece or to pictures sold under the cloak; but indignant letters against him filled columns of space in the evening journal of which he was an ornament, and for a time he considered the advisability of taking his outdoor exercise after sundown.

The years have passed, and neither admiration nor dislike is so hysterical. The symphony remains, though Paris has never accepted it. It will undoubtedly live as long as the younger generation that first heard it—much longer, probably—for if it has the hysteria and the hopelessness that characterized the period in which it was conceived, it also contains much that will appeal irresistibly to human beings of periods to come, so great is its virility, so appealing is its tenderness, so overpowering is its barbaric rhythms and colors, so eloquent is its summing up the life and the end of man.

Mr. Fiedler's reading of the symphony was interesting even when open to discussion, and as a whole it was unusually effective. The chief objection that might be made to it was the deliberation in preparing the entrance of the song theme in the allegro of the first movement and the slow pace of the first section of this theme. In the slow introduction Tschalkowsky's adagio was for once a true adagio and the music gained thereby in impressiveness. It was also evident that the conception of this whole first movement had been most carefully thought out. The slowness of pace allowed free speech to inner voices; passages in imitation were clearer; the music as a whole was both nobler and more dramatic. The interpretation of the second and third movements was admirable.

In the trio of the second movement the monotony of the drum was not unduly accented, and the nerves of the hearer were thereby the more keenly fretted. The final lamentation was read and played superbly. This adagio is hurried as a rule, and the mighty lament that should gain steadily in weight of woe then becomes merely a scream. I repeat, the performance was on the whole singularly dramatic, noble and impressive.

Dance tunes from an old opera by Grétry—a heroic ballet was the description of "Cephalus and Procris" when all sorts of titles were given to the form of entertainment we now call opera—have been arranged, elaborated, especially the gigue, and orchestrated to please modern ears by the ingenious Felix Mottl. It might be a pleasure to hear the naive tunes, as they were originally scored, played in a small hall by a little band, and not only for the pleasant associations with the stage women of too joyous and wildly extravagant life and with the great and arrogant Vestris, who danced to these airs. And yet, thus played, the dances might sound thin and vapid, for we are not men and women of the 18th century. Mr. Mottl's arrangement and improvements are discreet and musical. The menuet is particularly charming, and it displayed the art of Messrs. Longy and A. Maquarrie. The three little pieces, played here for the first time, gave much pleasure.

The scene and aria from "Der Frieschuetz" present serious difficulties to capable singers, either in opera house or concert hall. There are problems in phrasing that are not easily solved, if both text and melodic flow are to be respected; there are phrases that demand the utmost attention to the taking and the maintaining of breath; and many passages of the jubilant allegro are instrumental, rather than vocal, essentially un-vocal, as awkward for a voice as are famously clumsy phrases in Tannhaeuser's boisterous song to Venus. It might also be said that the scene from Weber's opera is of little interest only in the theatre, were it not that the prayer of Agathe is dear to many by reason of its adaptation for choir and congregational use.

Mme. Fremstad was the last to sing this extract from "Der Frieschuetz" at a Symphony concert, and she made a sad mess of it, for the simple reason that the music is on the whole above her effective range; but Mme. Fremstad, as Miss Edith Walker, not content with her rare natural gifts, would fain be a soprano.

Mrs. Rappold, who sang here for the first time, made a favorable impression by her singing of this music, and this impression was strengthened by her interpretation of the songs. Her voice is a pure and agreeable soprano, and she uses it for the most part skilfully. Her intonation was good, she did not force tone, and although now and then an upper tone was not so full as it might have been, the voice was effective, both lyrically and dramatically. In the songs Mrs. Rappold occasionally accented in succession first beats of measures without reference to the true rhetorical emphasis. She should guard herself against this, for it easily becomes a habit which is pernicious and distressing.

Mr. Fiedler's Second Concert in New York Wins Ampler Approval from the Reviewers—Mr. Klein's New Play Here

It must be confessed that Mr. Fiedler displayed a more amiable side of his art than he did at the first concert. He put plenty of fancy and vivid detail into Rimsky-Korsakoff's picturesque narrative piece of music, "Scheherazade." Mr. MacDowell's symphonic poem he played with earnestness and conviction, and the orchestra's performance of it clearly did full justice to the work. His reading of Schumann's fourth symphony, a work still vital with romance, poetry and robust energy, notwithstanding its much-discussed defects, had many good points, especially as to its robustness and firm accent. [The Times.]

MacDowell's tone-poem was played excellently with a clarity and a balance of tone and phrase which Mr. Fiedler's reading of the Brahms symphony on Thursday night did not promise. It would be a pleasure to say as much for the performance of the beautiful Schumann symphony. It was marred by sentimentality in the conception and the execution. To sigh like a furnace over every tender bit of cantilena is not great art any more than is thundering every forte at the top of the bellows. But this latter we were spared yesterday. Mr. Fiedler came much nearer to the measure of the acoustics of the hall and there was less noise and more sonority in the orchestral tone. [The Sun.]

There was much virility in the greater part of Mr. Fiedler's reading of the symphony, but at times it descended to almost lackadaisical sentimentality without really feminine grace. The concert opened with Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade," which was once one of the orchestra's show pieces, but is not now. [The Tribune.]

Mr. Fiedler in Philadelphia

"In For a Lively Season"—The result was the liveliest reading of a Boston Symphony programme heard since Paur gave up the baton, and it is clear we are in for a very lively season with the Boston Orchestra, a liveliness almost physical, truly strenuous and in so far quite up-to-date; prestos will gallop and fortes will thunder and the conductor will make it all clear to the most casual that it is hard work and an exciting occasion, so there you are! [The Press.]

"Music Impersonate"—But Fiedler here is triumphant, regnant, music mad, but the madness of genius. This man is music impersonate. He holds his wonderful orchestra in the hollow of his hand, obedient to his will, harmonic, grand, easily all-conquering. Without a score, this wonderful man injects his masterful personality into every phase of the writer's expression and emotion. His conducting is as near perfection as the mind can conceive. [The Record.]

The Metronome Smashed—The veterans of the orchestra seemed transformed and revived, and followed the conductor's lightest movement as eagerly and intently as in the far-off days of Henschel. There was unusual dramatic fervor in the "Leonore" music, and vigor and authority in Wagner's passionate and sonorous strains. It seemed like a different and a greater band—so completely has the human metronome tradition been abolished in the few weeks of Fiedler's ascendancy. [The North American.]

MR. FIEDLER AND THE "PATHETIC" SYMPHONY

His Interesting Reading of Tschalkovsky's Music—Wherein It Differed from Preceding Versions—Miss Farrar's Gift to the Boston Opera School—A New Piece for Organ and Orchestra by Mr. Chadwick—Mme. Sembrich to Retire from Opera in February—The Trifles of the Day

Trans. Nov. 16, 1906
Mr. Fiedler's conducting of Tschalkovsky's "Pathetic" symphony, repeated and to warm applause at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening, is the most interesting incident, thus far, of his work here. Whether the listener agreed or not with the conductor's version of the music, it stirred to stimulating reflection, and it invited to debate. On the page of the programme book that lists formally the music of the concert, Mr. Fiedler inserted under Tschalkovsky's name: "Died Nov. 6, 1893." By this he would signify that had he and the orchestra been in Boston a week ago he would have accounted the performance of the "Pathetic" symphony a commemoration of Tschalkovsky's death. As it was, the date was also a reminder that the composer has been dead for fifteen years. The "Pathetic" symphony had been played for the first time only a few days before cholera seized him. In the succeeding winter and spring when it was going the round of orchestral concerts in Europe and in America, it was impossible not to associate the music with the composer himself and with his death. It is quite true that Tschalkovsky had no foreboding that death was near; that, indeed, he was eager to go forward with other work that he had in hand. Nevertheless the character of the music and the circumstances under which it came first to performance alike fostered the belief that it was intensely subjective and intensely individual music. "The programme is wholly subjective," Tschalkovsky himself wrote to his friend, Davidoff, "and often composing it in my mind, I have wept bitterly . . . and worked passionately." The more reason, then, seemingly, to take the symphony as a distinctly personal utterance. MORE

In this wise, the conductors who first undertook the "Pathetic" symphony in America—Mr. Paur and Mr. Damrosch for example—generally construed it, and in later years Mr. Safonoff and Dr. Muck were like-minded with them. As they read the music, a personal and poignant despair filled the final movement, for example, and they sought by every means to heighten this note of wrenching poignancy. In the preceding movement of the march were all the fire and fury of a Slav temperament, unleashing itself and trying by sheer vehemence to escape from all that oppressed it. At the beginning of the symphony they kept the music restless, neurotic—now frenetic in outburst, now recolling into its depressed and weary song. They cast the second movement in the vein of melancholy and haunting disillusion, and to them the dull, iterated drum beat was the symbol of its mood. They treated much of the symphony as hysterical music as a personal cry, as Tschalkovsky outpouring in a kind of nervous fury certain moods of his own heart, certain emotions of his own temperament. Few thought of the music as a kind of epic of despair.

Mr. Fiedler, in his turn, seemed to lean to such an epic and impersonal notion of the music. Tschalkovsky has departed the world these fifteen years, his date on the programme seemed to say; we that play and hear the symphony now may no longer associate it closely with him; may we not plausibly seek to give the music a wider aspect and a more impersonal emotion? Proceeding in this fashion, he laid comparatively little stress upon the poignancy of the music of the finale. He restrained its piercing cries and sought to make it a large utterance of a mighty and encompassing despair that might settle down upon the hearts of men universally, impersonally. He goaded the march to no barbaric rage, to no hysterical advance and recession. He kept the second movement contemplative, elegiac rather than utterly weary and disillusioned. Above all he made the first movement no music of worn and tortured nerves, alternately frenzied and brooding; but he lifted it to what often sounded as a sombre and noble song of sorrow and of struggle. He made it grave music, lofty music. Heretofore we have had the "Pathetic" symphony, personal and nervous. Mr. Fiedler turned it epic and almost austere. H. T. P.

Fiedler's Tschalkovsky

A New Reading of the "Symphonie Pathétique"—Rappold Soloist at Fifth Symphony Concert

Tschalkovsky's "Symphonie Pathétique" was the nub of the programme of the fifth rehearsal and concert this season of the Symphony Orchestra. Mme. Marie Rappold, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, appeared for the first time at these concerts. She sang Agathe's famous recitative, "Laise, laise," and aria from Weber's "Der Freischütz," and these songs with piano, Mr. Fiedler accompanying: "Allerseelen," Richard Strauss; "Das Veilchen," Mozart; "Ein Traum," Grieg. Three dances from a "Heroic Ballet," "Cephale et Procris," by Gretry, which are freely—too freely—orchestrated and rearranged for concert use by Felix Mottl, were given for the first time in Boston. Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont" brought the concert to an end.

It is not strange that Tschalkovsky's supremely expressive and epoch-marking symphony should prove an irresistible temptation to Mr. Fiedler. It is a superb vehicle, the possibilities of which must make a strong appeal to every conductor of individual and modern tendencies, and Mr. Fiedler is surely that. Moreover, and in spite of the fact that the doleful predictions heard on many sides when the symphony came into prominence in America some 15 years ago, the public does not tire of the work, often as it has been given. Those who attended yesterday were not disappointed in their expectations. If the music was not interpreted strictly "according to Hoyle," it bore an individual and engrossing reading, and its essential spirit was grasped in a striking manner.

This work is so rich in harmonic color and wonderful details of craftsmanship that each conductor, taking it up in turn, seems to discover fresh strokes of genius which his predecessor had passed by. Mr. Fiedler showed us all that we already knew, and more than he had himself discovered. He examines his scores with a microscopic eye, and there was not a nuance that escaped him yesterday. He was inclined to be too microscopic. The allegro of the first movement was taken at a far slower tempo than the composer doubtless intended, nor did emotion immediately reach the boiling point, as it usually does under most batons. If Tschalkovsky would go off at half-cock, so would not Mr. Fiedler. He moved gradually up the emotional scale with a force of repressed passion and excitement that gripped the hearer and carried all before it when the crisis arrived. The conductor took each passage at the particular tempo that he conceived essential. He orated with temperamental freedom and abandon, but always the end, and the effective proportions of what came before the end, were kept in view.

The second movement was remarkable, and commendably so, for artistic reticence. That is to say, the leader relied on the music itself, on its inherent suggestion, for the deep impression that he wished to produce. That strange, three-legged waltz moved more lightly, more as a will-o'-the-wisp, but not less poignantly than heretofore. Always the still small voice of arch-tragedy was to be felt. Strange murmurs and hapless evolutions of the dance! The awesome drum beat in the trio did not strike the ears with brutal emphasis. It was not worn upon the sleeve, that all the world might wonder. But it was always there, terribly insistent, inescapable.

Never in our experience has a conductor so caught the colossal irony of the march movement. Here the sarcasm of utter despair is voiced with a superhuman energy such as only a weak soul ought to say could summon for a frightful moment. This scherzo is to me an ecstasy of moral terror. In other pages of this — music one looks into bottomless abysses of sorrow; here we shudder. The brutality that Mr. Fiedler has before manifested in his methods of tone production was not entirely out of place then. The sounds—the mock triumph—should rasp and hurt.

The finale was nobly impassioned. It is an atonement for the rest of the symphony, the ineffable woe of this funeral music, the sublime grief of the seer, for such does Tschaiakowsky, the morbidly personal composer, become in his transcendental expression. The grave of humanity, and all that is. Alas for our joys and sorrows; what are they? There is nothing; nor flesh, nor dust.

Mme. Rappold sang. She is an American, but her singing, especially in the operatic excerpt, was of the inferior German brand. At the public rehearsal—we are speaking of Friday afternoon—she was struggling for breath, chopping the phrases, which in many passages are singularly unsingable. It is very possible that conditions were better at the concert yesterday evening, but it appeared that the singer was by no means certain of herself in many technical respects, leaving entirely out of the question her emotional capabilities, had she been more at ease as an executant. A dramatic soprano can sweep an audience away with her by the singing of this music, but she must have temperament and personality in abundance to do so. Mme. Rappold was heard to better advantage in her group of songs, though she has not the subtlety or the spirituality—did not at least have them on this occasion, requisite to reveal the innerness of Strauss' great song. She was at her best in Mozart's beautiful little lyric, though it was apparently not easy for her to compass the characteristic lightness of style.

Gretry's "Cephale et Procris," heroic ballet in three acts, words by Jean Francois Marmontel (1723-99), was performed for the first time at Versailles before Louis XV. Dec. 30, 1773, at the wedding festivities of Charles Philippe of France, Count of Artois, who married the Princess Marie Theresa of Savoy the same year, says the programme book. Three dances from this ballet have been freely—and ruthlessly—arranged for concert use by Mottl, the great conductor. In spite of their distastefully swollen garb, the fragrance of the lovely melodies and the brisk rhythmic figures won the heart. The menuet is of heavenly exquisiteness! Mottl's instrumentation is exceedingly ingenious, but too brilliant and, in places, heavy. Surely, in Gretry's days an orchestra of half the size of ours would have been an immense body of instruments. Mottl's version is over-sophisticated. There is the sense of an ostentatious display piece for orchestra.

The concluding performance of the Beethoven overture was strong, dramatic, and too robustious.

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME IS VARIED THIS WEEK

MUSIC BOTH OF TRIUMPH AND OF LAMENTATION

Tschaiakowsky's Pathetic Symphony, the "Freischuetz" Prayer, Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture.

By Louis C. Elson.
PROGRAMME.

Tschaiakowsky....."Pathetic" Symphony
Weber.....Prayer Scene from "Der Freischuetz"
Soloist, Mme. Marie Rappold.
Gretry...Three dance pieces. From Heroic Ballet
Three songs with Piano accompaniment.
Mme. Rappold.
Beethoven....."Egmont" Overture

This time the programme was varied enough to show our conductor in every vein of expression. There was the lamentation of the "Pathetic Symphony," and also the heroic, military mood, and the grace of its most peculiar Scherzo; the romance of Weber; the light daintiness of Gretry; and finally the frenzied triumph of Beethoven. It means much to say that Mr. Fiedler caught the different styles with good artistic spirit, although he tends more naturally to the heroic side than to the delicate and dainty.

The "Pathetic" symphony holds its own very well. There are some classicists who worry because it departs from classical form, but this departure was rendered necessary by the whole scheme of the work. Some find fault because it does not reach the lofty dignity of grief that is voiced by Strauss in his "Death and Transfiguration," forgetting that this would have been an expression entirely foreign to the nature of the Russian, who is intense and frenzied in his emotional speech. The fact remains, after all the criticisms have been said, that it is a sincere work, and that it is a great contribution to the science of modern orchestration as well.

The second movement has never been equalled in its peculiar 5-4 rhythm. It is true that this is really an alternation of 3-4 and 2-4, but almost all so-called 5-4 rhythms are that. The character of this rhythm is unrest, and it is graphically used here to express anxiety, or at least lack of ease, even in the midst of brightness. There never yet has been a tranquilly joyous or serenely happy movement in 5-4 rhythm. Mr. Fiedler read this movement with commendable surety. One might have asked a trifle more of prominence in the persistent rhythm of the kettle-drum, but the rest of the interpretation was "sans reproche."

The third movement with its struggle between military glamour and sorrow is still a noble interpretation of the line:—

"The paths of glory lead but to the grave."

Here we liked Paur's great reading better than the conception given.

The climax was somewhat labored. The march-theme reminds us strongly of a theme which Tschaiakowsky used in his second symphony.

The finale leads to the gates of the tomb. Not with "Oh Death, where is thy sting? Where grave, thy victory?" which one can find in the Strauss tone-poem, but a more physical cessation of strife.—Rest.

Just as the emotions are extreme, in this work, so the scoring goes to the edge of the precipice. One would find it difficult to match the power with which the woodwind is here used, but if any conductor can bring out the final "p," "pp," "ppp," "pppp," and "ppppp" of the trombones and tuba of the last movement, he deserves a laurel wreath; it is as much an exaggeration of scoring as the work sometimes is of emotion.

We found Mr. Fiedler at his best in this movement. His reading differed essentially from those of Mr. Gericke and Dr. Muck and (the greatest of all) the noble interpretation of Emil Paur. Yet it was strong and lofty. We must become used to some of its points, however. That the conductor is "speaking with authority" is quite evident, and again he directed without a score, showing a complete memorization of the composition.

The Gretry dances, as modernized by Mottl, were a charming translation of ancient daintiness and grace into 20th century musical speech. The Gigue (and let us never forget that this is the blood relation of the Irish Jig) had all the rollick and insouciance of the most popular of all the folk-dances. If any of our readers want to see how gracefully Gretry could treat this dance let them look up "Colinette a la Cour," which unites French elegance with Irish heartiness. We wish that Mottl could some day instrumentate this.

The piccolo had its work to do, not only in the Egmont overture, but in two of these dances (Tambourin and Gigue) and the flute must also be praised for its excellence in the Trio of the Minuet.

Mr. Fiedler wisely took this Minuet in the true dance tempo; not in the "Tempo di Minuetto," which is quicker, but with a stateliness approaching the style of a Sarabande. Many conductors do not understand (even Rubinstein did not) the difference between the Minuet as a dance and as a symphonic movement. The dances were very daintily given, with charming delicacy, although, as above said, we consider Mr. Fiedler a heroic conductor by nature.

The "Egmont" overture will never grow old. Study it, you modern musical law-breakers and garrulous tonal neurotics! It is very short; you would have made it four times as long and called it a "Symphonic Rhapsody"; yet it tells the entire story. Its Coda-stretto is as triumphant (with a couple of trumpets and a piccolo) as you could have made it with 16 Kettle-drums and a wind-machine. "Freedom shrieked, when Kosciusko fell" (possibly he fell upon her corns) and here also the piccolo yells with triumph when Egmont's death arouses the phlegmatic Netherlanders.

But some points of the work were considered rather radical in their own day. The first violinists, for example, were almost in revolt at being sent into such a high position (four-lined C) and thought their ascending passages almost impossible. Our orchestra finds not the slightest difficulty with the passages today. The entire work was played with a full conception of its meaning. The tender love passages, the gloom of the catastrophe, the final whirlwind of triumph, were each brought out powerfully and in strong contrast with each other, and Mr. Fiedler did not give the first part with that tiresome slowness that some conductors invest it with. It was never mawkish or effeminate.

The singer, Mme. Rappold, took the place of Miss Gerville-Reache, who was announced on the last programme, but who seemed to be out of reach. Mme. Rappold was spasmodic rather than very dramatic, but grew in excellence as she went on, until she gave a very creditable performance of Grieg's "Dream." Her group of songs was accompanied by Mr. Fiedler, who showed himself an excellent accompanist, especially in Strauss' "All Souls Day." He abnegated his part to the singer as the great accompanist should always do.

A word of praise should also be spoken of "Das Veilchen" which Mme. Rappold sang with intelligence and archness. But the "Prayer Scene" from "Freischuetz" was not on this high level and betrayed some effort.

We may be permitted to make a final, quite serious, allusion to the "hat war" which has raged at these concerts this season. A New York paper recently saw fit to place the responsibility for the agitation upon the shoulders of Mr. Fiedler, and sneeringly asked if he deemed it absolutely necessary that he should be seen by all the auditors. Our new conductor is such an honest and modest nature that such a gibe may rankle. It may be emphatically stated therefore, that Mr. Fiedler had nothing whatever to do with the new rule of the concerts. The inception of the movement came from suffering auditors. But, after all, it is quite natural that in a Symphony Concert one should object to music being given "A Cappello!"

FIEDLER PROVES WORTH AS LEADER

"Pathetic" Symphony of Tschaikowsky on Saturday Night Impressive.

CONDUCTOR CARRIES
SCORE IN HIS HEAD

Performance a Thing of Beauty
That Deserves to Be Heard.
Over and Over.

Journal — Nov. 16, 1908
Max Fiedler proved his worth when he conducted Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony Saturday night. The Symphony Orchestra has done nothing more impressive in recent years. It was evident from the first that Mr. Fiedler had prepared himself thoroughly for the test. He carried the score in his head; his desk was lowered, and so he suffered from no distractions and gave himself up entirely to the matter of interpretation. Whether he met every demand of captious criticism is unlikely; no man has ever pleased everybody. But no one can deny that the performance of the symphony was a thing of beauty that deserved to be heard, if not forever, at least over and over again.

Style Was Graphic.

Mr. Fiedler's style was never more graphic. It was full of expressive motion, like the art of the pantomimist, now gently leading forth a captivating song and again urging up, with shaking fist, some barbaric blare of trumpets. Now and then, when his baton had given the necessary impetus, he subsided for a measure or two; but for the most part he gave himself over, heart, soul and body, to his impressive, if not absolutely inspired, interpretation of the Russian masterpiece. The question of inspiration is always dear to the partisans. But who can say that Mr. Fiedler's understanding of Tschaikowsky is not as clear and sympathetic as was that of his predecessors? Perhaps comparisons are inevitable in connection with the "Pathetic" symphony; but in this case the performance of Saturday night does not suffer. It will be remembered as a masterly exhibition of both directing and playing; an effort in every way worthy of one of the most affecting musical productions of modern times. Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra well merited the hearty and prolonged applause.

Mme. Rappold, Soloist.

The soloist of the evening, Mme. Marie Rappold, one of the sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera House, made a very pleasing impression. She sang the "Softly sighing" aria from Weber's "Der Freischuetz" with excellent skill and taste. Later she sang songs by Mozart, Grieg and Richard Strauss, Mr. Fiedler accompanying her on the piano. The novelty consisted of three short dance pieces from an old French ballet, "Cephalus and Procris," by Grétry, a work brought out about the time of the famous Boston Tea Party. However, the 135-year-old novelty was enjoyed; age had not damaged its lively spirit and pretty style. The concert closed with the playing of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Fifth of the Season's
Symphony Concerts.

Calve Here Next Tuesday—A Hess-Schroeder Quartet.

Recitals of the Week—
Current Gossip.

Globe — Nov. 15, 1908
The fifth Symphony program opened with Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony; there were three little dance pieces by Grétry, excerpts from his ballet, "Cephalus and Procris"; Beethoven's "Egmont" overture closed the numbers, and Mme Marie Rappold of the Metropolitan opera forces provided the vocal selections. The wonderful symphony of the Russian composer rather overshadowed the remainder of the program, for the grandeur of the massive work seemingly cast a spell over the audience, the impressive performance being of such a nature as to warrant fulsome praise for Mr Fiedler and his men.

Of course, the second part, with the interrupted dance music, still is foremost in pleasing the average auditor, and very beautifully were these phrases voiced by the different choirs. The muted violins might have been one instrument, so harmonious were the melodious rhythms played. Of the other parts it is hardly necessary to speak. The march movement was perfect in its precision, and in the pathetic finale Mr Fiedler brought forth adequate expressions of the mysterious emotional suggestions of the composer.

Possibly Mr Fiedler worked up the musical background a little too vigorously at times, and obscured the lighter strings, but if he did that was probably his intent, and he accomplished his purpose. Mr Fiedler conducted without a score.

Mme Rappold made an excellent impression, vocally and personally, for she has a sweet voice, which she uses very well, and she is an attractive woman. In the excerpt from "Der Freischuetz," aside from a lack in dramatic expression, she displayed good vocal power and sang with commendable fluency and purity of tone. She phrases well and her voice is of excellent quality throughout the entire register. In songs by Strauss, Mozart and Grieg she gave the contrasting sentiments with good effect to the piano accompaniments of conductor Fiedler.

The three dances arranged by Felix Mottl from Grétry's ballet were played here for the first time. They are pretty little pieces, the menuetto being the daintiest of the group, and very prettily were they played. While the ladies were donning and readjusting their hats the orchestra performed in a vivid manner Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. Mr Fiedler's climax was vigorous enough to suit any one and the whole work was given a spirited interpretation.

Concert master Willy Hess will be the soloist this week, playing Bruch's D minor concerto for violin. The symphony will be Beethoven's seventh. The first two numbers, novelties by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius, are short pieces, the first entitled "Varsang" and the second "Finlandia."

Here in Boston

Mr. Fiedler has completed the orchestral part of the programme for the Symphony Concerts of Nov. 13 and 14, and it comprises Tschaikowski's "Pathetic" symphony—music that in many respects suits Mr. Fiedler's forthright temperament and style; Beethoven's overture, "Egmont," and three dances, rescored by Mottl, from "Cephalus et Procris," an "Heroic Ballet" by Grétry, originally performed at the Opéra in Paris in 1775. With these pieces, Mr. Fiedler is beginning a comparative innovation at which he hinted a month ago upon his arrival in Boston. In the whole course of the Symphony Concerts very little ballet music has stood on the programmes, and in recent years almost none at all. In Mr. Fiedler's just view it deserves a larger place. Ballet music is indeed light music; but it may have qualities of true artistry, and give a true pleasure that are peculiarly its own. Of course, it is a minor form of music, but there should be room for both the minor and the major in concerts, as many and as wide-ranging as those of the Symphony Orchestra. Ballet music has tempted the imagination and the skill of many eminent composers; it sometimes discloses new qualities in them, or sets others in clearer light. It is almost sure to give pleasure to those that hear, and to accomplish all these ends the better when it is played in concert, without the diverting and sometimes clouding physical presence of the dancers themselves, and without the material background of paint and canvas. Many a composer of the eighteenth century, especially in France, cultivated the music of the ballet with singular feeling and aptitude. The Russians, in our own time, working with larger means to larger ends, have gained no less felicity. Mr. Fiedler is beginning with classic French dances of the eighteenth century, and by Grétry, who wrote them with animated ease and adroit rhythmic charm. Later in the winter, examples of the ballet music of the Russians will follow.

MR. FIEDLER IN NEW YORK

WIDELY VARYING COMMENT BY THE REVIEWERS

His First Appearance with the Symphony Orchestra Last Night—The Audience Receives Him Warmly—Mr. Henderson's
Analysis of His Conducting—Mr. Finck's
Praise, and Mr. De Koven's Objections—
The Comments of Other Reviewers

Trans. — Nov. 6, 1908
Mr. Fiedler made his first appearance in New York last night as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Four years ago, the public of orchestral concerts there heard him as one of the passing conductors of the Philharmonic Society when "star" was succeeding "star" upon its rostrum. Now Mr. Fiedler returned with an orchestra that is to be his own for at least a year, and that he has had time to train to the fulness of his will, ways and purpose. The audience, as usual, nearly filled Carnegie Hall. It received Mr. Fiedler warmly. A wreath went up to him after the first number of the programme—Beethoven's third "Leonora" overture. At the end of the other pieces—Brahms's symphony in C minor, the orchestral fragment from Strauss's "Feuersnot," and the overture to "Tannhäuser"—the applause was general and hearty. Evidently Mr. Fiedler pleased his audience. He pleased some of the reviewers much less; and here follow various excerpts from the New York newspapers of today. They are interesting to read here in Boston, though they are not always pleasant to those that have the quality and the standards of our Symphony Concerts warmly at heart.

Says Mr. Henderson in the Sun: "Mr. Fiedler is a strenuous conductor. He pushes his orchestra to the full limit of its tonal power. Last night the strings played much less transparently than lovers of sunlit instrumentation could wish, and there were frequent evidences of overblowing in the wind. The pressure on some of the middle voices was such as to bring out the worst features of the opaqueness of Brahms's instrumentation, while the general quality of the tone of the orchestra was less refined and more blatant than Boston Symphony audiences are accustomed to hear.

Excess in most of the emphases was one of the most regrettable traits of last night's performance. The lowest range of dynamics was a moderate piano. The supreme form of the Italian adjective seemed not to be to the conductor's liking, except when applied to the term forte. Clarity, elegance, delicacy, refinement and polish of detail were too often sacrificed to power, vigor and the all too startling explosion of kettle-drums. Even in the muted opening of the Staruss excerpt there was an overabundance of tone. The anxiety to impress certain subsidiary phrases on the attention of the audience often led to a disturbance of artistic balance.

Yet it must not be supposed that there were no merits in this conducting. It had a certain rude strength and an air of academic study. There were moments, too, when the conductor found precisely the right standard of tonal equilibrium. The most exquisite of these moments was after the noble horn theme in the plu andante of the last movement of the symphony, at its ninth measure, when the flute enters. This is one of the most luminous bits of orchestration in all Brahms, perhaps indeed in all music, and it was played last night to perfection. But unfortunately this was one of the few bits to command unqualified praise. The performance of the last movement as a whole was not one to arouse the enthusiasm of the general music-lover or to call for gratitude from the special lover of Brahms.

The orchestra will play again tomorrow afternoon. Perhaps Mr. Fiedler will then have taken a better measure of the acoustics of Carnegie Hall and will produce more agreeable tonal results. His energy and enthusiasm are undeniable, and so, too, is the accuracy of his memory, for he conducted the entire concert without the use of scores. But this is a prima donna feat of contemporaneous conductors, which offers quite as much to condemn as to commend.

Mr. Finck, on the other hand, writes in the Evening Post: Mr. Fiedler has to please not only the Boston public; he has to parade his players in several other cities, including New York, where the presence of great conductors gives opportunity for odious comparisons. Last evening at Carnegie Hall, he dared the test and came out victorious. In the audience were doubtless not a few who had been impressed favorably by the way he conducted at one of our Philharmonic concerts three years ago. Possibly the verdict then passed on him by the audience and the press alike, had something to do with his being invited to succeed Mr. Muck. At any rate, here he is, and no one has reason to be sorry therefor.

It cannot be said that the programme he had last night was specially adapted to displaying his best qualities. It has been pointed out that, unlike Dr. Muck, Mr. Fiedler has always been an orchestral conductor, and not an operatic leader transferred to the concert stage. That has its advantages but also its disadvantages. These latter were manifested in the third "Leonora" overture. This piece is, as Wagner remarked, really a complete music-drama in itself, a work of deep emotional import. This dramatic quality was not fully revealed last night; the climax at the end, where Beethoven for once uses the double fortissimo, did not have the thrill to which Seidl and Mottl and Mahler have accustomed us. In the "Tannhäuser" overture, on the other hand, which closed the concert, the final climax was effectively achieved; and be it said that like Safonoff and all other first-class conductors, Mr. Fiedler benefited by Nikisch's happy thought of bringing out the middle brass parts.

The love scene from Strauss's opera, "Feuersnot," gave the conductor an opportunity to display his players revelling in the ultra-violet colors of modern orchestration. As for the first Brahms symphony, which had the place of honor, it was quite impossible, of course, for Mr. Fiedler to mitigate the deadly dullness of the first and second movements. With the pretty theme of the allegretto grazioso, however, the interest was revived, and in the last movement, where Brahms does wonders with a theme borrowed from Beethoven, the orchestra and its conductor rose to a triumphant height of inspired interpretation, which aroused great enthusiasm.

Here, from the World, are the impressions of Mr. de Koven: Mr. Fiedler has body and brawn and bones, and conducts with energy, spirit, exactness and the authority of the man who knows what he wants. Unfortunately his artistic aims and perceptions do not lead him far, and for me he has already taken from the orchestra that wonderful balance and clarity of tone, that marvelously varied color, that individuality, finesse and distinction which have made the organization up to now unique and entirely sui generis.

Mr. Fiedler has brain, but little heart, and his readings, while lucid, lack grace, delicacy and poetic feeling. He is an impressionist in contrast, and his climaxes are heavy and overdone, with brasses blaring almost unrestrainedly. Thus his effects are over-emphatic and too much dwelt and insisted on, while the whole scheme of effect is too much on the same plane, and therefore lacking in variety of tonal color and individual effects. The "Leonore No. 3" overture was correct and fairly classic in form, but sounded unimaginative, uninspired and devoid of romantic feeling, and as an artistic reading did not compare with that of Pohlig, lately heard, although better balanced from a constructive standpoint. I have never heard the Brahms first symphony sound so arid, dull and monotonous, or the wonderfully pictorial and atmospheric finale go for so little. A highly colored "Love Scene" from Richard Strauss's one-act opera "Feuersnot" was effective in a rather coarse and truculent way which made the audience gasp as it were, and though the blare and bluster of a reading of the "Tannhäuser" overture seemed to please the audience, who applauded mightily, it reminded me in style rather of a good German-Kur-capelle than of the famous Boston Symphony.

Eheu fugaces; I can only hope for the return of Mr. Muck, or some one in a way his equal before the orchestra falls without recall from its high estate and degenerates into the mere concert orchestra it sounded like last night.

Mr. Ziegler in the Herald is better disposed: Vigorous, wholesome, conducting and almost faultless—but still human—playing (he writes) marked the first concert here of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The conductor was Mr. Max Fiedler and he conducted like a skilled routinier, missing few opportunities for making effects—even though he did make the Strauss excerpt sound a bit tame. But in the Tannhäuser overture he stirred the pulses by his rousing ending, and in the Brahms symphony he brought out a number of niceties that reflected honor on him and the players. He knows a climax when he meets one, and he introduces his audience to it.

Mr. Krehbiel continues in the Tribune: That there are many lovers of orchestral music who look forward to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with delight was made manifest by the fine audience which gathered in Carnegie Hall last night. That the audience was satisfied with the offering is a question which may be considered open, notwithstanding the enthusiastic greeting with which the visitors received it. It was presented as a reception to the new conductor, and so it must be accepted. There was nothing new on the programme and consequently there was nothing to consider outside of the readings of familiar pieces by Mr. Fiedler. The impression that was left was that the orchestra is still the most brilliant organization of its kind that the people of America are privileged to hear, and that its new conductor knows how to play on it so as to bring its technical perfection to the notice of every discriminating ear. That and little more. The emotional story of the Beethoven overture was not told; neither was the emotional grandeur of the Brahms symphony fully expressed. We knew the beauty of the orchestra's tone and its responsiveness to a masterful beat. We wanted more; and there was nothing impressive in the fact that the music was conducted without score. We shall hear more than is agreeable of that before the season is over.

Tschaikovsky and a New Singer for the Symphony Concerts—The Apollo Club and Miss Farrar—The Kneisel Quartet at Fenway Court—Mr. Czerwonky to Re-appear

Trans. Nov. 7, 1908
It was almost inevitable that during Mr. Fiedler's stay with our orchestra he should try his hand at Tschaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony. Audiences hear it gladly; it will make its effects almost of itself; it tempts nearly every conductor; and there are qualities in it that meet some of Mr. Fiedler's own traits halfway and more. He announced it before he came to Boston and now it stands at the beginning of his programme for the Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon, Nov. 13, and Saturday evening, Nov. 14. For another sort of dramatic music, Beethoven's "Egmont" overture—a second piece that Mr. Fiedler was sure to undertake—will end the concert, and the remaining orchestral number is a set of three dances from Grétry's "heroic ballet" of "Céphale et Procris" originally performed at the Opéra in Paris 130 years ago and now rescored by Mottl. Mr. Fiedler, as was said a few days ago in this column, believes that ballet-music deserves such a performance as our orchestra can give to it, and that it should have an occasional place on its programmes. He has made a beginning accordingly with these classic dances of a French composer of the eighteenth century for the stately opera of Louis XVI. The shifting and exacting repertoires of the two opera houses in New York make a recurring difficulty under which the management of the orchestra labors when it would engage their singers. Miss Gerville-Réache, the alto of the Manhattan Opera House, was to sing at the concerts of next week, but on Friday Mr. Hammerstein must have here for his revival of "Samson and Delilah." In her stead, Mme. Marie Rappold will come from the Metropolitan company for her first appearance. She is a singer of charm and skill, of the concert room, indeed, rather than the opera house.

112

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 21, AT 8 P. M.

Programme.

SIBELIUS,

- a) "A SPRING SONG," op. 16, for Orchestra.
b) "FINLAND," Symphonic Poem, op. 26, No. 7, for Orchestra.
(First time in Boston.)

MAX BRUCH,

CONCERTO for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA, No. 3,
op. 58.
I. Allegro energico.
II. Adagio.
III. Finale: Allegro molto.

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY in A major, No. 7, op. 92.
I. Poco sostenuto; Vivace.
II. Allegretto.
III. Presto: Presto meno assai.
IV. Allegro con brio.

Soloist:

Prof. WILLY HESS.

113

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

7th March 1908
TWO NEW AND STRIKING PIECES BY
SIBELIUS

A "Song of Spring" That Turns an Elegy, and a Strong and Trenchant "Song of Finland"—Mr. Hess's Playing Glorifies a Forgotten Violin Concerto of Bruch—Beethoven's Symphony of the Dance According to Mr. Fiedler and Not to Pleasure—Old Habits and New with the Audience

The audience of the Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon is acquiring a new habit and lapsing into an old. The new is the removal of the obstructing hats; the old is the dribbling through the doors at each pause in a symphony when such music happens to end the concert, or at any interval in the closing items of the programme. The management of the orchestra has not pressed its objections to the hats, since its unexpected foray of three weeks ago. The placards asking that they be removed still remain, but there is no fresh distribution of warning cards to the careless or the obstinate. The results of the original descent upon the offending still abide. They offend no longer and the habit of offence is dwindling within them. Hat after hat came off yesterday afternoon as mechanically as they do in a well-governed theatre among spectators willing to be courteous to each other and to those who would give them pleasure from the stage. There is little lifting now of the voice of protest or petulance. A few fortunate reforms advance of themselves, once they are set in motion, and of such seems the removing of hats on Friday afternoons in Symphony Hall. The stern-faced dowagers, who as some have it set the agitation afoot, may look complaisantly now upon their work. The other habit is as old as the Symphony Concerts. Each succeeding conductor probably hears that it is the custom of a part of the audience on Friday afternoons to drift away in the final half hour of the concert, and for a few weeks each conductor believes no less that he is breaking the habit. Mr. Fiedler has been more fortunate than some of his predecessors. For a month at least he kept his audiences, perhaps by the interest that his novel ways stirred, perhaps by the brilliant overtures with which he oftenest ended his programmes. He has ceased to be a new sensation now; his hearers are becoming used to him. A week ago even so brilliant an overture as Beethoven's to "Egmont" would not hold the whole audience. Beethoven's symphony of the dance was no more potent yesterday. The exodus has begun; and each Friday it renews itself; Mr. Fiedler deigns not to notice it and thereby is he wise. "I never go out with Beethoven," snapped one of the dowagers, yesterday, in audible warning to her neighbors, but some of them went as of old.

Sibelius is brief and Sibelius is trenchant, and these are unusual distinctions among the younger composers. Two of his tone-poems, each new to Boston—his "Song of the Spring" ("Värsång") and his "Song of Finland" ("Finlandia") began the concert Friday afternoon, and together they barely filled twenty-five minutes. Most of the younger writers of orchestral music would count themselves singularly concise and reticent did they spread the contents of a single tone-poem over the whole time that the two of Sibelius consumed. Surely, they would reason, he could not have had much to say. He might, indeed, have said more in these two orchestral songs; but either of them contains as much of musical idea and emotional mood as many a youngster puts upon double the number of sheets of music paper. Moreover, Sibelius makes his ideas and his moods tell, however meagre the one or unvaried the other, by concise and trenchant utterance. "The Song of the Spring" is comparatively simple of design, mood and utterance—a long melodic curve, beginning soberly, mounting, swelling, touching amplitude and almost climax, then declining again, but halting almost abruptly and a little roughly in the descent. Clearly, too, it is music of mood—no picture-music of the quick bursting of the northern spring, but music of the emotion it stirs in the composer as he looks out of his own heart. Melancholy is in his eyes—a bleak, dry melancholy. Comes the spring upon his gray rocks, his bare plains, his lustreless lakes, his silvery skies—comes to pour its light and warmth over them, and they obstinately mock it. Since earth was earth and man was man, it has so come upon them, and year upon year they have withstood it. A vain thing, after all, is this spring. Northern nature still resists it, and a melancholy watcher shall muse upon these things and make his song of spring its elegy. Yet, if nature seem not glad, the hearts of men rejoice; the bells peal in yonder village; life stirs eagerly, warmly again among the folk. The melancholy poet hears and struggles with his brooding. Yet it will not go. Vanity of vanities, said the Preacher, and the northern spring is of them. Of such, perhaps, is the mood of Sibelius's sad and sober song of the spring, and its mood is its virtue—perhaps a more sensitive and less monotonous mood than Mr. Fiedler gave to it.

"Finlandia" begins in grim, hard, iron-like music. As the spring song recalled a little the dreary and haunted vein of Sibelius's concerto for violin that Mme. Powell played here two years ago, so the song of Finland, and especially at the outset, recalled the stern, stripped force of his symphony that Dr. Muck discovered for us. A fierce and restless folk are these Finland-ers, clamoring and surging through the music, stretching in their anger the chains that they may not break. Deep is their wrath, their pride, their fortitude—and the music swells to solemn resolution. Their courage soothes their angry hearts; their restless voices are calmer; theirs after all is their land, and it has its cheer for them. The music broadens, brightens, swells again to sober exaltation, ends almost proudly. A subjective Sibelius, searching out his own moods, wrought "The Song of the Spring." An objective Sibelius, feeling his land and his people, hearing their voices, wrote "The Song of Finland." The man is sad and struggling. The patriot stern, passionate, exalted. Who knows, who cares whether folk-tunes suggested "Finlandia"? Sibelius looked in his heart and wrote what his country and his race inspired in it, and the passion they fired is worth reams of folk ditties. Finns are few in this world; many more are those who stir to the stern passion of such an orchestral song as Sibelius has made for them. And he is as rugged in his musical form, as bare and concentrated in his strength, as grim and gray in his coloring as the rocks about him. His is wind-winnowed music. Throughout "Finlandia" Mr. Fiedler caught its vein.

The Bruch who followed in the concerto for violin that Mr. Hess has resurrected—it was played twice at the Symphony Concerts sixteen years ago—was indeed far from this Sibelius. Last winter the poor old man was full of his complaints in Berlin. He was living in obscurity, in humble circumstance; he could write no more; the world of music and musicians had seemingly passed him by, and he stood walling by the roadside. It is for the violinists, from the students of the conservatories to the most lauded of the virtuosi, to make him amends. Who ever knew that Bruch wrote a symphony until the learned compiler of the programme listed it? His choral pieces recede faster and faster into provincial twilights. But the two concertos for violin and the "Scottish Fantasia" abide day in and day out wherever there is violinist to play them. They are "grateful" music; they follow the perfect idiom of the violin; they disclose the instrument and the performer to the full, and the virtuosi love them with an undying love. Perhaps they might have less conventional musical ideas; perhaps they might be more animate with imagination and feeling; perhaps they might be less dutifully academic. These, however, are the idle thoughts of the mere hearer. They trouble not the virtuoso. Bruch is the transparent medium, the ambling vehicle for him and for his instrument, and he rejoices accordingly. Perhaps the third concerto that Mr. Hess chose is the most conventional, prosaic and academic of the three; but it is efficient, changeable—and lengthy—to epitomize the virtuoso's skill. Of course Mr. Hess made the most of it. His tone had its clear brilliance, its penetrating sweetness, its nervous undulation, its elegant fineness. He played the piece with supple and adroit technical facility; he played it no less with an exquisite sense of fitting style. The performance went almost to cloying perfection. Not once did Mr. Hess's brilliance turn dim, his sweetness roughen, his felicities err, his elegance abate, his sense of rhythm falter. The listener could hardly be surer that Mr. Hess was a consummate virtuoso of the violin. Bruch, however, gave him not a significant or a beautiful musical thought to declare and enrich; not an emotion to vitalize in his tones; not a poetic imagining to transmit. The ideas, the emotion, the poetry, such as they were, were all of the violin and the violinist. Thrice was Mr. Hess recalled. Thrice should Bruch be grateful to him—and in a double sense.

Beethoven had much less cause for gratitude to Mr. Fiedler for the playing of the symphony in A major, the seventh as the numbers go, the symphony of the dance as Wagner has labelled it. At least Mr. Fiedler was in the fashion; it is the hour of the dancers; and Miss Duncan even dances to the last three movements of this very symphony, translating their rhythms and their spirit into bodily motion. Probably the music were left more wisely to the imagination and the emotion of those that hear. Fancy and spirit, better than bodies, may dance with such idealizing, such lyrically passionate music. Little, however, did Mr. Fiedler stir the imagination or the emotion of his hearers, and little did any sense of idealizing quality play in his reading. He made the symphony square-shouldered, heavy-footed, like a conventional classic dutifully placed on the serious programme of serious concerts to be played with becoming respect. There was too little brightness of tone, zest of rhythm and variety of detail. Now Mr. Fiedler over-modelled and moulded a melody, until it lost continuity, and, again, phrase after phrase went in flat monotony. Somehow, the music hardly spoke out, the exhilarating joy of it was gone; its idealizing voice would not mount. Better the vigorous and sweeping Fiedler than these dead levels of respectability. In one of Marcel Prévost's sprightly tales of Parisian women, a young wife is weary of being loved—"with respect." Old Beethoven may be no less weary of being played—with respect.

H. T. P.

A VIVIFYING INFLUENCE

There were probably many, like ourselves, who left the Symphony concerts of this week with a sense of almost personal gratitude toward Mr. Fiedler and Jean Sibelius, the composer whose two works, "Spring Song" and "Finland," were played for the first time in Boston. Our contemporaneous composers are too sophisticated. One hears a very great deal of music which in its carefully considered individuality and astounding ingenuity reflects infinite credit upon the mental status of our present-day music makers; but it is too seldom that we meet with music which breaks out from inner depths as inevitably as water springs from the ground. The two pieces by Sibelius are not pretentious in their form, nor do they compare in scope with the two great symphonies; but they are filled with the vigor of big thoughts and feelings, and it is tremendously refreshing to the habitual concert-goer when a strong man rises in his ancestral might and says his say, not because he would but because he must. Then criticism is swamped; then we welcome a sorely needed element in the art of today.

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT OF SEASON

Two New Pieces by Sibelius
—Violinist Hess Plays Dull
Concerto Finely.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its sixth concert last evening in Symphony Hall. Mr. Fiedler conducted. Mr. Willy Hess was the solo violinist. The program was as follows:

"Song of Spring" and "Finland".... Sibelius
Concerto No. 3 for violin and orchestra

Bruch
Symphony, A major, No. 7..... Beethoven

The two pieces by Jean Sibelius were played for the first time in Boston. We had already heard two of the three symphonies by this composer and also his violin concerto, played admirably by Mme. Maud Powell. The first symphony, peculiarly rugged and melancholy music, made a profound impression. The second symphony, produced here at an earlier date, was considered at the time a good deal of a bore. It would be interesting to hear it again, to see if there might not be a change of opinion. While the violin concerto is not of a nature to be immediately popular, while it was probably not the composer's intention to delight the easy-going and "knowers of what they like," the work as played by Mme. Powell appealed to the imaginative as austerely poetic, a northern and bardic rhapsody. Enough had been heard of Sibelius' music before the performance of the two pieces last night to win respect for the composer. His music is certainly not commonplace. It does not belong to a school; it does not show evidences of a direct descent; it is by itself.

It has been said that this music is unintelligible to the hearer who has not some understanding of Finnish history, religion and temperament, and the hearer must also be versed in the racial origin and "the deeply influencing mythology" of the Finns. The hearer must know that these people are a mixture of Mongolian and western stock, "deriving from the west vigor and self-reliance, and from the east languor and mysticism." Above all, the hearer must know by heart the "Kalevala," the collection of runes and folk lore. All this, and no doubt more, if the hearer is to dilate with the proper emotion when music by Sibelius is playing. If Sibelius' music is thus narrowly national, it is parochial, music of the parish belfry as far as the great world is concerned. The praise, then, in reality is a serious censure. Music that appeals to humanity is emotional in spite of the composer's accidental nationality. It is not enough that the Finns should be moved or thrilled by the work of a Finn.

It is said that "Finland," or "Finlandia," although it was composed as far back as 1894, evokes such enthusiasm in the composer's native land that performance of it was forbidden recently by the oppressing Russian. The question is, Does "Finlandia" evoke enthusiasm in Madrid, Dresden, Boston? For after all it is something more than a national document.

"The Song of Spring" is a long, sustained, melodious song. Darkly colored at first, it is as though the Finnish composer had wished to say with Coleridge: "And the spring comes slowly up this way." Whether the bells introduced at the end have a peculiar significance is not important. The music is agreeably sonorous, and was in effective contrast with "Finlandia," which is picturesque, with suggestions of prayers and hymns, revolts and revolutions. It is stirring music and it was stirring played.

Bruch's third concerto was produced here at a Symphony concert in 1892 by Camilla Urso. It has not been played here since then at a Symphony concert and it has been seldom played in Europe. The neglect of the concerto has been praiseworthy. Mr. Hess, however, in the course of last season played the concerto in two or three foreign cities, among them Berlin, at the express wish of the composer. He gave a fine performance of it last night. His tone was rich and full and brilliant. He played with breadth and authoritative fluency, but it was a pity that he chose this prolix, dull, bombastic empty concerto for the display of his indisputable talent. Hearty applause rewarded the violinist.

Mr. Fiedler gave a sane reading of the symphony. The music for the most part demands a strangely rhythmical performance, and the danger lies in over-emphasis and in undue prominence given to merely decorative passages. Mr. Fiedler avoided these pitfalls and the noble music spoke for itself.

118

Willy Hess Soloist at the Symphony. Globe — Nov. 22, 08 Conductor Fiedler Will Assist at Longy Club Concert.

Various Recitals of the week—Current Gossip.

Concert master Willy Hess was the soloist of the sixth Symphony program, playing the unfamiliar D minor violin concerto by Bruch. There were two numbers by Sibelius, the Finnish composer, "A Song of Spring" and the symphonic poem, "Finland," both new to Boston, and the program closed with Beethoven's seventh symphony. The "Spring Song" is one of the imaginative, romantic pieces which permits fancy to conjure up pretty woodland scenes and to find in a melodic score meanings to suit the music. It is cleverly written and the orchestra played in the sympathetic manner to be expected.

In a different vein is the same composer's "Finland," evidently a musical picture of some wanderer's return home. It opens with a restless theme in the brasses, which soon leads up to a quiet episode for the light strings, a strongly marked rhythm forming a background through nearly the whole movement. The finale is lofty in character, as if expressive of hope and final happiness for the exile. The various moods received proper musical illustration at Mr Fiedler's hands, the work of the brass contingent deserving favorable comment in particular. There was nothing in the number to tax the resources of the orchestra, though here and there are suggestions of Wagnerian influence.

Mr Hess chose for his violin solo the third concerto by Bruch. The three movements are greatly contrasted, the first being vigorous in treatment, the second deliciously tender, almost pathetic, and the last one mainly dance and song themes, light in character. Our first violinist gave a fine interpretation of the work. Lacking somewhat in the necessary vigor in portions of the first movement did not detract from the beauty of his execution, for his tone was pure and resonant. His skill in technique is too well known to call for mention.

In the second movement the exquisite quality of the violin part made the performance notably attractive, the dainty and appealing melodies being set forth in very beautiful harmonics in legato form. In the lighter themes of the finale Mr Hess did brilliant work. The soloist was tumultuously greeted before and during his performance. Mr Fiedler read the Beethoven symphony in a manner worthy of high praise and conducted without a score. The opening was impressive, and conductor Fiedler retained the tone of joyousness all through the piece after the strenuous introductory measures. The tempos in the second part were perfectly adjusted and the "Apotheosis of the dance" was vividly displayed in dazzling brilliancy and verve by the orchestra in the finale.

Richard Strauss' monumental tone-poem, "Ein Heldenleben," will be the chief offering on this week's Symphony program. This great work, which is supposed to embody Strauss' idea of his own tumultuous musical career was performed under Mr Gericke in December, 1901. In sharp contrast with this work of Strauss will be the other orchestral number, the prelude and liedstod from "Tristan and Isolde." The soloist will be Gavriliowitsch, the Russian pianist, who appears after an absence of two years. He will play Tschaukowsky's first concerto.

Trans. — Nov. 14, 1908
Elsewhere, in a column of musical comment, is a note about the two tone poems—"A Song of Spring" and "Finland"—by Sibelius that Mr. Fiedler has placed on the programme of the Symphony Concerts for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening for a first hearing here. The concert for violin and orchestra that Mr. Hess has chosen for his reappearance as a soloist, is almost as novel. It is the third and the last that Bruch wrote. He finished it in 1892; the same year Mme. Urso played it at a pair of Symphony Concerts, and since then not one of a long succession of violinists has undertaken it. The vogue of Bruch's other and hackneyed concertos has overshadowed it elsewhere; but Mr. Hess believes that it now deserves revival. Since Bruch wrote it, the music will be sympathetic to the violin; since Mr. Hess will play it, there will be brilliancy as well. The symphony, finally, for the concert is Beethoven's seventh—"the apotheosis of the dance." Only the other day in New York, Miss Duncan actually undertook to translate the last three movements of it into bodily motion.

On Thursday evening, Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra will go to Sanders Theatre for their monthly concert in Cambridge. Brahms's symphony in D minor, withdrawn from the programme of the first concert in order to honor the memory of Professor Norton with Beethoven's "Eroica," will be the chief item of the second. Then follows Tschaukowsky's first piano concerto, with Mr. George Proctor to play the piano part, and the concert ends with the prelude to "The Mastersingers" of Wagner.

PAST AND COMING INCIDENTS OF THE HOUR

Two Tone-Poems by Sibelius for the First Time at the Next Symphony Concerts— Mme. Sem. Trans. Nov. 14, 1908

As long ago as 1904, when Sibelius was barely known as a composer outside his native Finland and adjacent Russia, Mr. Gericke put his symphony in D major on a programme of the Symphony Concerts. Three years later, Dr. Muck found room for another in E minor, which deeply stirred many that then heard it. In the same season Miss Powell played Sibelius's sombre and significant concerto for violin, and again he was impressive and individual. In the second year of Dr. Muck's conductorship he ignored the Finn; but next week Mr. Fiedler who evidently shares the liking of most German conductors for his music, will bring him back in two of his tone-poems differing widely from each other and from Sibelius's pieces already heard here. One is "Värsäng"—"A Song of the Spring"—and of it Mrs. Newmarch writes in her monograph about Sibelius: "Here we leave the world of mythic heroes and are invited to listen to the voice of nature in exquisite and conquering mood. Yet the second title of this piece, 'the sadness of spring,' seems to indicate that it is not so much a glad and triumphant vernal mood which this music is intended to express, as some subjective feeling not easy to define. Perhaps the dryness of heart which follows upon some corroding, embittering sorrow, for which the swift, magic beauty of the Northern spring bears a message of mockery rather than of hope. But this is left to our imagination, as also the meaning of the strange peal of bells and the impassioned coda at the close of the work." The other tone-poem to be played next week is the highly patriotic "Finlandia," the performance of which overzealous Russian governors have sometimes prohibited. It sounds, according to Mrs. Newmarch, like a fantasia on Finnish folk-tunes. In fact, as Sibelius told her, he invented the melodies himself but animated them with the spirit of Finnish national airs. Like "Värsäng" and all his tone-poems, "Finlandia" is short, compact, and direct.

The Boston Orchestra gave its third concert of the year in New York last night with Strauss's tone-poem, "Ein Heldenleben," and Sibelius's two pieces, "A Song of Spring" and "Finland" for the chief items of the programme. Unfortunately for the orchestra, the Metropolitan Opera House had also chosen the evening for a revival of "Carmen." The reviewers counted the operatic performance the more important incident of the night, and they have little to say of the concert. The Tribune, however, finds room for a few sentences: "Mr. Max Fiedler was the conductor, and the audience dealt cordially with him, especially when, after the Strauss performance, he bade the orchestral players rise to share honors with him. This was, indeed, a tribute from the conductor to his associates that was well deserved, for there was at least as much to praise in the orchestra's clean-cut and brilliant instrumental work as in the interpretation of the music as a whole by the leader. The energy that Mr. Fiedler and the Boston men infused into their performance was carefully regulated, and the instrumental voices were deftly balanced, but this nicety of treatment served rather to reveal the frequent banalities of the music and its lack of convincing emotional force than to glorify what Strauss's admirers regard as perhaps his strongest work. The spirit of shrewd and witty caricature in the section depicting the hero's enemies was capitally brought out." Trans. Dec. 4, 1908

MUSICAL COMMENT

A NOTE ABOUT MR. HESS FOR A BEGINNING

The Exceptional Place That the Violinist Has Made for Himself Here—His Qualities in the Orchestra, in Chamber Concerts and as a Virtuoso—The Muscled Music of Sibelius—Mottl as an Orchestral Adapter—The Range and the Traits of Some of His Experiments, with an Example or Two from Recent Concerts—1773 and 1908—The Subconscious Calve—A Hint of the Repertory of the Boston Opera—Mme. Melba's Unusual Leave-Taking in London—Caruso's Record and Constantino's Return—Local Musical News

Trans. — Nov. 23, 1908
Wherever and whenever Mr. Hess plays, he is nervous tensity incarnate. His are the set and straining nerves of the thoroughbred, and perhaps, for that reason, he has made more individual impression upon the concert-going public here than any of his predecessors in the chair of the first violin in the Symphony Orchestra. It was easy to admire Mr. Kneisel a little impersonally and abstractly; admiration for Mr. Hess has a very concrete object. Bruch's concerto that he played on Saturday happens to begin with a considerable orchestral introduction, and through it Mr. Hess seemed the very image of nervous tensity. His body was as taut as a tightly strung wire with his desire to set to his work and to do his utmost at it. In one hand he grasped, rather than held, his violin. In the other was his bow, as rigidly erect and still as the ramrod or the walking stick of a drill sergeant. Not a muscle in Mr. Hess's body moved; not a feature changed; he was straining expectancy crystallized. Came the moment for the entry of the solo violin, and he was off and away like a thoroughbred given his head and touched with the spur. Mr. Hess does much—perhaps too much—but in whatever mood he may come to a task, once he is embarked upon it an irresistible impulse impels to do his utmost. He is always "keyed up"; he tightens himself nervously as he tightens the strings of his violin. The brilliance of his playing is a nervous brilliance; its fineness is a nervous fineness; the incessant undulation of his tone is, perhaps, the half-unconscious play of his acutely strung nerves. He has the power of a conductor like Mahler, of a singer like Fremstad, of a pianist like Gabilowitch, to give his more sensitive auditors as fine and keen a nervous thrill as that which is pricking him. It is an ultra-modern reaction (as the psychologists would say) in the listeners and in the performer. It is also the quality in Mr. Hess that saves the brilliance and the elegance of his playing from cloying.

120

It is this nervous tensility, this impulse to be always doing his utmost that makes Mr. Hess so efficient and influential a concert-master. He is not the easiest man with whom to keep the peace, as more than one conductor in Germany and in America has found; but those same conductors, as soon as they have cooled, testify warmly to his merits as the leader of their strings. He does not merely play solo or distinctive passages that fall to the first violin (as in Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" or Wolf's "Italian Serenade") with exceeding vividness and poignancy; he steadily stimulates the men about him diffusing, as it were, a part of his nervous force, giving them something of his eagerness. There are concert-masters who chiefly steady their companions—Mr. Wendling was a recent example here; there are concert-masters who guide them as Mr. Kniesel did in his earlier years with the orchestra. Mr. Hess spurs them, as he spurs himself. He makes them for the moment as taut and sensitive as he.

On the other hand, the very traits that make Mr. Hess so brilliant as a virtuoso and so efficient as a concert-master tend to defeat him in an ambition that he cherishes no less—the leading of a string quartet. There, as everywhere, his thoroughbred instinct to be doing his best and his utmost pricks him onward; but there, by exception, it drives him to excess. Half-instinctively, he pushes his violin to preponderance; he is fain to make it dominate the other three instruments and its part pervade the music in hand. The result is inevitable. The other players (as was the case too often at the first concert of the Hess-Schroeder Quartet) are stirred to an eager rivalry that wrecks all adjustment and euphony of tone; the whole performance turns feverish; and the nice proportions of the music are distorted. Everywhere but in his quartet it is the duty of Mr. Hess to assert himself, there it is incumbent on him to become a harmonious and sensitive part of a whole. It is a hard task for him. The undue, if unconscious, predominance of the first violin harmed many a piece that the Symphony Quartet played in Mr. Hess's first years here. There were signs in plenty, last Tuesday, that he had learned no new wisdom and gained no new restraint with the Hess-Schroeder Quartet. It is a pity. The rewards of balanced tone, of flawless euphony, of the community in all things, that are among the secrets of perfection in a string quartet ought to be as grateful to Mr. Hess as those of brilliancy as a virtuoso and exceptional efficiency as a concert-master. In all things Mr. Hess cannot help wishing to be primus—Fate gave him his temperament—but he has not yet learned that in a string quartet, he must be primus inter pares.

Fresh and interesting details of Sibelius's music that passed unheeded in the general impression of his two tone-poems on Friday afternoon stood clear in the repetition of Saturday. Recall, for example, the quick little jump of the orchestra at the beginning of "The Song of Spring," as though Sibelius would hint in the start at the flashes of hot sunshine cleaving the clouds, at the jets of warm air devouring the snow and setting the grasses almost in upward motion, with which the spring comes in one glorious instant in those high northern latitudes where he lives and works. "Tis here; 'tis here; 'tis gone," like the Ghost of Hamlet's father on the battlements of Elsinore. But the melancholy mood of the watcher will not yield to it, and Sibelius's tone-poem seemed at the second hearing no less than at the first an elegy, rather than a song, of the spring. None the less, like all his pieces that have been heard here in the past two years, "Vär-sång"—and "Finlandia" as well—seemed curiously muscular music. Not muscular in the sense of physical power and stress as when the string choir of an orchestra lays on its bows and spares not, and the dutiful reviewers make speed to praise its muscularity. Sibelius's muscularity is not the muscularity of the big tone. The outline, the substance and the manner of the two tone-poems often give the same impression to the ear as to the eye, the tense, clear muscles of the stark and sinewy athlete who is all fine and quivering strength. Some modern music is sprawling; it wanders over what it would say and does not concentrate its sayings. More of it is inflated and exaggerated, as one or another sort of athlete may overdevelop a particular set of muscles. Sibelius's music, on the other hand, is very justly and very finely muscled. It is curiously sinewy music in its melodies, its harmonies, its instrumental coloring. Everything in it has a starkness, a tensility, a kind of youthful and unconscious masculinity. It is neither sensuous nor sensual. It is never feverishly emotional nor reflectively intellectual. It is rather music of the clear power, the deep reticences, and the finely strung intensity that dwell in the young athlete could he translate the impression of his muscles—by some miracle—into the impression of tones.

Felix Mottl, the eminent conductor and the director of the Munich Opera, is an industrious adapter of music for orchestra. Sometimes it is easy to believe that he must give all his leisure to such work, except when he is recounting for the fiftieth time his unhappy experiences at the Metropolitan in New York. Eighteenth-century dances by Gluck or Grétry or Rameau and modern piano pieces out of Liszt or Chabrier are all alike grist to his amplifying hand. He takes them as he finds them; strips them to the skeleton of melody and rhythm; and then reclothes their bones with the plentiful flesh and the pulsing blood of modern instrumentation. Sometimes he makes these transformations with almost uncanny skill and illusion. Chabrier never happened to rewrite his piano piece, the Bourrée Fantasque, for orchestra; but if he had chosen to do so, it would surely have sounded as Mottl makes it sound in his orchestral version that was played at Mr. Debuchy's concert last week. Recall Chabrier's "Spanish Rhapsody," as it has often been played here; recall the overture to "Gwendoline" and other fragments of his operas, and Mottl in his translation of the Bourrée, has caught the very idiosyncrasies, the very tricks, of Chabrier. The brass sounds as though Chabrier had written the parts for it; the imitation of the shrill piping of the musettes that played the bourrée as a folk dance is musical humor that would have tickled Chabrier to invent; the music is full of progressions and strokes of instrumental color that might be Chabrier's own. Above all, the transcription goes with the verbe, the ebullience, of all that Chabrier wrote. Mottl himself is of very different temperament, and he has made himself Chabrier by sheer dint of imagination.

Mottl cannot, or he will not, transform himself into a Grétry. The three dances that he has arranged from the Frenchman's "heroic ballet" of "Cephalus and Procris," and that Mr. Fiedler has played of late here, and at Cambridge, are really much more of Mottl than of Grétry. They are agreeable to hear, but they do not sound like eighteenth-century music, with its cool, clear line and its fine, sober rhythm, and they sound still less like the sparkling and prattling Grétry. Mottl has really taken a melodic or a rhythmic idea or two from "Cephalus and Procris," and out of it built three dances of ancient form, but of very modern speech and raiment for an orchestra of numbers and sonorities of which Grétry never dreamed. They are cleverly interesting; they are good in their kind, but they are no more what they pretend to be than was Godowsky's transcription of a gigue by Locillet, a minor composer of the eighteenth century, that Miss Willard played the other day. The original dance blushed almost unseen—or rather unheard—in the gaudy bed of flowery ornament in which Godowsky had set it. And to shift the figure, Grétry tinkled innocently now and then through Mottl's sonorities.

121

There is a golden mean with these eighteenth century dances in modern concert rooms, as there is with most other things. Even the ardent Dolmetski can no more restore the conditions under which "Cephalus and Procris" was performed at Versailles and Paris in 1773 and 1775 than he can recall Sophie Arnould, who played the nymph, to life or revive in us who listen now the mood of those that saw and heard in Louis XV.'s court or in the boxes of the Opéra. A modern concert room replaces the little theatre of the palace; democracy sits in its rows of seats, its "rush" seats even, instead of kings in armchairs with the "court circle" about them. A broad platform has replaced the shallow, narrow, smoky stage; Grétry's little band is swallowed into a numerous orchestra. Now we hear the music under the dry clearness of electric lights; the court of the Well-Beloved—though he was hardly that in 1773—heard it through the soft lustre of candles. There is no "heroic ballet" for us to watch nowadays; and we should smile indeed were we to see Ovid's nymphs and swains, out of Greek legend, walking a minuet or prancing—decorously always—through a jig, in perukes and powder, lace and brocade. The music of the eighteenth century, outside that of a few everlasting and universal masters, like Bach and Mozart, must inevitably seem quaint to us of 1908, much or little as we may try to imagine its surroundings or the moods of those that heard it. For us it will have not only its intrinsic, but also an exotic charm. It does need strengthening, that it may sound at all in a modern concert-room, but it needs no such amplification and translation into another orchestral idiom as Mottl gave to these fragments of "Cephalus and Procris." As are the ample pergolas of the country houses of very rich men in the newest suburbs to the little weather-stained summer houses and "temples" that nestle in old Italian gardens, so are Mottl's dances to Grétry's.

Does Mme. Calvé sing nowadays by a kind of sub-conscious process? As long as she is singing the pieces that she has repeated hundreds of times—fragments of "Carmen" or of "The Pearl Fishers," the air of that highly fictitious but highly industrious bird, the Mysoll, or a song or two of her "dear Provence," she sings them with something of her old beauty of deep, smooth, luscious tone and something of her old artistry of phrasing and tonal coloring. The process must by this time be mechanical to her—how long is it since she has learned a new part or even a new piece?—but the mechanism was so perfect that time and repetition and even carelessness have little dimmed it. But when Mme. Calvé undertakes music that she sings only seldom, like the "Ave Maria" of Bach according to the saccraine Gounod, which she ventured at her concert here last week, she sings very poorly indeed. There is no sub-conscious mechanism to bear her onward, and the singer was plainly laborious and indifferent. She had been ill, it was said and truly in apology; but there was no trace of illness in her passionate declamation of the "stanzas" of Sappho. That, at least, was not sub-conscious. The old fires of the days when she was rightly counted among the most moving dramatic singers of her time stirred once more in her. For the time she was almost her old self. For the rest—but who may puzzle out the reasons of temperament, the reasons of circumstance that have brought Mme. Calvé to her present estate? At least, and happily, she has never been seduced by the current passion for the big, hard tone. The delicacy and the softness of her colatura singing are still at her best moments its charm and its distinction.

H. T. P.

Trans. PHILIP HALE. (W. J. Henderson in the New York Sun.)

When all is said about these recent promulgations of the publishers the end is not reached. The most extraordinary of all new books in the field of music is published by "C. A. Ellis, Manager," and it has not even a title. It just starts off this way: "Symphony Hall, Boston, Huntington and Massachusetts avenues. Telephone, 1492 Back Bay. Twenty-seventh Season, 1907-1908. Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor. Programme of the First Rehearsal and Concert."

And then you realize that you have opened a bound volume of the Boston Symphony programme books for the season of 1907-08. This book contains the historical and descriptive notes written by Philip Hale. It is a handy little volume of 1840 pages and it is no trite compliment to say that no musical library is complete without it. The truth is that it is a whole musical library in itself, for the mass of information packed in its pages is simply amazing. These bound volumes as they come annually from the press fill the reader with wonder at the prodigious industry, learning and literary skill of that remarkable man Philip Hale.

His fame as a brilliant, incisive and thoroughly equipped commentator on music and musical performance is very wide and has been earned by years of valiant service in Boston. These programme books let one into the secret of the boldness and readiness which enliven his critical writings. It is to be found in the stupendous scope of his reading, the omnivorous character of his assimilation. Mr. Hale is an ornament to the vocation of musical criticism. Long may he continue to uphold the high standard of Boston.

WILLY HESS THE HIT AT SYMPHONY

Concert Master the Feature of the Saturday Night Performance.

BRUCH'S CONCERTO
PLAYED HERE IN 1892

The Concert Was Concluded With Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, the Dance Epic.

Journal — Nov. 28, 1908

At the Symphony concert Saturday night the great success of the evening was made by the soloist; and the successful artist was none other than the concert master of the orchestra, Professor Willy Hess, who proudly wears the title the Kaiser bestowed upon him eight years ago when the Conservatory of Music at Cologne celebrated its golden jubilee. Professor Hess played Bruch's concerto No. 3, which had not been heard at a Symphony concert since 1892, during the Nikisch regime, when it was played by Camilla Urso. But it probably was never played here more brilliantly and effectively than on Saturday night. There was much applause after each movement and at the end the soloist was recalled several times. His triumph was all the more striking in view of the doubtful merits of the concerto itself. It was chiefly the virile and yet graceful performance of Professor Hess that carried the number to success, and the audience was quick to show its appreciation of an artistic exhibition of violin playing as it could possibly desire to hear.

Two short orchestral pieces by Jean Sibelius, the young Finnish composer, were new to Boston. One was a rather melancholy "Song of Spring," the other a stirring and more cheerful work called "Finland." The audience enjoyed "Finland" very much.

The concert ended with Beethoven's seventh symphony, which Wagner spoke of as the "apotheosis of the dance," and which, for that reason, perhaps, Miss Isadora Duncan may "dance" in Boston some time this season. The symphony is not on her Jordan Hall programs this week, but the plan is to bring her back, if Boston shows any enthusiasm over her, and let her interpret the Beethoven work in Symphony Hall, with a full orchestra to support her. Miss Duncan first offered this sort of entertainment at Paris four years ago. Early this month she did the "dance" in New York, and apparently succeeded in lending new force to Wagner's opinion that this symphony is "Dance in her highest respect, as it were the loftiest deed of motion incorporated in an ideal mould of tone." Mr. Fiedler gave a very straightforward reading of the symphony. The rhapsody may come later with Miss Duncan.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

BY OLIN DOWNES

Yesterday afternoon, at the sixth public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Willy Hess, concert master, appeared as soloist, playing Bruch's little known third concerto for violin and orchestra. The concert opened with two orchestral pieces, "A Song of Spring" and "Finland," by Jean Sibelius, given for the first time in Boston, and came to an end with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

The music of Sibelius is superb in its spontaneity, elementality, force and sincerity. The "Song of Spring" develops with ever increasing passion a rather mournful melody of a decidedly Finnish character in its curve and rhythm. The instrumentation—probably with intention on the part of the composer—has little variety of color. The theme is given almost entirely to the strings in a low register, and is accompanied by clash harmonies in the brass and wood. A marvellously imaginative touch comes at the end, with the "strange peal of bells" mentioned in the programme book. "Imaginative of what?" might be asked. We leave the question to the officious interpreter. It is enough that, as with any truly creative artist, the unexpected innovation which he introduces has its own law of being; that it appears as an absolutely logical expression, and stirs one strangely. And let us thank the composer on bended knees that he omitted explanation in his title or in his score.

What a magnificently virile outpouring is the second piece, "Finlandia"! It has a greater emotional than artistic value, for the passionate reiteration of themes and sections does not conduce to a sense of contrast that we would desire to a greater degree in a work of a purely musical and formal character. But by its deep feeling and unbounded energy the music grips irresistibly. You cannot help sharing these feelings, or avoid being swept away by the stormy, swirling measures. Small wonder that there were days when the Russian government saw fit to prohibit the performance of "Finlandia."

The Bruch concerto has been heard but once in Boston, at a Symphony concert in 1892, when Camilla Urso was the violinist and Nikisch the conductor. Mr. Hess, we hear, considers that the composition has been unduly neglected. He gave the concerto a finished and entirely admirable performance. It is doubtful, indeed, whether the concertmaster has ever played more beautifully in Boston; but, after a single hearing, we believe such energies could have been spent in more worthy material. The whole work is too long. The first movement appeared strongest, though it, too, suffers from too extended development. The slow movement is inclined to drowsy platitudes. The finale is brilliant in substance, but falls short when the inevitable comparison with the G minor concerto is made. The orchestra is employed effectively. Mr. Hess was warmly applauded and recalled.

FIEDLER AND KUEHNEMANN

Noted Germans Entertain Members of Bostoner Deutsche Gesellschaft at First Winter Meeting

Trans. — Nov. 17, 1908

At the first winter meeting of the Bostoner Deutsche Gesellschaft, held last evening in the large ballroom of the Hotel Somerset, the guests of honor and also the entertainers were Max Fiedler and Eugen Kühnemann. The leader of the Symphony Orchestra played a dozen pianoforte selections on a variety of themes and showed to advantage his grasp of the eccentricities of each composition. At the close, Mr. Fiedler received enthusiastic applause, which continued until Mr. Kühnemann took the stage. The latter spoke instructively on some phases of German philosophy and read in illustration from Nietzsche's work on the subject.

After the reading a reception was held for the guests of honor and their wives. The meeting was a notable one in the history of the society, and the attendance—about eight hundred—unprecedented.

IARSCH.

loist:

PH GANZ.

124

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 28, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

RICHARD STRAUSS, TONE POEM, "A Hero Life." op. 40.

TSCHAIKOWSKY, CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 1, in B flat minor.
op. 23.
I. Andante non troppo e molto maestoso.
Allegro con spirito.
II. Andantino semplice. Allegro vivace assai.
III. Allegro con fuoco,

WAGNER, VORSPIEL AND LIEBESTOD from "Tristan und Isolde."

Soloist:

Mr. OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH.

The Pianoforte is a Mason and Hamlin.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

125

"MUSICAL NIHILISM" AS STRAUSS MADE IT

ad: ————— 11/28.08
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

GIVES "HELDENLEBEN"

Mr. Fiedler at His Best in Modern Works—This Week's Programme Long but Palatable.

By Louis C. Elson.
PROGRAMME.

Strauss—"Heldenleben."
Tschalkowsky—Concerto for Piano, No 1, B-flat minor.

Pianist, Ossip Gabrilowitch.

Wagner—Vorspiel and Liebestod, from "Tristan and Isolde."

The concert was long, but interesting in every part, and it displayed Mr. Fiedler at his best. He won a complete triumph. A Russian concerto between two German orchestral works made a palatable sandwich. We were glad of the juxtaposition, for it showed Wagner, even after an hour and a half of strenuous modern music, greater than the greatest composer of the present. It also showed Tschalkowsky as the apostle of the beautiful in Music, even when indulging in the passionate freedom of today.

No man can deny that in "Heldenleben" Strauss shows that there are orchestral depths (or heights) that even Wagner did not explore. Nor can one deny that there are beauties in the work that show the composer a tonal giant. But sustained passion, intensity of long breath, such as Wagner gives, is not in the prolix tone-poem—"Heldenleben."

One may revolt also against the bad taste of a composer celebrating himself as his own hero. The indulgence in self-praise which two moderns (Strauss and Wagner) have exhibited would have shocked the greater Bach or Beethoven.

We cannot ever become reconciled to the attempted realism of the battle-scene. Mr. Fiedler gave this a very powerful interpretation—one of the most brilliant that we can recall—but the movement remains a frightful example of musical nihilism. Instead of remembering Mozart's sentence,—"Even in the most terrifying moments Music must never offend the ear."—Strauss proceeds on the lines of Sherman's apothegm—"War is Hell!"—and illustrates it in an appropriately infernal manner.

We reprint here our poem upon this matter,—with apologies to Southey:—

THE BATTLE OF HELDENLEBEN.

One Saturday at evening,
The critic's work was done,
He sat within the music hall,

The concert had begun,
And by his side there might be seen,
His little grandchild, Wilhelmine.

Young Peterkin was also there,
With programme-book in hand,
And asked the critic to explain
What ailed the music band.
What was the thing that Fiedler found
That was so big and full of sound?

The critic gazed upon the boy
That stood expectant by,
He knit his brows, he scratched his head,
And heaved a natural sigh.
'Tis some poor fellow's score, said he,
That wrote a monster symphonie.

I find them often hereabout,
When I to concerts wend,
Strange, shapeless things, with gongs and drums,
And trombones without end,
For many a tiresome bore, quoth he,
Thinks he must write a symphonie.

Now tell us what 'twas all about,
Young Peterkin he cries,
While little Wilhelmine looked up,
Half-deafened, in surprise.
Now tell us all about the score,
And what they make such racket for.

It was a German, he replied,
A modern one, no doubt.
But what he wrote such discords for
I cannot well make out.
But everybody says, quoth he,
It is a famous symphonie.

With chords of ninth, and eleventh, and worse,
And zigzags in all keys,
He turns the music inside out
With unknown harmonies.
But things like that, you know, must be
In every modern symphonie.

Great praise the big bass-tuba won,
And kettle-drum machine,
Why 'twas an ugly, noisy thing,
Said little Wilhelmine.
Nay, that you must not say, quoth he,
It is a famous symphonie.

Much praise our Mr. Fiedler won
For leading such a din.
But what good came of it at last? -
Quoth little Peterkin.
Why that no man can say, quoth he,
It is a modern symphonie.

Yet "Heldenleben" grows on one with repeated hearing. We do not think that we shall "first endure, then pity, then embrace" in this case, for we still feel that

Strauss mis-spends his great gifts on such work, but we know that no other composer alive could have given such an impressionist picture in tones.

In brute force, in herculean swing of the orchestra, Strauss goes beyond Wagner, but if one compares even the motives used by the two the inferior position of Richard the Second will be apparent. Compare, for example, the "Hero" theme, with that of Siegfried; the Love theme with that of Tristan and Isolde; the cackling of the Hero's enemies with the Beckmesser music; the burlesque muted trumpets of the foes with the steel-wired harp of the final scene of "Die Meistersinger"; and then compare the treatment of these themes, in the one case glorious, continuous and logical, in the other sputtering and fragmentary, and it will readily be seen that Strauss does not attain Wagner's level.

What enemies our hero made of the flutes, the oboes and the bass tubas! Never was such bitter reviling and grunting. In this graphic vein the composer is inimitable.

die. In sustained beauty he is much less great. No, Richard Strauss, you are not a Richard Wagner, but you are the greatest man in the world, in a school that is altogether on the wrong track! In the performance of "Heldenleben" Mr. Fiedler and our orchestra deserve the most rose-colored adjectives. Their work was simply and emphatically glorious.

The rest of the concert was spent in healing the wounds of sound—not by silence, as a poultice, but by themes that were beautiful in themselves and were logically treated. The Tschalkowsky concerto, which was first played, and first appreciated, in Boston, is still as full of charm as when Von Bulow played it for us. It is also a long work, but it is not taxing to the mind. Yet, even with the intermission of ten minutes between, the work at first seemed tame after the iridescence of spice and fury of Strauss. It was like going from a prize-fight to a five o'clock tea. Gradually, however, this quiet impression wore off, thanks to the very brilliant playing of Mr. Gabrilowitch, and the finale was an entire success.

The pianist made much of the end of the first movement and his cadenza was very effective. But the Coda of the Finale was the crowning part of the work. In this the powerful double octave and chord work of Mr. Gabrilowitch was of superlative excellence and it excited the audience to very great (and deserved) enthusiasm. The pianist was recalled again and again.

But all that had gone before melted away in the white heat of the passion of "Tristan and Isolde." The figure which represented the hero's wife and the music devoted to that gentleman's wooing shrivelled up when compared to the theme of Wagner's two lovers and their affection. The treatment of the themes too was diametrically opposite in the two cases; the one being very skillful the other a delirium of ecstasy. It was as well that Tschalkowsky had acted as a buffer between the two modern Germans.

This concert gave Mr. Fiedler his best opportunity and he made the fullest use of it. That the public at large was aware of the especial value of this occasion was proved by a waiting line of "rush auditors" that was larger than any we have yet seen. It extended from the door of the hall well into Gainsborough st.

"A HERO'S LIFE"

STRAUSS'S TONE - POEM AFTER SEVEN YEARS

Mr. Fiedler to Revive It at the Next Symphony Concerts—Its Substance and Its Form—The Qualities That Distinguish It Among Strauss's Music—The Phases of His Hero and His Expression of Them—

Programme Music That Speaks for Itself

Seven years ago, lacking a few weeks, Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Ein Heldenleben"—"A Hero's Life"—was played for the first times at the Symphony Concerts, with Mr. Gericke conducting. It was then a relatively new piece. Strauss himself had conducted in the music at Frankfurt in March of 1899 for its first performance in any concert; while the Thomas Orchestra in Chicago and the Philharmonic Society in New York had anticipated the Boston band with it in America. Mr. Gericke did not repeat the tone-poem during the rest of his conducting; and Dr. Muck with Strauss leaped from "Till Eulenspiegel" to the "Sinfonia Domestica." Now Mr. Fiedler purposes to bring "Ein Heldenleben" to hearing again, and it stands in the first place on his programme for the Symphony Concerts of next week. Recollections of orchestral pieces are short—even of such a huge, searching and impressive as "Ein Heldenleben." It will come almost newly to many of those that will hear it again next Friday and Saturday. It deserves preliminary recalling alike as to its matter and its manner, not in the dry and withering dissection of an analytical pedant, but in the warm impressions and the clear judgment of an intelligent and sensitive listener. There is no better means to this end in our language than the following passages from the articles about "Ein Heldenleben" that Mr. E. A. Baughan wrote for The Daily News, when the tone-poem was new to London, and subsequently reprinted and amplified in his volume of essays, "Music and Musicians," published by John Lane in the summer of 1906.

Much has been written of "Ein Heldenleben," Mr. Baughan begins, "and much that has been unnecessarily confusing. As Wagner once was, so Richard Strauss now is the victim of the literary and musical commentator; but, as with the older composer, his music is not esoteric art. Those who have any feeling for music, some little knowledge of its later manifestations, and a temperament that can be impressed by poetic ideas and abstract emotions, will find in "A Hero's Life" a work which will move them strangely, and if the enthusiasm of the public may be taken as proof, this symphonic poem is among the great masterpieces of musical art which appeal to the initiated by their extraordinary cleverness, and to the larger public by their poetic meaning and power of arousing emotion. I have no hesitation in calling "A Hero's Life" a great masterpiece.

To begin with, no symphonic poem, except, perhaps, Richard Strauss's own "Death and Transfiguration," has seemed so clear in its meaning. This is caused, no doubt, by the nature of the subject. In many symphonic poems—in Richard Strauss's own "Don Juan" fantasia and "Till Eulenspiegel," for instance, and in Dvorak's series—music has attempted the impossible; it has pictured events and things; it has been realistic, in short. In "A Hero's Life" there is no such realism. The composer has taken the inner emotional life of a man for expression, and consequently there is no difficulty in grasping his meaning; it is all well within the psychological power of music, and is set forth legitimately. Strauss's hero is no swaggerer in the full sunshine of material heroism, but a man who makes a fight for his soul. In the very opening of the first section the hero's theme is heard. It is noble and tender, but not in any degree martial or aggressive. As the orchestra tells its tale we understand that the man is a hero because he has aspirations and the indomitable will and energy to realize them. What will the world hold for him? The reply soon comes in the second section, "The Antagonists"—shrill envy (stupidly flippant little themes on the wood-wind), bickerings and fierce brutish growling beset his path. Against these he has to battle, and for a time there is discouragement, but no loss of purpose or nobility. The hero goes his way, and brushes aside his antagonists—but they are not to be so easily overcome.

As a pendant to this outside opposition there is strife within himself. The influence of woman comes into his life. At first it seems almost as bad as the cunning onslaught of his antagonists. A long-winded violin solo tells us that the hero can as little understand this new influence as his opponents understand him.

The solo is for a long while an empty capriccio, full of meaningless twists and turns, and maddening in its reiteration. The hero holds aloof; he does not understand; but gradually the music grows warmer and more passionate, although the violin solo still holds its incomprehensible way. At last the oboe sings a phrase—a love-phrase of infinite beauty and tenderness, and the violin, repeating it, responds. The hero has called and has found his mate. Beautiful is the love-music that follows—it is among the most beautiful music that has ever been given to the world. But what are those shrill discordant trumpet calls that break in on this dream? The call to action; the organized onslaught of the hero's antagonists.

He girds himself for battle, inspired with new strength by the love for his companion. And what a musical battle it is! Technically it is the development section of the work. Themes which we have already heard are hurled against each other; a new hero's theme makes itself heard against the din of the warfare; dissonances which should turn the hair of old-fashioned theorists grey assault the ears; and over all the maddening rhythm of the drums. As a piece of legitimate musical writing it is amazing; when a Berlioz or a Tchaikovsky desired to obtain something of the same effect they had recourse to unmusical tricks—Berlioz with his absurd augmentation of his orchestra by four brass bands; Tchaikovsky with his cannon in the "1812" overture. Strauss does it all by polyphony and by his knowledge of how to use the orchestra. To analyze this musical battle would be almost impossible, but there is really no need for analysis. The meaning of the music cannot be misunderstood. It may not be so, however, with the next section, which deals with the "Hero's Work of Peace"—for Strauss's hero is a creator, and not a mere destroyer. Quotations from his other works are made, and perhaps some listeners may not have understood the drift of it all. It is a wonderful piece of music-making, the continuation of this development begun in the "battle." The hero has conquered his foes in open fight, but the triumph has not brought peace; the battlefield has only been transferred from the outside to the inside—at least, so I read the music. He has not yet conquered himself. He has not risen above all this turmoil of the soul. The woman's love has brought peace, and is the one spot of brightness in his wounded memory.

But there is a greater peace to come, the peace of death. The hero passes away solemnly, and the orchestra triumphantly puts a full stop to his life.

The abandonment of the realism, which mars the symmetry of "Till Eulenspiegel," "Zarathustra" and "Don Quixote," Mr. Baughan continues, is very noticeable at a first hearing of "Ein Heldenleben," with the result that though the piece is immeasurably more complex than its predecessors, and in detail the most extraordinary, its effect is almost simple. Some critics have said that this is because the last symphonic poem conforms more closely to recognized musical form than any of its predecessors. But each one of Strauss's symphonic-poems has very decided form. Indeed, this side of his compositions has not been sufficiently investigated. In this very "A Hero's Life" you have most of the known musical forms placed under contribution. There is something of the sonata form—thematic introduction, statement of principal themes with contrasting themes, a development section (here divided into two parts: the "Battlefield" and the "Works of Peace"), a recapitulation, and coda. There is, of course, much of the variation form; and, finally, it might be held that the symphonic-poem is a huge Rondo. But the real form it possesses is psychological. One of the chief features, then, of 120 "A Hero's Life" is that while from the first bar to the last it is programme music, it also has an organic musical life, which, in its turn, is the effect of the programme. The composer himself has authorized a statement of his intentions. He wished to depict, we are told, not a realistic portrait of a particular hero, "but rather a more general and free ideal of great and manly heroism—not the heroism to which one can apply an everyday maxim of valor with its material and exterior reward, but that heroism which corresponds to the inward battles of life, and which aspires, through struggles and renouncements, towards the elevation of the soul." The important point in this description is that the music interprets the inward battles of life—is, in short, psychological.

The six sections of the symphonic poem are logically organic, so that it is almost impossible to separate the musical from the psychological form. The contrast of character between the first section describing the hero and his soul-state and the second which depicts the foes (not realistic, but psychological foes) is natural to the programme, and yet gives the musical contrast which was undoubtedly the origin of the different movements of a symphony. And so again with the section in which the complement of the hero—the woman—is dealt with. But it will be observed that Richard Strauss has indulged in no seesaw of mere musical contrast. Looking at the symphonic poem broadly, it is dome-shaped. By alternating crescendos and decrescendos it rises to the climax of the battle, and then as gradually descends—a musical shape that is common to so many great compositions. But while the broad musical form of the symphonic poem is so intelligible, and in detail of workmanship is an amalgam of the sonata, variation, and rondo forms of absolute music, the composer is purely a programme writer in the shape of his themes, their development and harmonic treatment, and in his use of the varied tone-color of his orchestra. From this point of view you must listen to the composition as programme music; nothing but a programme explains the dissonances in which he indulges, but that the programme is never outside the powers of music is proved by the transparent clearness with which one grasps the meaning of the music. Only in one section is there any obscurity—the "Hero's Works of Peace." It is a fine piece of modern polyphonic writing, but it seems to me that the music does not explain itself. The references to the composer's previous works are, no doubt, a clue, but the whole thing as a mood picture is not clear. I fancy Richard Strauss here meant to describe a purely subjective idea of an intellectual subtlety which cannot get itself clearly expressed in music. "A Hero's Life" has a musical because it has a psychological form.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Gabrilowitsch Plays at the Symphony.

Handel and Haydn Concerts—
Recitals of the Week.

Gossip and News Items of Current Interest.

Forty minutes of Richard Strauss greeted the patrons of last week's Symphony concerts, the program opening with the tone poem "A Hero Life." Ossip Gabrilowitsch followed as soloist in Tschalkowsky's first piano concert, and Wagner closed the selections with an excerpt from "Tristan and Isolde." It is about seven years since the Strauss work has been played here, and its advent was somewhat of a novelty. That it is as puzzling as ever to the general ear cannot well be denied, for, despite the "advance" in musical culture and understanding, the work sounds as queer today as it did in 1901.

Wonderful in its orchestral structure, and revealing a master hand in working out combinations of the different instrumental choirs, there is so much of the dissonant and inharmonic woven into the "melodies" that the ear frequently is assailed with sounds that suggest incompetency among the performers.

And yet here and there are exquisite melodic thoughts beautifully expressed and appealing to the lover of "real tunes." But brief are these moments, the composer apparently taking delight in introducing cross harmonies, strange modulations or some other form of his musical fancy.

The bigness of the composition is universally recognized, but its value is, and probably will be for years, a dubious proposition. Mr Fiedler and his band showed it was no child's play to interpret this hero life according to the Strauss idea; but all the multiplex difficulties of the work were splendidly surmounted, and evidently to the satisfaction of the conductor. Mr Hess did his solo allotment skilfully and all the fortissimo passages received the expected vigorous exploitation.

Mr Gabrilowitsch performed the Tschalkowsky concerto magnificently. It is a man's piece in nearly every movement and in the heavy chord passages of the first part Mr Gabrilowitsch gave early evidence that his performance was to be one worthy of high commendation. And so it proved to be.

The beautiful melody of the first movement, at first simple in its voicing and finally developing into crashing passage work, was given through gradations artistically set forth by the player, whose clarity and smoothness in light finger work were of the finest quality.

The cantabel in the second part was delightfully melodic and delicate and the turbulence of the finale was fairly electrifying in its effect. All in all it was a performance of surpassing vigor, skill in tonal coloring and execution and brilliancy, and the audience was justified in its hearty tributes of appreciation. Mr Gabrilowitsch was recalled to the stage a half dozen times. The orchestral assistance was sympathetic and inspiring. Mr Fiedler gave an admirable reading of the Wagner selection along traditional lines.

There will be no Symphony concerts this week, as the orchestra will be away on its second monthly trip. The soloists on this trip will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch in Washington, New York and Brooklyn; Emil Sauer in New York, Mme Rappold in Philadelphia; Mme Emma Eames in Baltimore. The principal orchestral works to be performed will be the "Scheherazade," a suite by Rimsky-Korsakoff; Strauss' "Eln Heldenleben" and Tschalkowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. Miss Emmy Destinn of the Metropolitan opera company will be the soloist at the next concerts here.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Richard Strauss' "A Hero Life"
Given for the Second Time in
Boston

Post BY OLIN DOWNES Nov. 28-1908
Richard Strauss' great tone poem for orchestra, "A Hero Life," was given performance for the second time in Boston yesterday afternoon at the seventh Symphony rehearsal of the season.

"Eln Heldenleben" was first heard in this city when Mr. Gericke was here in 1901. It was then difficult for the majority of hearers to form any opinions of the work. Strauss was quite new to us seven short years ago. He wrote music which seemed, and seems, to the more conservative of the passing generation, too complicated to retain either beauty or intelligibility.

The hero stands on his own feet. Perhaps there is a touch of the flamboyant about him, yet he elicits your unwilling admiration, and the opening section, which portrays the individual, is splendid, vigorous, soundly constructed music. The second division, "The Hero's Enemies"—they who mock and gibe and snarl at the great man—is a masterpiece of malicious irony. It would not have been surprising to have looked up and discovered the woodwind players "making faces" just then. The enemies, as depicted by the composer, are surely a hellish crew.

The solo violin represents the loved one in what is to us an unfavorable light. Such a coquette! Such a whirligig! Was this the present Mrs. Strauss in the days of her youth? Perish the thought! The determined wooing of the swain, the ultimate acquiescence of the adored, are so obviously set forth that he who runs might read. The love music which follows has genuine tenderness, though the tenderness is very German, and rather heavy, and inclined toward sentimentalism.

The battle scene has long ere this set audiences by the ears. It is the ne plus ultra of magnificent contrapuntal effrontery. Themes are fairly hurtled against each other. The lyric phrase associated with the beloved appears ever and anon amid the brutal shrieking cacophony and the pounding of the drums, sailing smoothly along above or between the other motives. Such sure and prodigious workmanship is confounding! And out of the maelstrom which has served for what technicians call the "development section" we come, firm on our feet, the hero theme triumphantly hurled out by the brass in the primary tonality of the piece, and the "recapitulation" begins, called by Strauss "The Hero's Works of Peace." And what are they? Why, "Don Juan," "Don Quixote," "Traum durch die Dämmerung," by Richard Strauss! This new material is introduced with consummate skill. But of what avail the simple life? Still the world is scornful. Existence is a delusion. And now comes one of the most wonderful passages of the whole tone poem. In the throes of a diminished seventh chord, while the strings rush up and down a sizzling chromatic scale, the whole orchestra shudders. Is this revulsion, world-weariness? Does the hero say, with Lenau's Don Juan, though from a different point of view, "Exhausted is the fuel, and on the hearth the cold is fiercely cruel?" But this passes. Noble pages follow. Music of contemplation and sonorous majesty. The Hero dies, and a magnificent E flat chord accompanies his passing.

Works such as this should be heard oftener than twice within seven years. One can only record impressions now. The world moves swiftly. The music was surprisingly clear yesterday. It is absolutely symphonic in texture. Strauss' canvas is large to the point of raw wildness. He fills it with great masses and a multiplicity of detail, though these details are kept in place, and the architecture is designed in broad, big lines. He handles his material with freedom, but he keeps well within the tenets of the form perfected by Beethoven. Yet, with all this, the "Heldenleben" seems at a second hearing swollen, elephantine and curiously out of perspective in spots.

What a monstrous effusion it is! You may not like it, it may rouse your most deep-seated artistic antagonisms, but you can hardly pass it by—this ebullient, overwhelming outpouring. And whether Strauss does, or does not, portray himself in what is generally considered the composer's autobiography, the work is beyond peradventure the product of an egotism so sublime as to be its own excuse.

182

Of Mr. Gabrilowitsch's performance of Tchaikowsky's B-flat minor piano concerto, and of the Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde," which brought the concert to an end, we will speak tomorrow.

THE PASSING YEARS

At the seventh Symphony concert of the season Mr. Fiedler gave a rousing performance of Strauss' gigantic tone-poem, "Ein Heldenleben"; Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, followed with an equally individual performance of Tchaikowsky's gorgeous B flat minor concerto, and the concert came to an end with the mounting passion of the Prelude and Liebestod from Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde."

We heard the "Heldenleben" for the first time in 1901, and it was a bewildering sensation then. How times have changed! Strauss was setting the world awry with his apparently iconoclastic theories 15 years ago, but how differently, even now, do we look upon him. It was ever thus. Nature will pursue her way. Given, in the course of human development, the desire, conscious or sub-conscious, for a broader and more significant musical speech, and up rises the composer born to fulfil that need. Given, again, the composer, with his enormous demands on the faculties and intellects, and behold, we develop with astounding rapidity more highly sensitized ears to meet those demands. No doubt a good part of the credit belongs to Mr. Fiedler, but the audience listened in a far different manner than it did only seven years ago. How apparent it all was! How could it ever have been otherwise?

Tschaikowsky's concerto, with all its barbaric splendor and opulent color, was robbed of its full effect by the preceding piece. Mr. Gabrilowitsch was in fine fettle, and he had his own idea of the concerto, though it was of little avail to exhausted nerves. There should have been a 20-minute intermission, for only an Over-man may survive the "Heldenleben" with an appetite for more. Post

GALA NIGHT AT THE SYMPHONY

Conductor, Soloist and Players Divide Evening's Honors.

REMARKABLE FOR THE ENTHUSIASM

Gabrilowitsch Congratulates the Orchestra and So Does Fiedler.

Saturday night's Symphony concert was one of the most brilliant of the season. It was remarkable for the enthusiasm that followed each number. Mr. Fiedler, the conductor; Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the young Russian who appeared as soloist, and the orchestra itself had a share of the applause, though Mr. Fiedler modestly gave his to the orchestra. This happened at the end of the performance of Richard Strauss' gigantic tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben," which had not been played at a Symphony concert for eight years. Strauss is quoted as saying of "Ein Heldenleben": "There is no need of a program. It is enough to know that there is a hero fighting his enemies." It was in this simple but strenuous spirit that Mr. Fiedler interpreted the work and the orchestra played it. The audience applauded until the orchestra had stood up twice to acknowledge the compliment—an unusual occurrence.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch chose the charming Tchaikowsky concerto in B flat minor, which by chance had its first performance in Boston in 1875, with Von Bülow as soloist. The performance Saturday night was in the nature of splendid rivalry between pianist and orchestra, and at the close, while the audience was delivering its applause, there were mutual congratulations. Mr. Gabrilowitsch shook hands not only with the conductor, but with the concert master—and thus, by proxy, with the whole orchestra. Then he indulged himself in well deserved recalls.

The concluding number was the prelude and "Love Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," also stirring and artistically performed.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE MOST NOTABLE, THUS FAR, OF THE SERIES

Strauss's Tone-Poem, "A Hero's Life," for the First Time in Seven Years—The New and Strong Impressions That the Music Made—Mr. Fiedler's Ample Share in Them—Tschaikowski, with Mr. Gabrilowitsch, and Wagner for the Rest of the Concert—The Interesting Contrasts of Power Trans. Nov. 28, 1908.

The seventh Symphony Concert fulfilled yesterday afternoon the good fortune that presumably lurked in its number, and proved the most interesting and stirring, thus far, of the year. It began with Strauss's tone-poem, "A Hero's Life," revived for the first time in seven years and one of the pieces in which, and with good reason, Mr. Fiedler's conducting is of wide and high reputation in Europe. It continued with one of the few puissant and splendid piano concertos of the last half century. Tchaikowski's in B-flat minor, with Mr. Gabrilowitsch to play the piano part with a broader power and a more fiery intensity than he has hitherto disclosed here. It ended with the passionate prelude that Wagner wrote to his opera of "Tristan and Isolde" and the transfiguring love-song in which he set her spirit free. From beginning to end, the music of the concert was charged and surcharged with passion of idea, feeling and expression. It stretched to the utmost the technical and the emotional resources of the orchestra and the conductor. It engrossed, enthralled—and exhausted—the listeners. Above all, in nature, if not in exact date, it was music of our own time, bone of our bone, flesh of our flesh; in substance and in style, in thought and passion of the generation that heard and applauded it. The classics are the classics and they are good; but they may not stir some of us as that which we ourselves have wrought musically in the image of our own minds and hearts.

The beginning of "A Hero's Life" is as superb in its creative and visualizing power as is the shorter introduction to "Zarathustra." In sheer magnificence of passionate and vivifying tone, it may stand beside the mighty sweep of the final measures of "Death and Transfiguration." In sheer characterizing force, even such passages as those which delineate Don Quixote do not excel it. The orchestra begins, and in a few measures the hero, the ideal hero, strides into existence, panoplied in his strength, lofty of spirit, rejoicing in his life. He has sprung out of this creative music as Minerva out of the brow of Jove. The orchestra proceeds. The sternest purist of us all could not question its orderly development, fertile, imaginative, potent, everywhere sufficient in its abstract self, yet everywhere serving the concrete purpose of the composer. The sternest critic of programme music could no more resent the use to which Strauss has put it. He bids it vivify less an ideal hero than the ideal of exalted and struggling heroism. The orchestra proceeds; and steadily it is clothing the hero with new and clear traits. We learn the strength of his will, the exaltation of his purpose, the richness of his nature. The music assembles these heroic attributes, girds him with them and then in climax proclaims him fully armed to the world where he must battle. Strauss has seldom written with more vividness, eloquence and power. He has wrought his design and achieved his idea superbly and by wholly musical means worked and welded by a master of invention and development, of variety within unity, of polyphony and harmony, of rhythm and color. He has created in tones a hero.

133

Follows the tone-picture of the glib, jabbering, malignant world into which the hero strides. When "Ein Heldenleben" was new we that listened prattled much of croaking bassoons, shrieking flutes, and of every snarling contrast or combination of instrumental timbres with which Strauss has given this world voice. It squeaked and chattered and muttered yesterday afternoon, and no less came the answering smile. But the mood of the music and the mood of the listener changes when Strauss transforms the musical means by which he has created his hero and makes them disclose him downcast with these things, rebellious at them. The imaginative purpose of this music seemed now uppermost; its course was revealing another side of the hero's spirit, to which these dissonant sniggerings were but the vivid background. The design of the whole tone-poem had advanced another stage; it was creating itself out of itself. The imaginative and the musical power of Strauss were interlaced to eloquence.

Then the orchestra, or rather almost a single instrument in it, the first violin, again creates—the ideal woman, the woman fit to stir such a hero and to mate with him. She springs to life in the solo passages that gradually disclose and define her. In the rest of the orchestra, the hero sees and hears; longing wakes in him and rises to passion. The woman answers, kindles, gives herself in the poignant voice of the violin. The whole orchestra hymns the depth and the intensity of the heroic passion of the pair. The mutterings of the outer world fall away and are nearly still. Again the tone-poem is evolving itself out of itself, rearing its own design, achieving its own form, speaking with its own voice. It is as organic, as architectural, as interrelated and as adjusted in mass and detail, as orderly in development, as sensitive to its chosen form as though it were the most abstract of music. Yet it is calling ideal figures to life, giving them deep emotions and voices of sublimated beauty and lofty eloquence.

The trumpets sound, muted and far; the march to war begins; the battle follows; the din hurries; the foes are routed; the clamor dies; the chant of victory mounts. It was easy in the early days of "Ein Heldenleben" to call this battle piece a confused orgy of hideous sound, and the witty Huneker once put it into print in line after line of warring and whirling consonants. It is no less ear-racking and nerve-racking today. Strauss, the realist, might have retorted that battles inevitably are things of hideous din and that he was bound to suggest them in no less ugly and clamorous music. But now that the listener anticipates all this hurly-burly of dissonance, he instinctively makes it a background. Against this background he hears and sees the hero marching in his strength; catches his vision of the inspiring ideal woman; and out of the reek and riot feels the chant of victory swell. Again, the poetic purport of the music and of the idea behind, its creative and visualizing power, the mighty march and unfolding of its design come uppermost, and the details that seemed so momentous fuse into a mere background, under the energy of Strauss's imagination and expression of what are really the essential things.

The point of repose follows, and who knew and who cared yesterday whether Strauss was quoting fragments from his other music and fusing them with each other and with the melodic ideas of "Ein Heldenleben" in almost superhuman strands of polyphony? There is a passage, say the analysts, wherein he is plying simultaneously twenty-three—or is it twenty-four?—of these musical ideas. Neither the number nor the intricacy matters to the hearer. Strauss, with his cerebral energy and subtlety and polyphonic mastery and daring, has indeed written such music, page upon page. He has not, however, forgotten that it must also be heard to emotional purpose; that it must summon and maintain a mood; and that in this particular case it must continue to disclose his hero. Quotation or no quotation, feats or no feats of polyphony, it does accomplish these things. The hero brooding, the hero melancholy, the hero dreaming dreams and seeing visions lives in the music, freighted with sadness and longing. And these things were clearer now than they were when we listeners leaped to each intricate detail that we believed we had discovered.

Then "The Passing of the Hero" ends and completes the tone-poem. He has lived his life as an ideal figure; it has lived its life as organic music rising out of itself, making its own form, accomplishing its own ends. The close is near. The hero recalls his life as in long vision the music recalls itself. The purely musical and the purely poetic content of "Ein Heldenleben" pass in fused and transfigured epitome before the listening ear and imagination. Slowly, insistently rises the melody of the ideal woman but more distinct now—the melody of the ideal the hero has sought and cherished. Upon it the hero is translated. The death music is austere brief and simple, in its bare and solemn sorrow. The night and the silence out of which the hero seemed to spring in those impinging, vivid measures that brought him into the world close again upon him.

Such seemed "Ein Heldenleben" yesterday, and it owed many of its new aspects, and not a little of its new power and eloquence to Mr. Fiedler's reading of it. Undoubtedly nowadays we hear Strauss's music more clearly and truly for what it is than we did when it was the sensation of the hour ten years ago, and we do so in part because our conductors themselves take it less sensationally. In those days they were in custom bound to intensify every snigger and squall of "the hero's detractors," to heap a Pelion of din upon an Ossa of dissonance in the battle-piece, and to emphasize unusual or intricate detail from beginning to end. Such methods hid the larger aspects of the music and killed its true spirit. Musical and poetic ideas vanished in what Strauss had designed merely as backgrounds; large conceptions and large fulfilment of them became mere strands of superhuman polyphony and purple patches of instrumentation; the tone-poem proceeded in bits rather than mounted and expanded into an organic whole; while pedantically insistent detail hid the noble architecture that carried it.

Mr. Fiedler counted the jabber of the adversaries and the din of the stricken field but as background for the large poetic ideas, the musically living figures that moved against them. He turned polyphony into passionate eloquence. He made feats of instrumentation alive with meaning and feeling. He wove detail of all sorts into the huge and splendid web of the whole. Above all, as his performance of Tschalkovski's "Pathetic" symphony foreshadowed, he comprehended the vast design, the mighty evolution, the grandeur, the power of the whole tone-poem. It rose, under his hand, as Strauss would have it rise, creating itself, solid of substance, massive of form, vivid of image, passionately eloquent and vital always. He carried the music to its true nobility; he sustained it at its true grandeur. He kept its exaltation of idea, of feeling, of utterance. He caught its epic stride. The weight of thought, the intensity of passion, the beauty and the power of the music each spoke in his reading. Through the tonal magnificence of the orchestra they spoke only the more eloquently. The performance as well as the music had its creative force.

A piano concerto may be a small thing after such a tone-poem, but Tschalkovski in it seemed in no wise small at the heels of Strauss. Perhaps, indeed, the introduction to the concerto in B-flat minor is to the beginning of most other modern concertos as the opening of "Ein Heldenleben" is to that of many a tone-poem. Again, the music was vital with power and eloquence. It created itself, it wrought passionate and poetic mood. It had breadth and stride. Then through the concerto, after the diatonic sweep of Strauss, came and went the finer chromatic intensities of Tschalkovski. Writing as he was to no kindling programme, writing, as he confessed, in partial subjection to his chosen instrument, he keeps a noble and fiery ardor, that sets the music glowing with beauty and tingling with energy of idea and expression. The beauty in the changeful Russian has its moments of softness, its intervals of gayety, its riot of high spirits, but it is always a vivid and vital beauty. The energy never flags. It makes form pliant and expressive; it gives the piano a spontaneous voice; it carries the concerto forward and upward, as though a composer were actually writing such a piece from sheer creative impulse. Tschalkovski has much to say that is rare in the dry and perfunctory or the stirring and perverse concertos of our time. He says it with an eagerness and an intensity that make and keep the concerto a living form. And Mr. Gabrilowitsch played it with an understanding, a power and a large and deep eloquence that were like to Mr. Fiedler's with the tone-poem. The introduction came as a passionate declamation: the allegro was all changeful fire, now bright and hot and then soft and warm; the cradle song of the slow movement held its simple charm, and in the finale wild, high spirits danced and raced to the breathless close. The piano was no solo instrument for display, but the characteristic voice of the music, and not once did Mr. Gabrilowitsch forget that the concerto had substance, design and form, with all its ardors of mood and speech.

And Wagner ended the concert with still another sort of power. Strauss had wrought his ideal and heroic figures striving in an epic world of tones. Tschalkovski had filled a classic form with new vitality and eloquence. His was a passion and a beauty of sound in itself. Wagner, in turn, now wrought into tones human passions intoxicating and exalting, torturing and desolating human beings caught in the bonds of love and fate and death. The eloquence of the prelude to "Tristan" seemed more human than is either Strauss's or Tschalkovski's; the voice of Isolde's final love song, though there was no Isolde but only an orchestra, seemed a more human and poignant voice. The radiant strings—and how luminously and throbbingly, the violins played—clothed Isolde in their brightness, her great passion swelled out of the orchestra till it seemed to release her. It was the end of a human tragedy, the triumph of a human love, and there was no mistaking the answering human thrill. H. T. P.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

THE NEW STRAUSS AND THE OLD WAGNER

"A Hero's Life" and the Prelude to "Tristan" as Mr. Fiedler Played Them, and the Comparison That His Ways with Them Suggested—The Lekeu Club Gives Its First Concert—Mr. Mahler Conducts in Concert for the First Time in America—A Novel of Hardy on a Dorset Stage—"The Trumpet-Major" Played—Local Musical News—The Double Travesty That "Joe" Weber Brings Here—The Cast for "The Pipe of Desire"—Mr. Hadley's "Salome" in New York

Trans. — Nov. 30, 1908

Mr. Fiedler had his just reward at the Symphony Concert of Saturday. His audience not only listened to "A Hero's Life" with absorbed and unwearying interest, as indeed had the hearers of Friday afternoon, but at the end they applauded the conductor and his men long and ardently. All this was the more significant because the public of the Symphony Concerts is a little careless of applause. It is so used to them as it were; week after week, it sees the same orchestra and the same conductor before it, and the same faces around it. Week after week, it hears interesting music ably performed. Inevitably and almost unconsciously it is inclined to take the concerts for granted and to assume that orchestra and conductor are as sure of its interest and approval. They, however, are only men. Each week they are bringing different pieces to performance and to the utmost of their ability. They know that the same audiences are listening; and for that very reason, they are the more eager to please and to stir them anew. The audible token that they have gained their ends is applause, and hearing it, they go with the more confidence and zest to their next task. What the listeners take for granted seems to them only one more meeting of a fresh test. With the audience, applause is the token of a pleasure that has just ended. To conductor and to players it is rather a spur to make the next pleasure the fuller and keener.

Certainly the two performances of Strauss's tone-poem deserved all the applause that they received, and they suggested that his music is to undergo the same fortune here in America as befell Wagner's music-dramas. We heard them first, for example, at the hands of the Germans who sought in particular power, hemence and the large and sweeping movement that spring from these qualities at their best. Then came performances of the music-dramas with international casts, and the goal was beauty and finesse as well as power and sweep. In similar fashion, when we in America first heard Strauss's tone-poems, the chief aim of those who performed them seemed often the disclosing of the ruder, the unusual, the more superficial qualities of the music, while its recurring beauty, its truly poetic passion and its subtler qualities of psychological insight and expression went too little heeded. We heard so much of the wonders of Strauss's polyphony and instrumentation that we forget the mastery of musical design and of musical form, in the freer and the less academic sense, which these marvels served.

As a new generation of finer and more discriminating singing-actors came to Wagner's operas in the days of Mr. de Reszke and Miss Ternina, so a new generation of conductors may be coming to Strauss's tone-poems. Take, for example, Mr. Fiedler's two performances of "Ein Heldenleben." The clearest impressions of them were the fashion in which he and the orchestra reared the large structure of Strauss's tone-poem and steadily disclosed its musical and its psychological architecture; the luminous adjustment of backgrounds and the penetrating proportioning of details; and the incessant emphasis of the beauty and the poetic quality of the music and not of what is merely big or merely unusual in it. The tone-poem rose under Mr. Fiedler's hand as the vast and organic musical design that it is. He saw the end from the beginning no less truly than did Strauss. He perceived how intrinsically symphonic the music is. He made it rear itself from the introduction that unfolds the hero and his mate through the exposition and the free fantasia of the middle sections, to the coda that is at once the apotheosis of the hero and a musical summary of all that has gone before. So he made the piece like to a vast symphony, and into the mighty web of it he wrought each strand of detail and decoration. He did not mistake backgrounds for foregrounds in the section of the battle and the adversaries; he did not hide the wood with the trees in the section of the hero's memories. Above all, he disclosed very fully the passionate beauty, the truly poetic characterization of the hero's wooing; the loftier and deeper beauty of the hero's visions; the poignant tenderness of his musings and the glory of the mighty and serene close that mounts like the opening of some tonal heaven to the final and encompassing chord. To do these things as Mr. Fiedler did them is almost to re-create Strauss and at last in his own true image.

On the other hand, if Mr. Fiedler sought a new way with Strauss, he walked obediently in the old with the prelude to "Tristan" and Isolde's love-song. Dutifully he followed the old

"grand style" that proclaims the doom of the lovers; that sends their passion steadily upward and upward in broad waves of ecstasy; that breaks and descends again, makes the murmuring transition to Isolde's song and then sweeps it upward to swelling climax and luminous ecstasy. Not so, the newer and neurotic way that makes the music of the passion of the lovers almost wrench itself from the doom that fate has prepared for them; that gives each phrase, almost each measure, of the ascending love music its nervous and quivering thrill; that makes the climax of the prelude a single moment of tremulous ecstasy; that makes Isolde's love-song twilight and shadowy, sad and tender, the low, soft speech of her own spirit to Tristan's, the sublimated voice of their passion, and no mighty proclamation that "Love is stronger than Death." The new way Mr. Mahler brought to us last spring, Mr. Fiedler overwhelmed it with the old.

As Tschalkowsky's concerto was played again by Mr. Gabrilowitsch, it was national flavor that came uppermost. It permeated both performer and performance. The piece took on the character of the ideal concerto; it was as if soloist and orchestra had united in a free improvisation. It was true that for the first few minutes the reminiscences of elder concertos flitted across the hearing, shadowy reminders of Liszt in cascades of chromatics, or Beethoven's concertos in thunderous triple chords sunded alternately by orchestra and piano, or Chopin in arabesques which wove their patterns from bass to treble—inclining one, if not to sympathy at least to tolerance for the savage Nicholas Rubenstein, so prone to lay his index finger on "borrowings." But as the movement progressed, these fell away and vanished altogether, leaving only the music of the fiery Slav played in no less fiery mood—a concerto which has no more the laborious piecing together of symphonic orchestration and feathery keyboard rhythms, but a fusion of instruments out of which emerged the distinct outlines of the plan, with that unity which sees the end from the beginning. The concerto gives us three Russians, the symphonic, the romantic and the nationalist. Mr. Gabrilowitsch was a scholarly symphonist on the somewhat uncertain footing of the first movement; his musings in the Andantino were becomingly individual, but the national consciousness dominated the whole performance and found its true utterance in the furious career of the Slavic finale.

SEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT OF SEASON

Strauss' Tone-Poem "A Hero Life," Is Performed with Great Effect.

NEW STRENGTH AND BEAUTY DISCLOSED

Poetic Piano Playing by Mr. Gabrilowitsch in Concerto of Tschalkowsky.

By PHILIP HALE.

The program of the seventh Symphony concert, Mr. Fiedler conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, with the assistance of Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist, was as follows:

Tone poem, "A Hero Life".....R. Strauss
Concerto in B-flat, minor No. 1, Tschalkowsky
Prelude and "Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner

Strauss' colossal tone-poem was played here for the first time seven years ago, and it had not been heard here since until last night. It needs eight horns. For four or five years after the first performance the orchestra was not thus equipped.

Objections have been urged against this composition even by those who were not born to hate Richard Strauss and look upon him as antichrist in music. Some protest against the monstrous egoism of the man in writing thus his autobiography. Some find the battle scene too much for their nerves. Others like little of the music and they apply to it a list of adjectives as "abnormal, eccentric, morbid, complicated, violent, delirious, grotesque, swaggering, strutting, flamboyant, noisy, wildly jagged," and thus they recall Rabelais with his strings of epithets. There is no need of referring to those who object to nearly all of Strauss' music because, as they say, he is unduly fond of pecuniary gain and once was guilty of the atrocious crime of giving a concert in a department store. Yet these objectors are eminently serious persons and have much to say about purity in art.

Is this poem an autobiography? All music that is worth while is autobiographic in a way. But it is said that Strauss arrogantly paints his own portrait in tones, describes his own deed and glorifies them, holds up his enemies to scorn, introduces his wife for inspection, and at last, tired of the world, leaves it to find comfort in omphalic contemplation and the inevitable approach of death. In like manner Walt Whitman was accused of prodigious egoism because he began "Leaves of Grass": "I celebrate myself"; but Whitman added: "And what I assume you shall assume, for every atom belonging to me as good belongs to you." Every man is a hero to himself, if not to his valet. Every man has his aspirations, and the majority have their love episodes. The humblest has his enemies, and he might say, with Strauss' hero and the young man in "Maud":

Be mine a philosopher's life in the quiet woodland ways,
Where if I cannot be gay let a passionless peace be my lot.
Far off from the clamor of Mars belied in the hubbub of lies;
From the long-neck'd geese of the world that are ever hissing dispraise,
Because their natures are little, and, whether he heed it or not,
Where each man walks with his head in a cloud of poisonous flies.

And is a battle scene not a legitimate subject for musical treatment? How many composers have thought otherwise from Clement Jannequin of the 16th century, who in his "Defalte des Suisses a la journee de Marignan" attempted to imitate in vocal music fifes, drums, bugles, the thunder of cannon and the crack of musketry?

How small, how contemptible these objections seem in the presence of a master work! Let us be thankful for Strauss, his genius, his audacity! What a void there would be in the concert world today if his tone-poems had never been written.

It is true, however, that the inspiration of the greatest is never plenary. Both Aeschylus and Shakespeare wrote bombastic pages. Beethoven had his pot-boilers. Wagner his scenes of intolerable dullness. The weaknesses of Strauss are not hard to seek. His themes themselves are sometimes without marked distinction, if at other times they are superbly heroic or of ravishing beauty. There are undoubtedly passages in his later works that are effective chiefly on paper. Yet here enters the all important subject of appreciative and skilful interpretation. A conductor may be a sound musician, painstaking, an orthodox citizen, and yet make little out of the music of Richard Strauss.

Mr. Fiedler's interpretation of "A Hero Life" was highly romantic and poetic. It was at the same time analytical, in that the structure of the work was clearly revealed. And what a work it is! It is easy to say that this section and that section are the most remarkable—the truly heroic opening, the wonderful love music after the woman has put aside her coquetry as she would take off a garment, the serene music of contemplation, music that is worthy of Beethoven in his supreme moments of rapt meditation, music that is filled with the peace that passeth understanding; it is easy to prefer this or that section. I say, yet how the work is knit together, how one section depends on another, continues it or supplements it. Take the pages in which quotations from previous compositions of Strauss are introduced or hinted at. How deftly they are woven in the fabric!

There is the battle scene, discordant the objectors say. The clashing dissonances and the din disturb them. What would the gentlemen have? Echoes of a battle? Something sandpapered and oiled? In strict form, with smoothly flowing contrapuntal devices? If we are to have a battle in music, let us not be put off with a skirmish.

Mr. Fiedler is to be thanked heartily both for giving the opportunity of hearing this tone-poem again and for the magnificence of the performance.

Nor did the concerto of Tschalkowsky suffer by coming after the music of Strauss. Mr. Gabrilowitsch gave a memorable performance of the piano part, and he was assisted eloquently by the orchestra. Mr. Gabrilowitsch has gained steadily since he first came here a young man eight years ago, so that he can now be reckoned among the first. He has passed through the stages that nearly all must pass: at first a virtuoso rejoicing in his youth and strength; then the pianist striving after the true authority that does no come from force and brilliance, and, in the endeavor to gain this, erring on the other side and being a little didactic, a little dry; at last he has both the romantic spirit and the mental comprehension and grasp of the mature musician, the complete and rounded artist. His performance last night was admirable in every way. The spontaneous and long continued applause of the audience was richly deserved by him.

An effective reading of the familiar music from "Tristan and Isolde" ended the most brilliant concert of the present season.

There will be no concerts this week. The orchestral pieces of the concerts of Dec. 11 and 12 will be Norden's "Kaleidoskop: Theme and Variations" (first time in Boston); Debussy's "Nocturnes" (first time at these concerts) and the overture to "Der Freischuetz." Miss Emmy Destinn of the Royal Opera House, Berlin, and of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, will be the soloist.

RUSSIAN PIANIST AT THE SYMPHONY

Amerein Nov 29, 08

Torrent of Applause Greets Work of Gabrilowitsch at Concert.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, was the drawing card last evening at the Symphony concert. He faced a splendid audience, captivated them with his charm, grace and brilliancy, and was repaid with torrential applause. Five different times he was called to the front of the stage to show his appreciation. Not the least enthusiastic of his admirers were the members of the big orchestra.

The hall was crowded when Max Fiedler walked upon the stage and took up his baton.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch appeared after the intermission. He played Tschalkowsky's concerto No. 1 in B flat minor. It is divided into three sections. After the conclusion of each the audience manifested its warmest approval. The delicate rendition of the adante and piano, as well as the spirited playing in the livelier passages in the second section, were especially captivating.

"Beautiful! Beautiful!" exclaimed many music lovers audibly after the pianist had concluded and the storm of applause was on.

The program concluded with the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde." It was a fitting and finely executed finish to one of the most enjoyable concerts of the season.

MUSICAL EVENTS

RICHARD STRAUSS' monumental tone-poem, "Ein Heldenleben," will be the offering on next week's symphony programme. This great work, which is supposed to embody Strauss' idea of his own tumultuous musical career, has appeared only once on Symphony programmes, having been played under Mr. Gericke on Dec. 6 and 7, 1901—just short of eight years ago.

It is an interesting fact that Paur gave it in New York that season four times at two different pairs of Philharmonic concerts. In the same season Mr. Gericke played it in Boston, he played it in New York with great success.

It will be particularly interesting to hear Mr. Fiedler's interpretation of the Strauss tone-poem, for he is regarded as a specialist on Strauss' music. In sharp contrast with this work of Strauss will be the other orchestral number, the Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde." This very popular excerpt from Wagner's great love drama has not been heard at a symphony concert in several years.

The soloist will be Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, who appears after an absence of two years. He will play Tschalkowsky's Concerto No. 1 in B-flat minor.

THE PASSING YEARS

At the seventh Symphony concert of the season Mr. Fiedler gave a rousing performance of Strauss' gigantic tone-poem, "Ein Heldenleben"; Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, followed with an equally individual performance of Tschalkowsky's gorgeous B flat minor concerto, and the concert came to an end with the mounting passion of the Prelude and Liebestod from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

We heard the "Heldenleben" for the first time in 1901, and it was a bewildering sensation then. How times have changed! Strauss was setting the world awry with his apparently iconoclastic theories 15 years ago, but how differently, even now, do we look upon him. It was ever thus. Nature will pursue her way. Given, in the course of human development, the desire, conscious or sub-conscious, for a broader and more significant musical speech, and up rises the composer born to fulfil that need. Given, again, the composer, with his enormous demands on the faculties and intellects, and behold, we develop with astounding rapidity more highly sensitized ears to meet those demands. No doubt a good part of the credit belongs to Mr. Fiedler, but the audience listened in a far different manner than it did only seven years ago. How apparent it all was! How could it ever have been otherwise?

Tschalkowsky's concerto, with all its barbaric splendor and opulent color, was robbed of its full effect by the preceding piece. Mr. Gabrilowitsch was in fine fettle, and he had his own idea of the concerto, though it was of little avail to exhausted nerves. There should have been a 20-minute intermission, for only an Over-man may survive the "Heldenleben" with an appetite for more.

Traveller - Nov 25, 08

MUSICAL EVENTS

RICHARD STRAUSS' monumental tone-poem, "Ein Heldenleben," will be the offering on next week's symphony programme. This great work, which is supposed to embody Strauss' idea of his own tumultuous musical career, has appeared only once on Symphony programmes, having been played under Mr. Gericke on Dec. 6 and 7, 1901—just short of eight years ago.

It is an interesting fact that Paur gave it in New York that season four times at two different pairs of Philharmonic concerts. In the same season Mr. Gericke played it in Boston, he played it in New York with great success.

It will be particularly interesting to hear Mr. Fiedler's interpretation of the Strauss tone-poem, for he is regarded as a specialist on Strauss' music. In sharp contrast with this work of Strauss will be the other orchestral number, the Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde." This very popular excerpt from Wagner's great love drama has not been heard at a symphony concert in several years.

The soloist will be Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, who appears after an absence of two years. He will play Tschalkowsky's Concerto No. 1 in B-flat minor.

The first concert of the Longy Club will be given in Potter's Hall this evening. The concert gains great interest from the fact that Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, will appear as the assisting artist.

The first Pension Fund Concert of the present year will be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, Dec. 1. Mr. Fiedler has arranged a programme which promises much in the way of interesting music.

CONCERT.

DECEMBER 19, AT 8 P.M.

PROGRAMME.

1. TRILOGY, "Wallenstein."

in A major for PIANO.

RSCH.

ist:

GANZ.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 12, AT 8 P. M.

Programme.

H. G. NOREN	"KALEIDOSCOPE," original Theme and Variations for Orchestra, op. 30. (First time in Boston.)
WAGNER	SENTA'S BALLAD from "The Flying Dutchman."
DEBUSSY	THREE NOCTURNES: "Clouds," "Festivities," "Sirens." (with a FEMALE CHORUS from the New England Conservatory of Music.) (First time at these concerts.)
SCHUBERT	SONGS with PIANOFORTE. a) "THE SIGN POST." b) "GERTRUDE AT THE SPINNING WHEEL." c) "ERL KING."
WEBER	OVERTURE to the opera "Die Freischütz."

Soloist:

Miss EMMY DESTINN.

Of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Another Programme of Notable Music—
Noren's "Kaleidoscope" for the First Time and Debussy's "Nocturnes" to New Hearing—Miss Destinn and Her Singing—Miss Duncan Dances Again—Musical News

Trans.

Dec. 12, 1908

Mr. Fiedler likes a programme that assembles striking pieces each in its kind. He likes no less to have the contrasts between them keen and clear. He is fain to make each concert as exciting as he may, and yesterday in all three respects he succeeded to admiration. The three orchestral numbers were Noren's new variations, "The Kaleidoscope," for large invention, imagination and utterance, and for a kind of solid brilliance that was truly German; Debussy's "Nocturnes" for endless subtlety, delicacy and felicity of rare idea and rare expression, and Weber's overture to his opera "Der Freischütz" for what much repetition has almost turned into passionate commonplace. Between these orchestral pieces, Miss Emmy Destinn of the Metropolitan appearing here for the first time sang Senta's ballad from "The Flying Dutchman" and three familiar songs—"The Guide Post," "Gretchen Spinning" and "The Erl-King"—from Schubert as a dramatic singer of warm and sensitive understanding and of vital and communicating tones may sing them. Moreover, in the third of Debussy's "Nocturnes" a choir of thirty-two of the advanced pupils of the New England Conservatory sang the wordless song of the sirens. Mr. Chadwick himself had trained them in the difficult music and not only to its exacting demands of accuracy but to the quality of tone that it asks. From beginning to end, thus the music and the performance made as remarkable a concert as that of a fortnight ago.

Noren's Variations are cause for wonder at his long obscurity. At least twenty years of his working life he has spent as a teacher of music and as a composer of minor pieces. Then suddenly he has emerged with the unusual, the striking, the highly individual "Kaleidoscope," and fortuitous litigation over it proved another stroke of kindly fate. A theme and variations, with a fugue or a double fugue for ending, are one of the most prosaic and academic forms of absolute music. Two centuries of composers have worried and sterilized the form, even as they have the themes that they chose for their exercise in it. The more therefore does it tempt some composers of a third century, who set the expressive and the delineative quality of their music above all else. Strauss, to cite an extreme example, wrought his tonal characterization of Don Quixote and Sancho Panza and his panorama of tone-pictures of their adventures into the form of a theme and variations, and made the music marvellously graphic. He subdued the cho-form, as his wont is, to the purposes he had in hand, or, more truly, he made the form assert and emphasize those purposes.

Reger in his turn would vitalize the form by the energy, the fertility, the nervousness of his expression within the limits of music that has no other end than its own significant qualities.

Now Noren, even though "The Kaleidoscope" may prove only a remarkable tour de force, takes his place between Strauss and Reger in this modernizing of an academic form. He has devised eleven variations upon his theme; or more probably he designed the scheme of the eleven and then sought long for the theme that would breed them. Each variation has its individuality of mood and suggestion. Each he would have persuasively atmospheric. A title gives the clew—"In the Cathedral," "A Funeral March," "From Olden Days,"
"Humor" and so forth to a Mazurka, a Slav Dance or such a purely musical title as Canon. The clew is more than sufficient hint. The music in every variation achieves the suggestion that the composer would impart and leads the hearer into its mood and atmosphere. Various indeed are these suggestions, but Noren accomplishes each with almost equal pregnancy and skill. And he gains all this by wholly unforced and unobtrusive means. His variations spring readily from his chosen theme; each is admirably lucid in itself and its relation to the generating melody. He develops each with no less admirable fertility of invention and deference for form. His harmonies, his instrumentation, his every means to give color to his music are as resourceful and as adept. He ends with a double fugue that the Strauss of the "Domestica" might envy and that Reger might applaud. And while Noren is racing through it, while he is pilling climax upon climax, the music is as vivid of the suggestion he would have it carry. Out of "Heldenleben" come the voices of the "adversaries" of progress in music, the carpers and the mockers. They buzz about Noren's theme, and then it beats them down in as glorious a tonal fight as a fugue has brought in many a day. It is the symbol of the progress and the victory of "The Kaleidoscope."

Then followed, after the passionate intermezzo of Miss Destinn's singing, the strange beauty and the strange suggestion of Debussy's "Nocturnes." Noren's music is wholly normal. It is one of its virtues that by such normal means it gains so unusual ends. Debussy's means, even after many repetitions in other pieces, even after the analysts have shown in these particular "Nocturnes" that the music has a true and characteristic form, still seem rare, uncannily subtle, wholly individual. They perfectly accomplish their purpose. Not even the music of "Pelléas and Mélisande" works its will more surely, or more intimately fuses matter and manner, the things to be expressed and the expression of them.
The first "Nocturne" of "The Clouds" is, beside much of Debussy's music, tangible tone-picturing, and it is not merely by harmonic suggestion, by the association and disassociation of instrumental voices, by a development that seems to run all in tonal filament that Debussy paints his picture. His is the thought that summons the image when he gives that thought voice and life in tones as the thought of the poet, alive in his words, summons the image as his poetry seeks. The sky and the passing clouds do rise in vision out of the tones and in a vision of the poet's eye. No less persuasive is the pictorial and the atmospheric quality of the third "Nocturne" of "The Sirens." Out of the night and the stillness comes the song, distant, nearing, beguiling, holding—a song to pursue and never find. Below the voices, in the orchestra, is the glimmering, curling sea, bearing the song, catching it into itself, setting it free again. And the song and the background are as one. Between is the Nocturne that Debussy calls "Fetes," the dance, the pageant of the dazzling lights, the whirling atoms of his radiant vision. The music is as dazzling as they.

H. T. P.

Trans. NOREN AND DEBUSSY
Dec. 14, 1908
The German's Variations and the Frenchman's "Nocturnes" as They Seemed at a Second Hearing

Such traits will, and such traits did, bring the sound, the thoughtful brilliance of Mr. Noren's Variations on Saturday, and the more for these virtues of performance, did a second hearing of this "Kaleidoscope" suggest that the composer mulled much as he wrote. Recall the distant shrewdly-rhythmed drum beat with which "The Kaleidoscope" begins. Recall such instrumental details as the ghostly clap of the cymbals at the end of the variation of the "Funeral March," or the faintly interposing trumpet in the variation of the olden song. How vivid the listener may have said on Friday. How ingenious he may have thought on Saturday. Perhaps Mr. Noren fixes and maintains the particular atmosphere of each variation a little too precisely. He prescribes to his hearers what they shall feel. He bids us smile when the fragments of his fugue begin to tootle in the bassoons. He preordains too clearly the victory his own theme shall win over the sniggering adversaries. It is the good German way—the way of sureness, soundness and precision, of thought and scholarship. It makes "The Kaleidoscope" satisfying music. There is no doubting that Mr. Noren had much to say, and said it ably. Yet it is hard to be curious as to what he may say, and how he may say it in his next piece.

The more for these qualities in Noren's Variations were Debussy's "Nocturnes," as repetition again disclosed them on Saturday, vividly contrasting music. Prescription is the last of Debussy's preoccupations. Suggestion, at once very light, very quick, but very kindling, is his concern. Out of his timbres, his harmonies, his filaments of melody, his clouds sail the dull sky; his lights unfold their fantastic pageant, his sirens sing over the curling sea. If the listener sees the clouds, hears the songs, catches the dazzle and the din of the lights, so much the better. Then has the music made him of like vision, ear and fancy with Debussy. If it fail of these things, Debussy is not insistent. Why insist upon the merest individual impressions, set down seemingly for him who had them, in his own way, for his own pleasure? Debussy's methods are slower even, his pains more untiring, than Noren's. He has the ingrained stylist's delight in the search for the one, the inevitable phrase, that mirrors the thing. Yet he hides his subtleties and he cloaks his search. The "Nocturnes" come and go in flocks of sound, in glimpses of beauty. The music must be studied to find that these flocks and this beauty are sedulously ordered and interwoven, harmonized, rhythmed, tinted. It is half the charm of this earlier Debussy of the "Nocturnes," of "Pelléas," and of the faun, that he seems to be writing for himself and letting his audience overhear, that he is suggesting and not insisting. The later Debussy of "The Sea," for example, may have written stouter-fibred music, but music that has lost a little of its enticement and its innocence. Debussy himself likes to talk of the perils of a reputation.

Noren's "Kaleidoscope," Debussy's Three Nocturnes and Miss Destinn to Make an Exceptional Symphony Concert—

Noren's long announced Variations—"The Kaleidoscope"—begin the programme for the Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week. The piece was originally performed at Dresden in the summer of 1907, excited lively interest up and down Germany, and was generally announced on orchestra lists for the following season. Then came the litigation with Strauss's publishers over Noren's alleged appropriation of two melodies from "Ein Heldenleben," and for some months courts, and not conductors, were busy with the Variations. When they were free for performance again, it was too late for Dr. Muck to play them here, as he had intended. They have fallen accordingly to Mr. Fiedler. Technically the piece is a theme, eleven variations and a double fugue, richly scored for full modern orchestra. Noren, however, has not written the variations as so much self-contained and self-sufficient music. He would give each a particular pictorial or poetic suggestion, and he has labelled them accordingly. A slow introduction foreshadows the theme; a sustained passage sets it forth. Then follow (Variation I.) a light prelude; (Variation II.) a "melancholy dance" in the form of a slow waltz; (Variation III.) a canon; (Variation IV.) a "chuckling and frisky" scherzo; (Variation V.) "in the cathedral" with organ-like harmonies; (Variation VI.) a pastoral piece; (Variation VII.) a funeral march; (Variation VIII.) a lively Slavonic dance; (Variation IX.) a moody song "from far-off days"; (Variation X.) a bright mazurka; (Variation XI.) "to a celebrated contemporary" with its quotations from Strauss's "A Hero's Life." Out of the two themes so quoted and of material of his own, Noren builds his double fugue; there is climax heaped upon climax; and then the whole piece ends tranquilly.

Heinrich Gottlieb Noren, whom "The Kaleidoscope" has made known after long obscurity is an Austrian musician of forty-five, with Moravian and Slovak blood in his veins. He has lived the life of a teacher of music in the conservatories of Austria and Germany and before he wrote the Variations he had some reputation as a composer in the smaller musical forms. He worked at intervals through four years at "The Kaleidoscope" and finally sent the manuscript to the managing committee of one of the German festivals at which much new music comes to hearing. It was accepted, performed at Dresden in the summer of 1907, and forthwith became the novel piece of the year. Then came the litigation. In the final variation Noren quoted twice from "A Hero's Life," used quotation marks—a rare thing in a musical score—and proceeded to combine the two subjects from Strauss with his own theme to build his double fugue. Strauss's publishers demanded indemnity for such use of the composer's melodies, resting their case upon the German statute that forbids such infringements of copyright. The learned Court, after much expert testimony and much delicate deliberation, ruled that Noren had quoted no melodies within the purview of the law, but only "musical figures." And the way was clear for "The Kaleidoscope" to make the round of the orchestral world.

The other notable number of Mr. Fiedler's programme is Debussy's three "Nocturnes," once performed here at an orchestral concert under Mr. Lang, but hitherto unheard at the Symphony Concerts. They follow "The Afternoon of a Faun" in Debussy's orchestral pieces, and they were first performed in 1900 and 1901. "The title of nocturnes," wrote Debussy at that time, and quite as much to mystify as to enlighten his hearers, "is to be interpreted in a wider sense than that usually given to it, and most especially must it be understood to have a decorative meaning . . . signifying in the amplest manner diversified impressions and special lights." The first of the three pieces is "Clouds" ("Nuages"), the second "Routs" ("Fetes") and the third "Sirens" ("Sirènes"). "In them," writes Mr. Bruneau, "with the aid of a magic orchestra, he has lent to clouds traversing the sombre sky the various forms created by his imagination; he has set to running and dancing the various forms perceived by him in the silvery dust scintillating in the moonbeams, and he has changed the white foam of the sea into tuneful sirens." According to Debussy himself the first Nocturne pictures "the unchanging aspect of the sky and the slow, solemn movement of the clouds dissolving in gray tints, lightly touched with white." The second is of "aerial revelry in the restless dancing rhythm of the atmosphere, interspersed with sudden flashes of light," and the music is a maze of delicate, iridescent harmonies, rising into a fantastic and sonorous revelry, and then declining again into radiant flecks and flickers of dancing sound. The third Nocturne, as Debussy designs it, is "of the sea and its perpetual rhythm, while amid waves silvery in the moonlight pass the sirens" in light laughter and mysterious song. It is gleaming music. In this last Nocturne Debussy asks a choir of sixteen women's voices. They will come next week from the New England Conservatory.

The singer of the two concerts will be Miss Emmy Destinn of the Metropolitan Opera House to which she came a month ago, from the Royal Opera in Berlin and from Covent Garden in London. Miss Destinn is one of the most distinguished dramatic singers of our time, and though she has made her career chiefly in the opera house, she is not unpractised in the concert-room. An article that appeared a few weeks ago in this place described her career and her traits fully, and there is no need now to repeat them. Suffice it that her chief distinction is her ability to make her tones the very voice of the character and the passion in opera, and to impart in concert the mood and the poetic and emotional content of her songs. Her voice, thus, is of dramatizing quality rather than of purely sensuous beauty; but she makes the expressive quality of her tones the more vivid by her mastery of the art of song. Here in Boston, where she sings for the first time, her pieces will be Senta's ballad from the second act of "The Flying Dutchman" (in which the girl sees the vision of the tortured Hollander and his release by a saving woman) and three songs of Schubert—Gretchen's lament as she spins, the tale of the Erl-King, and the wanderer's melancholy song of the guide-post that points him to death ("Der Wegweiser"). After these songs, Weber's overture to his opera, "Der Freischütz" will end the concert.

The Symphony Orchestra will give the third of its current series of concerts in Cambridge at the Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening with a programme that Mr. Fiedler has adroitly made of the best-liked pieces of his recent concerts in Boston—Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony, Mac Dowell's tone-poem, "Lamia," Smetana's tone-poem, "The Moldau," the overture to "Oberon" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers." Miss Lilla Ormond will be the assisting singer. Trans. Dec. 5, 1908

FOR SALE—SYMPHONY REHEARSAL
 season tickets, 2 together on floor, row H, for $55 each. Also 1 central, floor, $55. Address V.S.O., Boston Transcript. 6t(A): d7

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES 8TH CONCERT

Miss Emmy Destinn of Berlin
Royal Opera House Sings
Here for First Time.

DEBUSSY'S NOCTURNES
ARE IMPRESSIONISTIC

Noren's 'Kaleidoscope' Played in Varied Program After Years of Repression.

Herald Dec. 13, 1908
By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler conductor, gave its eighth concert last night in Symphony Hall. Miss Emmy Destinn of the Berlin Royal Opera House and the Metropolitan Opera House sang here for the first time. The program was as follows:

"Kaleidoscope"; Theme and Variations.
Noren
Senta's Ballad..... Wagner
Three Nocturnes..... Debussy
Three songs: "The Sign Post," Gretchen at the Spinning Wheel, "Erliking"..... Schubert
Overture to "Der Freischuetz"..... Weber

Noren was unknown in the musical world save as a composer of small pieces until last year, when this "Kaleidoscope: Original Theme and Variations," was performed at a festival of the Allgemeiner Deutscher Verein at Dresden and there made a sensation. The composer was then about 44 years old.

Hazlitt once alluded in a tavern to a famous passage in "Grammont's Memoirs": how the Duke of York wooed Miss Churchill, but cooled, owing, it was said, to her having a thin, pale face. "One day, as they were riding out hunting together, she fell from her horse, and was taken up almost lifeless. The whole assembled court were thrown by this event into admiration that such a body should belong to such a face (so transcendent a pattern was she of the female form), and the duke was fixed. . . . I said I could conceive of nothing finer than the idea of a young person in her situation, who was the object of indifference or scorn from outward appearance, with the proud suppressed consciousness of a goddess-like symmetry, looked up by 'fear and niceness, the handmaids of all women,' from the wonder and worship of mankind."

So with Noren. He had been for years a pedagogue, a director of a music school in Crefeld, a teacher in Berlin.

This "Kaleidoscope," begun about 1904, was laid aside because Noren was obliged to support himself by teaching, and it was not completed until early in 1907. Correcting the exercises of dull pupils, weary in routine, hearing the works of other composers applauded, knowing that he, too, had musical thought, conscious that there was something in him which would excite admiration, he was obliged to wait for the opportunity to display his talent.

Noren is not wholly a Miss Churchill. His revelation is not so overpowering. Yet this "Kaleidoscope" is one of the most interesting compositions that have come to us of late years from other Germans than Richard Strauss. Two of the variations were omitted last night—the scherzo and pastorella—probably on account of the length of the program; but the composition was long enough without them.

Noren has both contrapuntal and orchestral technique; he also has fancy, but I do not find imagination in any section of this work. His "Cathedral" is sonorous and impressive. There is the thought of the organ, the choir, the solemn scene in the sacred building, but the music is pictorial; it has no spiritual uplift. The first two variations have true character and the "Canon" is ingenious.

The Mazurka is pleasingly vulgar, spirited, intoxicating, if you will, but inherently vulgar. The Funeral March is an agreeable surprise, for in it there is no luxury of woe, no snivelling, no threadbare crape and tears, but a heroic farewell, and the lamentation is neither familiar nor perfunctory. There are fine passages in the Fantasia and Double Fugue inscribed to Strauss, in which by taking themes from the latter's "Eeldenleben" Norden was prevented from publishing his work until the court decided that, as Strauss' two motives were not melodies, there had been no plagiarism. Another case of a Daniel come to judgment. But the Fugue itself has not the rush, the spontaneity of Reger's fugue in the variations on Hiller's theme. The pedagogue is here seen, rather than the thinker, who happens to use a fugue as the best medium for a particular thought. Still, the final trampling under foot of the motive that stands for Strauss' enemies is admirably depicted. All in all, an interesting work.

Debussy's "Nocturnes" were first played here at a Chickering "production" concert, led by Mr. Lang, in February, 1904. As Norden's "Kaleidoscope" is material of the earth, earthy, the Nocturnes are music that is purely impressionistic. To him who has not watched clouds and seen in them what Mark Antony saw,

A tower'd citadel, a pendent rock,
A forked mountain, or blue promontory,

The first nocturne will be only a weariness to the ear and mind. The impression is not for him, though Baudelaire's stranger who loved only the clouds would love this music. "Festivities," with its strange processional march, its whirling capriciousness, makes a more direct appeal. Does the third movement answer the old question put by Tiberius to the grammarians and repeated by Sir Thomas Browne, "What song did the sirens sing?" Here is music of waves and of sea women; music that never was heard on a casino-lined coast, but sounds that might go with "The light that never was on sea or land." Here is music that is subtly poetic, music of ineffable beauty. Suppose that Debussy had put words to this song; how he would have cheapened the nocturne! To each hearer on the ship of Ulysses or in the hall last night the sirens sang of what might well lure him. But of these nocturnes I shall say a few words next Sunday.

Miss Destinn sang with great dramatic force and yet without too marked suggestion of the opera house. She is one of the few visitors from German opera houses—they may be counted on one hand, and there will be a finger to spare—who, when they appear in concert halls, are not aggressively and impertinently operatic. Miss Destinn's effects were made by legitimate singing and by a personality that is both sympathetic and intense. Whether she were singing Senta's ballad or a song by Schubert, she first of all respected the melodic line, the rhythm, the sound principles of vocal art.

Then by the quiet power of her interpretation, by the simplicity and the sincerity of her eloquence, she charmed both the soul and the mind of the hearers. She is not one of the shrieking sisterhood that mistake palsy for passion. She remembered that Gretchen's lament was a reverie rather than a set song. She was not in "The Erlking" obliged to resort to ventriloquism to differentiate the actors in the little and terrible drama. It was a great pleasure to hear this famous singer in concert. It is to be hoped that she will at no distant day be seen and heard in operatic parts.

The orchestral performance was a brilliant one. There might have been more atmosphere in Debussy's "Clouds." The music was at times too formal; it was almost divided into sections; but the other nocturnes and "Kaleidoscope" were performed most effectively. "Sirens" calls for only 16 female voices. Their music was sung last night by a greater number, by the Choral Club of the New England Conservatory, and the singers by the purity, the agreeable quality of their voices and by the musical and aesthetic taste displayed contributed largely to the deep impression made by Debussy's imagination and rare expression.

Emmy Destinn, Soloist
at the Symphony.

Interesting Concert Tonight for the Pension Fund.

Mr Perabo's Recital—Other
Events of the Week.

The eighth Symphony program was unusually varied in character, for there were two "first-time" pieces. Miss Emmy Destinn of the Metropolitan opera forces made her local debut as soloist, five composers were represented, short works were in the majority and there was a chorus of female voices from the New England conservatory of music to sing the "Siren" music in Debussy's nocturne. His nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivities," were also on the program. Miss Destinn sang Senta's ballad from "The Flying Dutchman" and a group of Schubert's songs. The concert opened with Noren's "Kaleidoscope," which is made up of a dozen parts, and closed with the overture to Weber's "Der Freischuetz."

Miss Destinn, who recently made her debut in New York in D'Albert's opera, "Tiefand," has a voice of splendid volume, its timbre is excellent through all registers, though a trifle pinched in the higher range; but rich and resonant and admirably suited for dramatic expression, the melodic quality not being marred by fortissimo work. An almost perfect control enables the artist to voice different sentiments with seeming ease and there are no moments of monotony in her singing.

The familiar ballad by Senta was sung with a fervor and tenderness that indicated Miss Destinn's success in the role of the heroine of the opera, and in and three songs by Schubert the artist displayed a high degree of artistry by her skill in contrasting the different moods of the composed. "The Erlking" was possibly over-accentuated in expression, but it was declaimed with a fine effect perfectly satisfactory to the audience. Miss Destinn was generously applauded. Mr Fiedler again proved his skill as an accompanist and played the piano parts for the Schubert songs.

The variations and theme by Noren, entitled "Kaleidoscope," show a modern composer who fairly juggles with orchestral resources, for in the dozen parts forming the work he introduces musical and nonmusical combinations of many degrees of difficulty, not only in performance, but in comprehension. Originally there is in pleasing evidence, and the melodic moments are not wanting, but the average ear is not attuned to all the vagaries of Noren's score. The enjoyment of the piece arose more from the skill in ensemble work shown by the orchestra than from the quality of the puzzling composition.

Another modern, Debussy, figured on the program in his nocturnes, "Clouds," "Festivities" and "Sirens," ideals fanciful in orchestration suggesting tone pictures of the titles. Scored in a masterly manner, their effect is not to be denied, though many of the modulations and some of the strange commingling of instruments certainly sound harsh even in this age of musical progress. The young women voiced the "Siren" music in commendable harmony and the orchestra performed its part in the group in the usual efficient manner. And Mr Fiedler read the "Der Freischuetz" music discreetly and without any suggestion of undue vigor.

Joseph Lhevinne, the Russian pianist, will be the soloist this week, playing Rubinstein's fifth concerto. The other numbers will be Haydn's B-flat major symphony, "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," and the "Flying Dutchman" overture.

148 Miss Destinn Scores Dec. 14, 1908 Hit With Symphony

Miss Emmy Destinn, the celebrated Bohemian soprano, whose alleged jealous feelings toward Miss Geraldine Farrar have been the subject of many a cable despatch, scored a genuine success, both personal and artistic, at Saturday night's Symphony concert.

Miss Destinn's first number was Senta's ballad from "The Flying Dutchman," the dramatic song beginning with the valkyr-like call "Yohohoe, yohohoe, yohohoe!" Dramatically she sang it, but with no forcing of manner or voice, yet with big effect.

But otherwise it was one of the most interesting concerts the Symphony Orchestra has given in recent years. There was a rare spectacle after the "Flying Dutchman" number, when the Choral Club of the New England Conservatory of Music, an organization comprising about a score of well-trained singers, came on the stage to participate in one of the Debussy nocturnes, called "Sirens." And truly sirens, or something of the sort, the young ladies demonstrated themselves to be, for their success with the intricate music of Debussy was almost superhuman.

Trans. EMMY DESTINN Dec. 14, 1908 A Truly Remarkable Dramatic Singer Makes Her First Appearance Here—The Rare Intelligence and the Rare Expressive Power of Her Singing—Other Traits as She Revealed Them

Miss Destinn, as she proved at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and of Saturday, is one of the rare singing actresses who can maintain her powers within the limitations of the concert room. Costume, scenic background, histrionic action, the march of the lyric play, the stimulation of the other lyric players, are not essential to her. In opera she plies the arts of the actress resourcefully and significantly, but she remains primarily a singing actress, who vivifies and individualizes her character and who expresses its traits and emotions by the quality of her tones. Therein are the exalted speech and the peculiar power of the singing actress, and when her mastery of them makes her independent of assisting circumstance she may transfer them almost intact to the concert room. When Miss Destinn sings Senta's ballad in the second act of "The Flying Dutchman" in the opera house, she sits in the homely room of Daland's dwelling; the girls at their spinning are clustered about her; as she looks up her eyes and theirs see the picture of the fate-haunted, fate-driven seaman. Already the first act has shown him in flesh and blood, the phantom captain of a phantom ship, made man again in momentary respite from his doom, and cast ashore to find, if he can, salvation in a woman who will sacrifice herself to free him. The legend, the scenic spectacle, the more potent parts of Wagner's music have wrought atmosphere, suspense, expectancy. Then Senta's ballad dis-closes her haunted by the legend and possessed by it until she awaits the Dutchman—the woman, alike predestined and self-devoted, who is to release him from his fate. She sings; she ends; the door opens; the Hollander stands before her, and the opera—in spite of the moment of actual self-sacrifice that closes it—touches its climax.

On Friday afternoon and Saturday night, Miss Destinn's audience saw only the familiar stage of Symphony Hall and the familiar orchestra seated upon it. To it came no seeming Senta, but a stoutly built, dark-haired, clear-eyed, mobile-featured and very self-possessed young woman in the dress of the hour. The only preparation for an episode in a lyric drama was a few lines in the programme book; the only expectancy for most of the listeners was of a distinguished singer from the opera houses of New York, London and Berlin. Miss Destinn began the ballad, and from the first it was clear that she had no wish to bear the purely histrionic arts of the singing-actress into the concert-room. She made no play of face or figure or gesture, except as her features reflected the emotional and the communicating intensity within her and her body vibrated to it. By her tones, she wrought the vision that haunted Senta—the black sea, the blood-red ship, the ghostly captain on its deck, the storm that ever drives. In her tones the listeners heard the curse that had fallen upon him and heard no less the promise of redemption. Wagner has shaped the ballad with his instinctive aptitude for significant musical and dramatic contrast. The grim picture of the Hollander's fate, and the roaring promise of salvation alternate tellingly. Comes the strophe that tells of his quest of the woman; comes the ecstatic close in which Senta vows herself as his savior. And the voice of Miss Destinn had seemed the voice of this Senta; the visions that were more real than reality to the girl had come and gone in the singer's tones; the promise had mounted in them; the vow had risen in passion of original devotion. Miss Destinn had accomplished these things not merely because she has the characterizing power of the singing actress, not merely because hers are an imagination and a temperament that respond to emotions and transmit them, but because she is a mistress of singing as a vital, communicating, exalted speech. The distinguishing traits of her tones are their sensitiveness to what they would impart and their vitality of impartment, while that sensitiveness is the finer and that vitality the fuller, because she sings with ample knowledge and sure practice of the art of song. Her voice in itself is not a remarkable voice, as Mme. Melba's or Mr. Caruso's, is a remarkable voice. It has its tendency to turn a little sharp. Her artistry in song is not an elation in itself like Mr. Bonci's or Mme. Sembrich's. Its communicating and characterizing quality does not cover a multitude of sins, as it does in Miss Garden's. Rather, the distinction of Miss Destinn, as of Mr. Renaud, is the union in her singing and to mutual service of the fine art of song and of its qualities as an exalted and significant emotional speech.

Senta's ballad is ingeniously contrived, and it was not the least virtue of Miss Destinn's singing of it that her listeners took no thought of Wagner's contrivance. When, later in the concert, she passed to three of Schubert's songs—"The Guide Post," "The Erl-King" and "Gretchen Spinning"—there was no such deliberate artifice to aid. Schubert was too single-minded, too simple-minded, too untheatrical for the effects that are only the more such because Wagner made them with strokes of genius. She was shorn, too, of the aid of the orchestra. In its stead were only the galloping triplets of accompaniment of "The Erl-King," the spinning figure in the piano part of the lament of Gretchen and the dim tonal-coloring of the voice of the piano in the wayfarer's song. Here, too, the singer was more circumscribed. If she were really to sing the songs, she must respect their melodic contour, obey their obvious phrasing, heed narrowly their rhythmic accent and yet within these bounds establish—and in little space of time—their atmosphere, draw and color the picture, vitalize and impart the mood and the emotions that had summoned the one and shaped and tinted the other. Above all, she must be continent. "The Erl-King" is a lyrical narrative and the singer is the narrator. It is not a little lyrical drama with three parts. The song of Gretchen is a picture of the girl seen, the echo of her sad thoughts, and not her frantic speech. "The Guide Post" is the wan musing of the haunted wayfarer, not his passionate declaration about himself.

It was clear token of the intellectual, the discriminating qualities that underlie and shape most truly distinguished singing that Miss Destinn conceived and imparted the three songs with this continent perception of their particular quality. It was no less proof of her musical understanding and of her knowledge of the art of song that she was obedient to every one of their purely musical requirements. In fact this justice to their true nature and demands made her expression of their emotional and pictorial content the more vivid and potent. The voice of remembered rapture—of its ecstasy and of its blankness—sang the song of Gretchen. The voice of a narrator conjuring figures out of the mist in which the past, catching the echoes of their voices, told the tale of "The Erl-King." Despair crept phrase by phrase through the iteration of "The Guide Post." And in this imparting of the songs as a whole were details that flashed or wrenched—the passion that thrilled and faded on the instant at the kiss of Gretchen's memory; the wild yearning of the ceaseless quest at the "suche Ruh" of the song of the guide-post; the childlike quality, the insinuating sweetness of the Erl-King's enticements. No; the lamentations of the song do not enchain the arts of the singing-actress. They only stimulate them to more adroit perception and to finer accomplishment. Miss Destinn, of the new school through and through and not the least of its glories, is proof.

H. T. P.

FOR SALE
 Symphony Rehearsal and Concert Season Ticket; one each; floor, centre. Address: P.D.H., Boston Transcript. Tel. (A): Ja 7

The Herald last Sunday, in a review of the Symphony concert of the night before, said that the second and third Nocturnes of Debussy were performed effectively. This was true, and yet it is easy to imagine a still more effective performance, effective by reason of the absence of "effects." The Herald then wished that the performance of the first Nocturne had been less formal. There was not sufficient vagueness; outlines were too sharply defined. There was too much formality, too much precision. In certain German pleasure gardens there are arrangements of sheet iron Alpine scenery, with rigid glacier streams and still more rigid clouds. The clouds of Debussy were on this occasion too metallic, too immovable. They were without vapor. The Herald referred to Baudelaire's prose poem, "The Stranger." This might serve as motto for the nocturne, and for a hint to performance.

"Enigmatical man, whom do you love best? Tell me? Your mother, your sister, or your brother?"
 "I have neither father, mother, sister, nor brother."

"Your friends?"
 "You now use a word which to this day has been meaningless to me."

"Your country?"
 "I do not know under what latitude it lies."

"Beauty?"
 "I would love her gladly, goddess and immortal."

"Well, what do you love, extraordinary stranger?"
 "I love the clouds, the clouds that pass yonder, the marvellous clouds."

The Choral Club of the New England Conservatory sang Debussy's difficult music in the "Sirens" with fine quality of tone and, for the most part with praiseworthy accuracy. A false entrance was pardonable. The club sang perhaps with too excellent effect, for it was numerically too strong. Debussy's score calls for eight sopranos and eight mezzo-sopranos. The chorus was much stronger than this, so that in the ensemble these voices, which should have been as purely orchestral instruments, were too often as a chorus with accompaniment. Furthermore Symphony Hall is too large for the perfect enjoyment of such exquisite and delicate music. The second nocturne, the most obvious and direct of the three, stood the test of the hall the best.

How beautiful this music is! Yet, as it is impressionistic music, a performance of it should give only an impression. A too "effective" interpretation does injury to the music. P. H. H.

JOSEF LHEVINNE.

Remarkable Russian Pianist Who Created a Sensation at His American Debut in Carnegie Hall with the Russian Orchestra.

SUNDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 13, 1908
AT EIGHT

CONCERT
BY THE
BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

IN AID OF ITS
PENSION FUND

Programme

- I. LISZT LES PRÉLUDES
- II. WAGNER GOOD FRIDAY SPELL ("PARSIFAL")
- III. WAGNER SIEGFRIED'S RHINE JOURNEY
("DUSK OF THE GODS")
-
- IV. TSCHAIKOWSKY . SUITE, "NUTCRACKER"
(a) Ouverture Miniature. (b) Marche. (c) Danse
de la Fée-Dragée. (d) Danse Russe Trépack.
(e) Danse Arabe. (f) Dance Chinoise. (g) Danse
des Mirlitons. (h) Valse des Fleurs.
- V. TSCHAIKOWSKY . THEME WITH VARIATIONS AND POLACCA from Suite No. 3, Op. 55
- VI. TSCHAIKOWSKY OVERTURE, "1812"

JOSEF LHEVINNE.

Remarkable Russian Pianist Who Created a Sensation at His American Debut in Carnegie Hall with the Russian Orchestra.

SUNDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 13, 1908
AT EIGHT

CONCERT
BY THE
BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

IN AID OF ITS
PENSION FUND

Programme

- I. LISZT LES PRÉLUDES
- II. WAGNER GOOD FRIDAY SPELL ("PARSIFAL")
- III. WAGNER SIEGFRIED'S RHINE JOURNEY
("DUSK OF THE GODS")
-
- IV. TSCHAIKOWSKY . SUITE, "NUTCRACKER"
(a) Overture Miniature. (b) Marche. (c) Danse
de la Fée-Dragée. (d) Danse Russe Trépack.
(e) Danse Arabe. (f) Danse Chinoise. (g) Danse
des Mirlitons. (h) Valse des Fleurs.
- V. TSCHAIKOWSKY . THEME WITH VARIATIONS AND
POLACCA from Suite No. 3, Op. 55
- VI. TSCHAIKOWSKY OVERTURE, "1812"

PLAYING FOR ITSELF

The Pension Fund Concert of the Symphony Orchestra

Trans. Dec. 12, 1908

Once more, tomorrow evening, the men of the Symphony Orchestra are bidding the public of its concerts and the general public as well to one of the two occasions of the musical year when neither conductor nor managers but the players themselves summon the audience. The Pension Fund of the orchestra belongs to the men in other senses than in their income, in old age and retirement, from it. Their dues help to increase it; they administer its affairs; and they practically organize the two concerts that annually swell it. Already, too, the fund is fulfilling its purpose. For ten years the capital gradually increased until the income from it was sufficient for the payment of pensions. Now thirteen men, who earned their right to them by their service in the orchestra, receive them. With the years the number of retiring players will increase; the payments for pensions will mount accordingly, and if the principal of the fund is to remain untouched it must rise in like proportion. The men pay dues to the fund; there have been occasional gifts to it; but the larger part of it has come, and still comes, from the return of the two concerts in its behalf.

In the past, and again this winter, these concerts have appealed to three publics. One is the regular public of the Symphony Concerts that seizes the opportunity thus to make return to the men for all that they do weekly for its pleasure and for the prestige of the orchestra. Esprit de corps that binds players, conductor and audience together—the spirit that has done much to make the Symphony Concerts what they are—will send this part of the audience to Symphony Hall on Sunday night. A second public comes from those who do not subscribe to the Symphony Concerts, but who would hear the orchestra once or twice each year and hear it in striking pieces. Tomorrow night, it will have, besides, a new conductor to whet its appetite, and Mr. Fiedler will be making his first appearance to this miscellaneous public. Remains a third element whom the particular programme particularly attracts. Wagner and Tschai-kovski please it most, and from the two composers much of the music chosen for the concert of Sunday comes: From Wagner, the "Good Friday Spell" in "Parsifal," and Siegfried's journey in the first act of "Götterdämmerung"; from Tschai-kovski, the "Nut-Cracker" suite of ballet music and the theme and variations of the third orchestral suite—both of the brilliant and racy Tschai-kovski—and the "1812" overture with the composer turned clamorous and sonorous. Liszt's tone-poem, "Les Préludes," adds yet another sort of romantic music.

THE PENSION-FUND CONCERT

The Orchestra at Contrasting Bests in a Fragment of "Goetterdämmerung" and in Tschai-kovski's Ballet Music—The Other Numbers—Mr. Fiedler's Conducting Trans. Dec. 14, 1908

It was a pity that the concert of the Symphony Orchestra last night for the profit of its Pension Fund won so scanty an audience—the smallest in three years for such an occasion. Those who fear that the orchestra may of late have declined a little in its preëminent and its distinctive qualities might have had their alarms allayed, and those who question some of the traits of Mr. Fiedler's conducting might oftenest have had the pleasure of those qualities in it that are less open to reserve or debate. One of the items of the programme was the heroic intermezzo, so to say, between the prologues and the first act of Wagner's "Götterdämmerung" that carries Siegfried from Brünnhilde's rock along the Rhine to Gunther's hall. It is trumpet-tongued music, wrought with magnificent tonal eloquence out of glowing wealth of orchestral resources; it is vital with rich and puissant melody; it quivers with its passion of imagination, suggestion and delineation. It is the voice of the heroic youth of a young and heroic world. So forth fares a hero to the adventures that seal his prowess; so he parts from his Valkyr's side in the glow of his passion for her; so the Rhine bears him upon its broad, deep stream, echoing with the song of its daughters; so dreams he in joyous clamor, hot for high adventure to Gunther's warlike hall. The performance matched the music, and where the conductor and the men began the coldest listener might not say. And there could have been few cold under the glowing magnificence of the tone of the orchestra, changing from golden depth to silvery brightness, and half a hundred tints between, under the sweep of this instrumental eloquence and under the heroic accent with which the conductor animated it and the broad amplitude of power with which he clothed it. The splendor of passionate and sustained and fiery utterance of which our orchestra is capable was near its fullest and highest.

Then, in the set of dances from Tschai-kovski's ballet, "The Nut Cracker," the band disclosed no less rare and finely contrasting aptitudes. Here, as the music asked, was a perfect lightness and brightness of tone, of a lovely euphony and transparency, moving to delicate niceties of rhythm as though it were at play with them, touching adroitly the lightest graces of harmony and accent, making the dances a changeful fabric of changeful fancies that it wove with the lightest of fingers. The sugar-plum fairy tiptoed to her celesta; the trépak bustled gayly; the Arab dance rustled languorously to its own echo; the Chinese danced, shrilled and teetered; the waltz swayed on the soft horns to the accenting violins. Little feats of virtuosity went as the routine of the movement; little graces of tonal coloring melted one into the other. The felicity of the performance was like to the fancy of the music. And Mr. Fiedler, as he has already shown in his dances from Grétry a month ago, has the alertness to rhythm and to pace that is its spirit and its life.

Mr. Fiedler shines no less in rhetorical music, in music of the large flourish. He likes the florid, the emphatic. He had it on Sunday in Liszt's tone-poem, "Les Préludes" and on Saturday in Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz." Lamartine's verses that stirred Liszt to composition sound with grandiloquent rhetoric. The music is no less sonorous of it. Both have the large, vague voice through which romance trumpeted fifty years and more ago. She was a florid muse in those days; she loved showy trappings; and speech was becomingly effusive. Weber in an earlier generation worshipped her no less than Liszt. Nowadays his music must be made to sound to the utmost—emphatically, ornately, sweeping from flourish to flourish. Else does the listener say this is but a coda, this is but a transition, this is but a rhetorical contrast. Now Mr. Fiedler loves sonority, the rhetorical pause, the ample contrast. He warms to big-voiced music. Thus he gave Weber's overture its romantic whirl and gesture, and clothed Liszt's tone-poem in resounding and laborious pomp. He made each speak with its sonorous voice until the listener had his joy of the sound and cared not for the substance. A conductor may not so "rush" Tschai-kovski in the variations and the polacca of yesterday and over-emphasis blurred and smeared the very eloquence that Mr. Fiedler sought. No more will such traits gain the soft, suffused beauty of "The Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," that stood likewise on the programme of last night. It is music of April lights, of May softness, of tranquil gladness of heart. For Mr. Fiedler it was as sultry as July.

PENSION FUND CONCERT AND AUDIENCE BRILLIANT

adv. Dec. 14, 08
MR. FIEDLER PROVES

A MUSICAL HERO

Entirely at Home With Wagner—

Mme. Chaminade's Boston Debut

a Great Success.

By Louis C. Elson.

The programme at the Pension Fund Concert, given in Symphony Hall last light, was as follows:—

Liszt—"Les Preludes."
Wagner—"Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal."
Wagner—"Siegfried's Rhine Journey."
Tschalkowsky—"Nutcracker Suite."
Tschalkowsky—Theme and Variations from Suite No. 3.
Tschalkowsky—Overture, "1812."

A thoroughly modern programme in the best sense of the word, for Wagner and Tschalkowsky and Liszt are scintillant with all the effects of modern orchestration, yet are not crabbed or mystical in their utterances. Of course, in a concert which is given for a beneficent purpose, and in which everyone from conductor to drummer volunteers his services, criticism must be mute. But were this ban lifted the reviewer would find only praise to speak.

The audience was brilliant and of good size, and Mr. Fiedler and his orchestra appeared at its best. The supreme moment of the concert was its final number, Tschalkowski's "1812 overture," which was played better than it has ever before been done in Boston.

Mr. Fiedler is certainly at his zenith in the modern works. Nor is he a prophet without honor in his own country, for the applause at this concert showed that his earnest and painstaking care were fully appreciated. In other cities there has been some debate, yet the present reviewer was told in Brooklyn recently that every seat in the great new Academy of Music had been sold out long before the concert given there by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and one of the most prominent citizens of that city said that Mr. Fiedler was held there to be the best of all the Boston Symphony conductors.

As a matter of fact each conductor has had his good points. Henschel, the first conductor, made programmes which might serve as a model to all his successors, so broad and catholic in spirit were they. Gericke read Beethoven as none of the other conductors succeeded in doing, never "individualizing" or distorting the meaning, but interpreting with a devout piety. Paur could give us Tschalkowsky's Pathetic Symphony or a Liszt symphonic poem in a manner that his successor could not equal. Nikisch played upon the orchestra with an individuality that was little short of marvellous. Muck could take a well-known work, like the Brahms C minor symphony, and reveal it to us with an entirely new meaning and power. Each one of these had his specialties in which he was pre-eminent. Mr. Fiedler has also done some things which make him "sui generis." His performance of the Noren variations, two days ago, his interpretation of Strauss' "Heldenleben" a short time before that, make him also a musical hero that must be cherished in our Gallery of Fame.

In the programme of last night he showed that he is entirely at home in the Wagnerian and the Tschalkowskian veins. We do not rank him with Gericke in Beethoven, but each conductor has his "genre," and we are glad to insist upon his powers in the modern field. The performance that the symphony gave last night was brilliant in every detail and showed that there is no deterioration in its technique or enthusiasm. It was a worthy effort in a worthy cause.

Pension Fund Concert.

Once more tonight the members of the Boston Symphony orchestra appeal to the generosity of their patrons by giving a concert in aid of the pension fund which has been in existence 10 years. It is gradually approaching the size needed for its work. Payments of pensions began this fall and already 13 former members are enjoying a snug little income from it. Practically, the sole resources of the pension fund are the annual dues of the members of the orchestra and the receipts from the two concerts which are given each year.

For the first 10 years every cent which came in was invested as principal, for there are no costs of administration. Some gifts to the fund have been made by friends of the orchestra, and these have been added to the principal. As a result the pensions, that now must be paid, come out of the income of the fund, but as years go on the obligations will naturally increase and it will be necessary to add very considerably to the principal in order to meet them.

The friends of the orchestra have been exceedingly loyal, and its fund concerts have nearly always drawn audiences which tax the capacity of Symphony hall. Mr. Gericke was really the originator of the idea of forming this fund, and he always took a vital interest in it. No less interest did Dr. Muck take, and Mr. Fiedler, in turn, has shown keen interest, for he realizes that it is one of the several factors which enable the management to keep the membership practically unchanged from year to year.

There will be no soloist this evening. The selections are as follows: "Les Preludes," symphonic poem by Liszt; "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey," from "Dusk of the Gods," Wagner; "Nutcracker" suite, theme and variations from suite No. 3, and "1812" overture, Tschalkowsky. George Dec. 13, 1908

Herald

Music.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave the first concert of the season in aid of its pension fund last night in Symphony Hall. Mr. Fiedler conducted. The program was as follows:

Liszt, "The Preludes"; Wagner, "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal"; "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" from "Dusk of the Gods"; Tschalkowsky, "Nutcracker" suite, Theme with Variations and Polacca from Suite, No. 3, op. 55, overture "1812."

The cause for which the concert was given and the nature of the program should have drawn a much larger audience. Some may say that there should have been a soloist, an admired prima donna or a formidable pianist; but at whatever concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra a virtuoso assists, however famous he or she may be, the orchestra, after all, is the dominating soloist, the true virtuoso. It might be reasonably supposed that any opportunity of hearing this superb orchestra would fill the hall to overflowing.

All the compositions played, with one exception, were familiar to almost any concert goer. This exception was the "Nutcracker" suite of Tschalkowsky, which has been played, I believe, at the "Pops." The music deserves an honorable position in symphony concerts. In 1891 Tschalkowsky worked on an opera, "Iolanthe," and a ballet, "Nutcracker." He had been requested to compose the two for the Imperial Opera House at St. Petersburg. The subjects were given to him. The scenario of the ballet was based on Dumas' version of E. T. A. Hoffmann's well known tale. Tschalkowsky was at first not at all pleased with the subject, but he gradually became reconciled to it. In Paris he had discovered the existence of an instrument called the celesta, and he wrote his publisher to buy one for him, that he might use it in this ballet. He felt the joy of a child hearing this instrument, and he told his publisher, who, mirabile dictu! was also his friend, that the celesta would cost only 1200 francs. But Jurgensen was sworn to secrecy. What if Rimsky-Korsakoff or Glazounoff should find out about the celesta, and use it before the ballet were competed!

Tschalkowsky, writing the ballet music, was at times discouraged. He told Davidoff, the cellist, that he was wearing out, that his talent was going with his hair, his teeth, his feet; but it was the habit of Tschalkowsky to complain of his music before it was performed. The suite was played first—at a concert in St. Petersburg March 19, 1892, and nearly all the movements were repeated. The ballet was first performed with "Iolanthe" at the opera house Dec. 17 of the same year. Neither work was at first successful; the libretto, the story of King Rene's daughter, was found dull; the ballet, on account of the sickness of Petipa, the ballet master, was poorly arranged, and the music was too delicate for ears accustomed to ordinary ballet music.

They who do not know the "Nutcracker" suite are not fully acquainted with Tschalkowsky's genius. This music is charming by reason of its tunefulness, piquancy, euphony, fancy. The various dances are sharply contrasted, and it would be hard to say which one of them is the most delightful. There is more originality, more character, more poetic thought in this little suite than in many symphonies and symphonic poems made in Germany, analyzed laboriously and with awe by commentators, and classed among "important works."

155

The performance of the orchestra last night was often brilliant, and Mr. Fiedler and the players were applauded heartily by those who were fortunate enough to be present. PHILIP HALE.

SYMPHONY'S FIRST PENSION CONCERT

Orchestra at Its Best in Effective Display of Varied Resources.

Journal Dec. 14, 1908
In spite of the very attractive and diversified program of the Symphony Orchestra's first pension fund concert at Symphony Hall last night, the audience was rather thin. These two special concerts given each season are the only ones in which the famous band makes an appeal for popular favor, and the rows of empty seats were as surprising as they were rare at a Symphony concert of any description. However, on such an occasion many who purchase seats do not use them, and, owing to the purpose of the concert, they probably thought it best not to give them away.

But those who attended heard the orchestra at its best. The program was arranged to make the most effective possible display of the varied resources of the organization. There was the strangely beautiful and mystical music of Wagner in the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" and the "Siegfried Rhine Journey" from "The Dusk of the Gods;" there was music remarkable for its clarity and brilliancy in Tschalkowsky's "Theme with Variations and Polacca" from the Russian composer's third suite; there was a high-class popular pot-pourri in the same composer's "Nutcracker" suite; and there was what would generally be called "tremendous" music in Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Tschalkowsky's "1812" overture. The performance of this last piece was magnificent. However, the audience seemed to find the greatest pleasure of all in the light and merry "Nutcracker" suite; and in this piece the rare virtuoso elements of the orchestra were well shown. Professor Hess, Mr. Maquarre, Mr. Kautzenbach and Mr. Schuecker each had a more or less prominent part, Mr. Kautzenbach not in his usual role of cellist nor as conductor of an impromptu "Pop" concert but as a performer on the carillon.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 19, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

HAYDN,

SYMPHONY in B flat major. (B. & H. No. 12.)

I. Allegro moderato.

II. Adagio.

III. Menuetto: Allegro. Trio.

IV. Finale: Presto.

RUBINSTEIN,

FIFTH CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE & ORCHESTRA
in E flat major. op. 94.

I. Allegro moderato.

II. Andante.

III. Allegro.

(First time at these concerts.)

WAGNER,

WALDWEBEN "Life and Stir of the Forest," from "Siegfried," Act II.

WAGNER,

OVERTURE to "The Flying Dutchman."

Soloist:

Mr. JOSEF LHEVINNE.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

Because of Christmas, the next Public Rehearsal will be on Thursday afternoon December 24.

NINTH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Josef Lhevinne Plays Superbly a Dry
Concerto by Rubinstein.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, gave its ninth concert last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in B flat major (B. and H. No. 12).....Haydn
Fifth concerto (E flat major) for piano, op. 94.....Rubinstein
"Waldweben," from "Siegfried".....Wagner
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman".....Wagner

This concert gave pleasure to many, but neither the program nor the performance calls for extended discussion. The purely orchestral pieces were all familiar, for though the symphony had not been played at these concerts for several years, in fact, since 1895, the music itself, as far as form and melody are concerned, has been known to zealous players of piano pieces for four hands. The performance of these pieces was fully up to the high standard of the orchestra and Mr. Fiedler's reading was sane and orthodox. Yet it is impossible to refrain from bearing testimony to the clarity and suavity which characterized the interpretation of the symphony.

Mr. Fiedler is not one of those that endeavor to modernize Haydn, that are not happy unless they play all sorts of tricks with rhythm and introduce incongruous and anachronistic effects, so as to make this frank, simple music more acceptable. It is true that we cannot hear Haydn's music with the ears and the mental attitude of those who first heard it. Our enjoyment is thus no doubt somewhat diminished. To modernize it does not right matters. We are then farther away from Haydn and his period than before, and what becomes of the saving grace of his frank good humor, of his direct appeal?

Rubinstein's fifth concerto was played for the first time at a Symphony concert. Mme. Schiller introduced the work in 1876 at one of Theodore Thomas' concerts in Music Hall. Either the great difficulties of a purely technical nature or the dryness of the music itself discouraged other pianists. Mr. d'Albert used to play the concerto occasionally, but he, like the Hebrew prophet who displeased Voltaire on account of his name, was capable of doing anything. Josef Lhevinne, who played here at a Symphony concert for the first time, is passionately fond of the fifth concerto. It is his favorite battle horse. With it he won the Rubinstein prize. He chose it when he played in this country for the first time. He goes about with it as though it were his mission in life to persuade all hearers that it is a thing of grandeur and beauty. There is something pathetic in this devotion.

It matters not who plays the fifth concerto; the work is long and it seems longer in the performance. As a whole it is dull and futile music. Here and there is a page that has a faint melodic charm; here and there are pages that excite curiosity for a moment. Much of the concerto is only wearisome. It bristles with difficulties, but this is no longer a recommendation. Rubinstein could probably have written a still more difficult concerto.

Mr. Lhevinne is a virtuoso of the first rank. His uncommon mechanical proficiency is indisputable. He has both power, which last night he did not abuse, and delicacy. He is master of many nuances, and the quality of tone is always charming or distinguished. Since he last played here in recitals he has gained in aesthetic breadth and dignity. Last night he was more than an admirable virtuoso in the restricted meaning of the word. He played that which is for the most part inherently unmusical most musically. By the clearness of his interpretation he showed the deformity of the concerto, so that by the excellence of the performance the concerto was "most intolerable and not to be endured." Furthermore, he accomplished this: the hearer was fascinated by the superb character of the performance and often clean forgot the music. He was conscious only of Mr. Lhevinne displaying with the utmost ease beautiful or impressive arrangements of tones.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in aid of its pension fund will be on Sunday evening, Feb. 28. Dr. Ludwig Wuellner will then recite "The Witch's Song" to the accompaniment of Max Schillings' music, and probably sing a group of songs. The orchestral pieces will be Richard Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" and another piece to be announced later.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Rubinstein's Concerto
Finely Played.

Lhevinne Warmly Welcomed as the Symphony Soloist.

Handel and Haydn Concert
Tonight—Gossip.

Globe

Dec. 30, 1908

The Russian pianist, Josef Lhevinne, appeared as soloist of the ninth Symphony program, Rubinstein's fifth concerto for piano and orchestra, Haydn's B flat major symphony and excerpts from V. er's "Siegfried" and "Flying Dutchman" making up the selections.

Although the piano concerto does not rank with the more familiar fourth by the same composer it teems with difficulties and demands great physical endurance in performance.

There is little of the grace and melody of the fourth concerto, forte and fortissimo passages seem to be almost constantly demanded, and although it may be more taxing to the player than is the other, it does not contain the melodic elements and coherency that make the fourth one of the great concertos in the literature of the piano. But Lhevinne gave an amazing display of virtuosity, despite the somewhat uninteresting nature of the piece, and deepened the impression made at his recitals here two years ago.

Of stocky build, with muscular arms and shoulders, he has sufficient power to cope successfully with a composition of this nature, and throughout the three movements there was no lessening in his leonine vigor. His octave playing, and there was a great deal of it, was remarkable in its energetic rapidity; his singing tone formed a splendid contrast to it, and the innumerable runs in chromatic and natural scales and the arpeggio passages were fairly dazzling in brilliancy. It was virtuosity that compelled admiration and hearty applause.

The first movement is disjointed in structure, but it affords abundant material for display of technique and strength, both of which Lhevinne possesses in a high degree. In the second part there are some melodic movements, just a few in which the artist displayed the beautiful cantabile and expressive forms of his art in a pleasing manner, and in the hurly-burly of the final movement he never faltered in his task. Surely Lhevinne is a pianistic giant, and his recital next week arouses pleasant anticipations.

Mr. Fiedler guided his orchestra quite successfully over the musical shoals which permeate this concerto. This was particularly shown in the opening part among the chromatic ups and down which are impartially distributed among the instruments.

It was a pleasure to hear the Haydn symphony again, its joyous nature being most agreeably presented by the orchestra. The elaborate figures in the second movement were beautifully voiced by the different choirs and in the final part of the piquancy and verve of the dance themes were deliciously fetching. And the flute part, which is prominent throughout the work, was a delightful feature in an impressive ensemble.

The forest music from "Siegfried" and the "Flying Dutchman" overture were given with splendid effect. In the former the "woodland life and stir" were exquisite in their tonal suggestions and the storm, stress and mystery of the overture typified vividly, and almost savagely, the life of the ghostly rover of the seas.

Owing to the fact that Christmas falls on Friday this year, the public rehearsal of the orchestra will be given next Thursday afternoon, the concert taking place as usual on Saturday evening. The feature of the program will be Beethoven's fifth symphony, which will be an anniversary performance, the work having been performed for the first time in Vienna, Dec 22, 1808.

Of all the works on the program of the pension fund concert last Sunday night, the charming "Nut-Cracker" suite by Tchaikowsky seemed to please the most, and as it is essentially Christmas music, Mr. Fiedler has incorporated it in his Christmas program. The prelude to "Parsifal" will complete the selections.

Lhevinne the Artist Journal At Symphony Concert

Two Russian pianists have been Symphony soloists within a month. The first was Ossip Gabrilowitsch. The second, Josef Lhevinne, made his debut at his Symphony concert Saturday night, playing Rubinstein's fifth concerto. Mr. Lhevinne has been called "Rubinstein II.," but apparently he has not been spoiled by such adulation, for at this Symphony concert he displayed not only the artist's technique but the artist's tact. He showed not only himself but Rubinstein in a very favorable light, for his performance of the garish piece was tasteful as well as brilliant.

The orchestral numbers were Haydn's symphony in B flat and two Wagnerian selections, the "Waldweben" movement from "Siegfried" and the "Flying Dutchman" overture. Mr. Fiedler made the most of them, much to the delight of the audience.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

LHEVINNE, RUBINSTEIN, HAYDN AND

Journal WAGNER Dec 15, 08

The Pianist Reappears in an Unusual Concerto—A Season of Keyboard Heroics—Mr. Fiedler and an Eighteenth-Century Symphony—Youthful and Mature Wagner—The Christmas Break in Concerts—Few Announcements for Next Week

A programme in which Mr. Fiedler figured for the first time in Boston as the conductor of one of Haydn's symphonies, and which included Wagner of the late panoramics and early dramatics, the "Waldweben" and the "Flying Dutchman" overture, furnished still another element of novelty and interest at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. In addition to a pedagogic Haydn, a tempestuous Hollander and a Wagnerian wood in the spirit of the realists, came a seldom heard pianoforte concerto of Rubinstein, and a season of keyboard heroics. Mr. Josef Lhevinne was soloist, and the restraint and dignity of his performance in music of a character that consistently invites to personal display added one more element of distinction to the occasion. Whatever dissent might have been excited by the scenery of the "Waldweben" or the assertiveness and bravado of the concerto, certainly there was not a dull minute during the programme, which was fairly long. The B-flat symphony is one of the most attractive of Haydn's excursions in this form; Mr. Fiedler's qualities as a conductor gave peculiar emphasis to the Wagnerian numbers, and the firmness with which Mr. Lhevinne renounced the vanities of the virtuoso while playing the music of virtuosity added another portrait to the gallery of serious artists—one of a firm-lipped, earnest face bending over the black and white keyboard with passionate absorption in his task. The programme was:

Haydn: Symphony in B-flat major.

Rubinstein: Fifth Concerto (E-flat major) for Pianoforte.

Wagner: "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," act. II. Wagner: Overture to "Flying Dutchman."

Rubinstein, at least, made no symphonic flourishes. He declined to protest that he was sworn to the Beethoven faith of concerto writing, a symphony with a piano part. He set himself to a task of the utmost exploitation of the resources of the pianoforte. To him a pianoforte concerto meant a concerto for the pianoforte with the humiliation of orchestra. Agree with his premises or not, his conclusions are irresistible. He produced what he set out to produce, a flourish of glorified technique. If he had stopped there, the concerto might be left to gather dust with the swooping fantasias of Thalberg. But in the most intricate figures of this concerto is still the voice of melody, Rubinstein's inalienable gift. Does he make bass and treble bellow with full-fisted chords? the thunder is melodious; does he sound a flourish of delirious chromatics? the delirium is tuneful; does he impose herculean labors at a fleet rhythm for rushing hands? in its wildest tumult the pianoforte manages to sing. Not only manages, but sings spontaneously, and this throughout a concerto of more than generous length. No less noteworthy is the variety of its pianoforte figures. Some of them we have heard before in the barcaroles, a few are perhaps common to the vehicle, but as device is piled on device, and arabesque entwines itself in arabesque, as the composer plies the infinite combinations of the keyboard which he knows with such intimacy, there interposes the query whether he did not definitely set out to exhaust the vocabulary of technical prowess. In scheme, moreover, the work is large-boned, moving in a long stride, robust, and taking its lung-fulls of resonance. It stalks in heroics. But with this distinction—its heroics are a dash self-conscious; they differ from the earlier brands of pianoforte bravura as the Latin epic differs from the Greek. Achilles and Patroclus had no idea how fine they were. Nor had Homer. But the Latin poet had. This is not to accuse the Russian of posturing; he was too fiercely in earnest to take the time. But in his music the choices and rejections are plainly visible. It is heroic in another aspect as well—in the pianoforte's domineering ways with the orchestra. In its episodic progress are whole pages where the accompaniment is reduced to the proportions signified by the term ad lib., or the orchestra is silent altogether while solo instrument strides on in its seven-league boots.

It was to music of such hectoring ways that Mr. Lhevinne brought his firm and reticent style. In the phrases of such oratory he preserved his singular repose, and yet employed a forceful delivery. It was the musical speech of one who sees proportion and the due relation of details to the mass. When the accompanying instruments had dropped to a whisper and solo pianoforte was off at impetuous revelry; in passages which send spinning chromatics the length of the keyboard against hymning strings; or such episodes as the long solo which declares the theme of the finale with its ample qualifying clauses, the performer seemed to have submerged his personality, and to have surrendered his powers to the office of interpretation. If ever concerto courted the fine frenzy, wilted linen, disheveled mane and the other local habitations of divine fire, it is Rubinstein's concerto in E-flat, and yet in music which would, with justice, have been made the excuse of a score of pianists for walking off their hands. Mr. Lhevinne never sacrificed decorum to display. The virtues of his style became the virtues of the music. It expressed each idiom with peculiar justice, let it be feathery passage work, the musketry crackle of staccato runs, the legato discourse, or octaves in triple shouts. The performance thus became more than interpretive; it was also something of a justification. The conclusion theme of the finale is greatness descending a little to familiarity. It shows, as it were, the unapproachable when he unbends to the anecdotal strain. The great man goes further. He egotizes a little. To start in the lofty style, carry it off superbly for two movements and a half, to have a lapse into the vernacular some dozen pages before the end, is hardly in the books, as such things go. Again Mr. Lhevinne's fluency carried it off. If greatness egotized, that was to be its royal prerogative, and to be expressed by the regal or editorial "We."

With all its minute particularity, the playing never failed to grasp and present the larger designs, for the concerto adheres to a unified structure with all its bravura work, announces texts and carries them into logical development. Thus the Andante, while employing the most varied resources of the solo instrument, seeks and sustains a note of reflective melancholy to suit the most fastidious romanticist. And its spectral ending, with the contrast of strings and keys as of cheerful lamp light raying out into the clammy dews of a churchyard, the faint subsiding echoes of goblin laughter, ending with the hollow mutter of kettle drums, just audible, is surely something more than the music of technical display. And lastly, Mr. Lhevinne's modesty was its own reward. In the scriptural sense, by losing himself he saved himself. Played by numberless lesser men (or for that matter, several of the greater) it is not impossible that these florid measures might have become tedious if not offensive. That they were exuberant, virile and stirring was due not least to the noble quality of Mr. Lhevinne's playing.

To the Haydn which we remember as proceeding off the tip of Mr. Gerlicke's precise and scholarly baton, and the Haydn instinct with grace and vivacity as his scores were read by Dr. Muck comes another version, added yesterday afternoon by Mr. Fiedler—a Haydn drawing the long breaths of youthful vitality—like the athlete in repose after sharp exercise. The capacity for violent action is there, and felt, but dormant; nothing is vehement, nothing clamorous, but the strength is more emphasized for being subdued. Some such impression was produced as Mr. Fiedler swung his stick to summon the rounded phrase and the pompous sentences of this symphony. What he would have us see beside the beauty and symmetry of the form, the satin finish of the string choir, and the gold lace in its sparing ornamentation, is the strength and agility with which this figure moves in the courtly paces of the dance, with the clink of scabbard against silken thighs to hint of sturdier exercise which could be performed on more gallant fields. Once and only once in this form did Haydn essay to combine the language of the court, which was his natural tongue, with the language of the camp. That the military symphony, as usually heard, has less of the martial stride than the "Ninth" as played yesterday afternoon is sufficient comment on the spirit and energy of Mr. Fiedler's conducting. At no time, with the possible exception of some of the perorations of the finale, did he, as organists say, pull out all the stops. Obedient to his beck the horns quavered, the chattering wind choir responded, the violins paced their rectilinear measures, the 'cellos and double-basses uttered their monosyllables, arriving again and again at the full stop, so dear alike to composer and conductor. "I pause for a reply," says the speaker impressively. "Then none have I offended," he resumes after the silence, and launches out afresh. Mr. Fiedler's Haydn has been referred to as pedagogic. It is hardly that, for the term carries with it the reproach of pedantry, and whatever be the peccancies of Mr. Fiedler's conducting, pedantry is hardly one of them. His scholarship as brought to Haydn is professorial rather, but the type of professor who is actively fond of physical exercise, preferably mountain climbing.

In the Wagner numbers which brought the programme to a conclusion we were again on familiar ground—no dizzy balancing feats between music and virtuosity; no circumspect pacing of the line which separates scholarship and pedantry, but the full freedom of pealing strings and brazen-throated horns, for the overture, at least. The "Waldweben" was a slightly different story. Here the conductor plied a brush which might have been dipped in the pigments of the Dutch school. Wagner's music was pictorial. Mr. Fiedler would make it minutely so. Out of the droning pedal point and the zone of murmuring strings he called the roulades of flute, clarinet and oboe, cheeping and twittering; he defined the pictorial themes, smoothed off the drowsy hum of the woods, indicated the elfin chuckle of horns, all with the definiteness of the passionate devotee to clean drawing. When Wagner, busy at the work of scene-painting, glances up to remark: "There, something of that sort," Mr. Fiedler announces: "Precisely this!" This technique is abandoned, however, shortly before the end, for an imperious summons to the brasses to blare their mightiest. From plying the deft touches of the realist we change to the "jabbed brush strokes."

After all, why musical scene painting, frankly announced as such (and asserting no claim to the character of sheer programme music) in the concert hall? It is not only episodic; its essence is descriptive of something which is not there to see. To disassociate such music from its proper associations is somewhat analogous to the exhibition of a stage set, without the corresponding action, because, at the time of the performance, the excellence of the background and lighting was greatly admired.

Of the same pictorial texture, but with far other relations was the "Flying Dutchman" Overture. Written years before its composer attained his definitive stage, it could hardly be delivered with more than a general turn, and yet it had all the potency and charm and considerably more of grandeur than the forest idyl. As it was conceived—in the large style of the historical painters, with something of their theatricality and concessions to sentiment—so it was played, allowing free range of imagination through its mystery, its simplicity and its tumult. Its tale was freely legible, the far-off trumpet calls starting shivers of superstitious dread, the naïveté of its ballad, the misty gloom which shrouds the fate-driven ship; but most of all the majesty of the sea, its horror and fascination, its ache and its matchless beauty, as keenly felt by Northern peoples. The same tempest which the Roman braved by an appeal to his fatalism, roused the laughter of Vikings. Both are in this overture. Mr. Fiedler, possibly from national affiliations, chose the latter.

FROM HAYDN TO WAGNER WITH CONDUCTOR FIEDLER
Law: Dec 19, 08
SYMPHONY PROGRAMME
CONSERVATIVELY MODERN

Mr. Lhevinne's Pyrotechnic Playing of Rubinstein's E Flat Concerto Carries It to Success.

By Louis C. Elson.
PROGRAMME.

Haydn—Symphony in B flat.
Rubinstein—Piano Concerto in E flat. No. 5.
Soloist, Mr. Josef Lhevinne.
Wagner—"Waldweben," from "Siegfried."
Wagner—"Flying Dutchman" Overture.

A programme that was conservatively ancient and modern. It was not so long ago that Wagner was held to be the radical of radicals. "Nous avons changeé tout cela"; today he seems a rather conservative composer; he has been thrust out of the radical camp by the demon that he himself has raised, a la Frankenstein.

Haydn's symphonies wear better than Mozart's. Mozart tended somewhat towards modern dramatic effect and his efforts in that direction seem tame compared with those of his successors; but Haydn remains frankly in the 18th century and retains all the quaintness and naïveté of his epoch. Sprightly melody, suave counterpoint, unstrained cheerfulness are in each of his orchestral works and his symphonies will be played and give pleasure when all of Mozart's except the G minor and the "Jupiter" are placed upon the shelf.

It was not given in a periwigged style, this little symphony, but Mr. Fiedler managed to impart virility and vigor to its first and last movements. The minuets, in spite of the fertility of Haydn's invention in the treatment of this dance, are the movements that are fading most in his sonata forms. Small wonder that Beethoven brushed them all aside with the Scherzo, in 1802. Yet the Trio of this particular Minuet gave a very good contrast with the chief movement and was especially melodious. The symphony as a whole, however, was not as attractive a work as some others by Haydn.

The Rubinstein concerto has the falling that most pianist-composers fall into—it keeps the solo instrument rather too conspicuously in the foreground. It is not a symphony with a thread of solo-work interwoven, as is the case with Brahms' second concerto, or Beethoven's fourth and fifth. But, with a soloist, this is a falling that "leans to virtue's side" very decidedly, and the composition displayed the Russian pianist in a very favorable light.

Mr. Lhevinne is much more than a virtuoso. He has an abundance of technique, but he generally uses it as a means to an end and he does not believe that virtuosity is its own reward. We could have wished to have heard him in some more inspired composition, possibly a Beethoven concerto. The first movement seemed rather artificial, but it had a very brilliant coda, with an abundant display of wrist-action for the soloist, and of course the double octaves and heavy chords won their applause. The Andante has a striking pizzicato theme for contrabasses, afterwards treated by the piano, and there is considerable free poetic rhapsodizing in the movement. Its end is as whispered as the coda of the "Pathetic Symphony" by Tschalkowsky.

In the finale definite melodies (possibly some folk-themes) are present and there is an enormous amount of bravura work. This Mr. Lhevinne attacked with a power and verve that carried the rather showy composition to triumph. Such pyrotechnics and such endurance always excite an audience. Yet the content of the work is less worthy than that of Rubinstein's preceding symphonies. Even Mr. Lhevinne's superb playing cannot blind us to that fact.

The Wagner numbers were a noble ending to the concert. Mr. Fiedler had evidently worked with his accustomed care on the wonderful "divisi" passages for strings, which came out most clearly and eloquently,—the myriad voices of the forest. The preeminence of Wagner over his successors is clearly enough shown in such passages as these. Strauss and Noren, Mahler and Reger, have also sometimes subdivided their orchestral parts into many-voiced polyphony, but never with such effect as is here attained.

When it comes to the figures themselves, the "motiven," the beauty of Wagner is again made manifest. No one ever possessed, as he did, the power of suggesting a character, an object, an event, so graphically in a very few notes. We doubt, for example, whether in the whole realm of music there is a succession of three chords that can compare with the "Fate-motive," and in this number the Bird motives, the Siegfried motive, the Slumber motive, are infinitely more pregnant with meaning than anything which the later works can offer in their programme-music.

The pianissimo of the beginning was remarkably well done, and the crescendos were real crescendos with good climaxes at their end. But the best point of the orchestral performance at this concert was the "Flying Dutchman" overture. We were almost persuaded that it was also intrinsically the best music.

Since we are in the mood for comparisons we may suggest comparing the "Flying Dutchman" overture with Debussy's "La Mer," or even with Rubinstein's "Ocean Symphony," to see in which work the salt spray is most abundant. How great masters may weave material from similar figures may also be seen in the fact that the "Flying Dutchman" figure is twin brother to the opening figure of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, only the former moves upward and the latter downward.

The performance was a marvel of healthy vigor and the contrast between the sailor's motif and the sweet motive of salvation, the Senta theme, was finely drawn, while the apotheosis of the finale was made into a noble climax. It was a most stirring interpretation of a work with which almost every auditor was familiar and the abundant applause after its conclusion showed that its fiery reading was thoroughly appreciated.

164

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 26, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

WAGNER,

PRELUDE to "Parsifal"

TSCHAIKOWSKY,

SUITE, for full ORCHESTRA, taken from the score of the ballet, "Nutcracker," op. 71 a.

I. Overture, miniature.

II. Danses caracteristiques: a) Marche; b) Danse de la Fée Dragée; c) Trépae, Danse russe; d) Danse arabe;

e) Danse chinoise; f) Danse des mirlitons.

III. Valse des Fleurs.

(First time at these concerts.)

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 5, in C minor, op. 67.

(Performed for the first time December 22, 1808, in Vienna.)

I. Allegro con brio.

II. Andante con moto.

III. Allegro: Trio.

IV. Allegro.

165

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

TSCHAIKOWSKY'S BALLET OF "THE NUT-CRACKER"

Delightful Music Delightfully Played—A New Side of the Russian Composer—Mr. Fiedler's Just Fondness for Ballet-Music—The Prelude to "Parsifal" and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony for Contrasting Beginning and Ending

Blessed were contrasts and blessed was safety in Mr. Fiedler's programme for the Symphony Concert of Thursday afternoon. Wagner, Tschaikowsky and Beethoven are the most reliable composers, nowadays, for English-speaking audiences. The current series of Symphony Concerts is not yet half done, and already Mr. Fiedler has played five of Wagner's overtures and a fragment from "Siegfried"; three pieces of Tschaikowsky, and two overtures and three symphonies by Beethoven. The conductor, seemingly, is still uncertain of the likings of the public and rather indefinite in his own inclinations. He has discovered that his audiences are thirsting for Wagner, and he has given them generously to drink. Tschaikowsky is plainly secure with them; and Beethoven is safer still. On Thursday, besides, his three dependable composers gave him plentiful contrasts. His Wagner was the calculating and high-pitched Wagner of the anguished prelude to "Parsifal." His Tschaikowsky was the fanciful and playful, exotic and adroit Tschaikowsky of the "Nut-Cracker" ballet. His Beethoven was the mighty and the impassioned Beethoven of the fifth symphony.

The conductor led all this music to the diminished and rather perfunctory audience of the afternoon before Christmas, and with a band that sometimes seemed a little perfunctory as well. Tschaikowsky's dances, however, could not fail of applause, and the finale of Beethoven's symphony and a truly eloquent playing of it kept the audience long enough in the hall to recall Mr. Fiedler at the end of the concert. The youth of the second balcony is plainly fond of him, and it clapped him lustily. No previous conductor of the orchestra—to note another incident of the concert—has been so eager that his men individually or in mass should have the immediate reward of their prowess. The Dance of the Sugar-Plum Fairy in "The Nut-Cracker" is virtually a little piece for the célesta, with light orchestral accompaniment. Mr. Kautzenbach of the 'cellos played it with a tone as soft and sugary as the fairy herself, and Mr. Fiedler had him to his feet for the answering applause. The Dance of the Mirlitons, with its suavely insistent flutes, brought similar reward to Mr. Maquarre, Mr. Brooke and Mr. Fox.

Mr. Fiedler is apt in the conducting of ballet music and wise in his restoration of it to a just and agreeable place in the Symphony Concerts. Why it should have been counted beneath their "dignity," only the stiffly solemn-minded folk may say, and their explanations seldom reach beyond a priggish "because." One purpose, surely, of the concerts is to give musical and æsthetic pleasure, and ballet-music in its finest estate does bring a delight of its own. Very eminent composers, from the Frenchmen of the eighteenth century to the Russians of our own day, have written it abundantly. Beethoven and Schubert did not disdain to test their talents with it. The mere difficulties of such music are fascinating. There stands the relentless ballet-master with his "choreographic" scheme—so many measures here, such and such a dance here, a change of scenery (and its accompanying music) to fill a particular number of minutes, a play of light to be emphasized, a ballerina to be carried off or on the stage, and so forth with the endless requisitions of a minute and highly conventionalized form. The scenario of the average ballet is seldom, moreover, stimulating to the waiting composer. Yet with such impulse and within such arbitrary limitations, he should write music of light and gracious melody, brightly harmonized, piquantly figured, highly rhythmed, as brilliant, fanciful, pictorial and suavely suggestive as he can make it. It can be done, it has been done, in this particular "Nut-Cracker" from which Mr. Fiedler chose the suite of Thursday, in Lalo's "Naimouna," in Johann Strauss's "Aschenbrödel," in a dozen other pieces of our own and elder times.

And when it is so done, it gives twenty-fold the pleasure of much solemnly pretentious and solemnly ineffectual music. Take the case of Tschaikowsky himself. His "Manfred" symphony, his fantasia on "The Tempest," for example, are not nearly so interesting music or so satisfying and successful accomplishment in their kind as is this "Nut-Cracker" ballet in its genre. There is less imagination in them alike in the invention of melody, the play of rhythm, the command of mood. They are less felicitous technically, less fine and spontaneous of spirit, and they give far less pleasure of the ear and of the emotions. The truth is that light fancies and such elegant and adroit expression of them as fill "The Nut-Cracker" are many times more difficult to write than the sonorous periods of "Manfred" or the tone-picturing of "The Tempest." Pompous symphonies and passionate tone-poems are far easier to make—respectably—than a ballet of delicate and exotic charm. Every cook roasts beef; not all can make melting sweetmeats.

And how charming and fanciful and light of hand and mood these "Nut-Cracker" dances are! Tschaikowsky toiled long and rebelliously at the writing of them. He cursed roundly his acceptance of the commission for the ballet; but the music contains not a hint of these tempers. It is fluent and fickle as an improvisation, as elegant and polished as edgeless detail can make it. The little overture, nearly all in the upper tones of the instruments, change-ful, playful, brings the air of fantasy. Follows the march of the children, with its short-stepped eager rhythm. Then the "characteristic dances"; the "dance song," for the celesta seems to sing above the accompaniment, of the Sugar Plum Fairy; the fiery and snapping Trépak for the rude little Russian toys; the Oriental dance with its soft, heavy melody, its languorous rhythm of swaying fans and its undertone of the rustling tambourine; then the teetering Chinese dance as though the figures on a plate or a bowl had momentary motion; the mirilions—toy instruments—dancing to their own idealized voices; and last the titillating introduction, the flashing cadenza of the harp, and then the delicately footed, lightly colored, suavely graceful Waltz of the Flowers. Our Tschalkowski is usually the passionate tone-poet of the fantasias, the symphonist of large voice and unbridled mood, or the rapturous technician of the concertos. Here in "The Nutcracker" he is the adroit, the delicate, the fanciful virtuoso of the ballet, designing a miniature with the graceful lines of his melody, animating it with his bright rhythms, coloring it with the prettiest of tonal tints. And he is no less a master. What may there not be in the other ballet of his prime, "The Sleeping Beauty"? Mr. Fiedler should search it out—the more because he is so sympathetic and skilful with such music and has so adept an orchestra for it. Then, too, there are no troubling dancers of flesh and blood to cloud the dances. Only the eye of the imagination sees them. They say that Miss dell' Era, the original Sugar Plum Fairy, was "dull and ugly." Who would guess it from the music?

The agonized voice of the prelude to "Parsifal" and the heroic voice of Beethoven's symphony made strange preface and sequence to this ballet-music. And once more, in the prelude to "Parsifal" it was easy to miss the darkness and the close atmosphere of the theatre. Most of Wagner's preludes will plausibly bear transfer to the concert-room. The overture to "Tannhäuser," the prelude to "The Mastersingers" are full-bodied and eloquent symphonic pieces in themselves. But the prelude to "Parsifal" is too calculatingly contrived for a particular place and circumstance; it is too vividly and excitingly expectant of the particular things that are to follow. Besides, there sit the orchestra and the audience in broad, clear light and alert attention. The conductor stirs his stick; the band "gives out" the phrase of the Holy Supper, but no such nervous thrill comes to the listeners as when the phrase rises, mounts, gathers strength and fulness as some transporting and upbearing voice out of the darkness of the theatre. The reiterated anguish of the prelude rising until it cuts the listener's imagination like some fine-edged knife, throbbing, tortured with pain and with vain suffering; the intermittent glimpses of aspiration, hope, celestial glamor and celestial exaltation, are all at bottom transporting excitements to the remote mysteries and the remote passions of the drama that is to come. Poignant as they are anywhere, they are schemed for the mystery and the anticipation of the darkened theatre, the nervous audience, the hidden orchestra, the trembling blank of the curtain. There is no other music of such unspeakable agony, there is little of such ineffable aspiration; both are full of piercing reticences until in sheer relief the listener cries, What next, what next? Only the theatre may answer. Unconsciously probably, but fortunately, Mr. Fiedler somewhat lessened this note of poignant expectancy. The prelude, especially in concert, can be emotionally almost unendurable.

"Eroica" or no "Eroica," the symphony in C minor is the true "Heroic" symphony—heroic in idea, heroic in expression still, in spite of all the widening musical freedom and the waxing musical resources of a hundred years. Probably it is far more eloquent to us with our fuller and keener sense of the emotional qualities of music, than it was to the company who heard it dubiously in the Vienna of December, 1808. Some then called the symphony too long and over-developed. We in our turn see the heroic magnitude and fulness of the design and feel the mighty emotions that shaped and animated it. We have been attuned to heroic voice in music, of struggle, of longing, of fury, defeat and triumph. We rise instinctively to such heroic excitements as the transition from the scherzo to the finale, and answer to the thrill of the embattled chords of the first movement or of the triumphant song of the finale. For us, too, perhaps, more than for Beethoven's own generation is the deep and absorbed passion of the slow movement. The tonal weight, the tonal splendor of the modern orchestra only makes such music the more eloquent. Above all, the symphony is masculine music—the mass, the sweep, the power, the stress of it are all of the struggling, conquering, heroic male. The more broadly, vigorously and commandingly it is played the better. Mr. Fiedler was truly heroic in the swelling flood of the finale. He made it molten music. He wrought the transition vividly yet without obvious calculation. There were honest vigor, masculinity and directness, and no far-fetched emphasis, in his reading of the first movement. But in the andante his particular fault once more beset him. He must have his restless contrasts at all costs. He tried to be subtle in his modifications of the pace, in his nursing of the phrase, and he was only broken and disjointed. He would not give Beethoven his head. H. T. P.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Another Tone-Poem by Strauss at the Symphony Concerts—Mr. Elman's Debut—Mme. Melba's Return—Mr. Lhevinne in Recital—A Dolmetsch Concert for Christmas

Mr. Fiedler has put another, a familiar and one of the most generally appreciated of Strauss's tone-poems on his programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday and Saturday—"Death and Transfiguration," last heard here in the final year of Mr. Gericke's conductorship. As Mr. Ernest Newman and many another admirer of Strauss will have it "as regards the union of pure form with unalloyed purity of material, this is the most perfect thing that he has done. The poetic scheme is free from any matter that is not essentially musical, and it develops in such a way as to afford the musician the amplest facilities for development of his own special kind." No other music of Strauss, except, perhaps, that of "Salome" so readily and deeply stirs an audience, while Mr. Fiedler, in "A Hero's Life," sufficiently proved his mastery of these tone-poems. At the other extreme musically and at the other end of the programme is Nicolai's good old "Church Festival" overture, built upon Luther's hymn, "A Mighty Stronghold is Our God," hitherto unknown to the Symphony Concerts. Between the two, Mischa Elman, for his first appearances here will play Tschalkowsky's concerto for violin and orchestra. Mr. Elman is the most eminent of the younger violinists of the time, and since he ended his days as a prodigy, breadth, beauty and intensity of tone, ripe musicianship, largeness of understanding, and genuine passion and fire have been his distinguishing qualities. Since Mr. Kreisler came first to Boston, no violinist of such just distinction as Mr. Elman has come for his debut here. In the course of the week there will be room for an article about him and his career.

TENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT OF SEASON

Dec 17, 08
"Nutcracker" Suite of Tschalkowsky Feature of Program Incident to Christmas

MARKED CENTENARY OF BEETHOVEN SYMPHONY

Prelude to "Parsifal" Began an Evening During Which No Soloist Was Heard.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, gave its 10th concert of this season last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Prelude to "Parsifal".....Wagner
Suite from the "Nutcracker".....Ballet...
Tschalkowsky
Symphony No. 5, C minor.....Beethoven

This program was made with reference to Christmas and also with the thought that Beethoven's Fifth Symphony was performed for the first time at Vienna Dec. 22, 1808. Hoffmann's story, "The Nutcracker and the Mouse-King," on which the scenario of Tschalkowsky's ballet is founded, is a Christmas tale, and a delightfully old-fashioned one. Perhaps American children in 1908 are too sophisticated to enjoy it.

Not long ago a 10-year-old girl told me that she did not care for the Alice who sojourned in Wonderland and went through the looking-glass. She sneered at Alice, the mad hatter, the rabbit, the immortal Queen and Knight, and even at the Cheshire cat who had a habit of disappearing, leaving only a grin behind; she found no pleasure in the walrus and the carpenter; in short, she said the books were silly. She also said she had never read "The Arabian Nights," not necessarily Sir Richard F. Burton's "Thousand Nights and a Night"—although this reading would not hurt her—but the plain old "Arabian Nights" according to the Galland version. Truly a pitiable case!

Any conductor wishing to celebrate Christmas by his choice of program might find his hearers sophisticated. Bach's "Pastoral" from the "Christmas Oratorio" was once in fashion for Christmas. Mr. Paur was once fortunate in thinking of Bizet's pretty "Children's Games." Another conductor brought out "The Shepherd's Song at the Cradle" and the "March of the Three Kings" from Liszt's "Christus." Christmas week of last season we heard the symphonic piece from Franck's "Redemption." Mr. Fiedler made a happy choice in the suite from Tschalkowsky's ballet, and this suite was played last night for the first time at a Symphony concert given here by this orchestra. The music has been played at "Pop" concerts, and it was played recently at the Pension Fund concert.

And what charming music it is for the most part! Written only a little time before the "Pathetic" symphony, it reveals a side of Tschalkowsky's nature that is shown occasionally in his correspondence rather than in his musical compositions. There is a lightness, a gaiety of thought, a delicacy of orchestral expression that is seldom associated with him. Nor do I refer only to the employment of the celesta with the remarkable passage for bass clarinet in the "Dance of the Fairy Dragee." How fantastically light, high in the air, is the overture, a fitting prelude to a fairy tale! The hearer is reminded of the strange line in Laforgue's "Salome":

"On a lively and fatalistic mode, an orchestra of ivory instruments improvised a little and unanimous overture." The march with its chief theme repeated and repeated with childlike enjoyment is just the march for the assembling of guests before the lighting of the Christmas tree. The dances, it should be remembered, are in fairyland, in the kingdom of comfits and lollipops.

In the ballet the Arabian dance is entitled "Coffee," and the grotesque Chinese dance—music that in itself is humorous with the humor of genius—is entitled "Tea." They are delightfully exotic in rhythm, melody and harmonies. The waltz of the flowers is of more common stuff. There are much better waltzes even on earth. The suite was thoroughly enjoyed by the audience, as though it were ready again to answer "yes" to the question put by Peter Pan.

Tschaikowsky's ballet was based on the elder Dumas' translation of Hoffmann's story, and this same Hoffmann, composer, conductor, critic, writer of extraordinary tales, the best of which may be classed with those of Poe and Hawthorne, was the first to write a long analysis of Beethoven's fifth symphony in the second year after the first performance. He was the first also to appreciate fully the grandeur of the work. Yet musicians of repute heard this first performance. All that Reichardt could say was: "A great, highly-developed, too long symphony."

It is true that the performance, according to all accounts, was a poor one. When the symphony was first played in Leipzig, the leading music journal of Germany praised the first movement, although it was "rather obscure"; the musical ideas of the Andante were characterized as "heterogeneous"; "as for the scherzo that follows (it is almost impossible for a large orchestra to perform it) we have not been able to find it agreeable by reason of its too salient capriciousness." These honest judgments should teach us all humility in passing an opinion on music of today that seems at first "capricious," "not agreeable," unusual. Enough has been written about the fifth symphony to fill several large volumes. In spite of this the symphony has lived. Even the wildest eyed idolaters have not succeeded in arousing iconoclasts to destroy their idol. It was eminently fit and proper that the 100th year of this symphonic life should be commemorated.

The Prelude to "Parsifal," which has not been played for several years at these concerts, is associated with the passion rather than the birth of the Saviour. But it is good music for the end of the year, with the solemn thoughts, the inevitable regrets, the expectancy that is both hopeful and full of bodement.

All in all, a well contrasted program eminently suited to the time. Furthermore, there was no disturbing soloist, nor was the concert too long.

THE "NUTCRACKER" PLEASES AUDIENCE

Symphony Program Suits So Well Mr. Fiedler Is Applauded Again and Again.

Saturday night's Symphony concert was the shortest and most popular one given this season. There was a well-contrasted and unusually attractive orchestral program—the prelude from Wagner's "Parsifal," Tschaikowsky's "Nutcracker" suite and Beethoven's Fifth symphony. An audience that quite filled the hall showered applause upon Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra from first to last. The climax of enthusiasm was reached during the performance of the Tschaikowsky number. This must have surprised the stand-patters, who have been clinging to the notion that the "Nutcracker" suite was too trivial for a Symphony program. Nothing played by the orchestra this year has been more heartily, more genuinely, enjoyed by the larger portion of the audience. The performance of this symphony was all the more impressive coming after the Kazoo Dance and the Flower Waltz.

Christmas Programme at Symphony Rehearsal BY OLIN DOWNES 1908

R. FIEDLER arranged a programme of a nature appropriate to the Christmas week for the 10th public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra, which took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, and the concert, which will occur as usual on Saturday evening:

Prelude to "Parsifal".....Wagner
"Nutcracker" Suite.....Tschaikowsky
Fifth Symphony.....Beethoven

A concert with Mr. Fiedler is never a routine occasion. The presenting of a programme in harmony with the season was more than a matter of form. Uncompromising sincerity, big-heartedness, warmth of fellow-feeling—these things were to be felt fairly exuding from the music and the platform yesterday. Their influence was infectious. The men seemed to recognize and assimilate every slightest thought of the conductor. They played with such contagious fervor, such personally inspired enthusiasm that one felt to very unusual degree the force, the magnetism, the individual flavor of the impulses that sprang hot from the heart of the leader.

The prelude to "Parsifal" was extremely impressive and atmospheric. Tschaikowsky's suite is charming Christmas music. The ballet from which this suite is drawn was arranged after E. T. Hoffmann's charming fairy tale, "The Nutcracker and Mouseking." On Christmas eve the guests assemble and the children receive their presents. Marie is given a nutcracker, which she prizes above all her other gifts. Her brother snatches it and it is broken. Marie weeps. She puts the nutcracker to bed and rocks it asleep. At midnight she steals downstairs to look at the poor nutcracker and the strangest things occur. The fir tree grows larger and larger. The toys come to life. There is a battle. The mice, led by their king, are defeating the other toys, when the tin soldiers rush in to save the day. The wounded nutcracker fights with the mouseking, who is gaining upon his adversary, when Marie throws her shoe and kills the monster. Victory! The nutcracker, an ensorcelled prince, regains his manly beauty and carries Marie with him to his magic kingdom. As they go through the air the passing snowflakes seem to the girl to be alive. At court there are gay festivities and dancing, in celebration of the marriage and Marie's heroic deed.

Tschaikowsky's music is utterly charming, full of inspiration and scored with felicitous lightness of touch. It is all exquisite miniature work. Though it is surprising, it is true that the "March," with its whirling scales in the strings, the often repeated figure for the brass, and generally persistent character, reminds not a little of the colossal third movement of the "Symphonie Pathétique." Presenting the theme of the dance of the "Fee Dragee" to the celesta is certainly the happiest of conceits. The "Danse Russe," the "Danse Arabe," the "Danse Chinoise" are piquant little masterpieces, in each of which is marvelously compressed the characteristic national spirit and color. The "Valse des Fleurs" has a rather commonly sensuous theme, but it is suggestive and fanciful. This music "in a lighter vein" is ravishing to the ears and the imagination. The audience was warm in its approval.

We have rarely been privileged to attend such a surpassingly virile, romantic, impressive performance as that which Mr. Fiedler gave of the Fifth Symphony. It was his own reading. It differed in many details from those of his predecessors, and it was evidently the result of intense inward conviction. Every phrase jumped from the score to the hearers' consciousness. The famous phrase which opens the work ("The fate knocks at the door") dominated the stressful opening movement as a heroic figure might loom on a battlefield. The fermata that accompanies the last of the four notes was longer or shorter, according to the sense of the passage. The slow movement was taken at a faster pace than is usual, and it did not lose thereby. The transition from the strange scherzo to the shouting finale could not have been more thrillingly dramatic, and the finale itself has rarely sounded so strongly knit, so sustained in its thought, so proportionate and so effective in its climaxes. And there stood Mr. Fiedler, fairly quivering with the music and his own earnestness.

Hall.

908-09.

Y ORCHESTRA.

Conductor.

ERT.

Y 2, AT 8, P. M.

me.

TIVAL OVERTURE on the ghty Stronghold is our God."
nese concerts.)

VIOLIN.

Death and Transfiguration."

MAN.

IN WONDERS.

MISCHA ELMAN, AGED TWELVE.

Berlin Cor. Mus. Conv. Nov 30 1904

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

XI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 2, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

OTTO NICOLAI,

RELIGIOUS FESTIVAL OVERTURE on the
CHORAL, "A Safe Stronghold our God is still." for CHORUS, ORCHESTRA and ORGAN, op. 32.
(without Chorus.)
(First time at these concerts.)

TSCHAIKOWSKY,

CONCERTO for VIOLIN, in D minor, op. 35.
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Canzonetta: Andante.
III. Finale: Allegro vivacissimo.

RICHARD STRAUSS,

TONE POEM, "Death and Transfiguration." op. 24.

Soloist:

MISCHA ELMAN.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

IN WONDERS.

MISCHA ELMAN, AGED TWELVE.

Violin Soloist, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Jan. 2, 1909.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

XI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 2, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

OTTO NICOLAI,

RELIGIOUS FESTIVAL OVERTURE on the
CHORAL, "A Safe Stronghold our God is still." for CHORUS, ORCHESTRA and ORGAN, op. 32.
(without Chorus.)
(First time at these concerts.)

TSCHAIKOWSKY,

CONCERTO for VIOLIN, in D minor, op. 35.
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Canzonetta: Andante.
III. Finale: Allegro vivacissimo.

RICHARD STRAUSS,

TONE POEM, "Death and Transfiguration." op. 24.

Soloist:

MISCHA ELMAN.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

THE STRAUSS OF "DEATH AND TRANSFIGURATION"

A Remarkable Performance of the Tone-Poem at the Symphony Concert—The Source of Its Enduring Power—

Jan. 4, 1909
With "Death and Transfiguration" the imitative Strauss ends; with "Til Eulenspiegel," that followed five years later, the true and individual Strauss begins, say the stout champions of his later tone-poems and operas from the rondo of "Til" to the music-drama of "Salome." With "Death and Transfiguration," the sane and unperverted Strauss ends; and with the succeeding pieces the distorted and distorting Strauss begins, retort the detractors of all his subsequent work. Perhaps the listener as he hears the tone-poem at the Symphony Concert of Saturday need take small heed of either group of appraising voices. Until the apotheosis begins, it is certainly of the chromatic Strauss who walks in the ways of Wagner and of Liszt. There are hints of both as well in the apotheosis itself. No less certainly it is the Strauss of the high seriousness, of the perfect union of matter, form and manner that Mr. Newman, for example, cannot follow whole-heartedly into the more intricate mazes of the later tone-poems. Perhaps the truth is that beyond any other of Strauss's music, "Death and Transfiguration" speaks for itself at the moment. No other of his tone-poems can be so readily and fully "understood" of those who have come to the concert room without any preparation for it, and for no other purpose than the pleasure of mind and emotion it may give. "Death and Transfiguration" seems so clear now that it is hard to believe that there was ever any debate of its "obscurities." It is easier in many respects to follow than is Beethoven's fifth symphony, to which it harks back not only with its C minor and C major for its keys, but in its general poetic and emotional scheme.

And that scheme is as potent as it has always been from the days when music ceased to be beautiful or playful pattern-weaving and became an expressive voice of the strivings and the ideals of men. Only Strauss has modernized this scheme, as he modernizes all that he touches, and made it thereby expressive of the particular moods and struggles and the particular atmosphere of our time. There is no need to follow the German pedants in their quest of realistic details in the music of the dying man—of this suggestion of stertorous breathing, or of that of the ticking of the clock, of the distinction, known only to the analysts between the first and the second "fever motives." It suffices for our modern craving for truthful atmosphere that the music shall suggest, as it surely does, the tortured and tossing suffering of the dying man. The beginning is music of feverish misery and weary musing, and properly we ask no more detailed suggestion. Rather we ask that the music idealize such pain, and again Strauss did our asking. The episode of youthful memories is, perhaps, as tender prelude to the truly magnificent episode of the struggle for the achievements of life. The music fights again the battle for standards and ideals, fights it with all the intense striving, the nervous will, the solitary pride, the fire and fury, the recoil into black despair of such struggles in this our feverish day. The hero of "Ein Heldenleben" needed a woman to help him onward. The ideal figure of "Death and Transfiguration" fights in good modern fashion alone.

And if the end be defeat as it usually is, as it surely is in Strauss's music, then does the battle none the less go on and the ideals still shine. "Death and Transfiguration," with all its modernity, is gloriously impersonal. Later in "Ein Heldenleben," Strauss wrote the apotheosis of his hero. In the earlier tone-poem, he writes the apotheosis of the everlasting ideal, and in music that in beauty and in exaltation transcends, as it sometimes seems, even the beauty of the similar transfiguring music—and for far different purposes—at the end of "Salome." Recall kindred passages in the triumphal chants of the end of Beethoven's fifth symphony, of d'Indy's second, of Isolde at the end of Wagner's opera, and there is none to excel the idealism of this music of Strauss. There is the quality that gives its power, through all its broad diatonic progressions, through the glorious luminosity of the key of C major, through the heaping of instrumental resources and the richest of harmony, until the ecstatic violins bring a close that is the stillness of suffused beauty. For once in his life, at least, Strauss has written music—and what music!—of the ideal. There is none in all his tone-poems and operas, not even the tone-picturing of the beginning of "Zarathustra," that so absorbs and exhausts the emotions. They call Strauss's music intellectual; but here at the end of "Death and Transfiguration" is music that with each repetition goes more and more into the hearts of the men of his time. For Strauss, like Beethoven, and unlike Wagner, is through and through a masculine composer.

Mr. Fiedler's reading of the music helped as well as to compass and to maintain this transporting mood. Every conductor, however wide his sympathies, however earnest his repression of his own idiosyncrasies, finds music to which he responds with a deeper feeling and a truer understanding than he does to any other. For Mr. Fiedler, as "Ein Heldenleben" suggested last month no less than did "Death and Transfiguration" on Saturday, Strauss's tone-poems are such music. It is the oldest and also the truest of truths that the secret of conducting is the finding of the pace that will most clearly and significantly disclose the true substance and the true mood of the music, the discovery of what Wagner called its melos—its characteristic song—and the holding steadily to it. Mr. Fieldler did this throughout the tone-poem and most vividly and most truly of all in the apotheosis of the ideal. He took the music more slowly than many another conductor takes it. He took it, if memory does not fail, a little more slowly than does Strauss himself. By this change the music gained a new sweep and solemnity, a march that was nothing less than grandeur, a flooding magnificence that was wave-like in its luminosity and an overwhelming and exalted eloquence, that was like the "great voices" in the vision of the Apocalypse. And the orchestra met the conductor with the fullest splendor of its tone. Yet the concert had begun with a conservatory exercise by Nicolai—a conservatory exercise of the forties on "Ein Feste Burg"—mis-called a "religious overture." It was religious only in its counterpoint.

H. T. P.

MISCHA ELMAN

THE VIOLINIST AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

His First Appearance Here Yesterday—The Passion of His Playing and Its Exciting and Transforming Power—His Intensely Modern Spirit—The Qualities That He Brought to Tschaikowsky's Concerto and Their Effect Upon It and His Audience—The Youth and His Career in Europe

Mischa Elman's playing is the product of pure passion—passion for his violin, passion for its range and resource, passion for its beauty and power of voice, passion for his music, for the exact re-creation of it and for the completest and most communicative expression of all that it contains. Twenty passions, perhaps, shape and vitalize his playing, but the deepest, the fullest, the most commanding of them all is the passion for the uttermost and the irresistible expression. Thereby he is, or he seemed yesterday, when he played for the first time in Boston at the Symphony Concert, the most modern of violinists. For into him, young as he is, has entered the consuming passion for expression—of himself, his medium, his material—as it has not penetrated and possessed even Mr. Ysaye or Mr. Kreisler. It is the distinguishing and devouring passion of our time in every one of the arts, and in music most of all. To make the voice of poetry and of prose, the line and color of painting, the contours and the planes of sculpture, the tones of music, the varied impartments of the actor, yet more finely and largely, more vitally, truly, and potently expressive, is the restless and torturing goal, each in its kind, of our artistic generation. The composer strives for it in music, like Strauss or Debussy, Mahler or d'Indy, and still more, perhaps, the executive artist. It is the ceaseless goad, for example, that drives Mr. Paderewski to more and more strenuous eloquence or to finer and finer suggestion with the piano. It is the life itself of Mischa Elman's playing of the violin.

Therein is the wonder of him. Out of some obscure village in South Russia; the son of a poor Jewish school master; unlettered, almost uncouth; endowed only with instinctive and absorbing aptitude for the violin, he passed by a happy chain of discovery and circumstance to the teaching of Auer, the Russian master. He emerged from the conservatory a prodigy, who was not a prodigy, because already his talents had flowered into a youthful maturity. Managers, audiences, all sorts and conditions of men tried to keep him a prodigy. He himself hated the name, the position, the attributes. He was Mischa Elman, the violinist, be his years fourteen or sixteen, as they were then, or eighteen, as they are now, and as a violinist, independent of time or place or any transitory quality, he would have men know him, judge him and then yield to him. He went to and fro among the concert-rooms of Europe, steadily widening his world. He has now come to those of America. In these years, the very quality and accent of our artistic time have swiftly ripened in him, and uniquely among violinists. He has the affection for his instrument that every virtuoso must feel to win its secrets; but his is a passionate, a dominating affection. In a passionate quest he has searched out its resources, and as passionately mastered them until they serve him equally and at will. Then he has searched his music as ardently, affectionately, intelligently. His hearers shall know the exact substance, comprehend the full design, note the smallest detail of it. Still more shall they feel the passion that is in it and in him as he re-creates it. He would wring from it the last drop of expressive quality, the last hint of emotional suggestion. If it is songful he would raise it to the utmost pitch of impassioned melody; if it is stressful of rhythm and accent he would intensify this pulse. If every measure brings its technical exaction he would make such difficulties seem a part of its substance and spirit. If it is music of ornament he would give it the dazzling and transporting passion of rapturous bravura. Above all, passion and expression—full-blooded passion, vivid and vitalizing expression, so restless and so eager that it can barely pause for repose, and then rests that it may go only the faster and the farther to new intensities.

The passion, moreover, is irresistible to his hearers. There is nervous intensity in the presence of this youth—short of stature, slender below the waist, stocky above it, broad of shoulder, large of head, strong-chinned, Tartar-nosed, clear-eyed, high of forehead, resolute, alert, energetic, strong to the utmost of vitality, of sensation, of eagerness. Hear him in private talk, and his words come in quick, warm flood; his features play in incessant underscoring of them; he springs to his feet; he walks the floor; he leans over his companions in the energy with which the idea, the mood, the reaction of the moment possesses him; and in his eagerness to make them know and feel it. Watch him as he comes to the stage in the concert-room and waits for his instrument to enter. He has the self-possession of routine, but it is a nervous and eager self-possession. He is perceptibly straining to be free, to set to his violin and his music, to release the passion and the power hot within him. He begins and his playing and all that he would put into it wholly absorb and possess him. He sways, he "weaves," his body bends to the contour of his music and his head moves to the accent of it. And for once these things seem no trick of manner before an audience. They are as natural as inescapable, as his leapings to his feet in his own rooms. They are a part of the nervous intensity, the sheer passion that for the time control him. Quickly a similar passion, a similar tensely possess his hearers. For the first time yesterday, within long memories of the Symphony Concerts, an audience broke into applause in the midst of one of the movements of a concerto, and it was less of approval and of pleasure than of nervous relief and reaction from the strain under which the violinist, momentarily pausing, had held his hearers. It came again spontaneous, ardent, insistent, exciting, at each normal halt in the music, and most of all at the end. Even then the passion of his spirit was still strong upon Mr. Elman. The audience might have been the choice and final arbiter of the fate of violinists in the warmth of his acknowledgements. The orchestra had been zealous in accompaniment and loud in applause, and Mr. Elman must needs shake its hand by the proxy of Mr. Hess. Mr. Fieldler had conducted as though his fortunes as well as Mr. Elman's were at stake, and the violinist overflowed with gratitude. The passion of all these things, great and small, was sincere.

Mr. Elman had played Tschaikowsky's concerto, played it as though it were in his blood, with his warm pulse of life beating steadily in it, and with a bewitchment that made it seem like new, strange, wholly transformed music. Impressions came and went like the turning and the flashing of the glass in a kaleidoscope. Now the sweep of his bow, the power and the elasticity of his arm, gave his tone breadth, richness, vitality. Now the adroit delicacy of that same bowing filled the tone with lights and shadows. His rhythm leapt and stung. His accenting of the cadenza had made it seemingly spring to life under his bow. The technical feats, the technical exactions, with which Tschaikowsky filled the first and the last movements are an old story. They traverse the whole range of the violin—runs, harmonics, double-stopping, staccati, what you will. Unquestionably Mr. Elman accomplished them; but recollection of them came back in a blur. For he had achieved them so that they seemed neither feats nor exactions; they were of the piece taking its passionate course; they were normal means that the violinist was charging with imparting force; they had seemed the rapturous speech of the music. Between these two movements had come the idealized folk song of the andante, and Mr. Elman had sung it with sustained but subdued passion, with a soft, clear beauty of edgeless and undulating tone that had carried it to shadowy and haunting loveliness. The equality, the fusion of all these traits and things was the sum of these impressions. Mr. Elman's technical feats had been no more perfect in their kind than his singing of the canzonetta. His unfolding of the melody in the first allegro had been no whit less fascinating than the sweep and bite of his rhythms in the folk-dances of the finale. The power of his tone in the cadenza had been neither more nor less than its pervading beauty. He had been clarity and crispness itself in as intricate "passage-work" as the ingenuity of composer has often devised. The comprehensiveness, the balance of his playing made the marvel of it. So far as the concerto gave him room, he had poured the whole art of the violin into it.

And the passion was as comprehensive, as pervading, as equal and as diversified. César Thomson gains the beauty of his tone seemingly by a kind of devilish ingenuity. Ysaye achieves it by the amplitude of his power, Kreisler accomplishes it by an exquisite sensitiveness. With Mr. Elman the means are pure passion for the beauty, the range, the poignancy, the richness, the endless coloring of the voice of the violin. As some will have it, as Balzac himself had it, there are spirits imprisoned in these stringed and fretted and varnished shells. If it be so, not one of them might resist such passion as that with which Mr. Elman plies or persuades, goads or woos them to voice. He is as passionately insistent upon the coloring and the accent of their tones. Those who are cool-blooded enough to follow his playing of the concerto, score in hand, say that there is not a mark of expression in it that Mr. Elman does not follow to the letter. He enriches the music no less with imaginings and impulses of his own to changeful pace or varying stress of accent. Already the crowning artistry of the violinist that colors and shades tone through the skill of bow and fingers, spurred and ordered by the expressive impulse behind, is at its command. His tone is prismatic when he wills; luminous when he wills, shadowed, misty, radiant, suffused. The discernment, the sensitiveness, the means to do what these prompt, all dwell in him. There was like passion in his technical accomplishments. They were neither calculated nor ostentatious. They came and went with an intoxicating freedom. So unobtrusive were they that the uninitiated might never have suspected their existence. Double-stopping, harmonics, runs, staccato—he made them seem as so much rapturous and impassioned song, of themselves stirring him to warmer and warmer expression. As for rhythms, they beat throughout with irresistible vitality. The ear felt their quivering sinew. Fancy ran with them.

Thus the whole concerto seemed to live with a new life. Tschalkowsky at maturity toiled long upon it, and now this youth made the music a magnificent and rapturous improvisation. The first melody of the allegro seemed gradually to broaden and deepen under Elman's hand to warm and ardent song. With equal penetration, dexterity and imagination he wove the "passage work" into a gleaming or a shadowy web of many strands. If the violin were in dialogue with the orchestra, it seemed to command or to persuade it. The band followed where the solo instrument lead. The triumphant rhapsody of technical prowess that precedes the fantasia was like a climax to the song. The cadenza rose, with a kind of stark power, to its own striding rhythms. In the andante, the clarinets rippled to the song of the violin and the horns at their softest flowed with it. The whole was of an exquisitely suffused and softly ardent beauty. Then the violin leapt into the melodic and the rhythmic riot of the finale, and for once there was no thought of its repetitions. To each, Mr. Elman brought some new and more intense stress of rhythm and some new and more intense ardor of tone. His heat melted and consumed every technical exaction. The music smoked as it came from his violin, and from the orchestra he was really leading. The passion of expression could hardly further go. H. T. P.

GIFTED VIOLINIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Recorded Jan 3, 1909
Mischa Elman, Young Artist of Unusual Talent, Makes
First Appearance.

MASTERLY PLAYING OF TSCHAIKOWSKY PIECE

Impressive Performance of Strauss' Tone Poem, 'Death and Transfiguration.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Fiedler conductor, gave its 11th concert last night in Symphony Hall. Mischa Elman, violinist, played for the first time in this city. The program was as follows:

Overture on the choral, "A Safe Strong-hold".....Nicola
Concerto for violin.....Tschalkowsky
Tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration,".....Strauss

Nicola's overture, written originally for orchestra, chorus and organ, was once a favorite piece at concerts of the Handel and Haydn Society. There was no chorus last night when the overture was played at a concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the first time. It was once the fashion to build musical works of various kinds on a choral. The Germans have not wholly abandoned the custom, witness the orchestral variations by Georg Schumann on one, and the French have a trick of introducing a choral in unexpected places. Nicola's overture is at least 65 or 66 years old and it was no doubt a conventional piece at the time of the first hearing. When the chorus is employed the sonority of the opening measures is impressive if only through tonal weight.

Without the chorus these pages are effective. But the contrapuntal treatment that follows is rather cut-and-dried, and the second subject and the use made of it do not enhance the dignity of the choral. The overture was perhaps appropriate at the beginning of the year by reason of Luther's hymn. The inherent musical interest did not in itself warrant the introduction of the overture into the repertoire of the orchestra.

Young Mr. Elman is indeed a remarkable violinist. His reputation had preceded him. When he first appeared in European cities as an infant phenomenon, we were assured by grave critics that this boy had the masculine grasp and the emotional qualities of a mature and sensitive artist. Long articles were written about him, inquiries of a psychological nature. It was considered extraordinary that a child played emotional music with the right emotion when he could not have experienced this emotion.

Mr. Baughan attempted to explain the matter by saying that music carries its own emotions. "The performer has it ready-made for him if he does but understand the language." A prodigy, a wonder-child is a musical child of abnormally sensitive mind and body. There were some that preferred the theory of reincarnation, and they believed that a musical soul had entered into the boy's body. Admit spiritual transmigration. How did the boy acquire the ability to play passages which would baffle ordinary students for years? When Elman was asked about his practicing, he answered, "I would play for about 20 minutes, and then if I found I could not get the effect I wanted I would stop and think, until I felt how it should be." Here, then, was a boy violinist who actually thought, and thus he furnished a footnote to the old saying: "To some God gives brains; to others, to play on the fiddle."

If there were doubting Thomases at the concert last night they were convinced before the end of the first movement of the concerto that Mr. Elman's great reputation is fully warranted. It is seldom that any famous violinist at the zenith of his fame has so many admirable qualities. It is not necessary to dwell upon the pure intonation, the beauty of tone, now warm, full, sensuous, now exquisitely delicate, keen rhythmic feeling, the astounding mastery of technical difficulties. Mr. Elman has more than all this. He has the rare gift of interpreting Tschalkowsky's concerto as though the music were in a sense his own. His interpretation is in a way a creation.

The music had more dignity, beauty, fire by reason of his own individuality in expression. Nor is he a young man of one concerto. In New York, for instance, he will play with the Boston Symphony orchestra this week the concerto by Brahms and also Beethoven's. It would be interesting to compare the three performances for a violinist may be able to play effectively music by Beethoven and Brahms and yet be tame and even dull with the concerto of Tschalkowsky. According to the testimony of sound and experienced judges, Mr. Elman's best and highest qualities are revealed in each one of these concertos. That is to say, he is wholly rounded as an interpreter. His individuality accommodates itself to that of each one of the composers.

It is easy to declare with an air of portentous wisdom that Mr. Elman is a "born violinist"; that he is a "genius"; but these statements do not solve the mystery of such rare apparitions in the musical world. Here is a youth, who, born obscurely in Russia, is now, at the age of 16 or 17, ranked with the two greatest violinists now living. He is already illustrious, not merely as a virtuoso of the highest rank but as a master of purely musical and aesthetic interpretation. Here is a great mystery. Fortunately it is not necessary to solve it in order to have supreme enjoyment.

To those who are acquainted with the history of Tschalkowsky's concerto the superb performance of last night was not without its irony. Tschalkowsky wrote the concerto intending that Leopold Auer should play it. Auer for some reason or other pronounced the work impossible, and he did not try to conquer its difficulties. The composer went so far as to accuse Auer of intriguing against it. Yet Auer years afterward played it brilliantly, and now his pupil, Elman, ennobles a concerto that to many hearers, warm admirers of Tschalkowsky, has seemed a stumbling-block.

Mr. Fiedler gave a singularly impressive performance of Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," which is the noblest of Strauss' symphonic poems. Others are more extraordinary bizzare, if you will have the word, but "Death and Transfiguration" is imaginative without the suspicion of a too deliberate desire to make the bourgeois sit up. It is to be classed with "Don Juan" and "Till Eulenspiegel," but in its loftiness of sentiment it is above them. The magnificent climax was built up with great skill by Mr. Fiedler.

There was continuity that was irresistible. Performances of this work have been given when the "Transfiguration" section was not given time for majestic development, or the section seemed divided into episodes without close connection. Under Mr. Fiedler's direction, these pages of inspired music were as the apotheosis of the human race after the disappointments, sorrows, tragedies of daily life. Man is after all a noble animal, and this music is as the eloquent justification of his nobility even in the grave.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Mischa Elman Soloist
at the Symphony.

Old-Time Free Singing Competitions to be Revived Here.

Albert Spalding's Debut—
Recitals of the Week.

Globe Jan. 3, 1909
Mischa Elman, a young Russian violinist not yet out of his "teens," created unusual enthusiasm at the last Symphony rehearsal and concert by his wonderful performance of Tschalkowsky's D major concerto, a composition which was declared some years ago to be too difficult to play. Elman's playing bordered upon the phenomenal, and his hearty reception was thoroughly merited, for commendatory superlatives are his due when speaking of his interpretation of the immensely intricate work. His debut here was a musical sensation, and twice in the first movement the orchestra was interrupted by tumultuous applause after the interludes of the violin.

He appeared a trifle nervous when facing the audience as a passive performer, but the first few measures of action dissipated this feeling and immediately his playing disclosed a beautiful resonant intonation, as though a man and not a youth was the interpreter. He possesses confidence, in fact is quite authoritative in manner, and there is no lack of enthusiasm and earnestness in his playing.

He plays as if he loved his art, and

180
His attitude is a great factor in his success, for there are no "frills" with which to gain applause. He is the true artist and not the player who strives to gain plaudits by individual eccentricities.

His technique is of the highest grade, clarity, smoothness and flexibility of fingering ran through all his work, and the depth of his lower notes had the timbre of the cello. The instrument evidently was one of great value, for the tone throughout was rich and sweet. One feature of Elman's achievements was the unerring accuracy of his fingering, no matter what the tempo was or whether in single notes or chord passages.

Clean-cut purity in all kinds of octaves, in double stops, chord runs and harmonics were always at his command, and in the lyric passages the cantabile quality of his work was exquisite. In the cadenzas there were effects that fairly scintillated.

If the audience could have had its way Elman would have been forced to play indefinitely, but "no encores" were given, though young Elman had to make many a journey back to the platform and bow to his applauding auditors and fellow players.

The program opened with Nicolai's religious festival overture, an impressive composition to which the organ gives a dignified background. There was no chorus, which omission made some of the lighter orchestrated parts sound a little thin. The work was given effectively, especially in the opening movement with the organ accompaniment. The concerto was also performed in fine spirit, though the phenomenal solo work was the most interesting and the principal feature.

Mr. Fiedler gave a vigorous and at times an ear-piercing performance of the Strauss number, "Death and Transfiguration"; but it was in the accepted vein or mood and was received with considerable applause. There will be no concerts this week, the orchestra being on tour.

Globe Dec. 27, 09 Mischa Elman to Play at the Symphony.

This week's Symphony concerts bring to Boston for the first time Mischa Elman, from all accounts one of the most astonishing violinists that has visited America in a great many years. Elman recently made his debut in New York and won there unanimous praise from the critics. This young Russian was born in 1890 in Odessa. His father was his first teacher, and when he was years old he made his first public appearance in his native city.

In 1896 he became a pupil at the Imperial school of music at Odessa and won his first prize of a free scholarship at his entrance examination. Leopold Auer, professor in the Royal conservatory in St. Petersburg, heard him in 1903 and was so impressed with his genius that he secured the czar's permission to take Mischa and his family to St. Petersburg, where he accepted him as a free pupil.

Two years later he made his first appearance in St. Petersburg under rather curious circumstances. Auer was advertised to play the Tchaikowsky concerto at one of the symphony concerts, and at the last minute was compelled to give up the idea, and he sent Mischa Elman instead, then a boy of 14. His debut made a sensation, and in the same year he duplicated his success in Berlin.

At the Symphony concert he will play Tchaikowsky's concerto. The other works on the program will be a festival overture by Otto Nicolai that has never been played at these concerts. The other orchestral work will be Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." Globe Dec. 27, 1908

SYMPHONY

Part REHEARSAL

Jan. 2, 09 Mischa Elman Scores a Notable Success in Violin Solos

BY OLIN DOWNES

Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, scored a sensational success yesterday afternoon as soloist with the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. A young man of 18 years, compactly built, underneath average height, he played with astonishing authority, and his personal presence was a force with which to be reckoned.

Mr. Elman—one is inclined to say "Master Elman"—has seen some five years of wide experience as a travelling virtuoso. Perhaps his bearing savored slightly of the assurance of successful and self-confident youth, and such assurance is not displeasing. But there was more. How many of the famous virtuosos that we hear nowadays step out upon the platform with the stamp of great music already upon them? The vast majority might be butchers or bakers or soap-sellers, who having done their trick, could gracefully and appropriately retire into the commonplace of a mundane existence. When Elman appeared, there was in his face something of what he was to do.

It has never been our experience to hear the Tchaikowsky concerto played so characteristically, with such fire and passion, and yet with superb authority, self-control and a strong prevailing sense of form. One did not consider the violinist's splendidly adequate technique, or whether he was giving an "individual" reading of the work, or any other of those moot points of the modern auditor. There was only room for the consciousness of intense, vitally engrossing, if sometimes vulgar, music, speaking for itself. Even at the beginning the hearer anticipated the end, and was conscious, in some measure, of the course that the intervening pages were to take. As this implies, Elman's conception of the work was that of a very mature artist, arrived at the stage where, with the versatility and the perceptions of one who has seen and thought, he is fitted to grasp and convey another's message. This playing glowed with energy and inspiration, but the player's feet were always on the solid ground. Notably clear-sighted and healthfully vigorous it all was, but never stolidly sane or insensitive to the most subtle impulse of the music. Elman's technique rests on the firm foundation of a clear head and sound nerves, and such are the artists that we need today.

For at least eight years of Boston Symphony concerts—the writer's experience of them extends no further back—concerts where in the course of two or three seasons the most of the world's great artists appear, no audience heretofore has been guilty of breaking loose and applauding wildly during the orchestral tutti that follows the first passage of the soloist. That is what happened yesterday.

The concerto itself has rarely so great a composition. What some call its barbarism and its coarseness was not suppressed or veneered, but it all proceeded, we felt, from a strong, if over-emotional, man, and such was the artistry employed that passages which might have been hollow or redundant had distinction and appeal. The cadenza of the first movement was a demonstration of absolute mastery from every technical and esthetic standpoint. The longing, reminiscent romanza was sung with the ardor and the languor and the sensuousness that it demands, but it was never cloying. The finale went at a breakneck speed, with the savagery and the boundless energy of a Russian dance. Its mechanical difficulties were cleanly and authoritatively surmounted, and it was only the wilful and natural digressions of the composition that now and then slackened for an instant the headlong pace, while there was always abundance of tone to cope with the heavy orchestra. It was a memorable performance. If time for the succeeding applause had been subtracted from the 10-minute intermission that particular intermission would have been very short. This was one great feature of the concert. Of the other, Mr. Fiedler's overwhelming interpretation of Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," we will speak tomorrow. The rehearsal opened with Nicolai's Festival Overture on Luther's choral, "Ein Feste Burg ist Unser Gott," given for the first time at these concerts.

A VIOLIN PRODIGY AT THE SYMPHONY

advi Jan. 2, 1909
MISCHA ELMAN CONQUERS

BOSTON WITH HIS ART

A Fully Equipped Virtuoso at 16
—Orchestra Played From Nicolai and Strauss.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Nicolai—Overture on "Ein Feste Burg."
Tchaikowsky—Violin Concerto.

Soloist, Mischa Elman.
Strauss—"Death and Transfiguration."

The programme was chiefly modern in spite of the fact that Nicolai belongs to the first half of the 19th century. How much music the tune of "A strong castle is our Lord" is responsible for! It was the war-cry of the Reformation, this chorale, and there is an irresistible power in its measures that speaks of the inflexible determination of its singers. When the Protestant went into battle, he sang it; when he went to dreary imprisonment this tune with its confident words was his solace; when he went as a martyr to the stake "Ein Feste Burg" was to him as the "Ave Maria" to the Catholic.

Therefore Bach has made a Cantata of it; Raff has built it into an overture; Meyerbeer has had it played and sung in the "Huguenots"; Mendelssohn has used it as the foundation of his "Reformation Symphony"; George E. Whiting has spun it into his "Henry of Navarre"; Wagner has thundered it forth in his "Kaiser-Marsch." And here we have the melodic Nicolai, whose "Merry Wives of Windsor" is a masterpiece, again using it in overture form. Apart from its tremendous historical associations and its powerful words, the tune itself is finely adapted for counterpoint. Who wrote it? No one can say with certitude, although we know that Luther wrote the words.

The overture began grandly with the theme given out by full orchestra and organ. This is a much more effective method than the one adopted by Mendelssohn, who introduced the melody on flute alone, and then worked it up through the orchestra. Nicolai gives much excellent fugal work in this version and achieves a result much broader and more fitting than that attained by Raff when working up the same chorale into an overture.

Mischa (which means Michael) Elman is more than a prodigy,—he is an artist. It was a fitting introduction of this young phenomenon to Boston to have him appear at the Symphony Concerts for his debut,—an advantage which his more youthful predecessors of the bow, Reuter and Vecsey, did not have,—we question whether they so well deserved it.

182

Elman fairly conquered Boston with his brilliancy of work. He is not exactly an infant phenomenon, for he has attained the age of sixteen. But one cannot often find a full-fledged artist at so early an age. He has a sympathetic tone, much breadth, especially in passages on the G string, his harmonic tones are pure and birdlike, in double-stopping he is sure as a rock, his bowing is free, and unconstrained, and altogether he is a fully equipped virtuoso and a musician as well.

It was small wonder therefore, that he won an absolute triumph. The public were aroused by his work as we have seldom seen them. He is likely to become the chief musical star, in instrumental work, of this season, if we except Paderewski.

The work which he played was less to be commended. While we do not agree with the great critic Hanslick, who abused it with Billingsgate, we nevertheless think it one of the weakest of Tschalkowsky's compositions. The first movement is almost constant display of the soloist; the second has some rather monotonous Russian melancholy, and the finale is too evidently an attempt at the extremes of folk-music. We feel that the great success here achieved was rather a personal one, a victory of Master Elman and not of Tschalkowsky.

We are always deeply moved by Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration." It is a lofty theme loftily treated. When we compare this powerful tone-poem on the greatest topic in the world (and partly out of it) with the same glowing orchestration applied to celebrating himself as a hero, or to giving us an idea of his wife and baby, we feel doubly that here is the right method in the right place. It was also interesting to study this picture of Death so soon after we had heard Tschalkowsky's tone-poem on the same topic; the one epic, the other personal; the one Miltonian, the other suggesting Hugo in its poetic realism. The one yields to the victory of the grave, the other triumphs over it. This is to us the highest Strauss, the noblest orchestral poet of recent times.

We have had this work often enough in recent years for all our concert-goers to become familiar with its salient points. We need not therefore spend much time in describing them. It is rather of the reading given by Mr. Fiedler that we should speak, and here we can eulogize heartily. It is very evident that Mr. Fiedler is one of the most painstaking of conductors. He makes every figure, every sub-theme, have its due prominence. Yet he is not a mere drillmaster; he throws himself into his work with an abandon that proves that he feels its every measure.

Yet in the first part, the picture of the sick-room, we found some exaggeration; the art of concealing art was not always present. There was nervous vigor, rather than sustained power. But the performance gained as it proceeded and at the end we felt that we had never had the transfiguration, which is the climax, given so powerfully and clearly.

Death and Transfiguration

A Memorable Performance at the 11th Symphony Concert

The programme of the 11th rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra was:

Religious Festival Overture on the Chorale, "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott".....Otto Nicolai
Violin Concerto.....Tschalkowsky
Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration,".....Richard Strauss

Mr. Mischa Elman, a violinist of extraordinary talent, was soloist, and yesterday the Post spoke of his triumph at the public rehearsal, a triumph the more gratifying in that it represented the appeal of sane, vital art, which, whether Mr. Elman had been 18 or 50, would have exerted the same electric effect upon the enthusiastic audience.

Mr. Fiedler, it is generally conceded, made one of his greatest successes thus far when he placed upon a programme Richard Strauss' overwhelming "Hero's Life," which will be repeated at the second pension fund concert of the season. No less remarkable and more uplifting were the performances of the "Death and Transfiguration" at the concerts last week. There is no question of one thing: that Richard Strauss, be his position what it may 300 years hence, is beyond question the authoritative voice of this period, that when he speaks he voices the wonderful impulses of this generation. No wonder that he appeals irresistibly to young musicians, to the rising conductor, Mr. Fiedler, and others of his ilk, of today. Has there ever been a more curious age? And that heaven-storming mind, in its dauntless questioning, would not be balked by anything in the sky above or the earth below. Is all that within the province of art? Yes, within the province of art that is growing greater, more profound, more expressive, more all-embracing every day of these amazing years. To me such art represents the greatest word, "Modernity."

This tone poem is among the earlier of Strauss' epoch-marking works. He has not wholly escaped Wagner's idioms, or, rather, when this influence is perceptible, he multiplies—the voice, mind you of this n'th power generation—he multiplies a hundredfold the emotional stress, for instance, of the dramatic episode that depicts the final climax of Tannhäuser's struggle with the flesh and the spirit in Wagner's opera of that name. There is such a vortex of a reminiscence in "Ted und Verklarung."

It requires strong nerves to bear the strain of one of these torrential tone poems. Mr. Fiedler accomplished more than any conductor in our experience with the "Transfiguration" music—a dangerous test of the interpreter. In characters of fire he painted that soul-picture. Where, or when, are we to stop? Shall it soon be given to the Over-man whom Strauss is forever prophesying; to drink of the waters of Life and Death, and to Know?

Perhaps in a few generations the terrible depicting of the death chamber, the trance of introspection, and the dying man's last conflict with the last grim foe, will seem naive alongside the paintings of Richard Strauss the second, but for us of 1909 there is little in any art that goes deeper. Here and there in the score seems to be a patchy place, where the ends of a tremendous vision did not meet, where the inspired speech takes for a moment the tones of other men, but who else could have written the overpoweringly atmospheric beginning, the magnificently militant pages that represent man's struggle with fate, the warning of the trombones, and the psychological transition from death to victory? How very few composers—and conductors—could have so built up the ascending, victorious, rainbow-tinted apotheosis? And what more can we say of Mr. Fiedler's transcendent interpretation, than that it was equal to the great modern masterpiece?

ELMAN AND THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

None but the truly memorable musical occasions of the last decade in this city could provide a parallel for the artistic delight conferred last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall upon the splendid gathering of auditors that filled the great room. There are concerts designed to please mainly the casual listener, and other concerts avowedly intended to interest the connoisseur, but it is none too often that, as was the case last evening, a programme can be so arranged and so translated into musical sound as to captivate both classes of hearers. The list of pieces prepared by Mr. Max Fiedler for this concert was short, but skilfully chosen, and each work was thrice admirably played. Heinrich Noren's "Kaleidoscope" theme and variations, Op. 30, was the evening's novelty, and after it came the Beethoven violin concerto, performed by Mischa Elman, and Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." These sufficed to fill the space of two hours with thrilling musical beauty, and their respective performances were worthy in every way of the very best traditions of the Boston orchestra. In the superlative doings of the evening young Mr. Elman played a distinguished, indeed, an extraordinary part, setting a new standard by which he must hereafter be judged.

Heinrich Noren's name is new to local concert rooms, but it can scarcely fail to become better known here, for the theme and variations heard last night prove him not merely a master of orchestral writing but a musician of fertile ideas and of genuine feeling. The title, "Kaleidoscope," suggests the ever new combinations that scintillate through these variations, but it fails to convey a sense of the moving and compelling beauty that gives this work character and power. The original theme is simple enough, but the eleven variations extract from it a world of rich color and of eloquent meaning, without once straining the bounds of plausibility, so to say, or exceeding the limits of orchestral good taste. Whether Noren carries the listener through the measures of a "mournful dance," or into the regions of idyllic and mischievous humor, or sets him in the dim nave of a vaulted cathedral (and he does all these things and many more), this music is legitimate and sincere. Even the final variation, entitled "To a Celebrated Contemporary," with its highly ingenious play upon Richard Strauss's "Heldenleben" themes, strikes one as having musical as well as technical interest. Incidentally, it is not easy to see why Strauss's publishers invoked the law, in Germany, to prevent publication of Noren's score on this ground, since the quotation is in some respects superior to the original.

Mischa Elman's performance of the Beethoven concerto re-enforced the impression gained by his previous playing of less serious music and proclaimed him, beyond all doubt, a mature artist of high rank and still higher possibilities. Elman's present stage of development corresponds to the first period, so-called, of many a great composer or painter of the past. What he does now is as perfect, in its way, as could be wished. His playing has the fineness and precision of contour, the even the strictness, of line that is one precious qualities of youth. When Elman is older there may be a larger sweep, a ch, in his playing, but it could not well be intonation, juster and truer in its phrasing appreciative of every nuance and shade composer's meaning. It was good to hear form the Beethoven concerto, and there high anticipations of his promised playing rahms concerto at to-morrow afternoon's symphony concert.

"Death and Transfiguration" has sel-ever, achieved a finer effectiveness than Mr. Fiedler's ministrations last evening. noble music in it, and it was nobly set

Finian Jan 8, 09

major, No. 38, (Köchel 504).

RWONKY.

182
at the Symphony Concerts for his debut,—an advantage which his more youthful predecessors of the bow, Reuter and Vecsey, did not have,—we question whether they so well deserved it.

Elman fairly conquered Boston with his brilliancy of work. He is not exactly an infant phenomenon, for he has attained the age of sixteen. But one cannot often find a full-fledged artist at so early an age. He has a sympathetic tone, much breadth, especially in passages on the G string, his harmonic tones are pure and birdlike, in double-stopping he is sure as a rock, his bowing is free, and unconstrained, and altogether he is a fully equipped virtuoso and a musician as well.

It was small wonder therefore, that he won an absolute triumph. The public were aroused by his work as we have seldom seen them. He is likely to become the chief musical star, in instrumental work, of this season, if we except Paderewski.

The work which he played was less to be commended. While we do not agree with the great critic Hanslick, who abused it with Billingsgate, we nevertheless think it one of the weakest of Tschalkowsky's compositions. The first movement is almost constant display of the soloist; the second has some rather monotonous Russian melancholy, and the finale is too evidently an attempt at the extremes of folk-music. We feel that the great success here achieved was rather a personal one, a victory of Master Elman and not of Tschalkowsky.

We are always deeply moved by Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration." It is a lofty theme loftily treated. When we compare this powerful tone-poem on the greatest topic in the world (and partly out of it) with the same glowing orchestration applied to celebrating himself as a hero, or to giving us an idea of his wife and baby, we feel doubly that here is the right method in the right place. It was also interesting to study this picture of Death so soon after we had heard Tschalkowsky's tone-poem on the same topic; the one epic, the other personal; the one Miltonian, the other suggesting Hugo in its poetic realism. The one yields to the victory of the grave, the other triumphs over it. This is to us the highest Strauss, the noblest orchestral poet of recent times.

We have had this work often enough in recent years for all our concert-goers to become familiar with its salient points. We need not therefore spend much time in describing them. It is rather of the reading given by Mr. Fiedler that we should speak, and here we can eulogize heartily. It is very evident that Mr. Fiedler is one of the most painstaking of conductors. He makes every figure, every sub-theme, have its due prominence. Yet he is not a mere drillmaster; he throws himself into his work with an abandon that proves that he feels its every measure.

Yet in the first part, the picture of the sick-room, we found some exaggeration; the art of concealing art was not always present. There was nervous vigor, rather than sustained power. But the performance gained as it proceeded and at the end we felt that we had never had the transfiguration, which is the climax, given so powerfully and clearly.

Death and Transfiguration

A Memorable Performance at the 11th Symphony Concert

The programme of the 11th rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra was:

Religious Festival Overture on the Chorale, "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott".....Otto Nicolai
Violin Concerto.....Tschalkowsky
Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration,".....Richard Strauss

Mr. Mischa Elman, a violinist of extraordinary talent, was soloist, and yesterday the Post spoke of his triumph at the public rehearsal, a triumph the more gratifying in that it represented the appeal of sane, vital art, which, whether Mr. Elman had been 18 or 50, would have exerted the same electric effect upon the enthusiastic audience.

Mr. Fiedler, it is generally conceded, made one of his greatest successes thus far when he placed upon a programme Richard Strauss' overwhelming "Hero's Life," which will be repeated at the second pension fund concert of the season. No less remarkable and more uplifting were the performances of the "Death and Transfiguration" at the concerts last week. There is no question of one thing: that Richard Strauss, be his position what it may 300 years hence, is beyond question the authoritative voice of this period, that when he speaks he voices the wonderful impulses of this generation. No wonder that he appeals irresistibly to young musicians, to the rising conductor, Mr. Fiedler, and others of his ilk, of today. Has there ever been a more curious age? And that heaven-storming mind, in its dauntless questioning, would not be balked by anything in the sky above or the earth below. Is all that within the province of art? Yes, within the province of art that is growing greater, more profound, more expressive, more all-embracing every day of these amazing years. To me such art represents the greatest word, "Modernity."

This tone poem is among the earlier of Strauss' epoch-marking works. He has not wholly escaped Wagner's idioms, or, rather, when this influence is perceptible, he multiplies the voice, mind you of this n'th power generation—he multiplies a hundredfold the emotional stress, for instance, of the dramatic episode that depicts the final climax of Tanhäuser's struggle with the flesh and the spirit in Wagner's opera of that name. There is such a vortex of a reminiscence in "Tod und Verklärung."

It requires strong nerves to bear the strain of one of these torrential tone poems. Mr. Fiedler accomplished more than any conductor in our experience with the "Transfiguration" music—a dangerous test of the interpreter. In characters of fire he painted that soul-picture. Where, or when, are we to stop? Shall it soon be given to the Over-man whom Strauss is forever prophesying, to drink of the waters of Life and Death, and to Know?

Perhaps in a few generations the terrible depicting of the death chamber, the trance of introspection, and the dying man's last conflict with the last grim foe, will seem naive alongside the paintings of Richard Strauss the second, but for us of 1909 there is little in any art that goes deeper. Here and there in the score seems to be a patchy place, where the ends of a tremendous vision did not meet, where the inspired speech takes for a moment the tones of other men, but who else could have written the overpoweringly atmospheric beginning, the magnificently militant pages that represent man's struggle with fate, the warning of the trombones, and the psychological transition from death to victory? How very few composers—and conductors—could have so built up the ascending, victorious, rainbow-tinted apotheosis? And what more can we say of Mr. Fiedler's transcendent interpretation, than that it was equal to the great modern masterpiece?

ELMAN AND THE BOS

None but the truly memo of the last decade in this parallel for the artistic del by the Boston Symphony Hall upon the splendid ga filled the great room. The to please mainly the ca concerts avowedly intende seur, but it is none too case last evening, a progr and so translated into m vate both classes of heard pared by Mr. Max Fied short, but skilfully cho thrice admirably played leidoscope" theme and evening's novelty, and a violin concerto, perform Strauss's tone poem, " These sufficed to fill th thrilling musical beaut formances were worth best traditions of the superlative doings of t played a distinguish part, setting a new hereafter be judged.

Heinrich Noren's n rooms, but it can se known here, for the last night prove him chestral writing but and of genuine feel suggests the ever ne through these variat sense of the movi gives this work cha theme is simple end extract from it a quent meaning, without once straining the bounds of plausibility, so to say, or exceeding the limits of orchestral good taste. Whether Noren carries the listener through the measures of a "mournful dance," or into the regions of idyllic and mischievous humor, or sets him in the dim nave of a vaulted cathedral (and he does all these things and many more), this music is legitimate and sincere. Even the final variation, entitled "To a Celebrated Contemporary," with its highly ingenious play upon Richard Strauss's "Heldenleben" themes, strikes one as having musical as well as technical interest. Incidentally, it is not easy to see why Strauss's publishers invoked the law, in Germany, to prevent publication of Noren's score on this ground, since the quotation is in some respects superior to the original.

183

Mischa Elman's performance of the Beethoven concerto re-enforced the impression gained by his previous playing of less serious music and proclaimed him, beyond all doubt, a mature artist of high rank and still higher possibilities. Elman's present stage of development corresponds to the first period, so-called, of many a great composer or painter of the past. What he does now is as perfect, in its way, as could be wished. His playing has the fineness and precision of contour, the firmness, even the strictness, of line that is one of the precious qualities of youth. When Elman is ten years older there may be a larger sweep, a freer touch, in his playing, but it could not well be purer in intonation, juster and truer in its phrasing or more appreciative of every nuance and shade of the composer's meaning. It was good to hear him perform the Beethoven concerto, and there will be high anticipations of his promised playing of the Brahms concerto at to-morrow afternoon's Boston Symphony concert.

Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" has seldom, if ever, achieved a finer effectiveness than under Mr. Fiedler's ministrations last evening. There is noble music in it, and it was nobly set forth.

Jan. 6—Th
Santa I

Jan. 6—Th
the Lot
Beirut;
Long Is

TO DRA

A comm

chairman,

Civic Feder

ment to the members of

of Boston;

ben D. Silli

No attem

ment to th

a careful s

will then b

gestion to v

of the cour

ments, the f

PHONY in D major, No. 38, (Köchel 504).

Soloist:

ARD CZERWONKY.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

XII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 16, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

SCHUBERT,

SYMPHONY in C major, No. 7.

I. Andante; Allegro ma non troppo.

II. Andante con moto.

III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio.

IV. Finale: Allegro vivace.

DEBUSSY,

PRELUDE to "The Afternoon of a Faun."
After the Eclogue of Stéphane Mallarmé.)

SCHILLINGS,

"THE HARVEST FESTIVAL," from the Opera
"Moloch," Act III.
(First time in Boston.)

BERLIOZ,

OVERTURE, "The Roman Carnival," op. 9.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

FRENCH AND GERMAN MUSIC, OLD AND NEW

Debussy for a Modern and Berlioz for a Classic on the French Side—Schillings and Schubert for Germans—A Rather Empty Fragment of Schillings's "Moloch"—"The Afternoon of a Faun" Again

Jan. 16, 1907
Schubert in heroic size, Debussy refining his musical phrases into the most elusive subtleties, an excerpt from an opera of Schillings, and the riotous rhythms of Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," composed the programme of the twelfth rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra. The piquancy of the contrasts it presented was an ample substitute for the personal interest usually aroused by the entrance of a soloist. Schubert in an Olympian mood (not unstreaked, be it confessed, with the sentiment common to Germanic notions of Greek deities) and Debussy at the opposite end of the scale—not only harmonic, but mythological—the two are as far apart as the formal symphony and the subjective fantasy, as the faun from the deity. But the antithesis demands this modification; that the scale must be regarded as horizontal rather than vertical. These divisions would have been still more emphatic had the pieces been played in the order in which they appeared on the programme, which would have made Debussy follow Schubert directly after the intermission. This, however, was announced as an error in the printing, and the order observed was:

Schubert: Symphony in C major, No. 7.
Schillings: "The Harvest Festival," from the Opera "Moloch."
Debussy: Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun."
Berlioz: Overture, "The Roman Carnival."

From the number of those who departed before the beginning of the Overture by Berlioz, it might be gathered that a generous share had come to share the reveries of Debussy and that not a few declined to subject them to the possible blur of Berlioz's exuberant scoring. And the filmy grace and lightness brought to the eclogue by the players instilled sympathy with such a retreat. Debussy, in common with other moderns, clears a space for individual virtuosity, less that of technique than of tonal coloring. It is not enough that the flute in its bend of chromatics announcing the chief theme, should sound the bucolic note. Debussy is not content with the conventional symbols—staff, pipes and a grazing herd in the prospect. His notes must convey what they conveyed asplayed yesterday afternoon in tones of warm rich languor—the silken shimmer of still air, trembling glow of yellow sunlight, the peace of wild things undisturbed, the peace of wild, half-divine beings, unvexed with notions of right or wrong. Golden afternoon; greenery, rich and luxuriant in ripe, midsummer growth, spots of wavering sunshine on cushiony turf, the tinkle of a stream, and the faun lying in a swoon of drowsiness among golden-headed lilies; the catlike grace of his supple body in repose, tips of hairy ears with their peep of the animal, the hint of a smile—playful without viciousness—the longish look under half-closed eyelids—such a faun as looked down from one of the niches of the hall; such a faun lay among the golden-headed lilies of Mallarmé's verse; such a faun breathed out of the strings and wood winds of Debussy's score. Creature of vague, wistful passions, rolled in the embrace of the thick turf—shall he yield to the soft persuasion of the hum that pervades the wood, or urge his drowsy senses to recall a visit of nymphs, swan-white—or was it a visit, or was it a dream? If reality, he would resign his divinity to search it out and claim it for his own. But the yellow sun grows too bright for these twilight of memory; the air palpitates with its golden radiance. His eyes turn to smoking Etna, and his thoughts not to a nymph, but a goddess. And while he trembles at such presumption, the day again exerts its spell; his long lashes meet and the smile of wild innocence melts into the curves of the slumber smile and a deep sigh as of cello notes comes from the parted lips. Flakes of sunshine tremble in the golden air.

These, or something next of kin, were the images which haunted the mind of the composer, and these were what he sought to convey, and does convey, in the measures of his ejaculatory score. Its melodies come in jets and spurts out of billowy tones which stretch the silken strands of their weaving. The throb of the initial flute notes is developed in masses of writhing and crawling chromatics; a solo violin speaks in pensive soliloquy, with flute reminiscent; up sweep the chromatics, and down; and in passionate undertones the sustained background of wind notes—a parenthesis of sound, always expressive, and often explicit. All at last—visions, harp glissando, sigh of cellos, solo violin—melt into silvery mist and fade to gray silence. Such music may or may not "last." It is. And considering the difficulty of predictions, it cannot well be overlooked.

With Schubert's symphony (still-born, but christened with a rhapsody from the critical pen, of Schumann) the case is far otherwise. In lateral dimensions, at least, the work is gigantic. The same might be said of its melodic proportions. The fertility of invention, responsible for so much that is best in Schubert, and much also that is commonplace, did not desert him here. He practises no husbandry with his themes. Material that would have prompted a score of his peers to niggardly hoarding, he lavishes in ornamental detail. He sings with a score of throats. He is, moreover, magnificently deliberate. Here is no deference to suburban trains and dinner hours; but the rounded episode, the complete development of his idea, orderly and loquacious, if you like, with the pregnant loquacity of the elder novelists like Fielding, who "brought his armchair into the proscenium to chat in the lusty ease of his fine English." As Schubert paced the four-square paths of the Academe in this symphony, Mr. Fiedler was heard at his best—scholarly, robust and apt in his sense of the contrasts in which the work abounds. As an illustration, consider his generalship at a certain climax of the second movement. It grew in volume and in import, like the preparation for great events, it gathered head and gained intensity; it became a vial of tempests, burst, and smote a dead silence of human stupefaction, after the manner of great historical climaxes. A few measures of philosophic comment and the preceding themes picked up their routine employments to go on as before, also after the manner of what follows historical climaxes. All these and other matters of moment came in response to the minatory flourishes of Mr. Fiedler's baton—sharp accentuations of rhythm which told like a bold line, military blares of brass, abrupt thunders, remote horn calls, Schubert's dropped stitches of melody in obscure nooks of the band, caught and thrust on the ear in their fleeting phrase; themes briefly announced and finely amplified, and always the string choir's limpid undercurrent of sound. To scan the pages of this symphony is to see at a glance how Schubert relied on this last device, the chanting of strings, as a mass against which to build his themes. Increasing in volume as the end is approached, never perfunctory, but always vitalized with melody, these members mount like clustered columns, springing their light tracery into the upper recesses of groining where all is rich, intricate and dim. Considered as the music of tracery, still all is disciplined—pure design before the inroads of the flamboyant, when still for every member in the column exists a member in the arch, interrupted, it may be, by the flowers and foliage of the capital, but resuming above in firm continuity of line. Such music was born of a reverence for the schools. Perhaps do not write that way now from choice. Perhaps we cannot.

For the rest, the prelude to the third act of Schillings' "Moloch," bearing the label of "The Harvest Festival," frank and full-lunged, gave a demonstration of how to perform intricate orchestral evolutions, to avoid the extravagances of "distinguished contemporaries" and keep within the law up to within half a score of measures from the end, there to admit a riot of strange words which may be supposed to follow in the train of Moloch. The overture of Berlioz, heard many a time at these concerts, freely exhibited its kaleidoscopic colors from the red of brasses to the blue of muted strings in its thick instrumentation. Again the English horn (deliciously appropriate) arrogated to itself the singing voice of Benvenuto in his melody, "O, Teresa, vous que j'aime," in strains that would have left that worthy completely bewildered and inexpressibly flattered. Berlioz and Cellini; indeed, why not? The fervid romanticist pouring the rich glow of his fancy about the image of the glorious, æsthetic thug? If it succeeds, as in this case we are bound to admit that it does, so much the better for art and biography. Benvenuto mounts from the naive to the heroic. A failure can be attributed not to romanticism but to the romanticist, whose wings were weak (or to the librettist whose fable was silly). But Berlioz and Benvenuto, romanticist and romantic, thinker and thing thought—the two were ordained twins in a metaphysical heaven. A psycho-picaresque overture remains as fruit of the union.

12TH SYMPHONY CONCERT OF SEASON

Sturdy Performance Given of Composition by Franz Schubert.

Herald Jan. 17, 1909
By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, gave its 12th concert last night in Symphony Hall. The program, as announced, was as follows: Symphony in C major..... Schubert
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"..... Debussy
"The Harvest Festival" from "Moloch"..... Schillings
Overture, "Roman Carnival"..... Berlioz

The order was changed in the performance. Debussy's "Prelude" was played immediately after the excerpt from Schillings' opera "Moloch." This excerpt was heard in Boston for the first time, and I believe the performance was the first in this country. Schillings' opera has a sombre subject and it has not met with general favor. "The Harvest Festival" in the opera is the prelude to the third act with the first scene of this act. When an excerpt from an opera is played in a concert and makes little impression, it is courteous to the composer to say that it is taken from its place and, devoid of dramatic significance, necessarily loses in value.

It is doubtful whether in this instance Schillings' music has any theatrical worth. It is heavy-footed; it has no true animation, no life; it is neither boisterously merry nor delightfully piquant; the dancers around the sheaves on the stage surely wear rubber boots. There is no invention in melody, harmony or rhythm. There is only one touch of instrumentation that is noteworthy, and this occurs a few measures before the end. The music is worse than vulgar; it is common.

The performance of Schubert's symphony was vigorous, sturdy, and yet the finer sentiment in passages that are peculiarly Schubertian was eloquently expressed. There are some who are not persuaded by Schumann and Weingartner into enjoying the extreme length of the symphony. They would fain have the work undergo some process of condensation, and yet it would be difficult for them to indicate the measures or sections that should be omitted. It is still a marvellous work in certain respects.

The Hungarian dash of the second theme in the first movement; the wonderful trombone passage; the melodic charm of the andante and the infinite beauty of the detail; the expressive trio of the scherzo; the rush of the finale—these place the symphony high on the list—and yet, and yet—but Schubert was not a severe critic of his own compositions. He wrote at full speed and he had not the time to revise, to condense.

Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" is familiar here, but the performance last night was a triumph of euphony. This Prelude is a masterpiece of imaginative poetry in tones; it is a thing of flawless beauty. It matters not whether the symbolism of Mallarmé be cryptic or intelligible. It matters not whether the explanation of Gosse or of another be ingenious and plausible. The title is enough to give a clue to the hearer if a clue be needed. Debussy himself has composed nothing more charming in strictly orchestral music.

There is the suggestion of sunlight and wormth, forest and meadow, dear to fauns and nymphs. There is the gentle melancholy that is associated with a perfect afternoon. There is the exquisite melodic line and there is harmonic suggestion with inimitable coloring that is still more exquisite. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has seldom if ever given a more romantic interpretation of a rarely poetic work. The ensemble was so remarkable that it seems invidious to particularize, yet who could refrain from admiration of the art and sentiment displayed in this performance by Mr. Maquarrie and Mr. Longy?

Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, with its sparkling brilliance and its strangely sonorous final chord, brought the end to a concert that on the whole gave much pleasure.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Echoes of Yesterday's
Symphony Concert.

People's Choral Union Tonight
—Geraldine Farrar Coming.

Interesting Recitals of the Current Week.

Globe Jan. 17, 1909
No soloist appeared at the 12th Symphony rehearsal and concert, the orchestra having things its own way in the following program: Symphony in C major, Schubert; "Harvest Festival," from Schillings' opera, "Moloch," first time in Boston; Debussy's prelude, "The Afternoon of a Faun," and the "Roman Carnival" overture by Berlioz. Schillings' work was the only novelty, a somewhat heavy piece largely in dancing rhythm with once in awhile a note of joyousness suggesting merriment of the dancers, but not specially typical of festive scenes. Unanimity of performance resulting in the usual standard of ensemble playing by the men made the piece effective, even though there was not anything of particular interest to the auditor.

Schubert's symphony is such a glorious composition that the first part of the program really overshadowed the second part. One composer against three, and the one won. From the horn passages in the first movement, through the march themes of the second, the pathos and humor of the trio and scherzo and the brilliant finale, the work of the orchestra was as lucid and expressive as one could desire.

In the first part brasses and woodwinds were in beautiful harmony, and all the complicated "conversations" and elaborated repetitions of the second movement were admirably voiced by the different choirs. The charming scherzo and the trio, with its tinge of melancholy, were each given with fine effect. The well-known "four notes" oft repeated were impressively introduced and the strings managed their terribly difficult score with commendable smoothness. All in all the finale was a notable performance.

"The Afternoon of a Faun" gave the flutist, Mr. Maquarra, a chance to reveal an exquisite tone and with his fellow players to set forth the languorous and dainty moods of Debussy's idyl in delightful tonal colors. The Berlioz overture was given with the energy and variety necessary to characterize the ideas of the composer.

This week the orchestra will give the first performances in Boston of Sir Edward Elgar's new symphony in A-flat, a work which has been creating a sensation in England and has aroused considerable interest where it has been played in America.

Another interesting feature will be the first appearance in Boston of Miss Germaine Arnaud, a French pianist, about 18 years old who will play Saint-Saens' G minor concerto. Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" will close the program.

FOR SALE—Symphony Season Rehearsal
Tickets at cost for remaining 16 rehearsals to May, 1909; choicest location; 2 together, 1 single. G.P.J., Boston Transcript. 6t(A): d 14

FOR SALE—SYMPHONY REHEARSAL
season tickets, 2 together on floor, row H, for $55 each. Also 1 central, floor, $55. Address V.S.O., Boston Transcript. 6t(A): d 7

FOR SALE—One Symphony Season Rehearsal; also one Concert. Ticket, remaining 12 concerts to May, 1909; most costly and choice location; central floor. Address H.O.O., Boston Transcript. 7t(A): d 30

SYMPHONY CONCERT WHOLLY ORCHESTRAL

Adm. 1.00
Jan. 16.09
EFFECTIVE PERFORMANCE
OF SCHUBERT'S C SYMPHONY

Schillings, Debussy and Berlioz
Also Contribute to the Programme.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

- Schubert—Symphony in C.
- Schillings—"The Harvest Festival."
- Debussy—Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun."
- Berlioz—"Roman Carnival Overture."

Dvorak, some time ago, wrote in an American Magazine that Schubert was greatest in his instrumental works. It was, we think, an entirely false estimate. Schubert thought vocally and his instrumental works are merely transcriptions of various phases of song. Beautiful melodies, effective contrasts, symmetry of themes are there, but not that development that keeps a large work constantly interesting.

A symphony should be a perfect blending of the melodic and emotional on one hand, and the intellectual on the other. Made up entirely of the first two elements it will pall. Therefore we felt less attracted to Schubert's largest symphony than we had been in previous years. Yet it is well to hear it occasionally. A new generation of concert-goers is growing up and to them the work comes with most attractive freshness, and they are probably ready to vociferously contradict the older critic who has watched some portions of the great symphony grow threadbare.

This fading process is found chiefly in the first two movements. The second might be much benefited by an application of the blue pencil; it requires several amputations to restore its vigor. We of the 20th century are not as patient of repeats as they were at the beginning of the 19th. Mr. Fiedler omitted the first repeat of the work but more "cuts" are necessary, in both movements.

The third movement, however, remains throughout attractive. It is one of the most genial of scherzos and it has a beauty of melody that wears better than the gypsy theme which eternally bubbles up in the Andante. The trio here is the finest part of the work. It received an exceptionally fine reading, but it was scarcely necessary to observe all its repeat marks. The finale, too, with its powerful four strokes (were they copied from the four accents of the chief figure of Beethoven's Violin concerto?) is still an exciting bit of composition and it was played with a vigor that gave its points well home. The performance was very effective. When one remembers that the Viennese Orchestra shelved this work because it was "too difficult," one realizes the advances made in orchestral technique since the classical epoch. The resolute trombone passages in the coda of the first movement sounded as fiery as ever, and the violins dashed through the chief theme of the finale with clearness in spite of the lightning speed taken. One must also chronicle the excellent work of the oboes in the chief theme of the Andante and the perfect ensemble of the great crescendos and diminuendos of the finale. Altogether, then, an excellent performance.

Schillings' "Harvest Festival" was a picture of a merrymaking in ancient Thule. If the old Thulians had "harvest-homes" like that we imagine that they planted bombs and reaped explosions. The music seemed inflated and not very full of ideas in spite of some very skillful orchestration. We hope that Schillings will not imitate the example of the bad penny of the proverb.

From this the programme swept to the opposite extreme and gave the ultra-delicacy of Debussy's Faun. We have now passed several afternoons with this party and have not become reconciled to his melancholy yet. It is an over-refined picture of a mood into which we cannot enter. This may be our misfortune; the noisy minority, who always force the applause when Debussy is played, will undoubtedly think so. They recalled the conductor at the end of the work and he caused the orchestra to rise as accessories in the matter. The careful performance deserved the tribute.

Then came a totally different French school. We do not think Berlioz's "Carnaval Romaine" overture one of his strongest works, but it is at least tangible and intelligible. There is some melancholy in this work also, which was finely expressed on the English horn, but this sadness was made into an excellent foil to the hilarity of the Carnival, and the Saltarello was played with much animation.

Yet we have had better performances of this overture. There was a certain forcing of the pace that took away the natural gaiety of the work. It was rather vehement than light-hearted.

At the next concert we are promised the much-discussed new symphony of Sir Edward Elgar. No one can accuse our conductor of not being sufficiently modern. The first half of the season is now over and he has given us as much of the modern school as any conductor of them all. He has also proved himself a careful conservator of the technical excellence of our orchestra—a most important matter, since even the German music journals begin to acknowledge that Boston possesses the "best orchestra of the world."

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

XIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 23, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

ELGAR,

SYMPHONY No. 1.
(First time.)

SAINT SAËNS,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, in G minor, No. 2.

WEBER,

OVERTURE to "Euryanthe."

Soloist:

Miss GERMAINE ARNAUD.

SYMPHONY CONCERT
WHOLLY ORCHESTRAL
Adm! by 16.09
EFFECTIVE PERFORMANCE
OF SCHUBERT'S C SYMPHONY

Schillings, Debussy and Berlioz
 Also Contribute to the Programme.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Schubert—Symphony in C.
 Schillings—"The Harvest Festival."
 Debussy—Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun."
 Berlioz—"Roman Carnival Overture."

Dvorak, some time ago, wrote in an American Magazine that Schubert was greatest in his instrumental works. It was, we think, an entirely false estimate. Schubert thought vocally and his instrumental works are merely transcriptions of various phases of song. Beautiful melodies, effective contrasts, symmetry of themes are there, but not that development that keeps a large work constantly interesting.

A symphony should be a perfect blending of the melodic and emotional on one hand, and the intellectual on the other. Made up entirely of the first two elements it will pall. Therefore we felt less attracted to Schubert's largest symphony than we had been in previous years. Yet it is well to hear it occasionally. A new generation of concert-goers is growing up and to them the work comes with most attractive freshness, and they are probably ready to vociferously contradict the older critic who has watched some portions of the great symphony grow threadbare.

This fading process is found chiefly in the first two movements. The second might be much benefited by an application of the blue pencil; it requires several amputations to restore its vigor. We of the 20th century are not as patient of repeats as they were at the beginning of the 19th. Mr. Fiedler omitted the first repeat of the work but more "cuts" are necessary, in both movements.

The third movement, however, remains throughout attractive. It is one of the most genial of scherzos and it has a beauty of melody that wears better than the gypsy theme which eternally bubbles up in the Andante. The trio here is the finest part of the work. It received an exceptionally fine reading, but it was scarcely necessary to observe all its repeat marks. The finale, too, with its powerful four strokes (were they copied from the four accents of the chief figure of Beethoven's violin concerto?) is still an exciting bit of composition and it was played with a vigor that drove its points well home.

The performance was very effective. When one remembers that the Viennese Orchestra shelved this work because it was "too difficult," one realizes the advances made in orchestral technique since the classical epoch. The resolute trombone passages in the coda of the first movement sounded as fiery as ever, and the violins dashed through the chief theme of the finale with clearness in spite of the lightning speed taken. One must also chronicle the excellent work of the oboes in the chief theme of the Andante and the perfect ensemble of the great crescendos and diminuendos of the finale. Altogether, then, an excellent performance.

Schillings' "Harvest Festival" was a picture of a merrymaking in ancient Thule. If the old Thullians had "harvest-homes" like that we imagine that they planted bombs and reaped explosions. The music seemed inflated and not very full of ideas in spite of some very skillful orchestration. We hope that Schillings will not imitate the example of the bad penny of the proverb.

From this the programme swept to the opposite extreme and gave the ultra-delicacy of Debussy's Faun. We have now passed several afternoons with this party and have not become reconciled to his melancholy yet. It is an over-refined picture of a mood into which we cannot enter. This may be our misfortune; the noisy minority, who always force the applause when Debussy is played, will undoubtedly think so. They recalled the conductor at the end of the work and he caused the orchestra to rise as accessories in the matter. The careful performance deserved the tribute.

Then came a totally different French school. We do not think Berlioz's "Carnaval Romaine" overture one of his strongest works, but it is at least tangible and intelligible. There is some melancholy in this work also, which was finely expressed on the English horn, but this sadness was made into an excellent foil to the hilarity of the Carnival, and the Saltarello was played with much animation.

Yet we have had better performances of this overture. There was a certain forcing of the pace that took away the natural gaiety of the work. It was rather vehement than light-hearted.

At the next concert we are promised the much-discussed new symphony of Sir Edward Elgar. No one can accuse our conductor of not being sufficiently modern. The first half of the season is now over and he has given us as much of the modern school as any conductor of them all. He has also proved himself a careful conservator of the technical excellence of our orchestra—a most important matter, since even the German music journals begin to acknowledge that Boston possesses the "best orchestra of the world."

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

XIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 23, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

ELGAR,

SYMPHONY No. 1.
 (First time.)

SAINT SAËNS,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, in G minor, No. 2.

WEBER,

OVERTURE to "Euryanthe."

Soloist:

Miss GERMAINE ARNAUD.

GERMAINE ARNAUD - SYMPHONY

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

XIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 23, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

SCHEINPFLUG,

OVERTURE to a comedy of Shakespeare (with the use of an old English air of the Sixteenth Century) for FULL ORCHESTRA, op. 15.
(First time in America.)

BRAHMS,

SYMPHONY in F major, No. 3, op. 90.
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Andante.
III. Poco Allegretto.
IV. Allegro.

SAINT SAËNS,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA, in G minor, No. 2, op. 22.
I. Andante sostenuto.
II. Allegro scherzando.
III. Presto.

WEBER,

OVERTURE to the opera, "Euryanthe."

Soloist:

Miss GERMAINE ARNAUD.

The Pianoforte is a Chickering.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

GERMAINE ARNAUD - SYMPHONY

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

XIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 23, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

SCHEINPFLUG,

OVERTURE to a comedy of Shakespeare (with the use of an old English air of the Sixteenth Century) for FULL ORCHESTRA, op. 15.
(First time in America.)

BRAHMS,

SYMPHONY in F major, No. 3, op. 90.
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Andante.
III. Poco Allegretto.
IV. Allegro.

SAINT SAËNS,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA, in G minor, No. 2, op. 22.
I. Andante sostenuto.
II. Allegro scherzando.
III. Presto.

WEBER,

OVERTURE to the opera, "Euryanthe."

Soloist:

Miss GERMAINE ARNAUD.

The Pianoforte is a Chickering.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

GIRL PIANIST AT SYMPHONY

Post BY OLIN DOWNES Jan. 23, 1909

Miss Germaine Arnaud, pianist of 17 or thereabouts, who has been making herself known in Europe since she took the first prize for piano playing at the Paris Conservatoire in 1907, made her debut in this city at the public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

Miss Arnaud played the Saint-Saens G minor concerto with elegance and swiftness and authority, with not a little of the fire of the conquering and experienced virtuoso as she sped over the keys.

She has accomplished much, and there is much that she will yet accomplish. Her frank, though demure, enjoyment of her own playing and the applause that it roused was not the least pleasurable feature of the performance.

She played her prelude with breadth and sure conviction, and, in fact, her conception of the work as a whole was admirably free from preponderance of detail.

She had always the main structure of the concerto in mind, and her attention to it was never distracted by passing episodes or taxing difficulties which often demanded every ounce of her ability.

Miss Arnaud has the requisite fleetness and elegance of technique, so requisite for the middle movement.

This young lady took the finale at a pace nearly twice as fast as that taken by the composer himself, when he played the concerto here three years ago; but her guardian angel was on hand, she emerged, triumphant, though rather breathless. She had often been compelled to hammer, to force tone, but her enthusiasm, tempered by presence of mind, had carried the day, and there was loud applause.

Play Scheinpflug's Overture

An overture to a Shaksperian comedy, by Scheinpflug, a young German, hitherto unhonored and unsung in Boston, was played for the first time here. The composer uses his orchestra with taste and with brilliance.

We are not informed as to which comedy he had in mind.

Among some of those present there was contention as to the likelihood of its being "Much Ado About Nothing" or "Love's Labor Lost." There is humor and there is lightness of mood, but this is usually a trifle manufactured.

Like the man who saw things, Scheinpflug is most humorous when he does not make a special point of being so. We shall remember the piece chiefly for its sparkling instrumentation.

The greatest moments of the afternoon were provided by Mr. Fiedler when he read the F major Symphony of Brahms. Then, indeed, it was not difficult to understand Hans Richter's thought when he dubbed this symphony "Heroic," yet in the two following sections there is the tranquillity, the impersonal, pitying philosophy of the later Brahms. And in the finale—how big—there is the invigorating sensation as of great heights, and clean, wide spaces, and Homeric laughter. Mr. Fiedler's performance re-

GIRL OF FIFTEEN MAKES HER DEBUT IN MUSIC WORLD.

MISS GERMAINE ARNAUD.

Traveler. Jan. 23, 1909
Miss Germaine Arnaud, pianist, the youngest artist ever booked for an appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made her debut with that orchestra in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon and will be heard again tonight. Miss Arnaud also appears with the orchestra at the Sanders Theatre concert in Cambridge the coming week.

Miss Arnaud, who is only 15 years of age, is considered a phenomenal pianist. She was born in Paris and comes of a talented family, her father having been the leader of a French musical company and her mother a noted vocalist. She has studied in several countries and can converse fluently in several languages, as well as being proficient in Latin.

Miss Arnaud will remain in America several months to fulfill engagements and will then resume her studies in Europe. Among the compositions she has played of the more difficult ones from Bach, Beethoven, Liszt, Chopin and Schumann.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

NEW LAMPS FOR OLD, BRAHMS AS MAGICIAN

The Discreet Conjuring of His F Major Symphony and the Music of Impassioned Scholarship—Its Symbolic Qualities—A Familiar Concerto of Saint-Saens and a Pianist of a Type New to These Concerts—The Unusual Impression She Created, Together with a Few Reasons Why It Could Not Be Safely Duplicated—A Piano Concerto in the Vein of Impersonation—An Old Overture and a New

Trans. Jan. 23, 1909
A programme which declared a multitude of texts, mostly romantic, was furnished at the thirteenth rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. Curiosity was plucked by a new name affixed to an overture for an unspecified comedy of Shakespeare; further range for conjecture, especially as the piece bore the parenthesis of "first time in America." It was an afternoon of music in which more is meant than meets the ear. Saint-Saens's concerto, from being interpreted turned interpreter. It was a season of odd inversions—a strange pianist and a familiar concerto, an old symphony uttering old truths a new way, transfigured by ardent players and impassioned leadership to meanings much wider than those of pure music, even with the purity of Brahms. The symphony became a metaphor. There remained, to conclude, Weber's overture to the opera "Euryanthe," at its familiar task of vitalizing the rattling wooden Byronism of its period. In detail, then, the programme was:

Scheinpflug: Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare (with use of an old English melody of the sixteenth century) for full orchestra, Op. 15.

Brahms: Symphony No. 3, in F major, Op. 90.
Saint-Saens: Concerto in G minor, No. 2, for Pianoforte, Op. 22.

Weber: Overture to the Opera "Euryanthe."

The wide range of reference which lurked in this performance of Brahms's symphony can best be gathered by going outside of music for a start. And this is fair, for the music went outside itself. All artists and all arts pause at some turning of the path between the forks of the old and the new. Scholarship to one is a vital issue; nothing of lasting value, he holds, can be accomplished without it; to another it is a burden of dusty tomes; it is a blazed trail or a vexatious thicket. The whole dilemma was once tersely stated in an odd letter from Grimm to Emerson in which he complains that to know the valuable portion of what has already been produced requires the best part of a man's productive years. The application of this is readily seen upon recalling the youthful Brahms who scorned universi- ties and the mature Brahms who cele- brated academics in a special work. The ideal, a union between scholarship and imagination, seems to be beyond even most of the "shining ones." But this modest youth, heralded by Schumann like another Baptist, was endowed with a kind of clairvoyance by which he di- gested and assimilated the vast bulk of what had gone before, made it his own, and reared his work upon it in the re- lation of figure to pedestal. This feat is the badge of intellect. Mere lyric rapture smothers or surrenders in the press of traditional forms. Long before the in- ception of his third symphony, then, Brahms had outgrown his apostasy and thought as a man and understood as a man. His passion for expression was fiery as ever, but his reverence for the old models exercised a firm controlling power. This lofty and rarified music was played by the orchestra as by a company of impassioned scholars—such a thing can be imagined. The band enunciated, both as a unit and by groups, its unique and vivid phraseology—unsuspected timbres as of some instrument not yet invented, deep commotions of cellos and wood wind, melodies in sober ecstasy, and the haunt- ing horn call of three chords, repeated throughout the first movement with an odd insistence. Both the playing and the con- ducting expressed what the symphony ex- presses, a quiet man deeply moved. Rare- ly, while Mr. Fiedler has sojourned in Bos- ton, has a symphony given such a sum- mons to his ripest qualities as a leader. Here was no marshalling of bold contrast, or forcing of effect, but a fineness and firmness of judgment which assigned to each nuance its due emphasis. This score of surprisingly sparse notation, for pages apparently little more than a duet of wood wind and strings, expressing itself to ex- act shades of meaning, intricate and or- derly, was taken for exactly what it is—an impassioned paradigm. Great actors have recited alphabets in strange tongues and moved their audiences to tears. The par- allel falls because Brahms dealt in terms more complex than an alphabet. But his symphony and its structure have the same elements of the simple and the arbitrary. Its restatement of orchestral truisms in novel forms, its skimming chromatic runs, sharp but edgeless in their clarity; its choirs of hymning wood wind; its subtle orchestral colorings, show the hand of a draughtsman who left vast omissions with- out vacancies. Whether he works with a sculptor's chisel, as in the heroic propor- tions of the finale, or in the Andante, where he turns his hand to the minute re- liefs of a medal, there is the same chas- tity of design. As the work was conceived so it was played at Mr. Fiedler's be-hest, with a kind of intellectual passion. Brahms began where his predecessors left off, and carried on the torch. It has seldom burned more brightly than it burned yesterday afternoon, fanned to a steady glow by the sober enthusiasm of Mr. Fiedler and his players.

The next, by every token, was a portent. Most of those in Symphony Hall had heard at one time or another Saint-Saëns's piano concerto in G minor, knew its polish and glitter as they knew the high polish and black glitter of the instrument which shouldered in among the players on the platform. Not so many seasons ago its voluble fleetness had been heard from the same station at the hands of the composer himself. The deep-throated prologue, the lilt of the merro allegro scherzando, and the finale alternating trills and triplets were tolerably familiar matters. What, then, had Miss Arnaud to utter in this brilliant and tricky medium? Those who went predisposed to hear a conservatory graduate of some distinction heard something quite different and considerably more—just what it requires some qualification to declare. The first movement was uneven. Miss Arnaud was plainly asked to talk in an alien tongue. The result was that she could see in part and prophesy in part. When her hands swept the treble the instrument throbbed and sung with the joy and freshness of birds in a shower, and with much the same quality of tone, evoked by that singular deftness of a feminine touch. But the excursions into the instrument's bass bore corresponding resemblance to that shower when it strikes the dusty road. The pianist was here in the enemy's country, and fortunately for the balance of her performance these excursions were brief, infrequent and confined almost wholly to the first movement. For the flash and sparkle of the two remaining movements called for no such masculine sonority. It was thus that the soloist found her true voice in the matchless scherzo. Her playing became impersonation. Its irresistible rhythms, now shy, coy, modest or hoydenish, laughed like the chatter of a maidenly frolic. It went its serpentines in spouts of holiday fire—the white fire of Saint-Saëns, which gives out radiance without sultriness. Up went its spirals, tuneful as larks. Still in the finale Saint-Saëns was the songster—in the triplet rousades which advance the themes; in the warble of trills which the pianist rippled off her nimble finger tips, while the wind choir drowsed and droned woodsy noises. Her appearance at a concert of these proportions partook of the nature of an experiment. Such experiments, or frequent repetition, are likely to prove detrimental. It is equally certain that Miss Arnaud was either wise or lucky in her choice of a concerto. It would be idle as well as unjust to pretend that she has attained any thing like her full stature of artistry. It befell yesterday afternoon that, in a concerto happily attuned to her range and endowments, and accorded a chivalrous deference by the band, she started thrills of surprise and delight. She left her audience pounding its palms with a general smile, and it was good to see the players beam paternally on her reappearances as they whacked the backs of their instruments. Hitherto no one had suspected that Saint-Saëns could be so jaunty.

The formal novelty of the afternoon, Scheinplug's "Overture to a Comedy of Shakspeare," gave challenge by its venture of heavy instrumentation on a thin old English melody. If the overture is to remain Elizabethan in spirit, the scoring of Strauss and Mahler hints the anachronism. The work, for its first half, hugs its principal rhythm with some anxiety. When this is finally cast off the synthesis seems to have departed. English tune and chief theme of the introduction reappear, but in structure which is less architectural than stratified. Its chief virtue is that of dominant, if interrupted, melody. Again and again the voice of the orchestra bursts into lusty song which does suggest the bluff jollity of the crew in doublet and hose. If the overture is to match edges with Shakspeare, however, it must be with the Shakspeare of early work—preferably "Taming of the Shrew."

For the end came the overture to "Euryanthe," which it is the custom to lament as the well-preserved portico to a mansion fallen into decay because the contractor was dishonest, or, which is the same thing, the librettist nodded. But on its romantic side alone this overture has enough individual character to commend itself to the programmes of the future. For a musical re-statement of that romanticism of the supernatural which ran riot in the beginning of the last century, which is responsible for the worst of Byron and the best of Scott, we shall probably continue to turn these pages. They sublimate its melodrama and vitalize its crude symbols. There is little prospect of shelving Weber while he so persistently refuses to be shelved.

GIRL PIANIST AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MISS ARNAUD SHOWS HERSELF GREAT ARTIST

Success of Brahms' Third Symphony—A New Overture Produced; Also Weber's "Euryanthe."

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Scheinplug—Overture to a Shakespeare Comedy.
Brahms—Symphony in F.
St. Saëns—G minor Concerto, for Piano and Orchestra.
Soloist, Miss Germaine Arnaud.
Weber—Overture to "Euryanthe."

By an error of type, the Programme-book stated that Scheinplug was born in 2872. This might account for his composing Music of the Future. But, as a matter of fact, although he used a thoroughly modern orchestra, he drew no essentially modern effects from it and he was more melodious than most members of the new school. To what play is this an overture? The composer gives no clue. One might sarcastically say,—"Much Ado About Nothing," but it would be fairer to find in its light and chattering style a reflection of the "Merry Wives of Windsor," which has already inspired much music. In fact one could find a few reminiscences of Nicolai's overture to that opera in the present work.

Scheinplug is more accurate than Volkmann in his introduction of ancient English melody into overture. Volkmann uses a Scottish melody ("The Campbells are Comin'") as an English tune, at the battle of Bosworth, a full century before the music was in existence. But Scheinplug uses an old Allemande, from the famous Virginal Book, which is preserved in the Fitzwilliam Museum in Cambridge, England. It is a composition of Giles Farnaby, characteristic and tuneful. It was in good taste also to give the tune on two English horns, for the English horn is really of English descent, and such dances were often played on the wooden Shepherd's pipes which originated the instrument.

The tune is well developed through the overture, especially towards the end. There are quaint bassoonings that recall Brahms's excellent treatment of the student's song, "Was kommt dort von der Höh," in his Academic Overture. The Glockenspiel solo at the very end is not in good taste, but the work as a whole is a good addition to the modern repertoire.

Brahms's Third symphony is well suited to the middle of a programme, since its end is not of the epic symphonic style. It is a glorious work from first to last. The Andante starts out with an exquisite theme, but its promise is not entirely fulfilled, and this is the only labored movement in the symphony. The second theme of the first movement is one of those calm and serene bits of melody that only Bach and Brahms seemed able to achieve. If ever the line "Sweet day, so cool, so calm, so bright," were set to music, it would be to something like this.

But every movement of this great work displays surety and power. Here are no experiments, no strivings after the unattainable, but a display of the noblest poetic thought combined with the clearest musical logic. And Mr. Fiedler's reading was masterly and the performance a delight to every musical auditor.

The precocity of artists in this present epoch is remarkable. We are not yet over our astonishment at young Elman giving a difficult concerto at these concerts when there comes a slender young French maiden and gives a piano performance that puts her among the great artists of her genre. By and bye, if this goes on, there will be concertos in the nursery, and babes will play themselves to sleep with Chopin's "Berceuse."

Miss Germaine Arnaud needs no concessions on account of her youth. She is 17 and she plays St. Saëns second concerto much better than that master played it at 71, a couple of years ago. She gave a massive force to the first movement that was virile enough, and her cadenza work in this was full of brilliancy. Her octave and chord playing was sturdy enough to indicate wrists of steel, and in every part of this movement she showed a full comprehension of the composer's thought and an ability to interpret it. This first movement has the fault that it is too full of display of the soloist, it becomes a piano solo with an obliging orchestra in the background.

But it was in the Scherzo that Mlle. Arnaud was at her very best. No one could have made more of the piquancy and the delicacy of this movement. She was well seconded by the orchestra and the result was a Scherzo that ought to be long remembered.

The Finale has less to say for itself intrinsically, but is also hampered by coming after such a perfect movement. It comes in the nature of an anticlimax. Nevertheless, Mlle. Arnaud carried it to success, and the young miss was recalled with much enthusiasm three times.

The concert ended with a very fiery performance of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. It may have seemed a trifle overdrawn in the very soft passages, but Weber demands just this treatment. He was of the theatre, and something of the odor of the footlights is permissible in his music where it would be out of place in the works of another composer. The abandon and dash of the work was recognized by the audience and was most heartily and deservedly applauded.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Young French Pianist
Symphony Soloist.

For the second time this season, Symphony patrons have been pleasantly surprised by the playing of artists yet in their teens whose performances abroad have been heralded in fulsome praises. Many of the so-called wonders have not justified their reputations when heard here; but Mischa Elman's fame was deserved, and at last week's Symphony concerts the young pianist, Miss Germaine Arnaud, a French girl, created great enthusiasm by her splendid performances of Saint-Saens' second piano concerto, Miss Arnaud made her American debut last Thursday evening with the Symphony orchestra at Cambridge.

Another agreeable feature was an overture by Paul Scheinpflug, played for the first time in this country. The other selections were the third Brahms symphony and the overture to Weber's opera, "Euryanthe." Elgar's new symphony had been announced, but owing to the impossibility of securing the orchestral parts in time, Mr Fiedler rearranged the program, and will give the new work later.

The concerto gives great prominence to the piano part, as if Saint-Saens, being a pianist, had considered that instrument first and made the orchestral support secondary. The girlish figure at the piano did not seem able to cope with the physical difficulties of the long score; but she did succeed admirably in this respect and in the technical part her performance was of a nature to warrant encomiums and justify the tumultuous applause.

She opened the first movement with a confidence that presaged an interesting performance, at least, for the introductory cadenza was given with commendable vigor and led up to brilliant and crisp finger work. In the accelerated passages the increase in speed did not impair the clarity of tone and the furious arpeggios and octave runs but slightly lacked the force of a male hand.

And this 17-year-old artist showed dainty and nimble fingering in the scherzo-like second movement, in which delicacy of touch and execution is mainly required. The trills and other figurations of the finale were equally charming, the coda winding up in a dashing bit of pianistic pyrotechnics.

Scheinpflug's overture is deliciously quaint in many instances, his arrangements of wood winds being musically humorous and the whole work one of joyous moods and suggestions. It may be written in a Shaksperian vein, or may not, but it is thoroughly pleasing and is not so lofty and modern in orchestration as to be above the comprehension of the average music lover. The wood-wind choir did its work perfectly and the orchestra as a whole was up to its usual standard.

Mr Fiedler conducted the Brahms symphony along traditional lines, with the necessary vigor in the first and parts of the last movement, and held his men to unity of purpose through the intricacies and numerous transitions in the second part. In the third movement the playing by the lighter string contingents was specially enjoyable after so much of a somber nature had been heard in the earlier part of the symphony.

The orchestral association with the solo pianist was inspiring, so sure and perfect was the support, and in the Weber overture the sentiments were lucidly set forth, as usual and none of the fortissimo passages lost in force under the impetus suggested by Mr Fiedler's baton.

The orchestra will be away this week on its western trip. The first part of next week's program will be commemorative of Mendelssohn's birthday, Feb 3, 1809, and the selections will be the overture, "Fingal's Cave"; Scherzo from "Midsummer Night's Dream," and the Scotch symphony. The Strauss tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," will close the program.

YOUNG PIANISTE PLEASES AUDIENCE

Germaine Arnaud, a Girl of 17, Makes Hit at the
Symphony Concert.

Twice this month the Symphony Orchestra has had the assistance of artists still in their teens. The first was the boy violinist, Mischa Elman. The second was a girl pianiste, Germaine Arnaud, who celebrated her seventeenth birthday only last Christmas week, and who called forth great applause Saturday night when she played the Saint-Saens concerto in G minor, No. 2, which had last been played at a Symphony concert by the composer himself two seasons ago.

Miss Arnaud, a plump little miss, with a very youthful face and a rather engaging manner, gave, on the whole, a brilliant performance. The power she lacked was amply compensated for by the remarkably merry spirit which she infused into the charming scherzo and by the dazzle and delicacy of her runs and trills. She was recalled several times. The audience seemed to find genuine enjoyment in her playing.

Orchestrally, the principal feature of the evening was the performance of Brahms' third symphony. It proved to be one of the best offerings of the season. An overture by Paul Scheinpflug, a young composer living in Bremen, was performed for the first time in this country. It won instant popularity. The last number was the ever-welcome "Euryanthe" overture by Weber.

The next concert will be largely in the nature of a Mendelssohn memorial.

CONDUCTOR FIEDLER

LEADS 13TH CONCERT

Shakespearean Overture by Scheinpflug Played by Boston Symphony.

By PHILIP HALE. Jan. 24, 1909.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, gave its 13th concert last night in Symphony Hall. Miss Germaine Arnaud, pianist, played for the first time in Boston. The program was as follows:

Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare
Scheinpflug
Symphony No. 3.....Brahms
Concerto in G minor, No. 2.....Saint-Saens
Overture to "Euryanthe".....Weber

Scheinpflug, a Saxon by birth, now about 34 years old and living at Bremen, is unknown to the great majority in this country, yet he has written a few works that have given him an honorable name in the list of younger German composers. The overture, performed last night for the first time here and probably for the first time in America, is entitled as a prelude to a comedy of Shakespeare. There is no closer identification of its intention. Some may think that a certain deliberately ponderous episode is a reference to Falstaff, but this would be only a rash surmise. Any composer who names his overture a prelude to "As You Like It," "Love's Labor Lost" or "Much Ado About Nothing" runs the risk of a flippant and disparaging jest.

Scheinpflug is a modern of the moderns and he demands a full modern orchestra—one with even two English horns—for the expression of his musical ideas. He furthermore went back to the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book to find an English tune of the 16th century that he might introduce it as one of his themes. This fact should not lead any one to infer that his own thematic invention is weak or halting. His motives have character, and they are not painfully thought out merely for subsequent combination in development.

This overture has buoyancy and sparkle, though a few of the pages are heavily scored. The development of the themes is not forced, and the polyphonic treatment seems natural and not an example of severe scholastic labor. The style has individuality, though there are a few traces of the influence of Richard Strauss. All in all, the overture interested and gave the hearer a desire for further acquaintance with the composer.

The third symphony of Brahms is one of the finest of his compositions. It is characterized by the sturdiness, the granitic force, the elemental rhythmic sweep, the peculiar and not displeasing melancholy that are associated with his nobler works, and there is also true melodic simplicity that gives delight by its frank appeal. The first movement and the third are perhaps the most genial sections of the work, genial in both the German and the English meanings of the word, but there is much that is beautiful in the second movement, and the close of the symphony, with the appearance for a moment of "the ghost of the first motive," as Mr. Apthorp happily called it, is a stroke of genius.

The symphony was read with imagination and warm sympathy for the most part. Perhaps in the second movement the melodic speech was too articulate, perhaps the sentiment was too much insisted on, so that Brahms for once was almost sentimental. But the performance as a whole was warm and glowing, and that of the first movement was appropriately dramatic.

Miss Germaine Arnaud, a pianist who is now in her 18th year, gave an extraordinarily brilliant performance of Saint-Saens' familiar concerto. Going from Bordeaux to Paris, she studied at the conservatory of the latter city, and in 1905 was awarded a first prize. She is remarkable first of all in this; that, although she is comparatively fresh from the school, she does not play with the exasperating precision of a prize pupil. She has freedom and elasticity. She also has an emotional nature, which, in a concerto that is seldom inherently emotional and then only in an elegant manner—for Saint-Saens is always a man "comme il faut"—nevertheless made itself felt.

Her mechanism is highly developed. Her scale passages for fleetness, fulness and richness of color or crystalline purity are a delight. There is no suggestion in her bravura of cloudiness or unsteadiness. She has great strength, which is employed musically, for last night tone was never forced, and in her heaviest chord-playing there was the virility that gives the suggestion of reserve force. She has nuances, not only a fortissimo and a piano, at her command. These nuances are finely graded and she has the ability to shape gradations when she is going at full speed.

In melodic passages she sings the phrase, and she has the art of giving meaning and vitality to measures that often, as played by others, seem more or less agreeable padding. She rises in aesthetic dignity when the music itself has nobility, as in the superb opening and exposition of the first theme. Ornamentation, as played by her, is not something extraneous and showy, but that which is natural and significant. She displayed last night an admirable sense of proportion and genuine musical comprehension.

Let it be added that she has a sympathetic, winning personality; that she plays with delightful self-unconsciousness, and that she is modest and charming in her acknowledgment of applause. Her success last night was instantaneous and unusual.

FOR SALE—AT COST, SYMPHONY TICKETS

floor, centre, 1 Rehearsal, 1 Concert. Address N.A.S., Boston Transcript. 7t(A): ja 22

FOR SALE—SYMPHONY CONCERT

one season ticket; best location. Address S.F.B., Boston Transcript. 7t(A): fe 16

Mr. Hess, who left New York this morning for Germany, to bring his motherless family back to Boston, expects to remain abroad only a week. He sails for New York again on March 16, and is due here on March 23. Then he will at once resume his place in the Symphony Orchestra and continue with the concerts of the Hess-Schroeder Quartet. Mich. 1. 1909

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

XIV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 6, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

PART I.

In commemoration of Mendelssohn's 100th birthday (born at Hamburg, February 3, 1809.)

MENDELSSOHN, OVERTURE to "Fingal's Cave," op. 26.

MENDELSSOHN, SCHERZO from the music to Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," op. 61.

MENDELSSOHN, SYMPHONY, No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch," op. 56.
 I. Andante con moto; Allegro un poco agitato.
 II. Vivace non troppo.
 III. Adagio.
 IV. Allegro vivacissimo; Allegro maestoso assai.

In compliance with the intention of the Composer, the movements of the Symphony will be played consecutively without pause.

PART II.

RICHARD STRAUSS, TONE POEM, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," (freely after Friedr. Nietzsche,) op. 30.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans. — July 6. 09

Mr. Fiedler and the Orchestra Keep the Mendelssohn Anniversary with Three Pieces, Two Living and One Moribund—The Contrasts of the "Scotch Symphony" and the Overture, "Fingal's Cave"—Strauss's "Zarathustra" for Ending

Mr. Fiedler is dutiful to anniversaries, and he began the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon with due commemoration of Mendelssohn. The pieces he chose were the overture, "Fingal's Cave," the Scherzo written to fill the interval between the first and the second acts of "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; and the "Scotch" symphony—the symphony to which the woful tale of Rizzio, murdered at Mary Stuart's feet, and the shrill and merry piping of competing Highlanders are said equally to have stirred the composer—the latter certainly to the more musical profit. The Overture and the Scherzo are of the enduring and the living Mendelssohn; and if one of his symphonies must be played—shall we say for dignity's sake?—the "Scotch" is oftener interesting nowadays than the "Italian," while the "Reformation" is altogether moribund. The pipers were surely Mendelssohn's friends if they prompted him to a Scherzo that still keeps its snap as of native Scottish music and of the good Scottish air. The tale of Rizzio, the atmosphere of the chambers of Holyrood served him less well. Mendelssohn, pressed by many concerns, deferred long the writing of the symphony, and he found the impulses and the memories of Scotland hard to quicken again. When they came at his call he wrote in the brightness of the Scherzo or the melancholy of the opening Andante. When they would not come, he could only take refuge in such music-making as the linked sweetness long-drawn-out, and without a drop of acid to it, of the Adagio or as the empty Finale. The glory of the overture, "Fingal's Cave," is the enduring freshness of suggestion in it. The Mendelssohn who wrote it had seen the land and the waters of the Hebrides, the dripping rocks, the vivid fields, heard the swish of the currents of the cave and felt the beat of sea and wind. The impression did not dwindle; the impulse did not flag; and the overture remains a tone-picture that the vividest and most suggestive of the moderns might envy.

Mr. Fiedler was abundantly dutiful, and in the symphony in particular he seemed resolved that Mendelssohn should "sound," and "sound" where he was weakest. The conductor had no need of anxieties or obligations with the other two pieces. The scherzo once more exemplified the beautiful iridescence, the gossamer lightness of tone, that the orchestra can compass. The strings wrought in cobwebs; the wood winds sent fairy lights twinkling through the web; the conductor had barely to keep a guiding hand. Mr. Fiedler is, they say, enamored of Debussy's music; he has had opportunity to discover it in Boston as he never had in Hamburg; he descants lovingly of it. And meditation upon the Nocturnes and "The Afternoon of a Faun" is apt preparation for the playing of "Fingal's Cave." There were kings before Agamemnon; there were impressionists in music before—the other day in Paris. Mendelssohn had a certain chameleon-like quality in his nature, which was very sensitive and not very deep. In "Fingal's Cave," in all his wanderings in the Western Isles, he was as truly the impressionist as Debussy over his sea, and much more spontaneously and in much less mannered fashion than is the Frenchman in his "Symphonic Sketches" of the waves. The suggestion, the atmospheric quality, the caprice—formalist though Mendelssohn was—that the impressionists cultivate are in the overture, and Mr. Fiedler, newly schooled in his Debussy, was the more adroit to express it.

To make the "Scotch" symphony "sound" is another matter. When dry bones must on occasion be rattled, why rattle them vehemently? And it is well to step lightly on the covers of hollows in musical, as well as other ground. To make Mendelssohn sound big and vital in what are really the small and moribund parts of the symphony, Mr. Fiedler made him sometimes sound rude. He deserved at least the euphony and the polish that are always in his music even when it is driest. Mr. Fiedler might have glossed the cracks in the polish. Instead, he sometimes, and especially in the finale, split them wide open. But Mr. Fiedler is one conductor in the music that tradition bids him respect and another in the music that he loves, that he apprehends to the utmost of his mind and feels to the utmost of his emotions, that stirs him deeply and honestly, and that he can make so stir his hearers. He came to such music in Strauss's tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," that made the second part of the concert, and that was revived for the first time in nine years. The composer—and the conductor—began in something very like sublimity. They ended in beautiful and haunting mystery. Many ideas, many emotions, much music that was extraordinarily eloquent and much that was extraordinarily puzzling stood between. A second hearing—for "Zarathustra" was almost new—will clarify impressions that may be left for another article on Monday.

H. T. P.

FOR SALE

Symphony Rehearsal and Concert Season Ticket; one each; floor, centre. Address P.D.H., Boston Transcript. 7t(A): Ja 7

FOR SALE, AT COST

a Symphony Rehearsal, also a Concert season Ticket; middle floor. Address V.T.H., Boston Transcript. 6t(A): Ja 15

Musical Notes and

Post July 7, 1909

Edited by Olin Downes

Also Sprach Zarathustra

Strauss, like Nietzsche, might well label his tone-poem "Also Sprach Zarathustra," "A Book for All and None." The work is for those who search. Previously to the performances of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at the Symphony concerts it had not been heard here since Mr. Gericke gave it in 1900. The reason for such neglect is hard to explain. No musician of today can afford to remain unacquainted with that transcendental score, which, in our opinion, embraces all that Strauss has said in his instrumental works, the fruits of the compositions that had gone before, the potent germs of what was to come.

Let us not waste time in a discussion of no importance: whether or not Strauss interpreted Nietzsche. He probably had no intention of doing so. If he had it would be of indirect interest to us. Unlike the Guileless Fool he asks the questions that we ask, and certain phases of Nietzsche's book corresponded to his own spiritual attitude at the time that he composed his greatest symphonic work.

That is enough, and such is the boundless energy behind this questioning that if the music were less potent in itself it would still live by the resistless underlying force which is the source of its being. Strauss has uttered in tones what has been uttered by the great thinkers in literature, only he has used a far subtler and all-embracing medium, beginning where literature must stop. And these things are said with no apology to the reader after the writer's first hearing of the work.

The opening—it is no news to those who know the tone-poem—is overpoweringly elemental, sublime. To be drowned in that surging, flaming outburst that seemed to spring from the bottom of the earth, was in itself enough to evoke a lifetime of visions. And how magnificently Mr. Fiedler proclaimed the sunrise! The performance in every detail was superb beyond words.

The elemental and inscrutable nature-motive—the World-Riddle—dominating the score, confronting the hearer wherever he turns, has far more than some particular and exclusive significance to the composer, for it does produce, in the mind of any ordinarily sensitive hearer, a sense of profound and undiscoverable depths, of a universe that no man may fathom. It is always in our ears—C G C, or its equal in some other key—and let Strauss discourse of "Joys and Passions," "Of Science," of "The Convalescent,"

there it exists, bottomless, dimensionless, eternal. This recalls that master stroke—the triumphal and confounding reappearance of the sunrise music at the end of the complex, pondering fugue, which has wandered restlessly through labyrinths of counterpoint and tonalities. Can you answer that, says Zarathustra to Science.

The great obsessing thing about this work is the world-vision that it unfolds to the listening mortal. With Whitman, one "roams in thought over the universe." The "Back-Woodsmen," the chaos and the soul fear that preceded the coming of God—what marvellous transitions, experiences, from this passage to the Elysian "Dance Song," when the theme of the World-Riddle leaps and plays in the wood-wind accompaniment. And then I remember the extraordinary feeling as if one were gazing up into the receding stars during the wonderful progressions in the upper strings and wood-wind that follow close upon the tolling of the bell.

Strauss wrote with his feet in the pit, his head in the galaxy. He concluded his prophecy in the only possible way that he could reasonably conclude it. The eternally warring tonalities are not a sought-out mannerism. They are the inexorably logical development of a marvellous comment upon life and eternity, an utterance that will remain by the side of the great masterpieces created by the chosen ones whom nature sends every few hundred years to awaken, encourage and illumine the path of blind, faltering humanity.

SYMPHONY'S 14TH ^{July 7, 09} Herald CONCERT OF SEASON

Mendelssohn's 100th Birthday Anniversary Remembered in Program.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, gave its 14th concert last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Overture, "Fingal's Cave".....Mendelssohn
Scherzo from the music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn Symphony No. 3, "Scottish".....Mendelssohn
"Thus Spake Zarathustra".....Strauss

The selections from Mendelssohn's orchestral works were happily chosen. They are characteristically Mendelssohnian, and they show his finer qualities. In the overture he is picturesquely descriptive; there is a freshness of fancy, an appropriateness of color, something more than a suggestion of the scene that made a deep impression on him. The scherzo is an excellent example of the composer's nimbleness and grace. There are pages in the symphony that almost persuade the hearer into the belief that the whole work is a masterpiece, but in this symphony Mendelssohn's inexorable formalism appears and there are measures of the cloying sentiment that disfigures so much of his music.

All composers of rank have their mannerisms, and ironical Time turns into annoying mannerisms things which, when they are first heard, are hailed as original and delightful or impressive. There are few composers who can stand the test of a long program made up wholly of their works. Mendelssohn had his adventures in many fields, so that there is plausible variety in his case; but he seldom escaped from his set ways and his set speech. More aggressive individualities may not fatigue the hearer so thoroughly. The very sweetness and the impeccability of Mendelssohn in matters of form are more tiresome than wild irregularities of the creative and universal genius who is at times rude and coarse.

Mr. Fiedler read the overture, scherzo and symphony poetically and at times, as in the adagio, saved Mendelssohn from himself. The composer in this symphony too often is seen tempting a conductor to be sentimental. The orchestral performance was of the highest order in mechanism, euphony and romantic spirit.

Mr. Fiedler, having thus paid to Mendelssohn the tribute that was meet and fitting in commemoration of his 100th birthday, turned joyfully toward Richard Strauss, and led a stupendous performance of "Thus Spake Zarathustra." This "tone-poem" had been played in Boston only twice, and the last performance was nearly nine years ago. Mr. Gericke wished to perform the work some little time before his second departure, but only four horns were then available and the score calls for six.

On the whole, this tone-poem in purely musical value falls below the others that have made Strauss famous, or, as the more conservative would have it, infamous. The work might be described as a marginal gloss on certain excerpts from Nietzsche's singular book. The music seems episodic, in spite of Strauss' attempt to give it continuity by the repeated use of the motive, which is first announced by the trumpet, and by other technical devices. The opening measures are magnificent in their simplicity, overpowering, as though the heavens were unrolled for some celestial and triumphant vision.

The section that follows is beautiful, but after this and for a long time the music is labored and too often barren. Take, for instance, the section in which a fugued passage may reasonably be supposed to expose the futility, the emptiness of science. The exposure is more jejune than the thing exposed. Nor is the dance song irresistible. The orchestration of it is interesting; it excites surprise; but the chief impression made by it is infinite labor over an inherently vulgar theme. In the close is found again the greater Strauss, the Strauss that wrote the love music of "Ein Heldenleben" and of the "Domestic" symphony, the death music in "Don Quixote," the apotheosis in "Death and Transfiguration," and other superb pages.

It would seem that Strauss in this instance set himself to accomplish an almost impossible task; to comment in music on theories of a philosopher; to translate into musical language that which is not easily grasped in earnest reading. A hearer, if he contents himself solely with the title, must hear the music as though it were practically absolute, with contents only musical. In this case he will often be perplexed and at times bored. If he be saturated with Nietzschean philosophy he will be unable to identify the majority of the passages translated or commented upon. The noblest program music is effective without the program.

Mr. Fiedler is to be thanked for giving us another opportunity of hearing this work and he and the orchestra are to be thanked for a remarkable performance. In a Utopian concert and with a Utopian audience, a work of this character would be played twice in the same evening. It is better to speak with a certain diffidence concerning the merits of an important work by Strauss when performances are given at an interval of nine years.

MUSIC AND ^{July 7, 09} Globe MUSICIANS

Mendelssohn Program
at the Symphony.

"Elijah" Will be Sung Tonight
by Handel and Haydn Society.

Bonci in Operatic Concert—
Recitals of the Week.

The 14th Symphony program, commemorative of Mendelssohn's 100th birthday, Feb 3, 1809, was made up of three parts Mendelssohn and one part Strauss. The overture, "Fingal's Cave," the scherzo from "Midsummer Night's Dream" music and the "Scottish" symphony represented the work of the great Jewish composer. "Thus Spake Zarathustra," the tone poem by the more modern musical genius, closed the program. Mr Fiedler certainly managed to associate composers whose style of work furnished plenty of chances for contrast, and though the German giant was shown to be fairly defeating in his wonderful poem, the gentler and charmingly melodic Felix of Hamburg awakened the heartiest applause by his beautiful wrought harmonic schemes.

All the Mendelssohn music is familiar to patrons of the Symphony concerts. The Strauss work has not been heard here since Mr. Gericke's time in March, 1900. The dainty undulating measures of the "Fingal's Cave" overture impose a severe task upon the string contingents, the weaving figurations being reiterated at such length that precision of finger work is indispensable for making the "sound waves" clear and harmonious. The clarity of the strings throughout the overture was seemingly perfect, and in perfect accord were the shrieks and calls by the wood-winds, representing wild bird life among the caves.

In the scherzo, that elf-like tone picture of the romp of fairies and gnomes in the "Midsummer Night's Dream," merrily the flutes, horns, clarinets and bassoons chirped and chortled the opening measures. Did Bottom speak in the language of the ass? The bassoons seem to answer comically in the affirmative and the patter of the bows upon the stringed instruments called up delightful suggestions of the trixy gambols of the sprites around Titania or her lord Oberon. Had encores been allowed Mr. Fiedler would have been obliged to repeat the piece.

The "Scotch" symphony was played without a pause between the movement, which, although according to the intention of the composer, was almost resented by an audience inclined to express freely an appreciation of the performance of each section.

An impressive introduction led up to some splendid measures given out by the cellos, after which the ensemble was up to the usual standard. Of course the clarinet made a jolly diversion of the wee Scotch air, and the strings put in a few bars of Al staccato work in the scherzo. In the other two movements, the stateliness of the third and the rollicking, and sometimes pompous, measures of the last were all worked out in characteristic fashion. Mr. Fiedler is to be heartily congratulated for his splendid readings of all the Mendelssohn works.

And in a different and almost awe-inspiring vein did he make Strauss speak his musical mind according to "Thus Spake Zarathustra." Massive in structure, incoherent, yet impressive, in its instrumental riot this poem compels admiration for its phenomenal construction and originality in its combinations of instruments and choirs. Pandemonium runs rampant through the score and the orchestra did full justice to all demands.

The new symphony by Paderewski will be played at this week's concerts. He will also appear as soloist in Saint-Saens' fourth piano concerto.

FOR SALE—TWO SYMPHONY TICKETS; first balcony, second row, centre; price reasonable. Address B. D. E., Boston Transcript. (A):

MENDELSSOHN MEMORIAL AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Adv! Feb 6, 09
BUT STRAUSS WAS ALSO

ON THE PROGRAMME

His "Also Sprach Zarathustra," a Great Work, Nobly Interpreted by Dr. Fiedler.

By Louis C. Elson.
PROGRAMME.

Mendelssohn—"Hebrides" Overture.
Mendelssohn—Scherzo from "Midsummer-night's Dream."
Mendelssohn—Scotch Symphony.
Strauss—"Also Sprach Zarathustra."

There are proverbs about yoking the ox and the ass together, also about attempting to mix oil and water, but there is none regarding the mistake of putting Mendelssohn and Richard Strauss side by side. It is said that Politics makes strange bed-fellows; so, evidently, does symphonic programme-making. The juxta-position seemed unfair to both.

Of course, at this centennial season, we are having a shower of Mendelssohn, and there is danger of a slight reaction from the overdose. But there is enough of Mendelssohn left, even 60 years after his death, to assure his high rank. Pioneer, with Berlioz and Beethoven, in programme music, beginner of modern conducting (again with Berlioz), founder of the concert-overture, with Weber the chief introducer of the clarinette, there are claims enough on posthumous fame. Only the superficial critic will find his "Songs Without Words" of a saccharine monotony; they are built on one form, as is the human face, but they differ in their features, as does the human face. There are subtle points of workmanship in them that must forever interest the studious composer.

But we are not to write an essay on what Mendelssohn has done, save as it concerns the present concert. The "Hebrides" overture was considered by Wagner a masterpiece, and it is as spontaneous a work as any in the repertoire. The development of the graphic wave-figure gives suggestions not only of pensive loneliness, but sometimes speaks of a Highland storm, and sometimes of a warlike gathering of the clans. Mr. Fiedler read it with some caprice of contrast, especially between the chief and subordinate themes, but this rather helped than detracted from the effect.

Why the ultra-modern should go wild over the delicate suggestions of Debussy's Faun and then shrug his shoulders at Mendelssohn's fairies passeth all human understanding. The Scherzo, a very difficult work to play perfectly, was superbly interpreted. Here we may state that when it comes to musical humor Mendelssohn may fairly head the list. His dainty fun-making puts Beethoven's grotesque Scherzos, and Schumann's earnest ones, and Strauss's Rabelaisian ones, in the back-ground.

The playful overture to "Midsummer-night's Dream," which was composed at 18 years of age, is the only real masterpiece that was ever achieved by so young a composer; and this power of dainty humor never left him. At least in his scherzos he ranks with the greatest masters.

The audience seemed to think so too, for the applause seemed as if it would never end. It was pushed almost to the encore point!

It would be folly to contend that some parts of Mendelssohn's music have not faded out. But if our gentle reader will look out of the lower windows of heaven, a century hence, he will find that some of Debussy and D'Indy, and Richard Strauss and Mahler, and Bruckner and Elgar, will also have faded out.

But how royally well the clarinette is used all through this symphony! More than Mozart's E-flat it deserves the title of the "Clarinette Symphony." Perhaps part of this masterly use of the instrument came from Mendelssohn's friendship with the clarinettist Baermann (the grandfather of our own Prof. Carl Baermann), which led him to study the instrument carefully. The clarinettes were beautifully played in the sombre introduction (chalumeau here), in the brisk Scherzo, and in the lovely and lonely duet with bassoon in the finale.

Of course Mr. Fiedler cut out the repeat of the opening exposition—we do not need such reiteration in the 20th century—but he rather forced the contrast between the two first themes, making the second too rapid.

The Scherzo was the best part of the work. Beethoven, Schumann, Bruch, Volkmann, Robert Franz, and other German masters, have attempted to reproduce the Scotch song, and all of them have failed. Only Mendelssohn has succeeded. Spite of the apocryphal story of Schumann mistaking its meaning, no Scot but would find in this Scherzo the music of his native land. It is as Scotch as a Haggis. Then also the Finale gives a good impression of the Gaelic spirit of War, and a little of the sombre vein of Twilight in the Trossachs as well.

But the faded portions must also be mentioned. The "Storm" of the Coda does not in the least require an umbrella; the whole Adagio is a stream of alternating Eau de Cologne and Molasses; and the Thanksgiving of the final coda is not much better than the thanksgiving music sung at the revivals which are at present going on in Boston. Parts of the "Scotch" symphony have become cold Scotch—and without Soda!

After this, Zarathustra made a few remarks. They came about as pat as Poe or Coleridge would have come after Tennyson. As this tone-poem has been interpreted by commentators in many different ways, let us give our own impression of the real plot.

Zarathustra has been out very late; he is sleeping and snoring (deep tones of woodwind and tubas); the servant knocks firmly at the door (kettle-drums); he finally gets up, but with a severe headache (dissonances on all the instruments); now follows with a stern figure on the trumpets—"Also sprach Frau Zarathustra"—"Thus spoke Mrs. Zarathustra." He attempts an intricate explanation—the "over-man" now becomes the "under-man"—a fugal passage; Mrs. Z. still speaks (the figure of three notes is disagreeably persistent); he finally takes his hat and goes out until evening. He goes to a dance hall then for relaxation (dance themes mixed with bit-terers); the clock strikes twelve (gong); he now winds his homeward way. Arriving at his door (simultaneous chords in B major, woodwind, and C major, deep strings pizzicato) he finds that he has lost his key. He is left standing by Strauss on the doorstep, and the work ends thus unsatisfactorily.

But, all sarcasm aside, it was a great work and nobly performed. Mr. Fiedler is revealing himself as one of the leading Strauss conductors of the world. The complicated work was made clear in all its details; the insistent figure of three notes, which is so ingeniously developed, was never blurred or indecisive, or smothered out. The fugato was excellently balanced and not over-accented. The brilliant orchestration was made the most of:—

It cracked and growled, and roared and howled, Like noises in a swound!

For all that, the remarkable applause that had greeted Mendelssohn's Scherzo was not duplicated, although the great performance and the remarkable display of development and orchestration certainly deserved it.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Post By Olin Downes

Feb. 6, 1909
Mr. Fiedler presented a programme of uncommon significance on the occasion of the 14th public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

The Mendelssohn centennial was observed by the performance of the "Hebrides" overture, the Scherzo from the music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the "Scotch" symphony. But what a dastardly blow to the gentle composer's memory was the last work on the programme, Richard Strauss' overwhelming, all-embracing tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," after Friedrich Nietzsche. It is a wonder that the memorable performance did not wake Mendelssohn in his grave.

There are few finer overtures in existence than that inspired by Fingal's Cave. In it Mendelssohn is far more than the formalist in tones, the weaver of perfect patterns. It seems as if, contrary to habit, that adroit and polished workman forgot himself, sat down and said what was in him before there was time to cool.

So we love music that is vivid with color and sensation, salt and spray, and the pulse of the sea, yet is cast in the most symmetrical of moulds—a work that partakes equally and delightfully of the classic and romantic influences that were warring in the consciousness of the artists of Mendelssohn's time.

This and the sparkling fanciful Scherzo, a supreme masterpiece as conceived and scored, are more vital to the ear of today than the historic A minor symphony. The first movement of the latter work has a certain amount of "atmosphere" and pleasant melody, but one is waiting for that snappy Scotch tune of the second movement, and that tune gone, it requires mental effort to keep the attention fixed until the end.

Perhaps Mr. Fiedler desired to enliven the racial but rather superficial finale by a rough and drastic performance. Whatever his intentions, this movement was brutally treated. The beauty of tone upon which Mendelssohn would have insisted, and toward which end he designed his score, was too often replaced by coarse, harsh tone, and a general strepitaney that was uncalled for.

Strauss' colossal and fantastic tone-poem which seems to reach from boundary to boundary of human knowledge, made an immense impression, of which more tomorrow.

Mendelssohn and Strauss

Share Symphony Program

Mendelssohn and Strauss shared the Symphony program Saturday night. In commemoration of the Mendelssohn centennial, Mr. Fiedler conducted the performance of the former's "Fingal's Cave" overture—one of the most notable examples of musical landscape painting—the scherzo from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music and the "Scotch" symphony. Strauss was represented by his tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," the work in which the composer pays tribute to the genius of Nietzsche.

The Mendelssohn overture and scherzo were especially enjoyed by the audience. Parts of the symphony also had their delightful effects. Nothing was wanting in the interpretations. Nothing could exceed, it seemed, the graceful beauty of the performance of the scherzo; and this impression must have been in the general mind, for there was applause until the orchestra rose and acknowledged the compliment.

The Strauss tone-poem had not been played by the orchestra since 1900. In fact, this was only the third performance of it at the Symphony concerts since the work was brought to this country in 1897. Mr. Fiedler conducted enthusiastically, and the orchestra played as if inspired; and yet there were dull moments. There was no such overpowering impressiveness, on the whole, as was produced last month when the orchestra played Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration."

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

At the 14th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Saturday evening, three numbers were played in commemoration of Mendelssohn's birthday as follows: Overture, "Fingal's Cave;" Scherzo, "Midsummer Night's Dream" music; Symphony in A minor, "Scotch." The program also contained the tone poem of Richard Strauss, "Thus spake Zarathustra."

Mr. Fiedler, as usual, gave his best reading to the numbers which he happened to like best; there was no doubt of his delight in the scherzo of the Shakespeare music and of his mild pleasure in the scherzo of the symphony. To the overture he gave small heed; to the symphony as a whole he gave a conscientious performance, anxious more to do justice by the historic Mendelssohn than to call out from the music any message of great importance to a modern audience. Mr. Fiedler is not in temperamental accord with music which claims to be picturesque; he is better at defining human passions, great or small, than in painting scenery or in telling of actions. In scherzo music played before Saturday evening Mr. Fiedler has let many a fine opportunity slip by him, but he caught the spirit of fun in Mendelssohn's scherzo and expressed it to perfection. So it appears that he is a humorist when he wants to be.

Again in the lively second movement of the Scotch symphony, with its tune which every now and then pipes up clearly amid the hurry of the violins, Mr. Fiedler found much that pleased him. The last half of the symphony, clear in form but indefinite in purpose, with many a pretty blend of tone color but without any general scheme, was conducted with the evident intent to give it a fair presentation.

The Symphony Orchestra did its duty well by Mendelssohn, as all the musical organizations taking part in the centennial have done. His music on the program of the concert of Saturday, besides representing him well, had the secondary advantage of making the best of contrasts to the tone poem of Strauss which followed. In "Thus Spake Zarathustra" a listener does not at first recognize the Strauss of the "Domestic Symphony" or the Strauss of "A Hero's Life." It sounds more like the Strauss who is reported to have brought out recently in Dresden an opera called "Elek-tra." It is not Strauss limiting himself to the expression of everyday ideals, but the literary Strauss, who makes the imagination of a writer his field for musical parade. It will not do to call Strauss in this music bewildering, for to use that word is to make a confession that program music has its limitations. The best way is to fix attention on what does seem to have a meaning and to let the rest go until the tone poem is heard again. There is no question that as orchestral writing the long passage near the end, in which the solo violinist sings out a melody contrasted with all sorts of combinations of the other music is interesting music. It is something like a passage in "A Hero's Life," and whatever it means, it is Richard Strauss in one of his best moments.

From The Symphony Concert

In conformity with the usual custom in Holy Week, the twenty-first rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon. To the programme previously announced was appropriately and justly added Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music as a tribute to the memory of Mr. B. J. Lang. Mr. Chadwick's Theme Variations and Fugue for organ and orchestra was the most engrossing novelty on the programme. Berlioz's famous dictum concerning the combination of organ and orchestra may have had a repressive effect upon composers; it certainly has proved amply true within no very distant memory. But Mr. Chadwick has had the courage of his convictions to take up the problem afresh. In this work he certainly demonstrates positively that this combination is not only grateful, but not incompatible with realizations of effective and beautiful contrasts of timbre. To be sure, one is still a little in the dark as to whether there is a real and fundamental affinity between the two, or whether it is the conspicuous skill of the treatment that causes the illusion. The probable solution is simply that the underlying principles have not been thoroughly understood before, but the success of Mr. Chadwick's solution is unequivocal. These variations were first played by Mr. Goodrich at a Conservatory Concert under the composer's direction. A second hearing only reaffirms the first favorable impression. Mr. Chadwick, it is true, has written music of greater substance, deeper imagination and emotional eloquence. It seems as if this piece had been written primarily with the thought of tonal contrast and assimilation. Yet the effect of the whole is so genial in invention, so clear-cut and ingenious at every turn that it is difficult to recall a work in which Mr. Chadwick has seemed so unostentatiously in command of his forces. To characterize Mr. Goodrich as an organist is surely superfluous; he has assuredly been long recognized as hors concours. His performance of the organ part in Mr. Chadwick's variations was marked by his usual rhythmic solidity, dexterous manipulation of registration and tonal balance with the orchestra; in short the unostentatious mastery of true virtuosity.

There was more than ordinary curiosity to hear Mr. Fiedler's interpretation of Tchaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, especially after the acknowledged impression which he made with the same composer's "Pathetic" symphony. Mr. Fiedler gave a performance that was alike brilliant, full of appreciation of the true sentiment of Tchaikowsky, without exaggeration and undue rhetorical emphasis on the whole. There were some details which might proffer legitimate excuse for question, such as the inordinately slow tempo of the introduction of the first movement, as well as the first announcement of the first theme of the main body of the movement. But even these questions may be idle, in the face of an interpretation which was worthy to stand beside that of the sixth symphony. Incidentally this E minor symphony seems to resist the advance of time; furthermore the indisputably orthodox character of its technical development should refute with some warmth the assertions of those who would see therein merely a suite.

The tableau musical by Glazounoff, "Spring," is quite obviously an occasional composition. It is written with the impeccable, nay almost irritating, technical skill characteristic of its composer. One would like to see Glazounoff struggle under the weight of a musical utterance which taxed his technical resources! This piece is not without a certain charm; it has seductive color, a pleasing melodic vein, but its individual conviction is not overpowering. It was distinctly worth while to have heard this "Spring," but there are several others of the same sort among Glazounoff's works which do not demand a hearing. On the other hand it would be interesting to hear Glazounoff's pretty and ingenious ballet suite, à la Watteau, "Ruses d'Amour," or even the somewhat meteorological "Seasons." It is unfortunate that Mrs. Newmarch did not specify the works in which Glazounoff has been influenced by Brahms; it would seem as if he had distended to Wagner to more purpose, although he is far too skilful to plagiarize.

The concert ended with an exceedingly brilliant performance of the familiar Liszt "Preludes" in which Mr. Fiedler showed his admirable technical and interpretive grasp.

E. B. H.

FOR SALE—SYMPHONY CONCERT

one season ticket at balance of cost; best location. Address S.F.B., Boston Transcript. (A)7t: fe 16

IGNACE J. PADEREWSKI.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

XV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 13, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

PADEREWSKI,

SYMPHONY in B minor, Op. 24.

- I. Adagio maestoso; Allegro fuoco.
 - II. Andante con moto.
 - III. Allegro vivace.
- (First performance.)

SAINT-SAËNS,

CONCERTO in C minor, No. 4, for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA, Op. 44.

- I. Allegro moderato; Andante.
- II. Allegro vivace; Andante.
- III. Finale: Allegro.

Soloist:

Mr. IGNACE PADEREWSKI.

NOTE. As the DOORS WILL BE CLOSED during the performance of the first movement of the Symphony, which requires Twenty-five Minutes, patrons are urgently requested to be prompt in attendance.

The Pianoforte is a Weber.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

IGNACE J. PADEREWSKI.

25

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

XV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 13, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

PADEREWSKI,

SYMPHONY in B minor, Op. 24.

- I. Adagio maestoso; Allegro fuoco.
- II. Andante con moto.
- III. Allegro vivace.

(First performance.)

SAINT-SAENS,

CONCERTO in C minor, No. 4, for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA, Op. 44.

- I. Allegro moderato; Andante.
- II. Allegro vivace; Andante.
- III. Finale: Allegro.

Soloist:

Mr. IGNACE PADEREWSKI.

NOTE. As the DOORS WILL BE CLOSED during the performance of the first movement of the Symphony, which requires Twenty-five Minutes, patrons are urgently requested to be prompt in attendance.

The Pianoforte is a Weber.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

PADEREWSKI AT PIANO, SKETCHED BY BOSTON HERALD ARTIST

This Shows Great Pianist While Being Interviewed at His Hotel Yesterday by a Boston Herald Reporter.

her pieces. Often as he h the Symphony Orchesplayed his concerto in the "Polish Fantasia" in other pianist has attemptcally they have dropped epertory of concert rooms
"Manru," after its first riosity, has dropped from ertory of opera houses.
ade known his own variwn sonata. Scarcely an-undertaken them, and the may or may not choose ay them as he has Beet-and Schumann's "Sym-
of his recital last week.
erewski's opera and his
and orchestra have not of the first enthusiastic am, and the fate of his variations for piano
nce. Their large and in-asceticism of idea and dominant intellectuality
all for their future.

ie the less, by the asso-sion, of ideas that llection infers eminence
if us do approach a new ewski in much the same e should come to new er of established distinc-
such. Instinctively, too, standards to the judg-
d blood and hard logic,
owski is an illustrious pi-that he should prove an Likewise, because we Paderewski, the pianist,
the severest tests is no
uld subject his composistandards. Yet the ining impression of a nt personality will not wski has stamped himself on for what he is as he does. It has received
s of the music of others personality. Instinctiveit expects great music
His manager is indeed public anticipation, but made to run the high-e expectation that has
Mr. Paderewski's larger come to first perform-Yesterday afternoon the ormed for the first time composer himself had ony Orchestra for the nevitably the hall was
The occupants of the waited hours to prend professional or per-brought a little com-ark. Everyone was in e atmosphere was as
as it is at one of Mr.
citals.
of the particular audiular performance, the pointment. The sym-

PADEREWS

This

PADEREWSKI'S SYMPHONY

From. — July 13, 1909
YESTERDAY ITS FIRST AUDIENCE HEARD IT

The Disappointment That It Brought and a Lukewarm Reception for It—The Distinction Between Mr. Paderewski, the Pianist, and Mr. Paderewski, the Composer—The Expectations That He Involuntarily Raises—The Traits of the New Symphony—Its Ideas and Structure and the Composer's Treatment of Them—The Monotony of Mood and Color and the Lack of Vital Emotional Appeal

Mr. Paderewski is the most illustrious pianist of his time. He is of distinct intellectual force in whatever direction he may turn his mind; to hear him play is to recognize those qualities of imagination and emotion that set the recreating interpreter above the mere performing virtuoso; and even for those that know him only in the concert room his personality is distinctive and impressive as a man of thought, feeling, power and intense inner life. The image of Mr. Paderewski as one of the unusual and puissant figures of our time, alike in the arts and among men, has stamped itself gradually upon the imaginations of all of us. Whatever he may attempt, therein we expect large and fine achievement. Like most executive musicians of his power and rank, and inevitably with his traits, he is ambitious of accomplishment and eminence as a composer. More: he has found ideas shaping themselves in his mind, stirring his imagination and translating themselves into emotion, that the music of others, however personal he make his interpretation, may not express. For years past, accordingly, he has given his leisure and some of his deepest thought and most zealous toil to composition, and often made himself opportunity for it. His symphony, played by the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon for the first time, he numbers the twenty-fourth of his pieces, and the list that runs through the piano sonata, the variations and fugue for piano, the "Polish Fantasia" for piano and orchestra and the piano concerto to the opera "Manru," represented in America seven years ago, is long and considerable.

Yet this very enumeration suggests an immediate and curious reflection: "Manru" aside, how seldom have these pieces been played by anyone except Mr. Paderewski himself and how completely most of them have fallen from the living repertory. Though a pianist spoke with the tongues of men and of angels, self-sufficient virtuoso nature is such that few other pianists would play his music in his lifetime, while Mr. Paderewski himself in recent years has ignored his earlier pieces. Often as he has appeared with the Symphony Orchestra, he has not played his concerto in sixteen years, or the "Polish Fantasia" in thirteen, and no other pianist has attempted them. Practically they have dropped from the living repertory of concert rooms as completely as "Manru," after its first vogue of eager curiosity, has dropped from the working repertory of opera houses. Last season he made known his own variations and his own sonata. Scarcely another pianist has undertaken them, and the composer himself may or may not choose to cherish and play them as he has Beethoven's sonata and Schumann's "Symphonic Studies" of his recital last week. In fine, Mr. Paderewski's opera and his pieces for piano and orchestra have not endured, in spite of the first enthusiastic curiosity over them, and the fate of his sonata and his variations for piano hangs in the balance. Their large and intricate style, their asceticism of idea and expression, their dominant intellectuality do not promise well for their future.

Instinctively none the less, by the association, or the confusion, of ideas that eminence in one direction infers eminence in another, most of us do approach a new piece by Mr. Paderewski in much the same spirit in which we should come to new work by a composer of established distinction and fame as such. Instinctively, too, we apply similar standards to the judgment of it. In cold blood and hard logic, because Mr. Paderewski is an illustrious pianist is no reason that he should prove an illustrious composer. Likewise, because we properly try Mr. Paderewski, the pianist, by the highest and the severest tests is no reason why we should subject his compositions to similar standards. Yet the insistent and abiding impression of a unique and puissant personality will not down. Mr. Paderewski has stamped himself upon his generation for what he is as much as for what he does. It has received great interpretations of the music of others through his great personality. Instinctively, albeit illogically, it expects great music of his own from it. His manager is indeed artful to quicken public anticipation, but thereby he has only made to run the higher, the enthusiastic expectation that has awaited each of Mr. Paderewski's larger pieces when it has come to first performance in America. Yesterday afternoon the symphony was performed for the first time anywhere and the composer himself had chosen the Symphony Orchestra for the first performers. Inevitably the hall was filled to the last seat. The occupants of the second balcony had waited hours to preempt their places; and professional or personal interest had brought a little company from New York. Everyone was in place promptly. The atmosphere was as still and as charged as it is at one of Mr. Paderewski's own recitals.

By the demeanor of the particular audience of this particular performance, the outcome was disappointment. The symphony runs in three movements. To the first the listeners paid the closest attention, and it is twenty minutes long. At the end came scattered and rather artificially prolonged applause that finally brought Mr. Paderewski once to the stage. The second movement is short; but an unflinching sign—the reading of the beguiling "entr'actes" of the programme-book—indicated that the attention of the house had begun to wander, and at the close the applause was brief and thin. The third movement, more directly stirring in matter and in manner than its predecessors, measurably recalled attention and revived applause and again Mr. Paderewski was summoned a little laboriously to the platform. Of course, the audience at the afternoon concerts is a feminine and a peculiar company; but it has been thrice as warm in its applause for other pieces at other concerts. It was curious to note, too, how chary of its plaudits was the usually generous orchestra. What, moreover, audience and orchestra, even on Friday afternoons, can do in applause was obvious enough when the hall rang with their admiration and emotion over Mr. Paderewski's playing of Saint-Saëns's concerto in C minor. The pianist, and not the symphonist, was he who engrossed and thrilled them. And the unmistakable disappointment over the symphony lay in the music and not the performance. Mr. Paderewski, and with reason, warmly congratulated Mr. Fiedler. All that the conductor and the men might do for the symphony, by every token of a single performance, they did. They imparted, as it seemed, its structure and substance, its spirit and its voice. They justified Mr. Paderewski's choice of them. They added the distinction of their performance to the symphony. But they could not bring to life music that in itself often lacked vital quality.

Melodically the symphony is rich. Unlike Brahms at one extreme and Strauss at the other, Mr. Paderewski has not invented his themes with assiduous thought of their fitness for certain necessities and contingencies or for their plasticity as so much musical material for development. They are imagined as well as invented themes, short-breathed as they often are, they have emotional and characterizing quality. The listener does not discover them as so much musical fact and musical possibility. Intrinsically, too, they are songful themes, and Mr. Paderewski's use and development of them throughout the symphony is distinctly and agreeably melodious. The second and slow movement, in which Mr. Paderewski would mirror "the lyric nature of the Polish race," is indeed melancholy song, moody, dreamy, tender, shadowed and shivering at the close. The vein of the first movement—of the ancient glories of Poland—is often that of solemn, heroic chant or of grave and sorrowing song of vanished days of old prowess. The third movement—delineative music of the moods and passions and even the events of the Polish rebellion in the sixties—is necessarily of less clear, songful quality, but the Polish anthem appears in many guises in it; the theme of the chivalric youth is strong and vivid, and the theme that is sooner or later to add a scherzo to the symphony has rhythmic life and promise. Mr. Paderewski is conservative. He places melody above color. He keeps his music, however scholarly on the one hand or delineative on the other, essentially melodious. By so much the symphony has the advantage over the musical ideas, too little touched with emotion to become song, that made the variations and the sonata of last year.

In those pieces Mr. Paderewski showed his intellectual and technical mastery over musical form and development. They were designed with the sense that sees the end from the beginning and that neither obscures nor weakens the musical structure by hesitations or deviations by the way. The sonata and the variations were snappy, ascetic, close-packed music—music of idea and intellect rather than of emotion and imagination—but at every turn Mr. Paderewski wrought the chosen form to the chosen purpose. The symphony bears like witness to his qualities of intellect applied to music. It is an organic whole, a fully conceived and fully wrought design not merely in the repetition or the association or the continuance of themes, but in well-knit and well-proportioned structure that makes each movement a firm entity and yet keeps that movement a part of a larger and cumulative design. In spite of too frequent repetition of short fragments of themes, the progress of the music is steadily evolutionary, steadily expansive. It does move slowly—the whole performance, with Mr. Fiedler now and then speeding up the music, consumes seventy minutes—but in that slowness Mr. Paderewski wisely gains time to develop his musical ideas, so that in the narrative and the delineative music of the third movement it unfolds both itself and the "programme" behind. Full, significant and adroitly ordered is the harmonic background. Moreover, this scope and surety of design, this firmness of workmanship have not made the symphony precise, prim and angular. Throughout the music is elastic. The spirit of Polish folk-music dwells in the idealized melodies that Mr. Paderewski has invented from his own imagination. Thus they are highly rhythmic; the first and the second movements run in incessant undulation; while the third tingles to the march beneath. The music is steadily obedient to melodic curve, sensitive to accent and readily pliant to each detail of the "programme" of the finale. The mere transmutations and disembodiments that the national anthem and other melodies there undergo—and usually comprehensibly and significantly—is proof of Mr. Paderewski's manipulative skill and intellectual grasp of his music. Clearer proof still of this mastery of design and form: though he professes to count the three movements already written a rounded whole, the final and projected scherzo is essential to matter, symmetry and mood. The emphasis of the theme from which it is to spring clearly signals it.

With the instrumentation—and that is to say the tonal coloring—of the symphony, reservations begin. Mr. Paderewski has worked at the music intermittently four years and more. As report runs among his friends, he has spent much of his time and labor, especially for the last two years, upon the instrumental voices. Try as he might—again to trust similar reports—the result has never fully satisfied him. And instrumental coloring is half the battle with a modern symphony scored for modern orchestra and for modern ears. The merest youngster, nowadays, who is writing music thinks in instruments, and plumbs their capacities and their possibilities, their combinations and contrasts, to the utmost. Half the emotional and the nervous thrill of the music of our day is the thrill of tonal coloring. In some respects—if ideas were not still necessary—modern music would become instrumentation. Now it is all very well for Mr. Paderewski to add his three double-bass sarrusophones to the orchestra and to obtain from them veritable "chunks" of deep, heavy, sombre, solid tone. His own "Tonitruone," which in sound is not so very far from a skilfully manipulated thunder machine in a well-equipped theatre, brings a distinct and telling instrumental suggestion. The point is not of additions and innovations, but of the resources that any modern orchestra offers. As it seemed at a single hearing, the instrumental coloring of the symphony lacked variety and saliency. Comparatively seldom did the ear and the imagination receive a distinct sense of any instrument or choir of instruments. Mr. Paderewski seemed content with a relatively narrow range of what is possible to his violins, for example, to his wood-winds or to his horns. Perhaps this was deliberate purpose; but the result, none the less, was monotony and tameness of tonal coloring. On the other hand the frequent thickness of the instrumental web could hardly have been deliberate. Throughout, the listener heard with a curious impression of tonal mass. So stout was it, however, and so closely was it woven that it was hard for the ear to catch the various strands in it and the fancy to answer to them. Individual voices could not cut their way through, except when it was obviously opened for them; interior voices sounded choked and smothered. Sometimes the instrumentation was downright opaque. Often it needed opening, clarifying, individualizing. Mr. Paderewski's melodic and harmonic invention and his manipulative skill are elastic enough. It is his instrumental coloring that lacks suppleness. Frankly, there are moments when the music hardly "sounds."

Remains a final test that, perhaps, best accounts for the measurable disappointment that the symphony brought. Music, as we understand it nowadays, has become an emotional speech. It imparts ideas—it is true—but ideas that have crystallized into emotion and become a possessing, communicable mood to the composer. Music must kindle the imagination and stir the emotions of those that hear. Of course the test is personal and intimate. Where Wagner kindles one imagination Debussy may leave it cold. Some that hear and thrill to Strauss are deaf and inert to d'Indy. The reviewer, however sensitive and catholic-minded and with the best will in the world, can only set down a candid personal impression and have done. And this particular symphony left many that heard cold and unstirred. It was easy to admire its melodic fertility, its songful quality, its justice of design, its firmness of workmanship, and its manipulative skill. It was easy to debate of its tonal coloring. There was mental appreciation of the delineative force, the excited and strenuous voice of the third movement; of the moody and dreamy song of the Andante; of the grave and heroic exaltation of the beginning. The listener surely understood something of what was stirring in Mr. Paderewski's imagination and of what he would express in his music. But with understanding came halt. The symphony, even in the clear beauty of the Andante, did not command, seize, engross, enthrall and make the mood and passion it would compass the mood and passion of those that heard. It was the voice of Mr. Paderewski, but not the common voice of us all. It lacked communicating life. Mr. Paderewski wrote the symphony in passionate tribute to his own Poland. The programme book, rather than the music, affirmed this passion. H. T. P.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Great is Paderewski's
New Symphony.

It Will Insure Piano Virtuoso
Fame as a Composer.

Busy Week for Concert-

Goers Hereabouts.

Paderewski's tribute to his native Poland, in the form of a symphony inspired by the 40th anniversary of the revolution of 1863, received its first production at the Boston symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon and was repeated last evening at the regular concert. The unusual importance of the event brought to Boston critics from other prominent cities, and at both performances under Mr. Fiedler the big audiences were of a size and disposition indicative of great interest and due appreciation of the composer's decision to have the initial performance made by our orchestra.

The famous pianist also appeared as soloist in Saint-Saens' fourth concerto, which isn't often played now-a-days. So with the composer-pianist represented in both capacities in the two works making up the selections, it was a Paderewski program. And that is just what the eager listeners came to hear.

The symphony is a work of colossal proportions and expresses broadly the patriotism of his countrymen outlined in themes which, though characteristic of musical Poland, contain but few melodies developed to a finale. Pictures and moods, rather than tunes, are wrought in splendid musical colorings, and throughout the work the composer has been able to suggest the atmosphere of unrest and melancholy fitfully varied by more joyous moments brief and fitting.

There is no claim made of special tone pictures in the first two movements. The final movement is a symphonic poem showing the transitions from grave to gay among the discordant elements of the nation, the conflicts, civic and upon the battlefield, the despair at defeat, the dirge for the heroes slain and the reawakening of hope founded upon the chivalric deeds of the past.

The first part opens with wailing phrases on the lower strings, the first violins entering as the orchestration grows bolder, after which the woodwinds are given a new theme, mainly legato. Fuller orchestration, still of a restless character, leads up to the first fortissimo passages which introduce a martial air, followed by a quiet episode—muted strings. After a brief outburst on the organ the termination is very abrupt.

The beginning of the second movement is in the same vein as the first, cellos and double basses being prominent in the figure. Then the fortissimo work develops into heavier passages than those of the first movement, the contrasts are similar in type, yet varied skilfully in newer instrumental combinations, and the finale is about as sudden as the previous one.

The martial trend of the last movement is unmistakably stirring, from the introductory trumpet calls and drum beats, through the rush of weaving measures by all the strings and the crashing and thunder-claps of the instruments of percussion, the tonitruone and sarrusophones and others. The little interruptions by the tremolo on the violins carry out cleverly the idea of uncertainty, despite apparent confidence, and the turmoil of the battle music, perhaps, is made the more impressive by this association.

Midst war's alarms come the supplementary moments of gloom, the dirge, bitter recollections and lamentations made vivid by the background of accompaniments in a minor key. Hope returns, songs of rejoicing are heard, and in vivacious and merry mood the symphony comes to a close.

The work is very long, about one hour and a quarter, and with the fourth movement added will be of sufficient length to make up a whole program. Paderewski has not only used the regular instruments of the orchestra, but he has employed some new ones in producing big effects. The orchestration is, of course, very elaborate and complicated. He is very liberal in using chromatics, the undulations running through most of the three parts in some form or other. It is a work of such magnitude that a single hearing is insufficient for judging of all its beauty in detail, merely a general summing up seems possible now. But the dignified and scholarly nature of the symphony guarantees it an interest even to those who cannot fully appreciate the welcome addition to musical literature.

The interpretation evidently was satisfactory to the composer, who expressed to Mr. Fiedler his pleasure at the performance under his direction. The audience was quite enthusiastic and Paderewski was obliged to make his peculiar bowing acknowledgements several times before the applause was stilled.

The C minor concerto by Saint-Saens was played by Paderewski with a dash, velocity and vigor which was fairly dazzling. The big chord passages in the first part were like miniature thunder peals, the brilliant second movement seemed like a shower of musical gems so fleet, accurate and crisp was the fingering. And the finale of the concerto, not the program, was another display of pianistic pyrotechnics that started applause before the wonderful musician ceased to play. And then came more plaudits and the wished-for addition to the concert number. Mr. Fiedler led his men through this whirl of notes with becoming enthusiasm.

The orchestra will be away this week. Elgar's first symphony will be given at the next concert.

Post (Olin Donnes) July 14, 1900

PADEREWSKI

A Composer and Pianist

The performances of I. J. Paderewski's new symphony at the Symphony concerts of last week sold all available seats weeks in advance, assembled an audience which included many of the foremost musicians and press representatives from other cities, come to pass first judgment on the new and eagerly anticipated work in advance of their lingering brethren at home. Other works of great and greater importance have been given for the first time in this city, but where was the public and where were the critics? What's in a name?

But it is not Mr. Paderewski's fault that his symphony has been so shouted about. Doubtless he himself would have been happier to shun the publicity that dogs his footsteps, remain as any other composer who eats today, allow the music to stand or fall by its own merits. But what can one do with a reputation that has been steadily gaining momentum during years of golden virtuosity?

It is a pleasure to say that the atmosphere of the press agent is absent as one listens to the new work. Sincerity and nobility of the purpose shine through every measure. Every page bears evidence to the care and exhaustive labor that have been expended toward an artistic end, but whatever a man has within him he finds true self-expression only by long experience and many failures. In the course of a lifetime the active and reflective individual develops more than his brain and his muscles. The outside life, contact with material things, is as important as what passes within, as potent a factor in development as any mental or spiritual progress. I am delivering this homily not because it is Sunday, but in reference to Mr. Paderewski's intentions as contrasted with his handling of the symphonic, the orchestra and the symphonic form.

Mr. Paderewski as a composer is chiefly known to pianists by much refined music of a salon type, by a concerto that contains some beautiful ideas, by the sonata and the variations with which he recently acquainted his audiences. The two latter works are in many respects important additions to the literature of the piano. They are written by a composer who finds in himself things eminently worthy of expression, and they are written by a pianist.

So is this symphony. It requires an immense amount of experience to write effectively for a large orchestra. The scoring of the work under discussion, thick and too often colorless, often does injustice to good ideas. There is sufficient contrast of color, and when instruments of different families are used together the timbres are not clearly and skilfully mixed. The writing for the strings, which bear the burden of the instrumentation, is only effective here and there. No doubt with the intention of procuring a dark and melancholy effect their brilliant upper register is too often neglected, and the parts are packed too closely together. The theme for instance, which is given to the lower strings at the beginning of the allegro of the first movement, is only perceptible by industrious burrowing through a mass of thick tone. The passages for the brass are too often harsh and muddy. There are some freak experiments with instruments which have no adequate effect. No doubt Mr. Paderewski had other sounds in his mind than those he put upon paper. Some slight alterations were made at the rehearsals. It is very possible that other revisions will come to pass in the near future. Thus far there is more theory than practice in that partition.

The writer on music subjects is famous for changing his opinions with the seasons, and that is as it should be. Making allowances for this, it yet seems that the work under discussion affords an instance of a composer hampered by a self-set task of herculean proportions. Naturally it is in the third movement that this unwieldiness is most to be perceived. It is not hard to imagine that pre-ordained programme staring the composer between the eyes, numbing his hand: Spirit of insurrection, the outbreak of war, the conflict, defeat, Poland's future, etc. Thus do the Britishers at their music festivals. The magnitude of the task and the conscientiousness of an artist have exerted what is upon the whole a pernicious effect. The work has been, one feels, revised and again revised. The painters would call this symphony "fussed."

It is not wrong that such an artist should hitch his wagon to a star, yet it must be confessed that Chopin, by means of a common, ordinary piano, has accomplished more in praise of his native land than his countryman with that enormous, inflated orchestra. The first two movements of this hour and 20 minutes' symphony are more concise than the last. There is little that is new in the initial section. There is circumstantial and undeniable evidence of close acquaintance with the scores of Tschalkowsky. No one, indeed, could easily avoid remarking the Russian's weeping lyric phrases and typical examples of his methods of scoring. The beautiful opening of the introduction for the muted strings might be called bardic by the imaginative. A fine passage occurs later in the movement just before the return of those phrases. A chivalrous theme for the first violins has impulse and ardor, but it savors decidedly of the heroic and is but a phrase that mounts in sequence. There is plausible gallantry and rhythmic excitement toward the end, though the brief entrance of the organ is theatric rather than dramatic. The movement is symphonic, but patchy in development.

The middle section is the best of the three in every respect, in melodic invention, clearness and richness of instrumentation, conciseness and spontaneity of expression. It is, too, more truly racial than the rest, though the voice of the great Russian is not always missing. But sum it all up and what have we? Ideas that are in themselves unimportant and seldom individual, architecture that is anything but finished and symmetrical, devices in writing and instrumentation that are known to every up-to-date composer of the present time. But surely this is not the last word from Mr. Paderewski. He is unceasingly self-critical; he is untiring in the pursuit of his highest ideals. He will be the first to observe the shortcomings of one of his most serious works, and the first to retrieve them. As far as one may judge of a new work, the performance by Mr. Fiedler and his men could not have been excelled.

It is difficult to describe adequately the superb playing of Saint-Saens' concerto in C minor. The work is far too little known, and it was worthy of the attention Mr. Paderewski bestowed upon it. His performance was intoxicating. The work, with which I am not intimately acquainted, was probably presented in a far greater light than its contents merit. That is not, however, especially essential just now. The fact remains that Mr. Paderewski was far more creative in his playing than with his pen, and that he achieved a sensational triumph. It would even have been a pleasure, without listening, to watch the play of those wrists and fingers of tempered steel, so instinct with life and creation. It has been years since the virtuoso has done himself such justice here, so fairly earned the pots of ink that have been flung at him. Of course, the royal exception to the rulings of the Symphony concerts was made, and there were encores.

PADEREWSKI'S NEW SYMPHONY PLAYED

July 14, 1909
Given for the First Time at Fifteenth Concert of the
Symphony Orchestra.

THEME IS POLAND'S
NATIONAL AMBITION

Work Is Long; First Movement the Strongest and
Most Imaginative.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, gave its 15th concert last night in Symphony Hall. Mr. Paderewski was the pianist. The program was as follows:

Symphony in B minor, op. 24.....Paderewski
Concerto in C minor, No. 4.....Saint-Saens

The symphony was played for the first time. Mr. Paderewski made sketches for it in the summer of 1904, and he completed the three movements last December. It is his purpose to add a scherzo. He wrote one, but was not wholly satisfied with it.

The three movements, with the pauses included, consumed an hour and nearly 10 minutes in performance. It is easy to say that the symphony is long, too long. This remark is to be expected; it is inevitable; but the music is not to be dismissed jauntily with this reproach. There are some who do not find it too long. Length is not necessarily fatal to a work of art. The "Odyssey," "Don Quixote," "Tom Jones," might thus be branded and condemned. It all depends on what the man has to say. It is true, as Poe insisted, that an epic poem is not inherently great by reason of its length or because it is an epic. It is also true that a sonnet is not a masterpiece simply because it has only 14 lines.

This symphony consists of a first movement, which, we are told, "seeks to celebrate Poland's great heroic past"; an andante, which is an expression of the lyrical character of the composer's race; a finale which is a symphonic poem with a program that is based on the Polish revolution of 1863-64. This finale might be played as a work complete in itself. The symphony might bear the title "Poland." Compositions that are deliberately patriotic often show more patriotism than musical inspiration. The "Finlandia" of Sibelius, for example, is not only inferior to the same composer's first symphony; it does not give to the hearer the same intense expression of the racial and natural characteristics of Finland. Yet this symphony of Sibelius is absolute music, and there is no hint of any program.

Mr. Paderewski's love of Poland is known to all. To him patriotism is a religion. No one would question for a moment the sincerity of his passionate devotion. No one, speaking of it or thinking of it, would call to mind the weak poseur in the bitter novel of Cherbuliez. In his symphony the first movement, which is rigidly symphonic and without a table of contents, is the strongest of the three, and to any hearer of imagination, who has been told that the music portrays the heroic past of the composer's country, this past of the composer's country, this movement is the most imaginative and the one charged with suggestion. In the finale, or the symphonic poem, the hearer is told expressly what he should expect to hear: The unrest of those longing for independence, older heads counselling patience, the summons to war, battle music, a dirge for the fallen, the anticipation of happier years to the anticipation of happier years to come, for Poland is not dead. Yet this movement as a whole does not rivet the attention; nor is it so impressive in descriptive detail as is the first movement for which the hearer has no guide book.

The symphony begins with a long introduction, a dangerously long introduction, for the sad and sombre mood is maintained at so great length that the character of the main body of the movement seems not to be firmly established for some time. A second hearing of the symphony shows that this apparent lack of proportion is only apparent. It is as though a narrator mourning the loss of national liberty and lamenting with reiterated lamentations the past glories, harping on sorrow the more poignant by reason of the contrast, at last warms with the thought of the glorious years and tells as a rhapsodist a tale of chivalry and splendor. This tale is interrupted by the thought of present woes, but again the narrator finds comfort in the recollection of the proud past.

The introduction, which is of a singularly original nature, establishes a mood which is not equalled in the finale. The themes of the first movement do not have, perhaps, a striking profile, but the motive that may be reasonably characterized as the theme of chivalry is finely exposed and admirably used in development. In his thematic treatment as in his conception of form and general structure, Mr. Paderewski may be described as academic, but I do not use this word in its obnoxious sense. While his musical expression is modern, it is not ultra-modern. As far as he is concerned, there has been no harmonic advance since Wagner.

Observe, too, how scrupulous Mr. Paderewski is in the matter of development. There are pages where his anxiety to develop in every way a theme, to exhaust its possibilities, leads him to repetitions that have little or no significance. Fragments of themes are used until they annoy or weary. In one or two instances a fine effect is thus frittered away. But this first movement as a whole impresses by its solid structure, the nobility of the general design, the high purpose that animates and vitalizes. The ornamentation is solid rather than designedly brilliant. The instrumentation is not always fortunate. There is a passage at the beginning of the main body of the movement for double basses and cello that does not come out, and this is true of a few other passages later in the work, as in a curious use of muted violins, where what should be a faint but dismal cry is almost inaudible.

This movement was played with great spirit and marked effect, but the second movement suffered somewhat from a lack of poetic sentiment in the interpretation. The performance was not sufficiently elastic. The melodic thought was not sung with the requisite freedom. The music itself has lyric charm. It should be played with the spontaneity of an improvisation. The music is romantic. It should be interpreted as Mr. Paderewski himself plays Chopin.

The finale is descriptive in its nature. It begins with a restlessness that is full of bodement; music of agitation and revolt. This section is more successfully imagined than that which portrays the actual conflict. The battle music is conventional; but after the heroes have fallen and their cause is lost the composer rises to a tragic height in mourning their lot. Here he is simple and eloquent. The funeral march that follows has not the same intensity. The close is in the manner of an apotheosis with the reappearance of the chivalric motive. The interest of the finale is not always maintained. The movement is laid out on a great scale, and the detail is at times verbose and uninteresting. These disturbing passages could be easily cut out. There would then be an impression of more logical continuity, and the many fine passages would stand out in bolder relief.

It may be added for the sake of the record that in the finale Mr. Paderewski uses, or rather hints at, a national song the burden of which is "Poland is not dead." He employs in his orchestra three sarrusophones and an instrument of his own invention, the "tonitruone," which is modelled after the thunder machine of the theatre.

The audience called out the composer and the conductor many times.

The Symphony, whatever may be said of its fine qualities and its imperfections, is a work that is characteristic of the composer. His own nature is in the nobler pages, which reveal breadth of view, lofty aspirations, virility that includes tenderness, enthusiasm for the highest ideals.

It was a pleasure to hear Saint-Saens' concerto, which had not been performed at a Symphony concert since 1898, played as Mr. Paderewski plays it.

PADEREWSKI LAUDS BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Eminent Pianist Calls the Symphony Organization
"Finest in the World."

ALSO PRAISES AUDIENCE OF MUSIC LOVERS HERE

Had Always Purposed to Have His Symphony Produced in This City.

That institution of which Boston people are so proud, the Boston Symphony orchestra, received from Ignace Paderewski yesterday afternoon the finest tribute of them all—"It is without doubt the best orchestra in the world."

The greatest pianist of the present day declared that from the moment he had first begun work on his symphony, he had determined it should have its introduction to the world through the Boston Symphony orchestra. He added simply, "I never considered any other."

Paderewski was good enough to accompany this remark with some pleasant words about the people who attend concerts in this city. "I wanted not only your orchestra," he said, "but that other requisite, an intelligent and appreciative audience, and I knew from past experience that I was sure to find it in Boston. Nowhere in Europe do you find superior audiences."

Perhaps Paderewski was most impressive when he went on to remark that he was quite willing to let his selection of Boston to hear the first production of his symphony stand as the profoundest expression of his attitude on music in America. When it was suggested to him that if it had not been for Russian restrictions possibly Warsaw might have been given that honor, he smiled, shook his head and said again that he had always planned to have his symphony introduced by the best orchestra in the world.

"I have long been of the opinion," he continued with emphasis, "that the Boston Symphony orchestra was superior to all others."

Expressed Himself Directly.

It isn't often that Paderewski has anything to say for publication, especially anything which may be used for comparisons. But in his apartments at the Touraine, yesterday afternoon, he expressed himself with such simple directness and dignity as to leave a charming memory of his sincerity. While he talked he sat at his piano and, from time to time, when there came a pause in the search for the precise statement, his fingers sought the piano keys as naturally as another man would make a gesture.

Paderewski had been practising when the interruption occurred, but he minded that circumstance not at all. He shook hands warmly and drew up an extra chair and took his seat at the piano again. He inquired if he should keep on playing. Then he suddenly remembered some later engagements and, with his hand half-raised, he wheeled around to talk—a sturdy figure of a man, broad-shouldered, thick-chested, vigorous in his movements, vigorous in his speech. In middle age is Paderewski now, but he has lost no part of that mass of tawny hair which, with his powerful frame, make him at first glance look more like one of the old Northmen than the foremost pianist of the world. And the delicacy of line in this master's face which serves to make the second impression is, after all, the delicacy of lines in a strong man's face.

"It is not embarrassing in the least to tell you why I have planned to have my symphony performed for the first time here in Boston," he said in English. "It is quite simple, the answer to that question. I never thought of any other city or any other orchestra than yours. Not for one moment have I considered any other. I wanted my symphony introduced to the world by the best orchestra in the world. And the Boston Symphony orchestra is without doubt the best orchestra in the world."

"There you have one reason. Let me give you another." Now, Paderewski leaned forward, smiling most affably. "I wanted your audience of Boston to hear my symphony first. I wanted not only your orchestra, but that other requisite an intelligent and appreciative audience. I made my first visit to this city in 1892 if I remember correctly. I formed then a favorable opinion of your people who come to hear music. That opinion has only been strengthened by my subsequent visits."

"But Never the Violins."

"The other great orchestras and audiences in the world—oh, yes, I know them very well. One must not omit to mention those at Berlin and Vienna. But I do not say their players are as fine in every respect as the Boston Symphony orchestra. Sometimes in the orchestras of this or that city of Europe you will hear some instruments a little better, but never the violins—never the violins! But the European orchestras must not be compared with the remarkable institution which you have here in Boston.

"And you have orchestras in America elsewhere," continued Paderewski. "And you also have audiences. I suppose for Boston I have an especial fondness. But in New York and Pittsburgh and Chicago there are great orchestras, and the people who come to hear music are cultured and appreciative and they understand quite as well as the people in Europe who come to hear music. There is no difference. I have played before them all, and I have observed none. Perhaps the audience in Italy is more demonstrative, but you find, when you go there and note observantly, that the enthusiasm is like the flame of a match—it goes out quickly."

"One must understand of America that, for the last 30 or 40 years especially, all efforts have been concentrated on the accumulation of the material resources. It is the same in any new country; it is the same everywhere, that devotion to art cannot happen until the material needs have first been satisfied. Afterward comes—well, what is now coming in America."

"Music takes a little longer time than some of the other arts. The development of music must have at least a generation for its basis. Music is at one extreme; architecture, for example, is at another. You may get beautiful buildings easily in one generation. Was it not Mr. White who in a few years gave America many most beautiful buildings, whose influence is everywhere seen as you travel through the country?"

Praise for Maj. Higginson.

"Now, thanks to such men as Maj. Higginson, the influence of music is steadily spreading, and as in this locality, its standard matches any standard in Europe. Such a wonderful man is Mr. Higginson. I think of all your munificent givers—and you have so many of them in this rich country—he deserves a little place of his own."

"One may note what Mr. Carnegie has done for the libraries and other institutions for the advancement of the arts, what Mr. Rockefeller has done for the Chicago University—the millions he has given that university for education—what others in America have done generously in promoting the arts. It has no parallel on the other side of the ocean. Perfectly wonderful is the amount of individual benefactions—of the individual initiative, as I may call it. In Europe it is the state which must come to the support of institutions which individuals support here. One must go back to the period of the renaissance to find a parallel to the conditions in America—back to those days when, through the patronage of the rich princes, Italy was enabled to get its marvellous paintings."

And so Paderewski went on saying pleasant things about America. Boston in particular, differing markedly at every step from the tenors and sopranos and impressarios who have lately been giving their impressions. The flow of compliments did not come uninterruptedly, for the pianist was in a thoughtful mood and he wished to be precise. But there was no restraint about his attitude. "It is not embarrassing for me to give you my views," he had said. "But there is so much to say!" Unfortunately the clock hands were moving all the time, and he had other engagements.

Deep in the second reference to his symphony, he looked up and chanced to catch the warning eye of his secretary and he paused, with an apologetic reference to those other engagements. Then there had been another pause, quite different in character, which came in the middle of a little description of his music.

Finale Deals with Revolution.

"The last theme, the finale," he was saying, "deals with the revolution in my country—with the last revolution. That was 40 years ago, and my father and my brother—I can remember it all quite easily. Perhaps some time ago it would never have done to attempt to present my theme, to revive mention in Poland of those circumstances of the revolution. But the constitution has permitted greater liberty, and so there's no objection now."

Instinctively the hands reached for the piano keys again. But before they could strike a note their owner drew them away and passed them over his face, a little heavily. Then he raised his head firmly and smiled. "The symphony will be produced," he said, "10 times by the Boston orchestra, twice in New York, in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Chicago and probably in Minneapolis. Afterwards I shall go to London, Paris, Berlin and then to Warsaw."

Paderewski rose from the piano, deprecating his regret that he could not permit himself to talk longer. "There is always work to do," he murmured. He shook hands warmly. And those fingers which travel along the keys of a piano so delicately gave such a crunching grip as one of its possessor's ancestors, in the days of the Polish conquest, might have given.

A moment later, through the transom, came the ripple of melody such as only this man can make.

PADEREWSKI'S SYMPHONY PRODUCED IN BOSTON

See adv. review further on.

A LONG, EARNEST AND

IMPORTANT WORK

Record By Louis C. Elson. Feb. 13, 1909

Paderewski possibly suffers from the same handicap which once affected the compositions of Liszt. Everyone idolized Liszt as the King of pianists, and his own reputation in this field threw him into the shade as a composer. Only now, when his piano-playing is but a memory, the world is beginning to realize how great he was in musical creation. It may be the same with Paderewski, but we are by no means convinced of this yet. He has the spirit of nationalism in his music, always a great advantage in composition, and he has certainly mastered the routine of orchestration and of figure development.

The symphony of yesterday afternoon took an hour and ten minutes in its performance. It called for instruments galore and some of them of a new type. Richard Strauss has brought in the Heckelphone and revived the Oboe d'Amore; Paderewski brings in the Sarussophone and other novelties, including a "Thunder-machine."

There is no essential need of the Sarussophone as a new tone-color. It is a brass instrument with a contra-bassoon mouthpiece (at least in its deepest pitch), and the contra-bassoon is the more effective of the two instruments. When Massenet introduced the Sarussophone into his "Esclarmonde" he told the present reviewer that he did so because there was sometimes difficulty in obtaining a good contra-bassoonist, and the Sarussophone was the easier to blow and the least liable to be off pitch.

Side-drum, gong, triangle, tambourine, etc., enter into this large score as a matter of course, and there is, as above mentioned, a new instrument to imitate the rolling of distant thunder.

When one remembers, in this connection, Strauss's wind-machine and his more recent device of striking bass-drums with birch rods, it shows that we have entered upon an epoch of tonal experiments. Smashing panes of glass, scraping slate-pencils on a black-board, or the use of locomotive whistles seem to be the only tone-colors yet untried, for Berlioz has used even rifle-shots in a score.

There was considerable applause at the end, and the composer was called out twice.

"The Paderewski Festival" Feb. 15, 1909

For Boston, the "Paderewski Festival," as the press agent is announcing the performances of his symphony and his appearances as a pianist this week in New York, ended at half past ten on Saturday evening. By that time Mr. Fiedler and his men had performed Mr. Paderewski's symphony for a second time; while he himself had played Saint-Saëns's concerto in C minor with the orchestra and, though he was very tired, added three solo pieces for an audience that was more eager for Mr. Paderewski, the pianist, than for Mr. Paderewski, the composer. If we have a musical or a social diarist nowadays, he must have surely noted the little things that make the spice of such "festival" occasions when later generations read amusedly of them: the shrill-voiced youth who hawked photographs of Mr. Paderewski as the audience were entering and leaving the hall and even up and down the corridors in the intermission—an innovation indeed at the decorous and rather austere Symphony Concerts; the sartorial tribute, especially among the men of the audience, of evening clothes—a homage that they often deny to old masters and to new; the palpitating Polish train in Mr. Paderewski's wake, bright with his reflected glory; the patient endurance of the prolonged intermissions and the occasional delays that his presence required, since Mr. Paderewski has long forgotten the courtesy of promptitude to an audience; the just tribute of the composer to the orchestra, that had brought his new music to luminous hearing; and the general air of eager participation in an "occasion." Restless spirits from New York for example—have complained that outside programmes and performance, our Symphony Concerts are routine. Certainly those of Friday and Saturday were not.

Mr. Paderewski, in his justly laudatory and becomingly courteous thanks to orchestra and audience, has told how warmly he appreciates the intelligence and the judgment of those that first heard his symphony. The more to regret then that it was received on Saturday night only a little more heartily than it had been on Friday afternoon. At the end of the first movement—to make the record—came a quick burst of applause that was sustained enough to bring the composer once or twice to the platform. The second movement went, as on Friday, to scanty plaudits. At the close of the whole symphony there was hearty, but not enthusiastic or very prolonged applause, that gained in spirit and volume when the composer shook the conductor warmly by the hand. Unmistakably the stress of sustained attention for seventy minutes, and the monotony of much of the mood of music had their effect even upon so intent and so appreciative a company. The familiar plaudits of the audiences on Saturday evenings—quick, general, sustained, warm and vital with the keen pleasure of what they had heard and the pleasure of answering and rewarding emotion—came in the pauses in the concerto, at the close, and after Mr. Paderewski's encore pieces.

Those who heard him play in his recital a week ago still recall the marshalled magnificence of his matured powers, deployed then as he has not deployed them in years. They were no less rich and splendid, so far as the chosen music gave them room, in his playing at the concerts of Friday and Saturday. The memory of the symphony may endure or may fade, as it impressed each who heard, but the memory of the mingled might and delicacy of tone, the splendors of coloring, the commanding, the persuading, the entrancing eloquence, the vitality of feeling and of expression, the perfect fusion of matter, manner and utterance, the sense of a fine and strenuous spirit making the music its own; the impression of a unique and singularly noble mind and temperament speaking with its true voice—all these will abide. To us at least who hear it is the pianist, rather than the composer, who expresses the masterful Paderewski of our admiration. H. T. P.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL TICKET

wanted, from Jan. 1. Address P.E.S., Box 1629, Boston, giving location and price.
(A):

FOR SALE—TWO SYMPHONY TICKETS: first balcony, second row, centre; price reasonable. Address B. D. E., Boston Transcript.
(A):

PADEREWSKI THE MAGNET

Globe — Feb. 13, 1909
Attracts as Soloist and Composer.

New Symphony a Monumental Work of Art.

Mr Max Fiedler Directs Its
First Performance.

The early birds going by Symphony hall yesterday morning at little past 7 o'clock saw one or two individuals encamped upon the steps near the entrance on Huntington av waiting, just waiting. Two or three hours later there were many more people, and by 11 o'clock there probably were a thousand or so, all doing the same thing, waiting; some patiently, some impatiently and nearly all of them armed and equipped with luncheons.

And there the twice five hundred remained until about 2 o'clock, when the doors of the hall were opened to admit to the 25-cent rush seats, not the whole crowd but only about half of the expectant ones, the number permitted by law. Slowly the disappointed half disintegrated, while the more fortunate musical enthusiasts massed themselves in the second balcony well satisfied with the expenditure of time and quarter dollars for the sake of seeing and hearing Paderewski and his symphony.

A Paderewski Afternoon.

'Twas a Paderewski afternoon, all right, for the great composer-pianist was about the whole thing on the program. His brand new symphony in B minor, op. 14, was to be given a first time anywhere public performance, and then along about 4 o'clock there was to be a Saint-Saens concerto played by the wonderful Pole.

P S—And possibly an extra number, perhaps more, could be managed somehow, despite the "no encore" tradition of the Symphony concerts.

And all this came about just as wished by the big audience, which was a particularly dressy one, and probably the only ones dissatisfied with the actions of the Oliver Twists of music asking for "more" were the people about the hall who would be obliged to hustle lively to get the stage cleared in time for the commemorative meeting at night in honor of Mr Lincoln's memory.

It is pretty safe to say there were few tardy ones, for the doors closed as per notices, promptly for the first 20 minutes necessary to play the first movement of the symphony. The audience was notably critical in its makeup, for there were an unusual number of prominent musicians and critics from other cities present.

Sembrich Sends Greetings by Wireless

Paderewski was showered with congratulations at his reception in the artists' room on the stage after the performance of the symphony, and cordiality was even more marked at the end of the concert. Among the "best wishes" received was one by wireless from Mme Sembrich, who is taking her ease upon the high seas on her way to Berlin.

This took place, as it were, behind the scenes; but the audience also took a hand, yes, many of them, in paying tribute to the gifted man. He was vigorously called to the stage after the first part of the symphony, and at the finale he was forced to make several return trips to bow his acknowledgments, to shake hands with conductor Fiedler and to indicate to the members of the orchestra his appreciation of their splendid work.

The monumental composition is really not completed, for Paderewski contemplates adding another part to the three movements played yesterday. Graphically has the composer pictured in musical form a tribute to his beloved Poland, and Boston is honored by his decision to have the tone poem produced here and by our own Symphony orchestra.

As soloist in Saint-Saens' concerto he again displayed his masterly skill as interpreter, and the usual scenes of enthusiasm were in order whenever the audience had a chance to applaud.

MR. PADEREWSKI'S SYMPHONY IN NEW YORK

Trans. — Feb. 19, 1909
An Excellent Performance, a Cordial Reception and Diversely-Minded Reviewers

Mr. Paderewski's symphony was played for the first time in New York last night—for the fifth repetition of it in almost as many days by the Boston Orchestra. "The audience was very cordial," says the Sun, "and called out the composer after each movement." With one accord, too, the reviewers praise the performance. "The symphony was superbly played," to quote the Sun again, "and Mr. Fiedler conducted with splendid authority." For the music itself, as the reviewers heard and judged it, there are many men of many minds. The reviewer of the Sun, for example, "is inclined to feel that the external descriptive power of music is utilized rather than its emotional expressiveness to create the desired mood in the listener. Once acquainted with the programme of the work we can sit back and watch its incidents pass before us in a wonderful procession.

"But we are spectators rather than participators in the thought and feeling of the action. The sketch is easily followed. We can see the old shaking their doubtful heads. We can see the young waving their athletic arms. We can hear the mournful Poles singing their melancholy songs, and we wonder that they do not in sheer despair break into the mad dance of their oppressors which we have so often heard in the symphonies of Tchaikowsky. Perhaps this will come in the yet unwritten fourth movement. The story of the long third movement is read without doubt. But it is all delineative and descriptive. It is pictorial, brilliant, intellectual, magnificent in instrumental technic and dazzling in mass effects. But nevertheless the hearer after this first performance wonders if less parade of combinations, less complexity of style, a simpler and more direct melodic idiom and a more compact design would not have accomplished something more in the direction of bringing the heart into throbbing sympathy with down-trodden Poland."

The reviewer in the Sun is likewise disposed to find the symphony a "tone-poem" in symphonic form rather than a symphony in the classic sense: "One thing stood forth quite clearly, and that was that the so-called symphony was not to be accepted as a symphony in the old sense of that term. . . . What Mr. Paderewski has written is an orchestral delineation in three sections. It is a tone-poem in cantos. Its themes are melodically vague, for the plain reason that they are bare outlines of melodic forms, planned to admit of the broadest freedom of color within their liberal limits. The composer has aimed at the evolution of his ideas through the media of the contemporaneous orchestral palette, not by means of the classic processes of thematic development. He asks much of his hearer. The auditor who sets out to grasp the scheme of this work must be ready to seize upon a few elusive melodic fragments which are woven into an iridescent web of instrumentation. Shape is indicated rather by color contrast than by line and curve. It is all intensely modern and sometimes exasperatingly intangible."

Mr. Krehbiel in the Tribune refers his readers to the despatch that he sent from Boston where he heard the symphony last Friday. In the course of it he said: "Nine-tenths of Mr. Paderewski's music is expression after mood. It is freighted with melancholy. It tells of a great corroding longing, vain effort, and hope which never shines resplendent, but appears ever at the end as only a flickering light. . . . Structurally Mr. Paderewski has paid deference to approved symphonic forms in his first two movements, and exercised the utmost freedom in his last, which has the dimensions and the outlines of a symphonic poem."

In it he has hewn to the lines of historical incident. The impression made by the music is not so easily described. Mr. Paderewski has invented some pregnant themes, but they are not strikingly novel, and his treatment of them makes them sound scant of breath. There is an excessive amount of iteration of short motifs borrowed from the themes in the working out of the climaxes. His fabric is polyphonic, and the singing voices are heard always, but much of the music is monochromatic. Portions of it might be improved by reorchestration, but there is much color in the score, and some of its effects are both brilliant and original. For the sake of its general effectiveness as a symphonic composition it might be wished that Mr. Paderewski had been less filled with patriotic emotion and a little less sincere. A strange wish this, perhaps, and one that the composer is too honest to sympathize with, but had he been willing to sacrifice truthfulness of delineation to musical effectiveness there would have been less gloom and more pride and consciousness of national strength in the mood of the symphony, and consequently more variety of expression."

PADEREWSKI'S FIRST SYMPHONY PERFORMED

Last Movement of Work Creates Strong Impression, But Opening Fails to Please—Composer and Conductor Congratulate Each Other—Fine Performance.

Paderewski's first symphony had its initial public performance at yesterday afternoon's Symphony concert. Paderewski also appeared as the piano soloist in the performance of the Saint-Saens concerto in C minor. Some idea of the remarkable popular attractiveness of the event may be gathered from the announcement made at the hall that the first seeker after one of the 500 seats on sale for this weekly rehearsal put in an appearance soon after 7 o'clock in the morning, and that long before noon there were twice as many waiting in line as there were tickets for in the box office.

It was a Paderewski program. The symphony came first. The authorized notice says: "The symphony was written as a patriotic tribute of the composer to his native land, and it was directly inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the revolution of 1863-64." It was begun in the summer of 1904 and the parts were copied only two months ago. In its present form it has three movements, but there is to be a fourth movement, based on the last theme of the third movement. According to the announcement, there is "no absolute program for either the first or second movement." But the third movement is "in effect a symphonic poem," dealing with the revolution. History says of this struggle: "It was a mere guerilla war, and no great or decisive conflicts took place; but the sympathy of Europe was largely enlisted on behalf of the Poles." In 1864 the Russian troops stamped out the last embers of insurrection; and since then "the kingdom of Poland has disappeared from all official documents."

The first movement is full of the "bitter memories of defeat." This is the least effective of the three movements. It is written in the latest style, but it makes no very deep impression. Instead of outspoken speech, it seems more like a mumbled soliloquy. In the second movement the composer undertakes to express "the lyrical nature of his race." The themes are distinctly Polish; they are bitter-sweet; they are interesting but not memorable. The third movement, with its definite program, its description of Polish feelings and Polish deeds, its pictures of prospective victory and of overwhelming defeat, is by far the most impressive one of all. Standing alone it would take its place among the most powerful and most popular symphonic poems produced in recent years. It made a strong impression on the audience yesterday. The applause that followed the first and second movements was rather perfunctory; but after the last movement there was an outburst of hearty applause. Composer and conductor congratulated each other in the presence of the audience, while the audience acclaimed both. Mr. Fiedler and his players deserved a good share of the honors. Their work was full of extraordinary skill and sympathy.

The score of the symphony calls not only for most of the known instruments, including three sarrusophones, but for a tonitruone, "an instrument of percussion which Mr. Paderewski himself invented." The noise it creates is first cousin to stage thunder.

The Saint-Saens concerto, with Paderewski at the piano, brought to an end the most remarkable Symphony concert of the season.

Paderewski's Symphony in Chicago

Mr. Paderewski's symphony, heard here in Boston almost exactly a month ago, was played in Chicago on Friday and Saturday of last week by the Thomas Orchestra, with Mr. Stock conducting under the eye of the composer. Both audiences listened intently, but according to the newspapers "there was not a great deal of applause," and that applause was rather for "Paderewski, the popular idol," than for Paderewski, the symphonist. The reviewers themselves, when they write of the music, show the same diversity of opinion as did their brethren in Boston and in New York. Says Mr. de Lamar, for example, in the Record-Herald: "To many of his auditors the first movement will stand as Paderewski's greatest achievement for a long time. The reason is simple. This section of the symphony is in reality a tone poem by itself. Laying aside all consideration of the subject matter, of that rather unnecessary 'programme' it is musically complete. Its structure is symmetrical. The well-planned returns of the introductory bars are a happy inspiration; the intermediate sections are splendidly sonorous, rich and sustained with great skill. The most purely beautiful phrases, the phrases, in other words, that are most musically emotional, are those same bars of the introduction. The composer proves the possession of an unerring sense of color and of harmonic values; beyond that he has evolved melodies really poignant in appeal. The first movement then, is a well-rounded work by itself, it vibrates with strong life; it throbs with an intensity of emotion; it glows with color that reveals a nice discrimination on the part of its creator. It should stand alone. For though there is a second movement sustained on a high plane throughout, and a third of crashing effectiveness, the remainder of the symphony does not measure up in nobility to that first section. The poem in tone was epitomized musically before the andante, when the last few bars of unworlly beauty were ended."

Mr. Hubbard writes in the Tribune: "The Symphony suggests pictures first of all. The pictorial is the whole tendency of music at the present time, and Mr. Paderewski is essentially of the present. He is not an ultra-modern to the extent of discrediting all that has been done or conceived in the past. But he thinks as the modern man thinks, and therefore his music must possess the pictorial and the dramatic elements. He has given us no 'programme' for the first two movements of his symphony, but the story they contain is not difficult to discover. He has written boldly and freely, but he has not forgotten that beauty is in the main the precious part in music and that melody is its vital force. His music all sounds well. It is colorful and rich, but its color and its richness are those of beauty. He can speak harshly and dissonantly, too, but his utterances at such times have justification. The rest is of the kind that soothes rather than irritates the ears of the listener. His orchestration recalls strongly that of Wagner—the Wagner of 'Die Meistersinger' and 'The Ring.' Not that there is anything of imitation, but the coloring and the manner are those of Wagner at his best—and a better master could not be found. The thematic material is much of it of the short-phrased, motif-like kind that is usual in the present day, but there also is a liberal amount of full, broad-phrased melody that gives a splendid lyric flow to the music as a whole. The skill in development and handling of the thematic materials is masterly—the work of a thorough musician who has made all technical resource his own, who knows what he wants and how to accomplish it."

Mr. Gunn in the Inter-Ocean is more reserved: "Paderewski's symphony serves in several ways to heighten the resemblance he bears to Rubinstein. It possesses much of the melodic charm and vitality which are characteristic of that master's compositions. It is far more subtle and exhibits a greater mastery of the technic of composition than Rubinstein possessed. It even shares the greatest fault of Rubinstein music, in that it is much too long. It consumed over an hour and is filled with repetitions that do not attain the only end of repetition, namely, emphasis of mood or idea. Nor is it distinguished by its originality. That is, it does not reveal a new and commanding figure in the creative world. But it has enriched symphonic literature by a great deal that is beautiful, both in a melodic and harmonic sense. And it does accomplish what the composer intended it should accomplish—a sympathetic and realistic portrayal of the patriotic feeling that inspired it. Wm. M. H. 10. 1909

Now
AUTOMOBILES
22 Church Street, Opp Park Square.
MODEL R STEVENS.....$1400
RUNABOUT. MASS. AUTO CO.
PEERLESS '07 30 H. P......$2300
MASS. AUTO CO., fully equipped and warranted.
STEVENS-DURYEA '07.....$1100
TOURING CAR, carefully equipped. M. A. CO.
ROYAL TOURIST.....$900
TOURING CAR. MASS. AUTO CO.
DARRACQ TOURING CAR.....$1100
MASS. AUTO CO., 52 Church St.
AMERICAN TOURING CAR.....$650
MASS. AUTO CO., 52 Church St.

the saxophone, and a new instrument of percussion, which he invented. He calls it a tonitruone and it is designed to give the effect of distant thunder. The first performance of this work will be at the Symphony rehearsal next week. Globe Jan. 31. 1909

In it he has hewn to the lines of historical incident. . . . The impression made by the music is not so easily described. Mr. Paderewski has invented some pregnant themes, but they are not strikingly novel, and his treatment of them makes them sound scant of breath. There is an excessive amount of iteration of short motifs borrowed from the themes in the working out of the climaxes. His fabric is polyphonic, and the singing voices are heard always, but much of the music is monochromatic. Portions of it might be improved by reorchestration, but there is much color in the score, and some of its effects are both brilliant and original. For the sake of its general effectiveness as a symphonic composition it might be wished that Mr. Paderewski had been less filled with patriotic emotion and a little less sincere. A strange wish this, perhaps, and one that the composer is too honest to sympathize with, but had he been willing to sacrifice truthfulness of delineation to musical effectiveness there would have been less gloom and more pride and consciousness of national strength in the mood of the symphony, and consequently more variety of expression."

PADEREWSKI'S FIRST SYMPHONY PERFORMED

Jan. 13. 1909

Last Movement of Work Creates Strong Impression, But Opening Fails to Please—Composer and Conductor Congratulate Each Other—Fine Performance.

Paderewski's first symphony had its initial public performance at yesterday afternoon's Symphony concert. Paderewski also appeared as the piano soloist in the performance of the Saint-Saens concerto in C minor. Some idea of the remarkable popular attractiveness of the event may be gathered from the announcement made at the hall that the first seeker after one of the 500 seats on sale for this weekly rehearsal put in an appearance soon after 7 o'clock in the morning, and that long before noon there were twice as many waiting in line as there were tickets for in the box office.

It was a Paderewski program. The symphony came first. The authorized notice says: "The symphony was written as a patriotic tribute of the composer to his native land, and it was directly inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the revolution of 1863-64." It was begun in the summer of 1904 and the parts were copied only two months ago. In its present form it has three movements, but there is to be a fourth movement, based on the last theme of the third movement. According to the announcement, there is "no absolute program for either the first or second movement." But the third movement is "in effect a symphonic poem," dealing with the revolution. History says of this struggle: "It was a mere guerilla war, and no great or decisive conflicts took place; but the sympathy of Europe was largely enlisted on behalf of the Poles." In 1864 the Russian troops stamped out the last embers of insurrection; and since then "the kingdom of Poland has disappeared from all official documents."

The first movement is full of the "bitter memories of defeat." This is the least effective of the three movements. It is written in the latest style, but it makes no very deep impression. Instead of outspoken speech, it seems more like a mumbled soliloquy. In the second movement the composer undertakes to express "the lyrical nature of his race." The themes are distinctly Polish; they are bitter-sweet; they are interesting but not memorable. The third movement, with its definite program, its description of Polish feelings and Polish deeds, its pictures of prospective victory and of overwhelming defeat, is by far the most impressive one of all. Standing alone it would take its place among the most powerful and most popular symphonic poems produced in recent years. It made a strong impression on the audience yesterday. The applause that followed the first and second movements was rather perfunctory; but after the last movement there was an outburst of hearty applause. Composer and conductor congratulated each other in the presence of the audience, while the audience acclaimed both. Mr. Fiedler and his players deserved a good share of the honors. Their work was full of extraordinary skill and sympathy.

The score of the symphony calls not only for most of the known instruments, including three sarrusophones, but for a tonitruone, "an instrument of percussion which Mr. Paderewski himself invented." The noise it creates is first cousin to stage thunder.

The Saint-Saens concerto, with Paderewski at the piano, brought to an end the most remarkable Symphony concert of the season.

Paderewski's Symphony in Chicago

Mr. Paderewski's symphony, heard here in Boston almost exactly a month ago, was played in Chicago on Friday and Saturday of last week by the Thomas Orchestra, with Mr. Stock conducting under the eye of the composer. Both audiences listened intently, but according to the newspapers "there was not a great deal of applause," and that applause was rather for "Paderewski, the popular idol," than for Paderewski, the symphonist. The reviewers themselves, when they write of the music, show the same diversity of opinion as did their brethren in Boston and in New York. Says Mr. de Lamar, for example, in the Record-Herald: "To many of his auditors the first movement will stand as Paderewski's greatest achievement for a long time. The reason is simple. This section of the symphony is in reality a tone poem by itself. Laying aside all consideration of the subject matter, of that rather unnecessary 'programme' it is musically complete. Its structure is symmetrical. The well-planned returns of the introductory bars are a happy inspiration; the intermediate sections are splendidly sonorous, rich and sustained with great skill. The most purely beautiful phrases, the phrases, in other words, that are most musically emotional, are those same bars of the introduction. The composer proves the possession of an unerring sense of color and of harmonic values; beyond that he has evolved melodies really poignant in appeal. The first movement then, is a well-rounded work by itself, it vibrates with strong life; it throbs with an intensity of emotion; it glows with color that reveals a nice discrimination on the part of its creator. It should stand alone. For though there is a second movement sustained on a high plane throughout, and a third of crashing effectiveness, the remainder of the symphony does not measure up in nobility to that first section. The poem in tone was epitomized musically before the andante, when the last few bars of unworlthy beauty were ended."

Mr. Hubbard writes in the Tribune: "The Symphony suggests pictures first of all. The pictorial is the whole tendency of music at the present time, and Mr. Paderewski is essentially of the present. He is not an ultra-modern to the extent of discrediting all that has been done or conceived in the past. But he thinks as the modern man thinks, and therefore his music must possess the pictorial and the dramatic elements. He has given us no 'programme' for the first two movements of his symphony, but the story they contain is not difficult to discover. He has written boldly and freely, but he has not forgotten that beauty is in the main the precious part in music and that melody is its vital force. His music all sounds well. It is colorful and rich, but its color and its richness are dissonantly, too, but his utterances at such times have justification. The rest is of the kind that soothes rather than irritates the ears of the listener. His orchestration recalls strongly that of Wagner—the Wagner of 'Die Meistersinger' and 'The Ring.' Not that there is anything of imitation, but the coloring and the manner are those of Wagner at his best—and a better master could not be found. The thematic material is much of it of the short-phrased, motif-like kind that is usual in the present day, but there also is a liberal amount of full, broad-phrased melody that gives a splendid lyric flow to the music as a whole. The skill in development and handling of the thematic materials is masterly—the work of a thorough musician who has made all technical resource his own, who knows what he wants and how to accomplish it."

Mr. Gunn in the Inter-Ocean is more reserved: "Paderewski's symphony serves in Ignace Paderewski's New Symphony.

Conductor Fiedler Will Direct Its First Performance.

Interesting Recitals of the Week.

When Paderewski arrived here from England last Tuesday he brought with him the long-expected symphony which was first announced for performance two years ago. On account of his extensive tours he had found it difficult to devote time to it until last summer and the final copies of the parts were only made last month. The symphony was inspired by the 40th anniversary of the Polish revolution of 1863-64 and the composer has written it as a tribute to his native land.

In its present form it has three movements and is complete as it is, but Paderewski contemplates inserting a scherzo between the second and third movements. As it stands the work will consume about an hour and a quarter in performance.

A full modern orchestra is used and in addition to the instruments found in such a band Mr. Paderewski has added three sarrusophones, which is a new instrument and is a distant relative to the saxophone, and a new instrument of percussion, which he invented. He calls it a tonitruone and it is designed to give the effect of distant thunder. The first performance of this work will be at the Symphony rehearsal next week. Globe Jan. 31. 1909

Christian Science Monitor
SYMPHONY CONCERT.

AT THE 15th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Saturday evening, the following program was played: Paderewski, symphony in B minor, op. 24; Saint-Saens, concerto in C minor, No. 4, for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 44. The soloist was Mr. Paderewski.

If Mr. Paderewski has not made a reputation as the composer of a great symphony, he has made his Boston friends feel acquainted with him as never before. Hereafter he will be something more than the Paderewski who plays with the lights low and makes himself known only by means of piano tones. He has been heard once to tell his thoughts not through his own playing, but through that of other men; he has discarded the mystery and the wizardry of the pianist for the open greeting, the direct speech of the composer. Though a week ago when he played the program of his recital he held the attention of the audience as nobody else can hold it, and though during the performance of his new work the audience yielded a flagging, labored attention, yet there was an intimacy of expression in the symphony that could never be spoken through the piano.

In the Symphony in B minor, which is to count as the composer's 24th work, Paderewski has undertaken to tell the general history of Poland, and besides that to narrate one typical event, the attempt of the patriots of 1863-4 to make a revolution. He is a better psychologist than narrator. In describing the efforts of people and nobles to make Poland a nation among nations, he has indicated their feeling, he has told the motives that actuated the conflicting classes; but he has signally failed to give an idea of the sequence of events, or of cause and effect. Since the music takes its character from the people's thoughts rather than from their actions, it lacks animation. It is full of contrasted emotions, it is full of arguments; sometimes it threatens to accomplish something, but nothing is brought to pass.

Of the three movements of the symphony, but two, the first and the last, will be discussed here. The second, the slow movement, is so hopelessly indefinite in its expression that a hearer could wish that the composer had done with

IGNACE PADEREWSKI,

Whose symphony had its first performances in Boston Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

it as with the scherzo, left it to be written later. The first movement, which describes Poland's past, has a sustained interest and would have been an illuminating study of the Polish race if the composer had presented it by itself. There is striving but no leadership, a wish to get into the light, but a willingness to stay in the dark; the wood wind instruments get hold of a good idea which the strings repeat; there is salvation for Poland in that idea if it is only followed out. A dispute arises, and a gentle voice, that of some idealist, speaks but is drowned out by the general chorus. An event happens which should decide the fortunes of Poland, but it is without consequences. The people are thrown into a fright, they deliberate with the nobles, and all agree on a course of action, but nothing is done.

In the first movement, which takes 25 minutes in performance, Paderewski is always clear but never picturesque. He tells what cross purposes and divided aims have brought his countrymen through the centuries without a nationality, but he never brings forward a flesh and blood hero either of camp or court and he never paints a Polish landscape. He writes like an absentee patriot who thinks much about his country, but has not lived very close to its soil.

Mr. Paderewski's detailed program of the last movement reads as though he dictated it hurriedly after he arrived in America; it does not read like a plan which he studiously followed while he composed the music; in it he says that the themes are shadowy and unsubstantial, so of course it would take an uncommonly shrewd listener to follow music and program together. Since the movement professes to narrate a definite event, the revolution of 1863-4, when the Poles made their last attempt to be independent, it should be reasonably easy to trace the course of action, yet when themes "disappear in despair" or are "divested of their substance" there is manifestly no keeping up with them.

As to instrumental color, Paderewski has shown individuality. He has developed especially some new combinations of wood-wind and percussion instruments which give the effect of whiteness and barrenness. His colors are almost never rich and so they are never turgid. He has a fondness for muted strings; he is very mild in his treatment of the brass: he likes now and then to make a rattle and a stir, but he is never noisy. At the close of the symphony he has some delicate strokes on the harmonics of the solo violin, which Richard Strauss would be glad to have thought of.

The audience was open-minded to Mr. Paderewski's work; but he is not Strauss and he made no great impression on them; they seemed glad to make his acquaintance as a composer and they felt that they never really knew him until Saturday night, but they gave him no encouragement to give up his piano playing and make a business of writing symphonies. After the first movement was played, Mr. Fiedler had to drop his baton and go behind the scenes with all speed in order to get Paderewski on the platform before the applause stopped. When the whole concert was over, symphony, piano concerto and all, the audience recalled the soloist and broke the laws of the Medes and Persians by demanding that he play for them again.

PADEREWSKI'S SYMPHONY PRODUCED IN BOSTON

A LONG, EARNEST AND
IMPORTANT WORK

New Instruments Heard for the First Time, but No New Points of Orchestration.

By Louis C. Elson.
PROGRAMME.

Paderewski—Symphony in B minor.
Saint-Saens—Piano concerto in C minor.
Pianist—Ignace Paderewski.

The above reads like a very short programme, but if any reader receives that impression let him get rid of it at once. A modern symphony is a serious matter, in breadth (of scoring) and in length, if not always in depth. There was a time when Beethoven's Ninth symphony was considered a pretty long work and rather heavily scored. But there are many modern composers who drive it into the domain of simplicity and brevity—by comparison with their very prolix works.

Paderewski possibly suffers from the same handicap which once affected the compositions of Liszt. Everyone idolized Liszt as the King of pianists, and his own reputation in this field threw him into the shade as a composer. Only now, when his piano-playing is but a memory, the world is beginning to realize how great he was in musical creation. It may be the same with Paderewski, but we are by no means convinced of this yet. He has the spirit of nationalism in his music, always a great advantage in composition, and he has certainly mastered the routine of orchestration and of figure development.

The symphony of yesterday afternoon took an hour and ten minutes in its performance. It called for instruments galore and some of them of a new type. Richard Strauss has brought in the Heckelphone and revived the Oboe d'Amore; Paderewski brings in the Sarussophone and other novelties, including a "Thunder-machine."

There is no essential need of the Sarussophone as a new tone-color. It is a brass instrument with a contra-bassoon mouth-piece (at least in its deepest pitch), and the contra-bassoon is the more effective of the two instruments. When Massenet introduced the Sarussophone into his "Esclarmonde" he told the present reviewer that he did so because there was sometimes difficulty in obtaining a good contra-bassoonist, and the Sarussophone was the easier to blow and the least liable to be off pitch.

Side-drum, gong, triangle, tambourine, etc., enter into this large score as a matter of course, and there is, as above mentioned, a new instrument to imitate the rolling of distant thunder.

When one remembers, in this connection, Strauss's wind-machine and his more recent device of striking bass-drums with birch rods, it shows that we have entered upon an epoch of tonal experiments. Smashing panes of glass, scraping slate-pencils on a black-board, or the use of locomotive whistles seem to be the only tone-colors yet untried, for Berlioz has used even rifle-shots in a score.

The first movement of Paderewski's Symphony, which has an impressive introduction, is fairly intelligible in its shape. Its themes are recognizable and their chief figures well developed. But the first two movements are almost entirely in a sombre mood and give very little contrast. There is also very little sustained melody, although very much figure development. The monotony is added to by the great use of chromatics. The orchestration is often turgid.

There is a bit of canonic work in the introduction, but little of strict counterpoint in the later portion of the symphony. All through the first movement there seems to be a struggle with great ideas but without mastering them. The work suggests greatness without being great. The military touches near the end of the first movement, the chorale-like phrase on the organ, are mighty fragments that might have been something more.

The slow movement continues in its dark tints the gloomy impression of its predecessor. There are many sequences, and much display of the wind instruments in the deepest register, a la Tschalkowsky, without, we must add, the attractive poetry of Tschalkowsky.

The symphony goes directly from its slow movement to its finale. The Scherzo is absent, as in a concerto-form. We are informed that this finale treats of the Polish Revolution of 1863. It is laudable for a Polish composer to glorify the memories of his country, for never has there been a more splendid kingdom than Poland, never a country in which more heroism has been displayed in a hopeless struggle against despotism. We therefore listened with the greatest respect to the tone-picture which gave one of the lofty chapters of Poland's history. And we found this the most tangible and the most effective part of the whole work. A bugle-call and a roll of side drums led up to what Shakespeare would have called "Alarums and Excursions." The introduction of a Polish national theme made the picture still more tangible. Most striking of all was the dominating, almost irresistible, march rhythm that formed the substratum of the whole Finale. We think that we shall like the last movement best, on repeated hearing.

It must be remembered that the reviewer has heard this work but once and that it has many novel effects. It would therefore be wrong to give an irrevocable judgment. We found some fine points in the symphony, but on the whole it seemed fragmentary in spite of its continuous development. We discovered no new points of orchestration in spite of the new instruments. Paderewski's scoring only restated what Tschalkowsky has given better. We believe also that all that this symphony had to tell could have been recounted in one-half of the time taken. Yet we recognize the earnestness of the work and its importance.

There was considerable applause at the end, and the composer was called out twice.

We intimated in our opening sentence that the concert was not as short as its list might indicate. The law of the Boston Symphony Concerts is prohibitive of encores, but Paderewski is like Necessity—he knows no Law. He is the particular pet of the encore-fiend. It matters not how long the concert may have been, nor what he may have played, nor how he may have played it, the public cry, with Prince Hal—"Well, breathe awhile and then to 't again," and the kindly artist never sets up a refusal. Therefore when the long concert was over the public did not depart, but waited for the inevitable post-script.

After the symphony came the St. Saens C minor Concerto. But between them there came the longest "wait" that has ever taken place at the Symphony Concerts. Twenty-five minutes elapsed between the last notes of the symphony and the beginning of the Concerto.

When it once began, however, it was very brilliantly given. It is not as fine as the G minor concerto, which we heard two weeks ago, but Paderewski played it with a verve that carried it to absolute success. There were some tremendous crashes in the first movement and in the final Coda, but the Allegro Vivace of the second movement was splendidly performed and the manner in which the chief theme of the Finale was rapped out was exciting. It was, as we expected, a greater Paderewski that was revealed (in spite of the thunderbolts) than was evident in his recital of a few days ago. In spite of all the spots that can be discerned upon this sun it still remains the chief star of the present piano world. When we left the hall the supplementary concert of encores was beginning.

TURN 600 AWAY FROM CONCERT

Immense Throng Unable to Buy Seats for Paderewski

Post Feb. 13, 1904

Several hundred women and many men were unable to secure rush tickets for the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon, the appearance of Paderewski as soloist and composer bringing out a crowd of 1200 people to secure 520 seats.

The double inducement of Paderewski as soloist and the orchestra playing a symphony composed by him was the lure that brought out one of the largest throngs that have been known in the history of the orchestra.

It was 7:20 yesterday morning when the first arrival, a woman, appeared, and she held her place in the line until the sale began. Carrying lunches done up in papers and in boxes, people straggled into line through the early morning hours and at 1 o'clock yesterday afternoon a double line extended from the entrance to the corner of Gainsboro street, the whole length of the Children's Hospital being taken up.

600 Disappointed

When the "No More Seats" sign was hung up at the window where the 25-cent seats were being sold a line of over 600 women and men turned away disappointed. But they had, some of them, come from such a distance and had been so anxious to hear the great pianist that many of them, particularly the women, remained outside the hall to have the consolation of seeing the musician at least when he came out after the concert.

Symphony Hall presented an unusual picture at noon, when one by one the people in the long line who had been far-sighted enough to bring lunch sat down on the broad stone steps and unwrapped lunches. News of the unprecedented throng spread rapidly and hawkers soon appeared with the usual street lunches, which were promptly bought by the waiting hundreds.

Women Struggle for Places

Street cars leading to the hall were crowded, and there were scores who came afoot. There were 520 people in line at 10:30 a. m., so that all who came later remained in line with no chance of securing a seat, but this did not seem to be any barrier, as the line grew longer and longer until there were 1200 waiting when the ticket window was thrown open.

Paderewski Plays at Symphony Concert By Olin Downes

Musical Boston, all agog, attended the 15th rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon in high anticipation of the first performance of Ignace Paderewski's new symphony and to hear that peer of pianists play.

Certainly Mr. Paderewski, in his performance, justified the pots of ink that have been flung at him since his first American tour.

It is not necessary here to recount the history and the purpose of the symphony. It has been told and retold at length to a wondering public. It is of more moment to remark that the composer has evidently labored with the utmost forethought and self-criticism toward the highest goal, that his purpose rings true in every measure.

It is not Mr. Paderewski's fault that his symphony has been so shouted about.

He has evidently perused many modern scores to advantage, notably those of Tschalkowsky. His tonal architecture is on the largest scale.

Consider the orchestra that he has employed to fill his canvas: Three flutes, three oboes (English horn), three clarinets (bass clarinet), two bassoons, contrabassoon, three sarrusophones, four trumpets, four horns, three trombones, bass tuba, harp, organ, three kettle-drums, side-drum, cymbals, triangle, tam-tam, tambour de basque, tonitruone, the usual strings.

Mr. Paderewski, as everybody knows, invented the tonitruone himself. To some, however, it may be news that at the first rehearsals it was found that at last a composer had "stumped" the Symphony Orchestra. Not a man of them could successfully handle the new instrument. The author of its being was summoned in haste, and soon everything was well.

The first movements of the symphony follow freely the accepted forms. They prepare the way for the third, which Paderewski's Symphony.

The next Symphony program may well be characterized as a Paderewski program, for it will include only two numbers, the first of which will present Paderewski the composer, and the second Paderewski the pianist. To Boston and to Boston's orchestra has been given the honor of presenting this long-awaited Symphony for the first time. Mr. Paderewski expected to have it ready two years ago and to come especially to this country in order to have the Boston Symphony orchestra play it; but on account of his concert engagements when that time came he had advanced not far beyond his original sketches. Last year came his long tour of this country, and it was not until the beginning of last summer that he was able to get really at work on the symphony. Not until the end of last December was he able to write "finis" at the bottom of the score. It is this symphony which brings him to America this year. It will be played eight times by the Boston Symphony orchestra, twice in Boston, twice in New York and once each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn. It will be played twice by the Theodore Thomas orchestra in Chicago and once each by the St. Paul and Minneapolis Symphony orchestras. The opus number of the work is 24 and the key is B minor. It is in three movements, the first of which is in free classical form, "adagio maestoso," "allegro con fuoco"; the second is the slow movement, "andante con moto," and the third is an "allegro vivace." As has been already announced, the symphony, while it bears no dedication, is a tribute by the composer to his native country, and was directly inspired by the 40th anniversary of the Polish revolution of 1863-64, which impressed itself so deeply on Paderewski's mind, all the more so as one of the direct results of it was the exile of his father to Siberia. The last movement of the symphony is a complete symphonic poem in itself. It seeks to picture musically the moods of the people during the revolution from the time of the first agitation, through the bitterness of defeat, to the brightness of recurring hope.

The performance will last about one hour and a quarter. The first movement lasts about 25 minutes, so it will be more than usually desirable for all patrons of the Symphony concerts to be in their seats promptly.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

XVI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 27, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

ELGAR,

SYMPHONY, in A-flat major, op. 55.
I. Andante nobilmente e semplice: Allegro.
II. Allegro molto.
III. Adagio.
IV. Lento: Allegro.
(First time in Boston.)

VOLKMANN,

SERENADE for STRING ORCHESTRA, F major,
op. 63.
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Molto vivace.
III. Waltz.
IV. March.

SVENDSEN,

"THE CARNIVAL AT PARIS," Episode for Full
Orchestra, op. 9.

SYMPHONY'S 16TH CONCERT OF SEASON

First Performance in Boston of Elgar's Symphony in A Flat Major.

Herald Feb. 28, 1909
By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, gave its 16th concert last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in A flat major.....Elgar
Serenade in F major, No. 2, for strings....Volkmann
Carnival at Paris.....Svendsen

Elgar's symphony was performed here for the first time. Produced at Manchester, Eng., Dec. 3 last, it has been played several times in London. The majority of the professional critics in that city are inclined to a belief in its immortality. Audiences applaud this music wildly. It looks as though, as far as Great Britain is concerned, Elgar's work will be among symphonies what "The Bohemian Girl" is among operas: the people's choice and favorite.

Early in January, Walter Damrosch produced the symphony in New York and prefaced the performance with an improving lecture, in which he endeavored to explain Sir Edward's "meaning," and he came to the conclusion that if Sir Edward did not have this or that purpose in his mind when he girded up his loins to compose the symphony he should have had the intentions Mr. Damrosch attributed to him. The New York newspapers, however, discussed the symphony as absolute music—that is to say, music without any program, without any inspiring ideas other than purely musical ones—and the critics praised Sir Edward as a serious person.

In England there were some that insisted on a program. There was a story that Elgar intended to portray in tones the career of "Chinese" Gordon. Some preferred to find in the music the story of man's struggle with his environment. The music critic of the Referee swore that Sir Edward told him the symphony showed a composer's view of life. As a man lives, so shall he write symphonies.

No argument, no interlinear translation would be of benefit to this music, which, as it stands, is absolute.

The English look upon Elgar as a great composer. They are impressed by his oratorio "The Dream of Gerontius" and by his march "Pomp and Circumstance." It would be hard to say which they admire the more. The latter is the more satisfactory work; it is honest, it reveals the composer as he really is, and it is much shorter.

Elgar suddenly became the fashion. There was an Elgar festival. There were Elgarian managers and press agents. The baptism of this symphony was loudly heralded. There is still an Elgar boom.

Yet this symphony is a disappointment to those who rubbed their eyes in wonderment, reading the dithyrambic articles published in London journals. It is not a disappointment to those who have suspected that Elgar, the composer of "Gerontius," "The Apostles" and "The Kingdom" was mortal. The symphony confirms their suspicions.

Elgar is certainly a man of parts. He has indisputable technical skill, and he can clothe a commonplace in a handsome orchestral dress. He can disguise a platitude so that it may at first be taken for sonorous eloquence. Occasionally he has a fine thought. Overjoyed by thought, he harms it by wearying development and elaboration.

The symphony begins with an introduction in which a theme, inherently suave, is fitfully made heroic, both in the introduction and later in the symphony. This theme in its sentiment is characteristically Elgarian: it has a certain sweetness, it is pleasingly melodic, but it has no marked distinction, and its beauty might be described as pinchbeck. The main body of the movement is of a restless nature, and it is supposed to depict life's struggle. The themes have little character. Their profile is faint, whether this one be strenuous, or that one of "sinister import."

The thematic development is crowded with detail, much of it uninteresting as far as any emotional, dramatic contents are concerned. Nor is there any true continuous development that takes the hearer with it to the conclusion of the matter. There is no irresistible flow. There are episodes galore; parentheses in parentheses. The repeated use of certain chords with harmonic progressions reminds the hearer of like passages in Puccini's "Tosca."

The Scherzo has a barbaric fury that makes an impression and the trio has measures of genuine beauty. The Scherzo and the Adagio are connected. Much has been made of the fact that the actual notes of the Scherzo theme are the same as those of the melody that opens the Adagio; but this in itself does not make a movement great. The Adagio has been described as "sublimely mystical." It is sublimely middle class. Its sentiment is of the sort that appeals at once to all that find delight in works of art like "The Railway Station" or the representation of Derby Day; to all that are filled with sacred emotion when they hear Mme. Clara Butt sing with the energy and conviction of her six feet and more the popular setting of music to "Abide with Me" with the accompaniment of piano-forte and cabinet organ. The workmanship displayed in this adagio is excellent; there are fine effects of euphony; but the musical thoughts themselves are for the most part conventional in sentiment; they are "middle class."

The finale with its apotheosis, which contains a glorification of the theme heard in the introduction, will inevitably excite applause. Yet there is a disturbing reminiscence of a familiar theme in "Aida" which enters before the apotheosis and is free used. Not that Sir Edward should be accused for a moment of plagiarism. Say rather that it is a case of the unconscious celebration to which many composers high above Elgar have been subject. There is also a fine Parsifallian flavor in certain pages of the symphony.

Mr. Fiedler had evidently studied the symphony carefully and he undoubtedly brought out all that therein is. The orchestra gave a brilliant performance and the applause that followed was unusually hearty and long continued.

How grateful was the little serenade by Volkmann that follows: It was comparatively unfamiliar, for it had not been played here at a Symphony concert for nearly 17 years. An unpretentious work, but it has charm and distinction; it is spontaneous. The waltz is delightful in its naivete, in its suggestion of open air dancing in the village.

Svendsen's "Carnival" is better known, and it might be described as the adventure of a bewildered and simple-minded Norwegian in Paris.

Offerings of the Past Week

Elgar's Symphony—Clara Sexton's

Recital—Tina Lerner—Other Soloists
Past Feb. 28, 1909

Two of the most important new orchestral works produced this season have been heard in Boston within the past three weeks—Paderewski's symphony and Sir Edward Elgar's composition in the same form, played yesterday evening and on Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

Both works represent first attempts in the symphonic field. Both were written after long deliberation, and at the maturity of their authors' powers. The one by a Pole, the other by an Englishman, we have in the first instance music that is highly romantic in form and substance, the last movement adhering strictly to a very definite programme; in the second a composition which follows freely, with modern modifications, the orthodox symphonic form. Yet Elgar's symphony, which should have its influence upon the makers of symphonies and symphonic poems, is more programme music in the highest sense of the word than Paderewski's.

Elgar evidently takes his stand with those who maintain that a stated programme only hampers a composer. Certainly it hampered Mr. Paderewski, who could not make his music match his ideas. But Sir Edward has encumbered himself to a scarcely lesser degree. Doubtless music to him is far more than a succession of sounds, and he has followed in the spirit, if not in the letter, a taxing programme of his own. So did Beethoven in his Fifth symphony. So did Brahms in his C minor symphony. But in the two latter cases the programme has its origin in the music; in the former the music owes its being to the programme. There is an adage which settles these vexed questions of esthetics as completely as they will ever be settled on this earth: the homely old phrase that defines the proof of the pudding. Does Strauss hit his mark with a symphonic poem? Does Elgar say his say in a symphony?

A lengthy programmatical explanation of the significant themes and their portent—presumably written with the knowledge and sanction of the composer—mixes up the well-intentioned hearer 50 times as much as the poem on the fly-leaf of the score of "Tod und Verklärung" or the captions in "Zarathustra." Elgar's themes, we gather from this programme and their self-evident character, represent God, the devil and a few intermediate things. The good finally triumphs.

The symphony is carefully and designedly constructed—carpentered might be a better word. Take the theme of the introduction, which dominates throughout. What a conscientious theme it is, how English in its religious respectability! How considerably broad, diatonic, capable of being inserted wherever and whenever it is needed by the composer. Then there is the "strenuous" theme in the remote key of D minor, and the "sinister" arpeggio figure. They all dovetail together.

The first movement is full of struggle. The scherzo might suggest to some Henley's "Let Us Be Drunk." Tschalkowsky said that most gigantically in the march movement of his sixth symphony. The nobility of the slow movement has been often remarked upon after other performances in other places. To me it is very anemic philosophy. The climax of the finale is at once impressive.

After single hearings of the two symphonies that we have been referring to—and such impressions are of far more value than certain deprecating persons would have us believe—it is our opinion that Elgar's work falls almost as short in the fulfilment of its purpose as does Paderewski's in another direction. Workmanship should always be but a means to an end. Elgar's obtrudes itself continually. You may listen to an epic by Strauss, and all that is requisite is a yielding to impressions, however complex the orchestra. But listen to this symphony, so full of counterpoint and material. The recurrent themes do not avail to concentrate the attention on the big lines of the work, and the vitality of the auditor is frittered away by enforced attention to themes and counter-themes. This is an important work, a very English work, but we do not now believe it will create for itself a permanent place in the orchestral repertoire any more than we consider it an adequate expression of the composer's conception.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans:

Elgar's Symphony for Its First Performance in Boston—A Contrast or Two with Mr. Paderewski's Symphony—Mr. Fiedler's Luminous and Stirring Performance—First Impressions of the Music—Its Dominant Masculinity

Two new symphonies by living composers within two weeks must be nearly "a record" at the Symphony Concerts. A fortnight ago Mr. Fiedler and his men played Mr. Paderewski's symphony for a first hearing anywhere. Yesterday afternoon they undertook Sir Edward Elgar's, for a first hearing in Boston. Neither symphony came unheralded, but announcement and summary were so brief as to Mr. Paderewski's that its first audience listened to it as a wholly new thing coming moment by moment into existence before its ears. Elgar's is only two months old, but since the first performances in Manchester and in London, last December, and in New York and Chicago last January, report has been diligent with it. The Britons, with their devout fidelity to the one distinguished English composer in two hundred years of sterility, have duly admonished us to expect a remarkable and impressive piece. New York and Chicago have been more doubtful on both scores. Prying analysts have exercised themselves plentifully upon Elgar's symphony and the humblest student or the laziest amateur may know what to expect of the music and where to expect it. The reviewers have been as energetic, and their impressions and opinions have filled many columns of the newspapers and the musical journals. As the event proved, the way had been too thoroughly made ready. There was no excitement in the air as there had been a fortnight ago, no buzz of eager comment in the intermission. Elgar, after all, was only a name on the programme with a reputation behind it. Mr. Paderewski had listened with his own ears alike to his music and to the applause of those that heard it. Thus Elgar's symphony was no more than a new and warmly discussed piece that was to be played for the first time in Boston. There was curiosity and interest, but no more than is becoming to such an occasion. The applause was hardly such, and the elect ladies of Friday afternoon received the new symphony of yesterday much more tepidly than they had that of a fortnight before. The Britons have their excitement of Elgar. The remote Bostonians take him as all in the musical business of the day.

The symphony and the performance as well deserved a more eager and a heartier reward. It is music of large outline filled with suggestive or only intricate detail. It needs the clearest of exposition and adjustment; and it asks, equally, sustained largeness and vigor of utterance and on occasion an ample and exalted eloquence. Often it is music of thought, even of calculation. At its best the calculation disappears; the thought warms into emotion; and idea and emotion translate themselves into music that engrosses and stirs those that hear. Mr. Fiedler so understood the symphony, and so, with his men, brought to hearing. He kept its largeness of design; he made clear the musical thought and the development even when the one was most concentrated and the other most intricate; he set details in their place. Thus he read the symphony luminously, with proportioning mind and hand. He read it no less with imaginative understanding and emotional response. He gave the scherzo its resonant vigor, its abrupt energy. He carried higher and higher the austere passionate song of the slow movement. He was eloquent in the large measures with which the symphony begins to the proclaiming of the melody of strength and aspiration that runs through the music and binds it together. He was no less eloquent in the exaltation of masculine fortitude and victory with which the symphony ends. Throughout he seemed to give the music its true, vital, revealing voice. Plainly it stirred him, and when Mr. Fiedler is himself stirred, the better, in spite of Coquelin's maxim to the contrary, is his performance.

Elgar is lengthy, as the way of composers is nowadays; his symphony runs a full fifty minutes; but it seemed yesterday by no means so exhausting to the hearer's attention as did Mr. Paderewski's. The introduction, with its proclamation of the theme of fortitude and aspiration, is relatively short. It disclosed only the pervading and the ultimately triumphant idea of the music. A first movement, that is not short, ensues, music of conflict on its imaginative side, music of reflection, often, in its structural aspect. In the fashion of the day, Elgar is fain to exhaust his themes; to leave nothing unsaid, to ply the resources of instrumental coloring that the modern orchestra affords. There is plentiful music of thought and reflection in this first movement; there is calculated music-making as well; but often feeling vitalizes the thought and the music has imaginative cast and emotional appeal. Melodies do battle as men battle for their ideals. The following scherzo runs with robust but continent vigor and with abrupt energy. Throughout it is fully masculine music of the joy seemingly of the joy of strength and of its ordered play. Then comes the technical feat with which Elgar has seemingly delighted the slow-uttered Britons. The theme of the scherzo and the theme of the adagio are identical note for note. The scherzo dies; the adagio uses from it, but the change of key, rhythm, mood and handling has altogether altered the aspect of the music. This slow movement again is singularly and gratefully masculine music alike in its reticence and in its intensity. Plainly it is the voice of a man contemplating in the secret places of mind and heart the ideal that he seeks and cherishes. The song rises in aspiration and devotion to a serene close. There is pause, and the finale allegro returns to the mood in which the symphony began. Again, there is contest, but now to victory; the theme of the introduction—the theme as it seems of fortitude and strung more and more asserts itself. The music passes from energy to eloquence; eloquence to exaltation; and the final measures are as puissant as those with which the symphony began. So much for first impressions, and such masculine music, such music that at its best stirs the emotions and yet makes no direct sensual appeal, is rare in our time. One of the London wits, who heard the symphony, came back to his club to say that the world of Elgar's imagination is plainly a world in which there are no women, but only a man's life and a man's ideals. It is, if his symphony speaks for him. H. T. P.

Elgar's Symphony Pleases Boston Audience

Another new symphony was on the Symphony program Saturday night, this time a work by Sir Edward Elgar, which was first performed in Manchester, England, three months ago. There was extraordinary excitement in London over this symphony. It had five performances in as many weeks. Saturday night it was warmly, if not rapturously, received by a Boston audience; and, as usual, the manner of the performance was partly the reason for the prolonged applause after the final movement. The applause lasted until the orchestra made its acknowledgments. It was the same when the new Paderewski symphony had its performance two weeks before. As Paderewski said, these Boston musicians are extremely fine performers, and these Boston audiences are extremely discriminating.

The symphony itself is at times disappointing, at times very impressive. Clear expression alternates with indistinct musing. The first and principal theme recurs so often that the whole piece might be described as a line upon which the composer has hung some emotional odds and ends, for there are many detached themes that seemingly have little or nothing to do with the main idea. Nor is there any marked originality of expression. Lovers of Wagner and Strauss both found much to enjoy in the work. In fact, the symphony is strongly tinged with reminiscences. Yet the thoughts, such as they are, have been presented with masterly skill. There is much in the work to make it popular. Mr. Fiedler conducted with almost affectionate care and enthusiasm.

Robert Volkmann's serenade for strings, in F major, was played by the orchestra for the first time in nearly seventeen years. It had, therefore, all the attractiveness of a novelty. The performance of it was delightful. The last number on the program was Svendsen's "Carnival at Paris" overture.

Elgar's new symphony has been performed in New York and some of the critics argue because it is eminently serious it must therefore be great. The statement has been made that in London this symphony excited admiration and there was not one dissenting voice. The latter part of the statement is not true. The critic of the Pall Mall Gazette heard the symphony a second time and he wrote (Dec. 21): "It still seems lacking in the finer qualities of symphonic writing. Interesting development of theme, and conciseness and clearness of form. But there is another reason, which increased familiarity has brought to light, why much of the music hangs fire and gives the feeling of being overlengthy, and that is the unvital character of some of the themes employed. The composer has, we think, expended a vast amount of masterly ingenuity over material which, at bottom, is really rather thin and approaching the commonplace. With the exception of the 'Nobilmente' theme, the general character of both first and last movements seems labored in expression and uninspired. While wishing for a little compression, we, however, readily acknowledge the beauty of the slow movement, especially the closing section, which must undoubtedly rank high as a piece of very genuine poetic writing."

And the London correspondent of the Glasgow Herald wrote: "It cannot be said that the symphony proves more interesting after several hearings. The work is too long and spun out and the treatment of themes, if ingenious enough, is scrappy. Each movement gives one the impression of suspended inspiration. It is quite possible that Mr. Wood and the composer, who conduct the next performance of the symphony in London, will give a different complexion to much of the music. There certainly should be more emotional wildness than Richter reads into the score."

NOISY SYMPHONY NUMBER. Elgar's Heavy, Rumbling Music Feature of Last Night's Program.

The Symphony Orchestra at its concert last night played the heavy, rumbling, important new symphony in A flat by Elgar. Volkmann's pretty, delicate "Serenade for Strings," and Svendsen's brilliant glittering piece of orchestral fantasies, "The Carnival at Paris."

The chief interest centered, of course, in the new symphony which Mr. Fiedler was fortunate enough to present at this early time. It is an interesting, but seldom melodious musical structure. There is a story, but it loses itself in harsh soundings from the brasses and too frequent rumbling of drums. One feels as the orchestra plays that one is listening to a most important, but certainly most noisy piece of music.

Mr. Fiedler gave on last night's programme, following the symphony, two delightful pieces of music. The "Serenade" and the piece of Svendsen are both gay, humorous, tuneful, pleasing.

Boston Audience Hears Elgar's Symphony For The First Time

Hall Is Crowded for the Sixteenth Rehearsal Given by Symphony Orchestra, the Attendance Including a Large Number of Society Women.

Journal Feb. 27, 1909

For the sixteenth Symphony rehearsal there was a full house to enjoy Elgar's symphony, given here for the first time. Willy Hess, the concertmaster, was missing owing to sudden family bereavement.

Seen in the throng were Mrs. Elmer J. Bliss, Mrs. Arthur Astor Carey, Mrs. Edwin Upton Curtis, Mary Vaughan, Henrietta Sowle, Mrs. John L. Gardner, Mrs. Winthrop Sargent, wearing a dark gray gown and black hat trimmed with green; Mrs. John Bigelow, Jr., in brown broadcloth and fetching furs; Mrs. T. P. Gooding, Arthur Foote and daughter Katherine, Mr. and Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, George W. Chadwick, Mrs. Neal Rantoul and daughter, Mrs. George Shattuck, Mrs. George Cushing, Alice Stackpole, Julia Coolidge, Mrs. John L. Thorndike, Ethel Fay, Leslie Appleton Knowles, Mrs. Roger Wolcott, Mr. and Mrs. John D. Long, Mrs. S. Reed Anthony, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mrs. William Lindsey, Mrs. Francis H. Appleton and daughter, Mrs. Mason Hamlin, Mrs. William P. Fay, Mrs. J. Reed Whipple, Mrs. George Mumford, Mrs. Weeks, Miss Helen B. MacNichol, Mrs. Edgar Champlin, Mrs. Martha Dana Shepard, Mrs. B. F. Bates, Alice Bradford, Mrs. Stanley P. McCormick, in wine-colored broadcloth, Mrs. J. M. Stevens, Mrs. George Bradford and many more.

ELGAR'S NEW SYMPHONY

Post By Olin Downes Feb. 27 '09

Edward Elgar's symphony, so mightily and lengthily heralded from England and New York, was played for the first time in Boston yesterday afternoon at the 16th public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall.

The work was first given at Manchester, England, on Dec. 3 last. It was played in London on the 7th. In England it was played five times in as many weeks.

Four movements follow freely the accepted canons of symphony making, but after the fashion of the moderns the composer uses significant themes, which predominate throughout. He has emphatically stated that the work lacks a "programme" of any kind, yet the news has gone round—it is borne out by the music—that Sir Elgar speaks in tones of what may be called the battle of life, the conflict of the real and the ideal, the ultimate triumph of the soul.

The analysis quoted in the programme book, the pigeon-holing of the themes, is twice as mixing as any printed programme of the Strauss sort could possibly be. Away with programmes and analysis! Have we great, potential music?

The symphony is very thick and full of workmanship. It would be possible to call it abstruse and didactic and other things, but we remember our first impressions of Brahms' epic in C minor, and we hold our peace for the time being. Great moments that immediately strike one are the rather conscious introduction and the final pages of the opening movement, the first section of scherzo, the last pages of the concluding movement. Obviously, Sir Elgar has worked hard over his symphony.

Volkmann's Serenade for strings in F and Svendsen's brilliant orchestral episode, "The Carnival at Paris," filled out the programme. Of the serenade the humorous "molto vivace," with its poignant effects, is the most entertaining. Svendsen's work was given an electric performance.

ELGAR CONDUCTS SYMPHONY.

Ever Since Its First Production the Enthusiasm Has Grown.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Jan. 2.—Sir Edward Elgar conducted a performance of his new "Symphony in A Flat" at Queen's Hall yesterday. This is the first time that the composer himself has wielded the baton at a presentation of his latest work, and the occasion carried what may be called "the Elgar boom" to the zenith.

Ever since the production of the symphony a few weeks ago the demand for a fresh hearing has grown with every performance, and the enthusiasm of the audiences knows no bounds.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Elgar Symphony First Time Here.

Tonight's Concert for Benefit of the Pension Fund.

Miss Hunt's Recital—Other Events of Interest.

Globe Feb. 28, 1909

Edward Elgar's new symphony, which was first produced in Manchester, Eng., in December, and has been played in New York and Chicago, was given its first performance here at the Symphony rehearsal last Friday afternoon and repeated last night. No work of recent years has been more generally commended by English critics, although there has been the usual divergence in opinion in some quarters, and in this country approval has not been quite so widespread as it was among the composer's fellow countrymen. It is Sir Edward's first composition in symphonic form, and it runs about 50 minutes.

The performance was one of the notable events of the musical season and, following so closely upon the "first time" of Paderewski's new symphony the week previous, one had an excellent chance to compare the works of the Englishman and the Polish composer. Mr. Fiedler certainly is providing plenty of novelties on his programs and affording opportunities for discussion and criticism of works of importance and interest.

And the best of it is that he is not circumscribed in his tastes, but is disposed to know no particular man or country if the composition possesses merit sufficiently worthy a trial.

Elgar has refuted several rumors as to the meaning of his tone pictures, saying the symphony is to be considered as absolute music. He has supplied no program and so the symbolic significance is left to conjecture. The plan and development suggest the life of a hero, the musical ideas being promulgated in such forms as to introduce a marital element throughout the four movements. There is a decided inclination to overelaboration in several parts of the score, this proclivity giving a clouded effect to the orchestration.

The work opens with an andante, noble and simple, and retains its truly melodic form until the principal theme has been repeated at some length in a full orchestration. Then comes the modern chromatic deviations with a frequent return to the first theme variously announced by accentuations and diminuendos in heavy strings and soft brasses. A sonorous climax of this subject follows leading up to some wierd arpeggios and finally dying away in a quiet pianissimo. The movement, though turbulent, does not show the influence of ultra-modern composers in its orchestration, Elgar's style being pretty well defined in his scoring.

In this supposed "allegory of life" he has knit the four parts together by utilizing melodic phrases in different ways and transferring them through the whole scheme. The second and third movements are practically one, and the rush of the scherzo and tender melody of the following adagio through to the majestic finale there is ever recurring hints of some theme heard in different form earlier in the work.

The mastery of orchestra effects shows the composer to be almost austere in his style, yet cognizant of the resources of the present-day orchestra and able to express them forcefully in his own way. It is a big work; a composition for those who judge music seriously and reverently and are not inclined to flippant and ephemeral scores.

The lack of well defined harmonies will prevent the symphony from being classed as popular, but its fine qualities are too apparent to be weighed and criticised justly on brief acquaintance. The interpretation was all that could be desired.

Volkman's serenade for string orchestra, the second program number, consists of four movements typified as minuet, rondo, waltz and march, although the latter might be a galop according to the syncopation. They are clever little dance episodes, which gave the orchestra chances to display its ability in depicting the joyous moods of the composer in delicate and characteristic dance rhythm. The program closed with Svendsen's musical tumult, "The Carnival at Paris." Here was another piece strongly in contrast with the preceding ones and which received due consideration in the matter of fortissimo passages, with the lighter episodes as carefully and skilfully set forth.

Berta Morena of the Metropolitan opera house will be the soloist this week. She will sing the aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's "Oberon," and three songs with piano, Wagner's "Traume" and "Schmerzen," and Richard Strauss' "Heimliche Auforderung." The symphony will be Berlioz' "Fantastic," which has not been heard at the Symphony concerts for several years and has not been played in Boston since Mr. Weingartner conducted it with the New York Symphony orchestra three years ago. Mr. Fiedler will add two other orchestral numbers, which will be announced later.

Monitor-ELGAR'S SYMPHONY. Mel. 1909.
IN Symphony Hall Saturday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, gave the following program: Elgar, Symphony in A-flat major, op. 55—I. Andante nobilmente e semplice; Allegro; II. Allegro molto; III. Adagio; IV. Lento: Allegro (first time in Boston). Volkman, Serenade for string orchestra, F major, op. 63. Svendsen. "The Carnival at Paris," Episode for full orchestra, op. 9.

Elgar's symphony is the best answer that could be desired to the question as to what is required to make a piece of music national. In this work there are no English tunes; there is no trying to build it on a historic foundation of any kind; the composer has simply founded the symphony upon himself and built it out of his own orchestral experience; the music is the voice of the same Elgar who was heard to speak in the London overture; he builds larger now, but he is the same architect. He is an Englishman and a remarkable musician; therefore the symphony is English and is a remarkable symphony. The structure of the first movement is solid and its outlines are rude; its loud choruses from the brass instruments, its voluminous tone from the strings, and the unimportant support from the wood wind choirs, mark it as Norman. The third, the slow movement, while not aspiring to the greatest heights of idealism and not sounding the profoundest depths of emotional experience, nevertheless recognizes the gentler purposes of human life and partakes of the Gothic.

Many symphonies sound as though they were composed at the piano; much of Elgar's symphony sounds as though it was composed at the organ. At the beginning of the first movement the gentle stir of the lower stringed instruments is like an organist's prelude; the adagio is full of organ passages, and it ends avowedly according to a church formula. There is little real orchestral character to the tone coloring; occasionally the oboe or clarinet or flute is heard as a solo voice, but the combination of the wood instruments into rich color masses is not much indulged in.

If Elgar has no great ingenuity in his management of the wood wind department of the orchestra, he is a master of the strings. An orchestra with a less competent band of string players than those heard Saturday evening might make poor work of this symphony; almost any orchestra could make the loud brass passages sound well and an indifferent wood wind section would not be likely to spoil the performance; but without a violin department of the first rank, Elgar's symphony would not be done justice. At times the second violinists are more important than the first, and in certain places the viola players are in the lead. After this music the serenade of Volkman, played wholly by stringed orchestra, told little about contrasted effects of the violin masses which had not already been told by Elgar.

As for pictures of England in the symphony, there seem to be none describing the open air, rural England. The scherzo is full of sport, but it is fun amid the noise of the town, it is not the play of village folk. In the midst of the scherzo there is a lull in the clatter and the gossip and the wood winds speak as expressively as they do anywhere in the symphony. At the noise and bustle of the streets is soon heard again, and Elgar of the London overture asserts himself. The scherzo is full of genuine humor and is Elgar with his scholarship flung aside, speaking his own thoughts as an everyday man. Critics have praised the adagio and they have praised the composer's treatment of the dignified main theme which is heard at the first and at the last of the work; but those parts of the symphony reveal only Elgar the self-conscious musician; the scherzo reveals Elgar himself.

The leading theme, which everybody admits is justly designated by the composer as noble, does not sound like a sudden inspiration; it is so well suited to treatment both by stringed instruments and by brass, that it must have cost the composer much thought in its invention. Much thought, too, must have been given to its treatment with reference to the climax of the symphony, which happily comes not somewhere in the middle but at the very close. This theme is the chief unifying principle of the structure; the side walls, as it were, are built of it and they are so massive that the edifice is sure to stand.

SYMPHONY HALL

SUNDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 28, 1909

AT EIGHT

CONCERT

BY THE

Boston
Symphony Orchestra

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

IN AID OF ITS

PENSION FUND

Dr. LUDWIG WÜLLNER, Assisting

PROGRAMME

Richard Strauss Tone Poem, "Ein Heldenleben," Op. 40

Schubert. Songs with pianoforte

(a) Der Wanderer

(b) Der Doppelgänger

(c) Erlkönig

Recitation of Wildenbruch's Poem, "Hexenlied" (Witch's Song) by Dr. LUDWIG WÜLLNER, with the accompaniment of Max Schillings' music for orchestra.

Accompanist, COENRAD v. BOS

THE PIANO IS A CHICKERING

DR. WUELLNER RECITES "THE SONG OF THE WITCH"

Trans. Mel. 1. 1909
Wildenbruch's Poem and Schillings' Music—One More Attempt to Yoke the Orchestra and the Speaking Voice—Its Comparative Failure—Mr. Hammerstein

"The Song of the Witch"—in Wildenbruch's narrative poem and Schillings' "musical accompaniment"—has made more stir in the world than its intrinsic interest and importance warrant. German audiences have listened patiently, perhaps admiringly, to it; Dr. Wüllner has declaimed it whenever there was an orchestra and opportunity; while here in Boston the ambitious Mr. Bispham has urged the Symphony Concerts to put it and him on its programme. Dark rumor has whispered that the poem and the music were unusual and impressive and that the reciter had rich range for his histrionic gifts. With curiosity thus whetted, and with the prestige of Dr. Wüllner to aid, "The Song of the Witch" was duly performed at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra last night for its Pension Fund. The poem, which has no very obvious distinction in the original German—and still less in the English translation that accompanied it in the programme—is half versified Byronic romance and half the thick and fleshly mysticism that often exercises the German imagination. An old monk, who has dwelt fifty years in his priory in exemplary odor of sanctity, lies on his death bed. Out of his cell to the astounded ears of his praying brothers rises a song of the joys and passions of earthly love. They speed to his pallet to exorcise the evil spirit. The dying Medardus stays them, finds voice, and tells his tale: how as a young priest he had gone to shrive a condemned witch; how her beauty—for she was young and fair—had stirred him and how her passion for life—for life was sweet to her—had warmed him. She had entreated him, cajoled him, told him of her weird and wondrous love song, almost persuaded him to flee with her to life and love and solitude in the forest. A staying hand and a condemning voice out of the darkness had withheld him. Next day the witch was burned, and as the monk held the crucifix before her, she had raised her song. He had fled, but through all his life it had haunted him. He hears it now; it calls and calls him; he goes to her; for she was the innocent, and he the guilty. Medardus dies. His brethren judge not, but pray.

The "musical accompaniment" that Max Schillings has written for the tale and the verses is no more than incidental music. It begins in comparatively few measures of preluding. It ends in as brief an orchestral epilogue. Here and there, when the declaimer pauses in the narrative, the orchestra would enforce the mood of the verse, the suggestion of the instant or the passion of the spoken word. Rarely it seeks to speak the emotions of the stirred and sympathetic listener. Surprisingly seldom, too, does the orchestra actually accompany the declaimer, and then, oftenest, to carry the magical song of the witch. Wildenbruch sprinkles it with descriptive adjectives. It must be "sad," "sweet," "weird," of distant lands, of haunting passion, of whatever the necessities of the poem ask. The voice of the reciter emphasizes the adjectives of the poet, and the poor composer must find a melody to match and even surpass them. Schillings has invention and imagination, but clearly they stirred not at the call of Wildenbruch's verse. The English horn and the first violoncello sing the song of the witch; it comes, it goes, it is wrought into sundry orchestral continuations; but nowhere does it touch, much less haunt, the imagination. Better Wildenbruch's adjectives than Schillings's tones. It is possible to believe the words; in the music is neither fascination nor power.

Throughout the listener heard the verses, for they were engrossing in Dr. Wüllner's declamation; he barely heard the music, and then only as the merest incidental voice. In the pitch and the adjustment of his tones, especially when they were to lead into the music or when it closely accompanied them, Dr. Wüllner was indeed artful and adroit, but often he could, and did, go his way independently. His declamation of the poem, too, was curiously disappointing. In the songs that preceded it—Schubert's "Der Wanderer," "Der Doppelgänger" and "Erl-King," and Strauss's "Cécille"—he had sung in his peculiar musical speech with delineative power, with eloquence of passion, with commanding and absorbing impartment of mood and emotion. In "The Song of the Witch" he was only the accomplished actor, the practised master of fiction, mindful of rhythm, potent and vivid now and then of tone or accent, in genius in climax, but persistently reticent and discreet. The impression was of admirable contrivance and skilled artistry, rather than of any unusual means, power and individuality. In a word, Dr. Wüllner needs the exalted speech of music. He is an actor in musical tones rather than in spoken words.

After all, an orchestra is an orchestra, and a speaking voice is a speaking voice, and never the twain shall meet, unless in some rare exception and achievement like the dialogue of the old peasants to Bizet's music in "L'Arlésienne." What Richard Strauss has hardly done in his music to "Enoch Arden"—and that too for piano—Schillings could not do in his accompaniment to "The Song of the Witch." He has written his prelude, his postlude and his interludes and in them his music has passing interest and significance; but when he would blend the declaimer's voice with the commenting and enhancing orchestra, he fails, albeit with Dr. Wüllner's sensitive and practised tones to aid him. He has written incidental music and not the ideal "melodrama" that is half spoken and half orchestral tone. Only Bizet has done that. As Dr. Wüllner was best by himself in his songs, so was the orchestra best by itself in Strauss's "A Hero's Life." Of the music enough has already been said this winter in this place. The performance, with that of "Zarathustra," is the most puissant and masterful, the most commanding and compelling of all Mr. Fiedler's conducting here. It was good last night to see a large audience engrossed by the substance of Strauss's music, thrilled by its power, and alert to every change in its matter and manner. It speaks, and speaks irresistibly, to a wider and wider public that better and better grasps its weight of substance and more and more yields to its delineative and emotional power. It was as good to hear it reward orchestra and conductor for a performance that neither hesitated—and in face of what difficulties—nor flagged to what demands for insistent and varied intensity.

H. T. P.

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

Dr. Wuellner Recites Wildenbruch's Poem, "The Witch's Song."

Herald Mel. 1. 1909
By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, gave a concert in aid of its pension fund, last night, in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Strauss' tone poem, "Eln Heldenleben"; Schubert, "Der Wanderer," "Der Doppelgänger," "Erlkönig," sung by Dr. Wuellner, with piano accompaniment played by Coenrad V. Bos; a recitation by Dr. Wuellner of Wildenbruch's poem, "Das Hexenlied" ("The Witch's Song"), with the accompaniment of Max Schillings' music for orchestra. There was a large and deeply interested audience.

Strauss' tone poem, "A Hero's Life," was played recently in a Symphony concert, and it is unnecessary to discuss again at length the character of the work. As before, however, the first section, the love music, and the finale seemed the most beautiful and the most impressive portions of the tone poem. The section in which the hero is mocked by his foes is amusing, but the battle scene, in spite of the din, last night seemed inherently tame, and the weakest part. The performance was loudly applauded.

Dr. Wuellner again interpreted the songs of Schubert in his intensely dramatic manner, and was obliged to add Strauss' "Cécille" in response to the enthusiastic applause.

"The Witch's Song," by the late Ernst von Wildenbruch, was recited for the first time in Boston with Schillings' music. Recitation with music, whether the latter be for piano or orchestra, whether the declamation be in conventional form or the cantillation that for a time engrossed Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies, is an inferior species of dramatic entertainment. If the music is dramatic and accompanying, then the attention is easily diverted from the reciter. If the music is less in evidence, it is practically unheard in the endeavor to listen to the human voice. In either case the reciter or the composer suffers, as long as the music is heard with the recitation. Yet music may serve in supplying a prelude, to put the hearer in a sympathetic mood; in furnishing interludes, which may emphasize that which has just been spoken, or prepare the hearer for a change in poetic sentiment; in adding a postlude that may continue the poetically dramatic or contemplative thought after the speaker is through.

Schillings has been discreet in his treatment of the orchestra and has respected the reciter. Richard Strauss in his piano music for "Enoch Arden" also has regard for the elocutionist, but his musical illustration and italicization have more character. There are a few impressive pages in Schillings' music, as in the prelude and in the orchestral burst of lamentation after the monk, fearing the young woman's kisses, refuses to confess her; but as a whole the poem, which is itself melodramatic, does not gain in effect by the musical commentary.

In reciting to music, the elocutionist must consider to a certain degree the tonality and the harmonic construction or there may easily be a disturbing variance between the spoken tones and the music. Dr. Wuellner, an actor in song, avoided pitfalls, and by his marked individuality put the music in the background so effectually that it seemed of little moment. His performance was interesting, but he is more effective when he is dramatic in song after his own and striking manner. The hearer could not refrain from wishing that either he would sing this witch's song, "so weird, so sad and so sweet," or that Schillings had been more successful in imagining the song for the orchestra. The song haunted the monk for 50 years. Schillings' melody was forgotten as soon as it was heard.

Healed Pension Fund Concert.

Tonight brings the second of the benefit concerts which the Symphony orchestra gives each season in aid of its pension fund. The program should be of much interest to all lovers of music, for it presents Max Schillings' musical setting of Ernst Wildenbruch's "Hexenlied." Dr. Ludwig Wuellner will recite the poem.

Schillings' work as a composer is not unknown here, for his music has appeared often on Symphony programs. He is one of the most brilliant of the younger school of German composers and is now conductor of the opera in Stuttgart, where he succeeded Karl Pohlig, the present conductor of the Philadelphia orchestra. He has undertaken to treat Wildenbruch's poem for orchestra much after the same fashion as Richard Strauss treated Tennyson's "Enoch Arden" for piano. In other words, he seeks with music to establish the moods of the poem and interpret the emotions displayed therein. The poem, with its music, has been given in this country several times by Dr. Wuellner with great success.

Ernst von Wildenbruch, the author of the poem, died at the age of 63 last January at Berlin. He was regarded as one of the chief contemporary German poets, and at one time, in the Emperor's opinion, he was held to be the greatest of modern German dramatists. Wildenbruch was an offspring of the house of Hohenzollern. His great-grandfather was Prince Louis Ferdinand of Prussia, who was killed in the battle of Salfeld in 1806. He left two children whose mother was the daughter of a shopkeeper. These children were afterwards adopted by Prince Louis' sister and later ennobled by King Frederick William III. One of them became known as Gen. Louis von Wildenbruch, and he was the grandfather of the poet.

The poem is a highly colored dramatic work, romantic in character. It relates the dying confession of an aged monk, who tells how when a youth he had been sent to confess a young witch condemned to death by fire and how he refused her plea of mercy and rescue. Since that time he had spent his whole life in repentance and in devotion to the memory of the girl whom he believed to be innocent. Ever present with him had been the song that she had sung to him—"The Witch's Song"—which gives the title to the poem.

Much may be expected of Dr. Wuellner's reading of the poem, for he is no less noted as a reader than he is as a singer of songs, and before he made music his specialty he was one of the leading actors of Germany. He will also sing with piano three Schubert songs, "Der Wanderer," "Der Doppelgaenger" and "Erlkoenig."

In response to many requests from patrons of the Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler has placed on the program Richard Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben," which was played at the seventh concert and was one of the most brilliant achievements of the season. The "Heldenleben" will be the first on the program, then will come the songs, and finally the "Hexenlied." The concert will begin promptly at 8 o'clock.

SECOND PENSION FUND CONCERT

Tomorrow night brings the second of the benefit concerts which the Symphony Orchestra gives each season in aid of its pension fund. The program which has been arranged, while of rather serious nature, is one which should be of utmost interest to all lovers of music, especially as it presents one of the most important novelties of the season—Max Schillings' musical setting of Ernst von Wildenbruch's "Hexenlied," with Dr. Ludwig Wuellner as the reciter of the poem.

Much may be expected of Dr. Wuellner's reading of the poem for he is no less noted as a reader than as a singer of songs, and before he made music his specialty he was one of the leading actors of Germany. He will also sing with piano three Schubert songs—"Der Wanderer," "Der Doppelgaenger," and "Erlkoenig."

In response to many requests from patrons of the orchestra Mr. Fiedler has placed on the program Richard Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben," which was played at the seventh concert and was one of the most brilliant achievements of the season.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

XVII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 6, AT 8, P. M.

Programme

BERLIOZ,

FANTASTIC SYMPHONY, No. 1, in C major, op. 16A.

I. DREAMS, PASSIONS. Largo: Allegro agitato e appassionato assai.

II. A BALL. Waltz: Allegro non troppo.

III. SCENE IN THE FIELDS. Adagio.

IV. MARCH TO THE SCAFFOLD. Allegretto non troppo.

V. DREAM OF A SABBAT. Larghetto; Allegro.

WEBER,

SCENE AND ARIA, "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster," from "Oberon," (Act II, No. 13.)

SCHUBERT,

ENTR'ACTE, No. 2, in B flat major, from the music to the romantic Drama, "Rosamunde, Princess of Cyprus."

SONGS with PIANOFORTE.

a) WAGNER,

"Dreams."

b) WAGNER,

"Pains."

c) RICHARD STRAUSS,

"Secret Invitation," op. 27, No. 3.

Soloist:

Mme. BERTA MORENA.

Of the Metropolitan Opera House.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

BERTA MORENA
OF THE METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE

MISS MORENA SINGS WITH THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Limitation of Time That Hampered Mr. Fiedler in His Programme—The Changed, and Now Established, Policy with "Soloists," and the Results That Have Justified It—The Personal Charm of Miss Morena—The Qualities of Her Singing—An Air of Weber That Has Aged and Songs by Wagner and Strauss—Mrs. Hall's Concert of Woollett's Music

Trans. M. 6. 1909
Symphony Concert

A symphony and a singer virtually divided the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon and gave its programme a peculiar cast. Mr. Fiedler, and rightly, loves not the limit of ninety minutes—less ten for an intermission—that rule and custom impose upon the concerts. The symphony happened to be Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," five movements and fifty minutes long. Ten minutes more fell to the intermission, and thus Mr. Fiedler had only half an hour for the rest of the concert. The singer, Miss Morena of the Metropolitan Opera House, must needs sing twice, and have breathing time between her pieces. Accordingly Mr. Fiedler slipped the longest intermezzo from Schubert's music to "Rosamünde" between the air from "Oberon" and the songs of Wagner and Strauss that Miss Morena sang. Thus the concert ended—or rather stopped—with Strauss's "Heimliche Aufforderung," music that vanishes into the thin air of voluptuous ecstasy. Mr. Fiedler is singularly skilful in the designing of his programmes, and whenever the arbitrary limit of time has not hampered him, they have had scope, contrast, and proportion. He knew, quite as well as any of his listeners, that an overture—"a brilliant overture" as the phrase goes—would have becomingly ended the concert; but to put it on the programme would have kept the audience in its seats for an hour and three-quarters. No one wishes to see the Symphony Concert attain the heavenly lengths that audiences endure cheerfully in English or in German cities. Yet to listen to music for two hours when the programme is duly diversified, and when there is a quarter of an hour, as it often is, of intermission, lays no great strain upon the attention and the finer receptive qualities of an audience. The season through, the public of the concerts has been praising Mr. Fiedler's programmes. Yet that same public accepts the custom that limits him to an hour and a half, or a little more, and constrains him to such an abnormal arrangement as that of yesterday, or such a misshapen list as that for next week when a lengthy symphony and a concerto for violoncello will make the programme. Mr. Fiedler, as his programme-making shows, is a man to improve and not abuse the freedom of an additional quarter hour. Moreover, as some cynics of the clubs say, the limitation to an hour and a half really originated in the desire of one of the earlier conductors to be home early.

Miss Morena, the last of the singers at the concerts this season, once more justified the restriction of "soloists" to artists of rank. Under it there are fewer singers and virtuosi than there used to be, but when they do come, they come to eager curiosity and appreciative interest. When some violinist was momentarily lifted from the ranks of the orchestra to be the "soloist" of the day, when some mediocre pianist made his way through a concerto, when some singer sang as the orchestra would never be permitted to play, they came and went oftenest as so much routine. The audience took them for granted or resigned itself to the tedium of their performances. It was time to raise the standard of the "assisting artists" to that of the orchestra which in theory they were assisting. The Symphony Orchestra is a band of the first rank and its conductor makes its programmes accordingly. Its "soloists" should be chosen by like principle and standards, and the coming of each, from the merit and the individuality of the singer or the virtuoso, should be a little event in its kind. Moreover, the public of the concerts was becoming too sophisticated, too familiar with eminent singers and distinguished pianists and violinists to care for the rank and file. The change of policy with the "soloists" has now continued for nearly three seasons, and it has justified itself at every turn. It has raised the standard of the concerts until no series in the country matches them in the quality of the "assistance" as well as in the quality of the orchestra. The mutterings of the neglected have died away; and the audiences come more eagerly to the soloists because they are at once fewer and more notable. So long as the two opera houses flourish in New York there will be no lack of distinguished singers, and the flocking virtuosi are as regular as the birds of autumn.

Miss Morena, hatless and gloveless, all in black velvet a little relieved by silver and by the gleaming white of her own throat and arms, looked as though she had stepped out of a portrait by Lenbach, from whom indeed she learned much of the artistry of costume and pose that distinguished her when she impersonated Sieglinde in "Die Walküre" at the Boston Theatre. Then she was a figure of beauty that kindled and held the imagination, and yesterday in her own person she was comely and, as the French say, troubling, in a beauty that has the clearness and the firmness of the north and yet something of the warmth and richness of the south. Her voice, too, was warmer and fuller, more capable of sustained tone and of varied and deeper expression than it was a year ago. Then she struggled with depression of body and mind. Now she has regained spirit, strength and elasticity, and this new vitality told in her singing. Perhaps she began with "Ocean Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's "Oberon" because it is a conventional show-piece of German and many other concert rooms. Conventional it certainly is in its alternation of fast and slow, broad and fiery, contemplative and impassioned passages. Its form is hidebound and in these days of "free lyric declamation" tends to become more and more antiquated. Usually, however, Weber has contrived to fill this form with music that compasses mood, that speaks with genuine and stirring emotional speech and dramatizing accent. His powers were failing when he wrote "Oberon," and this air of the ocean put side by side with Agatha's rhapsody in her chamber in "Der Freischütz"—a piece as conventional of form—is clear and curious proof of this dwindling in imagination and fire. The music from "Oberon" brings no picture of Huon's storm-tossed ship, and bears little to the hearer of the swift and changeable emotions of his gazing and fearful mistresses. It begins and it ends as a show-piece and by so much served to disclose Miss Morena's skill in the art of song, her technical surety and the warmth and the beauty of her tones. At their highest, they are perhaps a little shrill, and now and then she reached for a note, but some of the intervals in this air of Ocean are reckless and exacting enough to be modern.

In the three songs that ended the concert—Wagner's "Träume" and "Schmerzen" and Richard Strauss's "Heimliche Aufforderung"—Miss Morena discloses finer and more individual qualities of imagination and expression. "Träume" may pass for the "study" for "Tristan" that the commentators and even Wagner himself called it. He cherished it, however, none the less, and now after fifty years and when the music of "Tristan" is much the more familiar, it remains a truly beautiful expression of intense and rapturous longing. Its very reticence makes the intensity the more interesting. Writing for the stage, he rightly took thought of his audience, would have his music tell. "Träume" he wrote rather for himself and for the woman whose verses suggested it, and thus he made it intimate music. Yet the operatic note in it will not down, and it was the distinction of Miss Morena's singing that expressed the qualities that are thus mingled in it. She lent it the intensity of the dramatizing and the eloquent singer; and underneath quivered the feror of an intimate and jossessing desire. The music is all seriousness and of like seriousness were Miss Morena's lover. They can sing in Munich after all.

"Schmerz" may pass. It is not especially characteristic of Wagner, and Miss Morena's singing of it was not particularly individual. It was the work of an accomplished and understanding singer, but hardly more. Then came Strauss's "Secret Innovation," the strangely arotic and remote song that makes one of the group with the more familiar "Cécilie" and the less familiar "Mrgan." The song in its text is Ovidian, and in the music, Strauss keeps no such reticence as that of Wagner in "Traume." Yet it is no less a song of intimate of intimate passion. The picture, with which it begins, of the feast, of the passing goblet, of the lover and his mistress pledging each other with their eyes might have come straight out of Ovid's "Amores." Then the song strikes the more modern, intimate, personal note, of erotic image and rapture. And Strauss has filled the music first with curious echoes of the feast bearing seemingly the passion of the pair and then with imitated longing and excited voluptuous ecstasy. Miss Morena's singing of the song glorified. She stripped it of its muddy vesture of neurotic decay; she lifted it to exalted passion; she transformed it to rhapsodic longing. What Strauss has done with his orchestra at the end of "Salome" and of "Electra," the singer, with the qualities of her tones did for this, his song, H. T. P.

SONG TO CLOSE SYMPHONY NIGHT

Journal — Nov. 8, 1909
Miss Berta Morena Fails to Impress in Appearance on Saturday Night.

Saturday night's Symphony concert closed with a song with piano accompaniment. That was enough to make the concert memorable. Miss Berta Morena, one of the dramatic sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera House, who sang at the Boston Theater last April in "Die Walkure," was the soloist, and half the orchestra departed before she began the final group of songs. This purely lyric ending of a Symphony concert was rather new to Boston. It certainly was not effective.

However, it was deemed best that Miss Morena should sing with orchestra as early in the evening as possible. The number chosen was Rezia's aria, "Ocean, thou mighty monster," from Weber's "Oberon." Miss Morena sang in German.

It was recalled in the program that the original Rezia, Mrs. Joseph Wood, came to Boston from London back in the 'thirties. Weber had written that she sang "superbly" in "Oberon." Miss Morena, on the contrary, made but a moderate impression Saturday night. The applause was mostly courteous. She sang much better here last year. The songs that ended the program were Wagner's "Dreams" and "Pains" and Richard Strauss's "Secret Invitation."

The principal feature of the concert was the performance of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony." This number, lasting about an hour, was played with the utmost success. Equally impressive was the performance of the tuneful second intermezzo from the music Schubert wrote for the production of "Rosamund, Princess of Cyprus."

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Orchestra Revives Berlioz's Fantastic "Episode in an Artist's Life."

Herald — Nov. 7, 1909
By PHILIP HALE.

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. Miss Berta Morena of the Munich and Metropolitan Opera houses sang for the first time at a Symphony concert in Boston. The program was as follows:

Fantastic symphony Berlioz
"Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster" Weber
Entr' acte in B flat major from "Rosamunde" Schubert
Songs with piano Wagner
"Dreams" and "Pains"; Strauss' "Secret Invitation."

Such an arrangement of program is not customary in this country, but in symphony concerts given in Dresden and Berlin it is not unusual for a singer to end the program with a group of songs, or for a pianist to end with a group of pieces. The symmetry of a program demands an orchestral composition as a closing number.

The "Fantastic" symphony was last played here by the New York Symphony orchestra, led by Mr. Weingartner, three years ago. That performance was one of extraordinary brilliance. The one of last night did not efface it. The "Dream of a Sabbath" last evening lacked dramatic, demoniacal continuity. The opening measures were effective, although Mr. Weingartner's imaginative reading, as though he were summoning witches from the four quarters of the earth to meet foul creatures of the air and fiends from hell, still haunts the memory. So, too, was Mr. Weingartner's conception of the "March to the Scaffold," a marvellous nightmare with its headlong rush, its spectral chattering bassoons, its wild fanfares. Nevertheless, there were many fine points in Mr. Fiedler's reading; there was poetic feeling in the first movement; the "Ball Scene" seemed less hackneyed than on previous occasions, and the "Scene in the Fields" had true pastoral atmosphere.

This music, now nearly 80 years old, is still wonderful in its imaginative force, in its romantic spirit. It is true that certain pages now seem old-fashioned, but the vitality of the main body is unimpaired. The wonder is that Berlioz with his scanty education was able to write the symphony, to express his passionate, tumultuous thought in musical speech, in an orchestral language that impresses and compels admiration even in the days of Strauss, d'Indy, Debussy and Loeffler.

Berlioz wrote the symphony in a high-strung, hotly romantic period. Romanticism was in the air. Much that seems fantastic to us, living in a commercial and material period, was natural then. It was as natural to be extravagant in belief, theories, speech, manner of life, dress, as it was to breathe. They that accuse Berlioz of being a poseur are unacquainted with the art, literature, theatre, mode of life in the early thirties. And there was something superb in the bombast, the fanfaronade, the "panache." Victor Hugo never outlived those years; witness scenes in "The Man Who Laughs" and "93." Berlioz at last became virgilian in expression; witness his "Troyens." Imagine Byron at the end waiting after the manner of Wordsworth, forgetting his Corsair, his Lara and his Don Juan in joyful recognition of the virtues in a pious pedler.

Berlioz is still a heroic figure. His latest biographers may pile fact on fact: They cannot turn the composer of the "Fantastic" symphony, "The Damnation of Faust," and the "Dead March for Hamlet" into a smug bourgeois. The legendary Berlioz will move and thrill generations to come.

Mme. Morena was heard here in "The Valkyrie" as Sieglinde last April. Her voice has lost in quality during the year, and her control of it is not so sure. Singing in concert shows faults in technic and in style that in opera were hidden or passed over. She chose for her aria the once greatly admired "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," with its hiccupping finale. In it she displayed neither dramatic breadth nor lyric grace. Mr. Fiedler accompanied the songs.

BERTA MORENA AT SYMPHONY

Boston Am. — Nov. 1, 1909

Berta Morena of the Metropolitan Opera House will be the soloist at the next Symphony concert on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mme. Morena was a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company during its engagement in Boston last Spring. She recently returned to America and immediately took her place as the principal singer of the larger dramatic roles in German opera. She will sing the Aria "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's "Oberon," and three songs with piano: Wagner's "Träume," and "Schmerzen," and Richard Strauss's "Heimliche Aufforderung."

The symphony will be Berlioz's "Fantastic," which has not been heard at the Symphony concerts for several years, and in fact has not been played in Boston since Weingartner conducted it with the New York Symphony Orchestra three years ago. Mr. Fiedler will add two other orchestral numbers which will be announced later.

FOR SALE—One Symphony Season Rehearsal; also one Concert. Ticket, remaining 12 concerts to May, 1909; most costly and choice location; central floor. Address H.O.O., Boston Transcript. 7t(A): d30

Mme Morena Soloist at the Symphony.

Concert by Mme Nordica--Grand Opera by Commonwealth Club.

Various Recitals of the Week--Gossip.

Globe — Mch. 7, 1909
Mme Berta Morena of the Metropolitan opera house in New York was the soloist at this week's Symphony rehearsal and concert, singing with the orchestra the great scena and aria from Weber's opera, "Oberon," "Ocean! thou mighty monster," which was last sung at these concerts Dec 21, 1901, by Pauline Cramer.

Mme Morena sang also, to a piano accompaniment by Herr Max Fiedler, Wagner's two songs, "Dreams" and "Pains," and Richard Strauss' "Secret Invitation." The Wagner lieder have been sung in Boston by Lilli Lehmann, Emma Juch and Marie Brema; the Strauss song by the composer's wife. So none of Mme Morena's numbers were heard for the first time, though all of them were so unusual as to come to most of the audience as practically new. It cannot be said that the singer tipped her hearers over. Her wonderful voice, wonderful in range and quality, received its meed of acknowledgement; but the lack of shading, the lack of dramatic attack, the singer's apparent mental dryness—which belied the hope held forth by her personal appearance—left her hearers comparatively cold.

The Strauss song was wonderful in a subtle way; the singer appreciated all the passionate beauty of the music and carried to the aching loneliness of the final line the longing of the poem. It was unfortunate that the exigencies of program-building could not have put the "Oberon" number at the last of her group instead of at the first, for this was the most tremendous of all four of her numbers.

She sang it as well as it can be sung in concert, breaking in without the aid of the dramatic action that should lead to this as a climax. And always Mr Fiedler seemed to be at too slow a tempo for her; the sustained melodies of Weber's aria were justified only at the tremendous phrases of the ending. Mme Morena's was an artistic rather than a popular success.

The orchestra began the concert with the great Berlioz symphony, aptly called the "Fantastic"—so disconnected, unsequential, repetitional, that it hardly needs the program notes to say that it is the description of the opium dreams of a young musician of morbid sensibility and ardent imagination. The "beloved melody," which haunts the whole symphony, turning up in all sorts of improbable relations, the vague dreams of pastoral scenery, with the goatherds piping back and forth their rude strains, the weird Walpurgis night's dream, with the melody astonishingly contrasted against a mocking chant of brass and a devilish dance of strings, the frightful "march to the scaffold," which nevertheless holds the hearer to absolute belief—one follows another like the changes of a nightmare.

Mr Fiedler's reading was both broad and warm; it was by no means what Mr Gericke gave us, and as far as memory goes, it was more compelling, more moving. The terrible fourth movement, contrasted strongly with the ball scene, which was forcedly light, was but the preparation for the howling, exploding welter of the climax. Altogether, the performance was one of the events that hardly count among one's pleasures, but which nevertheless one was glad to have experienced.

The program for this week's concert will include the first performance here of Bruckne's eighth symphony and Gradener's concerto for violoncello. The soloist will be Mr Heinrich Warnke.

Miss Morena and Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" for the Symphony Concerts—A Novel Programme, with Dr. Wuellner for the Pension Fund—Mrs. Hunt's and Mrs. Hall's Concerts

Trans. — Feb. 27, 1909
Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" will be revived at the Symphony Concerts of next week, and Miss Morena of the Metropolitan Opera House will come to them for the last assisting singer of the current season. Mr. Gericke put the symphony on one of his programmes four years ago. A year later Mr. Weingartner and the New York Symphony Orchestra performed it, in a chance concert, very eloquently and excitingly. When Dr. Muck chose from Berlioz he preferred the less familiar symphony, "Harold in Italy." Thus, the "Fantastic Symphony" will come to comparatively fresh hearing, and it will be interesting to hear Mr. Fiedler's reading of it. Such largely imagined and romantically conceived music that incessantly seeks its effect plainly suits some of his most telling talents. The symphony itself becomes more and more a curiosity—a huge musical survival of the romanticism of 1830 with its mingled power and extravagance, its tempestuous passion and its sounding rhetoric. Who now, unless it were Richard Strauss or some of his disciples, would conceive this "episode in the life of an artist," with its passing scenes of the ball, the solitary reverie in the fields, the march to the scaffold, the descent to pandemonium, the dreams, the passions, the "fixed idea" and all the rest of Berlioz's romantic paraphernalia. It is the custom to trace Strauss's musical descent through Liszt and Wagner, but farther back Berlioz may be his truer musical progenitor. Anyhow, they have a common liking for huge musical and imaginative fabrics and for tonal coloring as their readiest and most efficient resource. Miss Morena is one of the younger German singers of the Metropolitan Opera House, who came thither last year from Germany. In Boston last spring she appeared as Sieglinde in "Die Walküre," and the expressive quality of her singing, her sensitive temperament and the beauty and the dignity of her aspect commended her. Next week she will sing the familiar air, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's "Oberon," and songs by Wagner—"Traume" and "Schmerzen"—and, by Strauss. The lesser orchestral numbers to complete the programme remain to be announced.

Trans. — Feb. 27, 1909
Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" will be revived at the Symphony Concerts of next week, and Miss Morena of the Metropolitan Opera House will come to them for the last assisting singer of the current season. Mr. Gericke put the symphony on one of his programmes four years ago. A year later Mr. Weingartner and the New York Symphony Orchestra performed it, in a chance concert, very eloquently and excitingly. When Dr. Muck chose from Berlioz he preferred the less familiar symphony, "Harold in Italy." Thus, the "Fantastic Symphony" will come to comparatively fresh hearing, and it will be interesting to hear Mr. Fiedler's reading of it. Such largely imagined and romantically conceived music that incessantly seeks its effect plainly suits some of his most telling talents. The symphony itself becomes more and more a curiosity—a huge musical survival of the romanticism of 1830 with its mingled power and extravagance, its tempestuous passion and its sounding rhetoric. Who now, unless it were Richard Strauss or some of his disciples, would conceive this "episode in the life of an artist," with its passing scenes of the ball, the solitary reverie in the fields, the march to the scaffold, the descent to pandemonium, the dreams, the passions, the "fixed idea" and all the rest of Berlioz's romantic paraphernalia. It is the custom to trace Strauss's musical descent through Liszt and Wagner, but farther back Berlioz may be his truer musical progenitor. Anyhow, they have a common liking for huge musical and imaginative fabrics and for tonal coloring as their readiest and most efficient resource. Miss Morena is one of the younger German singers of the Metropolitan Opera House, who came thither last year from Germany. In Boston last spring she appeared as Sieglinde in "Die Walküre," and the expressive quality of her singing, her sensitive temperament and the beauty and the dignity of her aspect commended her. Next week she will sing the familiar air, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's "Oberon," and songs by Wagner—"Traume" and "Schmerzen"—and by Strauss. The lesser orchestral numbers to complete the programme remain to be announced.

FOR SALE, AT COST
a Symphony Rehearsal, also a Concert season Ticket; middle floor. Address V.T.H., Boston Transcript. 6t(A): ja 15

BERLIOZ' SYMPHONIE FANTASTIQUE PLAYED

MR. FIEDLER'S WONDERFUL
READING OF THE FINALE

Adv. — Mch. 6, 1909
Mme. Morena of the New York
Opera Very Successful in Scena and Songs.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Symphonie Fantastique.....Berlioz
Scena. "Ocean, thou mighty Monster"....Weber Soloist, Mme. Berta Morena.
Entr' Acte from Rosamunde.....Schubert
Songs with Piano, Mme. Morena.

A strangely arranged programme, the order of which might almost have been reversed, to advantage. It began with the usual pause, during which Mr. Fiedler stood in rapt devotion before his orchestra. How does he occupy those regular moments of impressive silence? Is it a mystic ceremonial, like the "secret prayer" of the celebrant priest at the Mass?

Parts of Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique are growing threadbare. The very love-theme, which forms the core of this work, seems cloying and by no means as inspired a melody as the one which the same composer gave to Childe Harold. The Ball-room scene sounds decidedly tame, and one is only languidly interested in watching Berlioz "cipher with notes" and fit his love melody against the strains of the waltz.

The third movement, "In the Fields," is also fading fast. The Oboe and English Horn gave their conversation with much delicacy. There was, perhaps, an excess of "ritenuto" in their phrases, but the shading was most artistic. The final phrases of the English horn—the Shepherd calling in vain for his Maid, who has been killed in the tempest—are evidently the progenitors of some of the phrases in the third act of "Tristan and Isolde," upon the same instrument. But even this movement is too long and becomes "ennuyante" with its many repetitions and romantic languors.

But if the first three movements are fading, the last two are not. Mr. Fiedler may be proud of the successful way in which he read them. From the very first notes the audience, which seemed a trifle bored, began to sit up and take notice. There was more made of the March to Execution than we have ever heard in Boston before. The movement is, in music, as powerful as "The Ballad of Reading Jail," in literature—and as terrible.

Dickens, in his "Tale of Two Cities," speaks of the footsteps of the crowd; mad and headlong footsteps, footsteps that have been killed and dabbled in blood, dangerous footsteps to come into a man's life,—and these footsteps are heard here on the bassoons as the tumbril goes to the guillotine. The bassoons played particularly well, and the wonderful pizzicato harmony upon the contrabasses must also be mentioned as being of thrilling character. The obvious points, the last thought of the criminal as he awaits the supreme moment, the fall of the axe, the quivering corpse, these were all portrayed with power.

Still more fervid was the reading of the Finale. The temperature in Hades could not be measured by Fahrenheit. It was pictured as a very uncomfortable place, where snarling E-flat clarinette and impudent piccolos may jest at a gentlemanly murderer as much as they please. Superb was the burlesque of the church service, with its clangor of bells, its sarcastic fugal work, its sardonic working-up of the "Dies Irae." Yet there are those who say that irony is impossible in instrumental music!

If Mr. Fiedler did nothing more than the interpretation of the two final movements of this symphony, it would still be enough to make his advent in Boston memorable. It was a steady crescendo of power, even up to the last hard clash of cymbal (struck with a drum-stick) with which the scene ends.

In very vivid contrast with this picture of the immortal Winter resort was the Schubert Entr'acte in B-flat, No. 2. Here all was suavity, gentleness and melody. Violins and clarinettes vied with each other in smoothness of execution, and the audience showed at once that an easily followed tune never goes unappreciated.

Mme. Morena made a success. Her voice was not broad and fiery enough in the Weber Scena. Possibly she was a bit nervous, for in the later numbers her tones rang out gloriously. But even in the first Scena there was an expressive timbre, clear high notes and an unimpeachable intonation. The Scena is most difficult in some of its sharp contrasts and its skips from highest to lowest register would bother many a great artist. Alack and alas! This also seemed faded. Is the modern music spoiling the older and more primitive effects for us?

In the final songs with piano Mme. Morena was excellent. But it was odd to find a symphony concert ending thus. Yet the reason was apparent. If Mme. Morena was to appear twice, one of the appearances was bound to be either at the beginning or the end of the concert, for the programme was too long to add another orchestral number.

The songs were exquisitely accompanied by Mr. Fiedler. His performance of the piano part in Strauss's "Secret Invitation" was equal to Mme. Morena's noble interpretation of the vocal part. Wagner's "Dreams" is a sketch made in anticipation of "Tristan and Isolde," and the words are by Mathilde Wesendonck, who was the direct inspiration of that opera. Naturally it is as intense as any of the operatic numbers of the master. "Schmerzen" belongs to the same set of poems and songs. Both were finely sung.

It shocked us a trifle to find Mme. Wesendonck's "Schmerzen" prosaically translated as "Pains." There was not a word as to where the pains were situated. Why did not some enterprising advertiser take the occasion to announce Sarsaparilla or Little Liver Pills in connection with this? It was a golden opportunity now lost beyond recall. If the brilliant translator had only left off the final "S" and called the song "Pain" it would not have seemed so colicky.

CONCERTS OF YESTERDAY

MISS MORENA SINGS WITH THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Trans. — Mel. 6. 14. 19
The Limitation of Time That Hampered Mr. Fiedler in His Programme—The Changed, and Now Established, Policy with "Soloists," and the Results That Have Justified It—The Personal Charm of Miss Morena—The Qualities of Her Singing—An Air of Weber That Has Aged and Songs by Wagner and Strauss—Mrs. Hall's Concert of Woollett's Music

A symphony and a singer virtually divided the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon and gave its programme a peculiar cast. Mr. Fiedler, and rightly, loves not the limit of ninety minutes—less ten for an intermission—that rule and custom impose upon the concerts. The symphony happened to be Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," five movements and fifty minutes long. Ten minutes more fell to the intermission, and thus Mr. Fiedler had only half an hour for the rest of the concert. The singer, Miss Morena of the Metropolitan Opera House, must needs sing twice, and have breathing time between her pieces. Accordingly Mr. Fiedler slipped the longest intermezzo from Schubert's music to "Rosamünde" between the air from "Oberon" and the songs of Wagner and Strauss that Miss Morena sang. Thus the concert ended—or rather stopped—with Strauss's "Heimliche Aufforderung," music that vanishes into the thin air of voluptuous ecstasy. Mr. Fiedler is singularly skilful in the designing of his programmes, and whenever the arbitrary limit of time has not hampered him, they have had scope, contrast, and proportion. He knew, quite as well as any of his listeners, that an overture—"a brilliant overture" as the phrase goes—would have become the end of the concert; but to put it on the programme would have kept the audience in its seats for an hour and three-quarters. No one wishes to see the Symphony Concert attain the heavenly lengths that audiences endure cheerfully in English or in German cities. Yet to listen to music for two hours when the programme is duly diversified, and when there is a quarter of an hour, as it often is, of intermission, lays no great strain upon the attention and the finer receptive qualities of an audience. The season through, the public of the concerts has been praising Mr. Fiedler's programmes. Yet that same public accepts the custom that limits him to an hour and a half, or a little more, and constrains him to such an abnormal arrangement as that of yesterday, or such a misshapen list as that for next week when a lengthy symphony and a concerto for violoncello will make the programme. Mr. Fiedler, as his programme-making shows, is a man to improve and not abuse the freedom of an additional quarter hour. Moreover, as some cynics of the clubs say, the limitation to an hour and a half really originated in the desire of one of the earlier conductors to be home early.

Miss Morena, the last of the singers at the concerts this season, once more justified the restriction of "soloists" to artists of rank. Under it there are fewer singers and virtuosi than there used to be, but when they do come, they come to eager curiosity and appreciative interest. When some violinist was momentarily lifted from the ranks of the orchestra to be the "soloist" of the day, when some mediocre pianist made his way through a concerto, when some singer sang as the orchestra would never be permitted to play, they came and went oftenest as so much routine. The audience took them for granted or resigned itself to the tedium of their performances. It was time to raise the standard of the "assisting artists" to that of the orchestra which in theory they were assisting. The Symphony Orchestra is a band of the first rank and its conductor makes its programmes accordingly. Its "soloists" should be chosen by like principle and standards, and the coming of each, from the merit and the individuality of the singer or the virtuoso, should be a little event in its kind. Moreover, the public of the concerts was becoming too sophisticated, too familiar with eminent singers and distinguished pianists and violinists to care for the rank and file. The change of policy with the "soloists" has now continued for nearly three seasons, and it has justified itself at every turn. It has raised the standard of the concerts until no series in the country matches them in the quality of the "assistance" as well as in the quality of the orchestra. The mutterings of the neglected have died away; and the audiences come more eagerly to the soloists because they are at once fewer and more notable. So long as the two opera houses flourish in New York there will be no lack of distinguished singers, and the flocking virtuosi are as regular as the birds of autumn.

Miss Morena, hatless and gloveless, all in black velvet a little relieved by silver and by the gleaming white of her own throat, and arms, looked as though she had stepped out of a portrait by Lenbach, from whom indeed she learned much of the artistry of costume and pose that distinguished her when she impersonated Sieglinde in "Die Walküre" at the Boston Theatre. Then she was a figure of beauty that kindled and held the imagination, and yesterday in her own person she was comely and, as the French say, troubling, in a beauty that has the clearness and the firmness of the north and yet something of the warmth and richness of the south. Her voice, too, was warmer and fuller, more capable of sustained tone and of varied and deeper expression than it was a year ago. Then she struggled with depression of body and mind. Now she has regained spirit, strength and elasticity, and this new vitality told in her singing. Perhaps she began with "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's "Oberon" because it is a conventional show-piece of German and many other concert rooms. Conventional it certainly is in its alternation of fast and slow, broad and fiery, contemplative and impassioned passages. Its form is hidebound and in these days of "free lyric declamation" tends to become more and more antiquated. Usually, however, Weber has contrived to fill this form with music that compasses mood, that speaks with genuine and stirring emotional speech and dramatizing accent. His powers were falling when he wrote "Oberon," and this air of the ocean put side by side with Agatha's rhapsody in her chamber in "Der Freischütz"—a piece as conventional of form—is clear and curious proof of this dwindling in imagination and fire. The music from "Oberon" brings no picture of Huon's storm-tossed ship, and bears little to the hearer of the swift and changeable emotions of his gazing and fearful mistress. It begins and it ends as a show-piece and by so much served to disclose Miss Morena's skill in the art of song, her technical surety and the warmth and the beauty of her tones. At their highest, they are perhaps a little shrill, and now and then she reached for a note, but some of the intervals in this air of Ocean are reckless and exacting enough to be modern.

In the three songs that ended the concert—Wagner's "Träume" and "Schmerzen" and Richard Strauss's "Heimliche Aufforderung"—Miss Morena disclosed finer and more individual qualities of imagination and expression. "Träume" may have been the "study" for "Tristan" that the commentators and even Wagner himself called it. He cherished it, however, none the less, and now after fifty years and when the music of "Tristan" is much the more familiar, it remains a truly beautiful expression of intense and rapturous longing. Its very reticence makes the intensity the more penetrating. Writing for the stage, Wagner rightly took thought of his audience, would have his music tell. "Träume" he wrote rather for himself and for the woman whose verses suggested it, and thus he made it intimate music. Yet the operatic note in it will not down, and it was the distinction of Miss Morena's singing that it expressed the qualities that are thus mingled in the song. She lent it the intensity of the dramatizing and the eloquent singer; and underneath quivered the fervor of an intimate and possessing desire. The music by all consciousness, and of like sensuousness were Miss Morena's tones. They can sing in Munich after all.

254

"Schmerzen" came and went. It is not especially characteristic of Wagner, and Miss Morena's singing of it was not particularly individual. It was the work of an accomplished and understanding singer, but hardly more. Then came Strauss's "Secret Invitation," the strangely erotic and neurotic song that makes one of the group with the more familiar "Cécille" and the less familiar "Morgen." The song in its text is Ovidian, and in the music, Strauss keeps no such reticence as that of Wagner in "Träume." Yet it is no less a song of intimate and personal passion. The picture, with which it begins, of the feast, of the passing goblet, of the lover and his mistress pledging each other with their eyes, might have come straight out of Ovid's "Amores." Then the song strikes the more modern, intimate, personal note, of erotic image and rapture. And Strauss has filled the music first with curious echoes of the feast, bearing seemingly the passion of the pair, and then with irritated longing and excited voluptuous ecstasy. Miss Morena's singing of the song glorified it. She stripped it of its muddy vesture of neurotic decay; she lifted it to exalted passion; she transformed it to rhapsodic longing. What Strauss has done with his orchestra at the end of "Salome" and of "Electra," the singer, by the quality of her tones did for this, his song.
H. T. P.

Before the end of the season, and probably at the Symphony Concerts of next week, Mr. Fiedler will undertake a new Suite by Arthur Foote—the first orchestral piece, if we are not mistaken, that the composer has written in some years.

In his younger days, Mr. Fiedler was an expert concert pianist, and on occasion he exercised himself in composition. One of the pieces he then wrote was a sonata for piano and violoncello. At the final concert for the year of the Hess-Schroeder Quartet next Tuesday evening at Chickering Hall, Mr. Fiedler himself and Mr. Schroeder are to play it. Thus the conductor will make, so to say, a second début here—this time as composer and pianist. Trans. Apr. 8, 1909

255
Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

XVIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 13, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

BRUCKNER,

SYMPHONY No. 8, in C minor.

I. Allegro moderato.

II. Scherzo: (Allegro moderato-Andante-Allegro moderato)

III. Adagio.

IV. Solemnly (not fast).

(First time in America.)

GRÄDENER,

CONCERTO for VIOLONCELLO. op. 45.

(First time in Boston.)

BEETHOVEN,

OVERTURE to "Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus,"
op. 43.

Soloist:

Mr. HEINRICH WARNEKE.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

251
music is all sensuousness, and of like sensuousness were Miss Morena's tones. They can sing in Munich after all.

"Schmerzen" came and went. It is not especially characteristic of Wagner, and Miss Morena's singing of it was not particularly individual. It was the work of an accomplished and understanding singer, but hardly more. Then came Strauss's "Secret Invitation," the strangely erotic and neurotic song that makes one of the group with the more familiar "Cécile" and the less familiar "Morgen." The song in its text is Ovidian, and in the music, Strauss keeps no such reticence as that of Wagner in "Traume." Yet it is no less a song of intimate and personal passion. The picture, with which it begins, of the feast, of the passing goblet, of the lover and his mistress pledging each other with their eyes, might have come straight out of Ovid's "Amores." Then the song strikes the more modern, intimate, personal note, of erotic image and rapture. And Strauss has filled the music first with curious echoes of the feast, bearing seemingly the passion of the pair, and then with irritated longing and excited voluptuous ecstasy. Miss Morena's singing of the song glorified it. She stripped it of its muddy vesture of neurotic decay; she lifted it to exalted passion; she transformed it to rhapsodic longing. What Strauss has done with his orchestra at the end of "Salome" and of "Electra," the singer, by the quality of her tones did for this, his song.

H. T. P.

Before the end of the season, and probably at the Symphony Concerts of next week, Mr. Fiedler will undertake a new Suite by Arthur Foote—the first orchestral piece, if we are not mistaken, that the composer has written in some years.

In his younger days, Mr. Fiedler was an expert concert pianist, and on occasion he exercised himself in composition. One of the pieces he then wrote was a sonata for piano and violoncello. At the final concert for the year of the Hess-Schroeder Quartet next Tuesday evening at Chickering Hall, Mr. Fiedler himself and Mr. Schroeder are to play it. Thus the conductor will make, so to say, a second début here—this time as composer and pianist. Trans. Apr. 8, 1909

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

XVIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 13, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

BRUCKNER,

SYMPHONY No. 8, in C minor.

I. Allegro moderato.

II. Scherzo: (Allegro moderato-Andante-Allegro moderato)

III. Adagio.

IV. Solemnly (not fast).

(First time in America.)

GRADENER,

CONCERTO for VIOLONCELLO. op. 45.

(First time in Boston.)

BEETHOVEN,

OVERTURE to "Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus,"
op. 43.

Soloist:

Mr. HEINRICH WARŃKE.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

NEW PROGRAMME AT THE SYMPHONY THIS WEEK

BRUCKNER'S SYMPHONY

NO. 8 FIRST TIME HEARD

Adm. ———— Mch. 13, 1909

A Work of Great Power as Well as Length—A Graedener Concerto Another Novelty.

By Louis C. Elson.
PROGRAMME.

Bruckner—Symphony No. 8.
Graedener—Violoncello Concerto.
Beethoven—"Prometheus" Overture.
Soloist, Mr. Heinrich Warnke.

The list is short, but let no one imagine that the concert was. Two modern works form a genteel sufficiency for a tonal meal, particularly when the first one lasts nearly an hour and a quarter. When a radical like Bruckner gets to his eighth symphony he may be said to have acquired the "symphony habit," which is at present by no means the habit of brevity.

Bruckner, however, is beginning to show up well among the moderns. He is a slave of the demon of figure treatment, and he worries his little motives until he has squeezed out every possible meaning that is concealed in them, and the auditor is between the development and the deep sea, but he is at least logical and comprehensible, and he has a style that is absolutely his own. But the emotional power of Tschai-kowsky, the melodic form of Brahms, the glow of tone-color of Strauss, he does not possess, so that his great length sometimes leads to dullness.

The auditor must have had his fill of novelty at this concert, for every note of the two first works of the programme was new to Boston, not a single movement of either work having been heard here before. Mr. Fiedler has had the honor of giving Bruckner's largest work first, in America. It is prolix and difficult work that must have cost conductor and men many hours of tedious labor. Poor Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will soon be called a "Sinfonietta," for all of the recent symphonies given in our concerts have extended beyond the hour. Yet we may hasten to add that Bruckner's symphony towers above its two predecessors, not only in length but in power.

This C minor symphony (we cannot help contrasting it with two other C minor symphonies, to its disadvantage) was once given as an entire concert in Vienna. The excess of figure development is in evidence in the first movement, where a chromatic figure is treated in every possible way that ingenuity, patience and learning can devised. We at once concede the great skill displayed, but life is getting too short for these long tonal treatises and music in this guise is no longer a pleasure but a task.

Of St. Paul it was suggested that too much learning had made him mad; of the modern Regers and Bruckners one must say that their excess of learning prevents them from seeing when it is time to let an innocent little figure rest. There were, however, moments of grandeur and beauty in even the first movement of this symphony.

The Scherzo is less artificial and less long. It has something of that rustic naivete which seems natural to Bruckner and fits him well; it is no longer the academician who is speaking, but the inspired composer who has something to say. Nevertheless there is also some wonderful combination of themes in this Scherzo; parts that are difficult to comprehend at once, passages that may even bore the public, but that will be recognized more fully with better acquaintance. So that it seems that there is always a "Music of the Future!"

The Adagio is of great length. The phrase of "heavenly length" that used to be attached to Schubert may properly be used here, for Bruckner has also something to say in this movement. No man who is thoroughly in earnest, and has any ability at all, can ever become ludicrous in his work. Bruckner has been helped, rather than harmed, by the fierce and partisan attacks of Hanslick, the dislikes of the Herzogenbergs and Brahms. The virulence displayed by his adverse critics must eventually defeat itself.

In each of the movements there are points of beauty and of power, but not a sustained power such as one requires in even a shorter symphony. The Finale has some strong climaxes. There is a note of triumph in the trumpet calls that echo through some of its measures, and the chorale effects also suggest a victory with divine help. That Bruckner had as profoundly a religious nature as Cesar Franck cannot be doubted, and this was a moving impulse in his two last symphonies.

Like Franck, Bruckner cannot attain Wagner's condensed power in creating a figure. The aggressive little four-noted figure of the Scherzo is not in itself attractive, although very prominently thrust forward, and played upwards and downwards innumerable times. In orchestration Bruckner follows, a long way after, Wagner. The violins in high position, in the "Adagio," for ecstasy, the use of the brasses in rich harmony in soft passages, at the first part of the same movement, are striking examples. But Bruckner does not get as much out of the modern orchestra as many lesser composers.

There is too much of sequence treatment in every movement of the symphony, and too much of sheer repetition of figures. When Wagner carried a single simple idea (the tonic chord) through measures upon measures, at the beginning of "Rheingold," he was warranted in doing so by the picture he was portraying (the ceaseless flow of the Rhine) but there is no such warrant for such lengthy preparation of climaxes in a symphony. And Wagner himself used such an effect only once, while Bruckner returns to the same device often.

Yet, in spite of the defects and the proximity, the symphony has dignity and power and the voice is the voice of Bruckner and not often an echo of either Brahms or Wagner. It is the best of the nine symphonies of this master, and it was splendidly performed. Mr. Fiedler has here reached his highest point, thus far, in Boston. It was a work of self-abnegation too, for we believe that the public will be much quicker to see the faults than the merits of this learned and long symphony.

Graedener was much less lengthy. It may have been a logical sequence to go from Bruckner to Graedener, for the latter succeeded the former in the chair of harmony and counterpoint at the Vienna conservatory. He does not seem to have the musical gifts of his father, Carl G. P. Graedener, whose songs deserve to be much better known than they are, particularly his "Werner's Lieder aus Welschland."

But there are so few concertos for violoncello that one welcomes any addition to the scant repertoire, and Mr. Warnke played with such clearness and intelligent phrasing that the work was carried to some success. We could, however, have borne with much more breadth, for the tone seemed very light at times.

The concerto is a brand-new work and does not seem at all inspired. It seemed like "Eau Sucree" after the earnestness of the symphony. Its movements are joined together. Its slow movement is so constantly dreamy that one almost goes to sleep, in sympathy. Its rondo-like finale has a chief theme that is tuneful even to the whistling point, and comes back in a jolly treatment by diminution at the close. Its cadenza has some very long maudering for the violoncello. It is altogether a rather pleasant, but by no means great, work.

A goodly procession marched out before the "Prometheus" overture. It is by no means the greatest of Beethoven's overtures and was probably chosen on account of its brevity. It was well enough played, but the Bruckner symphony dominated this programme altogether. If Bruckner had only known that brevity is sometimes the soul of music as well as of wit!

-A New Suggestion About the Hats at the Symphony Concerts

An ingenious correspondent, writing once more of the interfering hats at the Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoons, suggests that the question of the wearing or the removing of them be put to vote among the women of the audience. But, suppose that the vote were in favor of removal, would the majority conform to the result of the ballot, or would everyone concerned be face to face once more with the old problem of individual submission to the general good?

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Post By Olin Downes Mch. 13, 1909

One of the greatest works which have been brought to a first hearing in some seasons in Boston was given its local premiere yesterday afternoon at the public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra, Bruckner's eighth symphony, played, it is believed, for the first time in America.

It has been my fortune to hear three of Bruckner's vast symphonic conceptions, the fifth, the seventh, and the ninth. All of those enormous creations have a great origin, and immortal moments that float a varying amount of tiresome verbosity and reiteration. With the exception of a moment or two in the mighty finale, the eighth symphony is an inexhaustible succession of tremendous ideas, developed with a herculean fantasy and a noble ideality that achieves the sublime.

The form in the first three parts seems as compact as it could well be when filled with so much rich material. As in all Bruckner's works there are Wagnerianisms, yet such is the compactness and the force of the writing that one feels as if the composer had had Beethoven more in mind. There is no other master whose works furnish a parallel to the vigor of the opening of the first movement, the repose that proceeds from sheer inner strength and faith in God which characterizes the slow movement. The work should be given again very soon.

Mr. Warnke, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, played for the first time in America a concerto by Hermann Graedener of Vienna, which has just been published. This concerto has three divisions, which are connected in modern style. The first movement is pretty and flows along pleasantly. The slow section begins with a fat melody for the 'cello, and two flutes play a syncopated accompaniment. The chief theme of the finale is more than common: it is trivial and meaningless.

Certain passages seemed not over-advantageous for the soloist, but Mr. Warnke's was a masterly performance. He has an accomplished left hand, bravura passages, whatever the tempo, were clean-cut and executed with apparent ease. In sustained phrases the tone was nobly sensuous and full and expressive. Both the soloist and the symphony, in which Mr. Fiedler surpassed any previous achievement of the season, were encored. A brilliant performance of the "Prometheus" overture brought the concert to an end.

at A NEW SYMPHONY Mch. 14, 1909

Yesterday it was impossible to speak at any length of Bruckner's symphony, which Mr. Fiedler presented at the Symphony concerts of this week for the first time in Boston, and probably in America. It seems strange that the work has waited so long for a hearing in this city.

Both Mr. Gericke and Dr. Muck were admirers of Bruckner's works, yet the strongest and the greatest of those with which we are acquainted was passed over until Mr. Fiedler placed us under a debt of gratitude, for after a single hearing we consider this symphony one of the greatest achievements in that form in modern orchestral literature.

Bruckner has given the world many pages of music which have an individual fascination that is not paralleled in the works of any other composer. Unfortunately, there is usually much chaff in the wheat, and one listens, not knowing which the next measure will bring. Yet the thoughts are so tremendous, the conceptions so vast, that they have preserved monstrous and unwieldy creations through one of the most swiftly changing periods in musical history.

We may be warmed and inspired by a composer who stops just outside the gates that he would enter. But Bruckner's fantasy knows no boundaries. He ascends, when he does ascend, on strong wings to cosmic regions. No composer, one is tempted to say, gives in an equal degree the sensation of the vast and illimitable.

And think of the incorrigible originality of the man! He could not write differently if he would. We are accustomed to call Hector Berlioz the most daring and thoroughly individual composer that has lived. Was Bruckner less so, in spite of the idolatry of Wagner and Beethoven? Berlioz dared, with an eye on the public, and thought for the memoirs he was going to write. In spite of his audacity he was an accomplished man of the world. He realized the public's normal indifference and lack of imagination. He prodded their brains with a programme. Bruckner, the peasant, the boor, whose day for a number of years consisted of "10 hours a day on the piano and three on the organ," detested contact with the people outside. He was gloriously rude when disturbed in composition. He locked himself in his chamber with God, and with the fearlessness and unconsciousness of a child wrote down what transpired.

The eighth symphony takes the breath away at first, by its enormous energy and concentrated force. The themes have superb length and arch and outline. When they are reiterated, as Bruckner is bound to do, the repetition only serves to drive them home. Where is the dodder and the twaddle? "Titanic" will do about as well as any other word to describe the first part. The melodies have tremendous potentiality. In absolute music there are few such intensely dramatic moments as the three successive crashes that hurtle together. The instrumentation splashes gorgeous color. The final muttering of the violins is epic, Homeric lamentation.

The scherzo is Beethovenish in its magnificent vigor and optimism. A poetical horn call precedes the idyllic trio. It is all breezy, open-air music, filled with vitality and humor, and the poetry of nature. There is a change to heavenly contemplation in the adagio. How wonderfully the lower strings establish the mood and prepare for the long, full-breathed song of the violins!

If the finale is a little broken up, it has such kindling triumph, such ecstatic vision, that it remains the worthy culmination of what is surely an enduring master-work. A symphony such as this should be heard more than once in a season. It should be quickly repeated.

Correspondents are again sending letters of complaint about the obstructing hats at the Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoons. In spite of the effort of the management, two or three months ago, to abate the annoyance, a seemingly incorrigible minority still wears its hats. What shall be done now? "Publicist," for one of the correspondents, suggests his remedy: "Kindly appeal is apparently lost upon the lady who declines to remove her hat when politely requested. Shall we ridicule her? Not very well. Then what remains? Treat her like a spoiled child, as she most likely is, and in a private interview in the manager's office notify her she cannot attend the concerts in the future if she will not remove her hat." "Long Sufferer" in turn draws a comparison between the ordinance that regulates traffic in the streets and the ordinance that, theoretically, regulates the wearing of hats in places of public amusement. His letter gives: "Certain rules or ordinances are passed relative to the use of streets and the prevention of obstructing the same, and these rules are enforced. The poor teamster who, through ignorance, violates the same, is promptly summoned into court and fined. The ordinance relative to the wearing of hats and obstructing the view in public halls and theatres should be just as vigorously enforced. The obstruction of the view of the stage is just as annoying, and just as objectionable, as is the obstruction of the streets, and the thoughtless and inconsiderate wearers of these hats should once and for all be given to understand, and actually compelled, to either remove their hats or remain away from the performance." To all our correspondents the crux of the matter is: If the rule requiring the removal of hats can be, and is, enforced in the theatres of the first class, why is it not also enforceable at the Symphony Concerts? It seems "up" to the management to make its defence.

March 13, 1909

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Novelties Played at Symphony Concert.

Bruckner's Great Work Feature of an Exacting Program.

Recitals of the Week and Current Gossip.

globe — Mch. 14, 1909
Yesterday's offerings of the Boston Symphony orchestra were a first-time-in-America symphony, Bruckner's No. 8, a first-time-in-Boston concerto for violoncello by Herrmann Graedener, played by the orchestra's first cellist, Mr. Heinrich Warnke, and Beethoven's overture to "The Creatures of Prometheus," a heroic, allegorical ballet. And as this last had not been played in Boston since 1897, it was practically new to a majority of the audience.

Altogether it made a trying afternoon. The great Bruckner work is by no means easy to listen to, and only its last two movements—for many a hearer only the last of all—were especially moving. Bruckner himself furnished no program with his symphony; one of his admirers furnished a program which takes in Prometheus, the German peasant, the meeting of three emperors and a description of the mercy of God. It is better to listen to the music itself without trying to find a story in it.

The work is, of course, massive, but it is massive like a business building, not like a mountain; it impresses one, but does not move the emotions. It is in four movements, allegro, moderato, scherzo, adagio, and that movement was the longest symphonic adagio in existence, it lasted about 20 minutes—and a finale, which is the most exalted movement of the four. Bruckner, having seized upon an idea, seems to have tossed it back and forth; sometimes it was beautiful, sometimes a stodgy notion, but over and over he repeats it; development is the addition of brass, in the same phrase—and after all this preparation what? Nothing. A new idea, tossed about like the one preceding. Some of them rose to great climaxes, some died in astonishingly simple resolutions.

In the second movement, following the rough humor of the first theme and its development, came a passage—and ante—of great beauty, and continuing interest; it suggested a warmth and richness that promised to come to something—but it was dropped like the others, and in a moment we were dancing over the pavements again in wooden shoes.

The adagio showed the organist; there was a breadth and nobility of scoring, a use of the brass choir that is inspiring, and just the color of organ music cut across in harsher stops; it is a movement which needs hearing twice or thrice to know.

Bruckner was not one of the foggy moderns, never resolving, but he indicated what was coming. Hearing his eighth symphony one understands the storm that raged about him in his lifetime.

The Graedener concerto has a theme singing in its simplicity, with wonderful cadenzas, and an orchestration sufficiently clever, though yesterday somewhat heavy for the soloist. Mr. Warnke's cello was of beautiful round tone, but subdued, and at times almost submerged by the sheer bigness of the orchestra behind him. The work was interesting.

After these two numbers it was refreshing to come out into the four-square, open chord and passages of the Beethoven overture, which is written with the instruments in great choirs that have individuality and balance, that work out the themes in manly, happy fashion without assuming to be a complete work in itself; it has the old overture form, and leaves the hearer, as an overture was originally intended to do, in the mood for the raising of a curtain.

There will be no symphony concert this week.

FOR ANOTHER SEASON

Contract is Renewed With Max Fiedler, Popular Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

globe — Mch. 14, 1909
The management of the Boston symphony orchestra announces that the contract with Max Fiedler as conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra has been renewed for another year. Negotiations to this end have been on for some weeks, but only now has Mr. Fiedler learned definitely that he is able to stay away from Hamburg for another season.

Mr. Fiedler has become very popular during the present season with friends of the orchestra.

A Novel Symphony by Bruckner

Seemingly Bruckner's eighth symphony, in C minor, originally performed in Vienna in 1893, will be played for the first time in America at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday. In it, according to the composer's partisans, he has come closest to the attainment of all that he would accomplish and, beyond any other of his nine symphonies, it embodies and sustains the qualities by which they would exalt him. Nowhere, according to them and to many another dispassionate German listener, has Bruckner so skillfully and interestingly applied his Wagnerian methods to symphonic music. They praise the symphony for its wealth of ideas, however little Bruckner may have been able to develop and coordinate them into his large design; for its richness of harmony, for the variety, warmth and expressiveness of its instrumental voices, for its stirring sonority and for ampler and more sustained emotion rising even to passion, than Bruckner has elsewhere attained. When the symphony was first performed in Vienna, and the city musically was divided between the "Brahmsites" and the "Brucknerites," Bruckner's followers filled the hall in which Richter and the Philharmonic Society were playing it, listened breathlessly, applauded for minutes at the end of every moment and finally cheered and clamored until they brought the simple-minded, shrinking old composer to the platform, to sob rather than to speak his thanks. There is no feud anywhere over Bruckner's music nowadays; a whole generation of German conductors—Weingartner and Nikisch, Muck and Mahler—have become his champions, and whenever they have put this eighth symphony on their programmes their audiences have listened to it more patiently and received it more warmly than any other of Bruckner's pieces. Mr. Fiedler admires it no less than do his brethren, and all the winter he has been ambitious to give the first performances of it in America, first in Boston and then in New York.

Yet the symphony is very long. The full score fills 129 pages, thirty of which are necessary for the adagio and fifty for the finale. Fortunately, the first movement and the scherzo are briefer, but Hanslick, the reviewer who heard the original performance in Vienna, records that the symphony consumed an hour and a half and that the adagio continued for eight and twenty minutes. No wonder that Richter made it the sole item of his programme and that Mr. Fiedler has ventured to add only a short concerto for violoncello. The music runs in the usual four contrasting movements and in the order that Bruckner oftenest followed—an allegro moderato for a beginning; a scherzo similarly marked; an adagio, "solemn and slow, but not dragging"; and a "stately" finale. The music requires the full modern orchestra that Bruckner borrowed from Wagner—

the tenor tubas out of the "Ring" operas, the eight horns that Strauss has made almost a convention, and even a harp. Ostensibly there is no "programme," but when Hanslick first heard the symphony, certain annotations and explanations by a friend and a partisan of Bruckner, stirred him to decision. The notes averred that what Hanslick calls "the vexations, up-springing, up-grumbling motive" of the first movement was intended to symbolize the Prometheus of Aeschylus's tragedy—who ever suspected Bruckner before of Hellenic learning?—and that often the music would suggest "the greatest loneliness and silence." Then the anonymous commentator, again to Hanslick's amusement, hinted that the scherzo was of "a homely, boorish German Michael" who reduced the mighty deeds and aspirations of Prometheus to parody. (Anyhow, Bruckner liked and oftenest wrote homely, peasant-like scherzos.) Bruckner, who was a truly devout man, was singularly naïve and outspoken in his conceptions of the Deity and of his own relations to Him. He dedicated his ninth symphony "to the good God," and it is easy to believe the analyst when he says that the adagio, in which Bruckner seems to feel deeply every measure, would speak of "the all-loving Father of Mankind in His entire and boundless wealth of mercy." The commentator returns to his Promethean idea for the Finale; and bids us hear heroism in solemn service for mankind, while the trumpet calls that blows endlessly through the music proclaim "everlasting salvation." Bruckner, so far as the records go, never acknowledged this "programme," but it is at once naïve and exalted, vast and confused enough, to be plausibly of his own imagining. Trans. Mch. 14, 1909

FIRST READING OF BRUCKNER'S WORK

Journal — Mch. 15, 1909
Two Numbers New to Boston and an Old One Played at Symphony Concert.

Record breaking is the rule at the Symphony concerts nowadays. Saturday night was a gala occasion in this respect. Bruckner's eighth symphony had its first American performance and Graedener's concerto for violoncello its first performance in Boston. To most of those present the Beethoven overture to "The Creatures of Prometheus," last performed at a Symphony concert on Feb. 13, 1897, must have been equally unfamiliar.

But this is not all. The Bruckner number occupied sixty-five minutes. The third movement alone—"said to be," according to the program book, "the longest symphonic adagio movement in existence"—lasted about twenty-five minutes. Nor do the remarkable features end there, for though the composition proved to be abstruse and profound, free of emotional and full of psychologic power, like the utterance of an unpopular philosopher, the audience applauded most warmly. Of course, as usual, a part of the applause was a tribute to the executive excellence shown by Conductor Fiedler and his men.

Heinrich Warnke, the solo cellist of the orchestra, came to the front in the Graedener number, but neither the piece itself nor the performance made much of an impression. The Beethoven selection gave a spirited finish to the concert, and the audience was dismissed at the late hour of 9.50.

SYMPHONY WOMEN LAUGH AT HAT LAW

"Merry Widows" of Society Stay On, Though City Ordinance Is Stern to the Contrary.

Sunday American — Nov. 14, 1909
THE management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is most seriously embarrassed. Not by anything in the musical line.

Women's hats constitute the present dilemma.

Between the perverseness of women on the one side and the city ordinances and masculine wrath on the other side, the Symphony management is involved in discord.

Despite the law, despite the placard and personal warning and entreaty of the management, the women simply won't take off their hats at the Symphonies. Here is the law:

"Every licensee shall not, in his place of amusement, allow any person to wear upon the head a covering which obstructs the view of the exhibition of performers in such place of any person seated in any seat therein provided for spectators, it being understood that a low head covering without projection, which does not obstruct such view, may be worn."
BOSTON CITY ORDINANCES.

The above ordinance was printed on all Symphony programmes early this season. It might as well have been printed in Sanskrit for all the effect it had.

"Hatted to the Limit."

The law does permit "low head-covering which does not obstruct such view."

But anyone who had one good look at modern fashionable millinery knew that the women were not getting immunity under that loophole. They simply wore hats bigger, if anything.

Then the Symphony management caused placards bearing the above law in bold lettering to be placed conspicuously about the hall and even at the very entrance. The women glanced approvingly at the placards and passed in hatted to the limit, as before. Presumably they regarded the placards as mural decorations, original in conception and mildly amusing.

Recently the management undertook to serve personal notice on the women. Ushers passed cards which read:

"Ladies wearing hats in Symphony Hall during a concert are violating the law. Will you kindly remove your hat? You will thereby oblige those seated behind you and aid in observing the law."

The management felt confident that this extreme measure would get results. It did. At the last Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon there were hundreds of women present.

Just two women removed their hats. Two—count 'em.

All the others, so far as could be seen, kept their hats firmly on.

The two who obeyed the law, heeded the request of the management and had consideration for those behind were:

MISS ALICE SOHIER
MISS ELEANOR SOHIER

The rest were hatted regardless. The management hasn't played all its cards, however. C. A. Ellis of the management says:

"We have about eight more concerts this year, and I guess we can stand it. Next year, perhaps, we shall sell our tickets with the understanding that holders must remove their hats or forfeit the tickets."

Here Are Some of the Hats.

Among the hats at the Friday rehearsal and those wearing them were the following exclusive creations:

Small basket-shape, trimmed with black lace and tiny apples—Miss Mary Amory.

Becoming black hat, trimmed with green—Mrs. Eben S. Draper, wife of Governor Draper.

Ermine hat and ermine furs—Mrs. Chandler Hovey.

Purple one of soft felt with large white drooping plume—Miss Ruth Winsor.

Large black hat—Miss Miriam Shaw.

Large green ditto—Mrs. George Lee, Jr.

Maribou with silver quills—Mrs. C. A. Burrage. (That hat was especially stunning).

Another large black hat—Miss Ruth Nickerson.

Among the most notable hats there was a large black one which came accompanied by Mrs. "Jack" Gardner.

Close-fitting fur hat—Miss Barbara Higginson.

Black hat—Mrs. Horatio Lamb.

Small toque—Mrs. J. J. Storrow.

Blue-winged, black hat—Mrs. Benjamin Pitman.

Black hat with peacock blue quills—Miss Alice Stackpole.

Black hat—Miss Mary Fay.

Purple hat (large one)—Mrs. M. B. L. Bradford.

Gray hat (also large)—Mrs. Edwin Up-ton Curtis.

Black maribou with pink roses nestled on one side—Mrs. Nathan Mathews.

Black "law-breaker" trimmed with pink roses—Mrs. Moses Williams.

Odd-shaped, wine-colored hat, with drooping effect and trimmed with wide scarf—Miss Elizabeth Gray.

Black hats trimmed with feathers—Miss Helen Fay and Mrs. Frederick Warren.

A perfect dear of a little hat, bowl-shaped, of gold lace and very becoming—Mrs. Charles White.

Chic hat, blue, trimmed with white roses—Mrs. Russell Codman.

Old rose hat—Mrs. Malcolm Stone.

It is considered, all in all, that this last rehearsal was one of the best gatherings of hats seen this season. The occasion was thoroughly delightful.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played.

18TH OF SEASON'S SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Herald — Nov. 14, 1909
Colossal Work by Bruckner Performed for First Time Here by Boston Orchestra with Mr. Fiedler as Conductor.

PERFORMANCE WORTHY OF MASTER'S COMPOSITION

By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, gave its 18th concert last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in C minor, No. 8.....Bruckner
Concerto for 'cello, op. 45.....Graedener
Overture to "Creatures of Prometheus".....Beethoven

Bruckner's colossal eighth symphony was played for the first time in Boston. The performance was probably the first in America. The symphony was completed in 1890 and performed for the first time in Vienna in 1892.

It is in all respects the greatest of the works of Bruckner that have been performed here. The structure is more substantial, it is nobler. The form is more clearly recognized by the ordinary hearer. There is less perplexing or boring detail. The digressions do not cause the main line of musical argument to be forgotten. The interest is more steadily maintained. The instrumentation is richer in color and in contrasts. Above all, the invention shown, both in the melodic lines and in wealth of development, is little less than marvellous, for Bruckner was 60 years old when he began work on this symphony.

Much has been said in European cities about the extraordinary length of the work. This length was not distressing last night. Bruckner had a great deal to say, and whereas in other symphonies he sometimes stammers and often falters, as though he were not able to express his thoughts, as though they were so great to him that he hesitated to put them into even musical speech, which comes nearest to the full expression of the inherently inexpressible, in this symphony he is master of his speech; he is convincing, authoritative, eloquent. Furthermore, he is more discriminative in his use of material. In other symphonies he is seen building indifferently with marble and clay. His eighth symphony is as a stately temple, in which mortals forget the paltry cares and tribulations of earth, and gods appear calm and benignant.

Bruckner, in the formation of his first movements, runs the risk of incurring the reproach of formlessness by his peculiar and interminable development of subsidiary themes and fragments of these themes. The remembrance of the chief motive is sometimes forgotten, so long are the waste stretches of development. Or the composer is as one sitting down and saying: "This I have done; now what shall I do next?" Analyzed closely, these first movements are not amorphous; but Bruckner's views of form, and his arrangement of a formal plan, differ widely from those that are traditional and accepted, and the impatient, the superficial, the ultra-conservative at once exclaim: "There is no form." In the eighth symphony, gigantic as his scheme is, this scheme is carried out as inexorably as were the military operations of the Japanese over miles of territory in the late war. The continuity is not diverted or broken; the march of the themes with the subsidiary motives is without lapse or confusion; the final combinations, foreseen, are inevitable.

In this first movement the themes have character; they are salient; and in what a masterly manner they are treated, with what richness and beauty! It matters not whether the Scherzo typifies "The German Michael"; the main body of the Scherzo has an aggressive, defiant swing and the Trio is of a tender beauty that one is not accustomed to associate with Bruckner, who, in other works, now seems a seer for whom the high heavens have been unrolled, and now a child amused by childish things, babbling or throwing down carelessly the house of blocks that he had built with infinite pains.

Yet the one peak that rises above the other heights is the sublime Adagio, music that in its immediate effect and in the afterthought of it is lonely and incomparable. There is no question in this symphony of the individuality of the composer. A worshipper of Wagner, he sometimes quoted deliberately a phrase from his master, or his expression for a page or two reminded the hearer of "Tristan" or "The Ring." In this symphony Bruckner revealed himself and spoke in his own lofty speech; and in this adagio he found for his own use "the large utterance of the early gods." Here is music without dross or alloy; music that soars above all that which is sensuous, soars in a flight that is sure-winged and sustained. The Finale has fine and inspiring passages; but it is the one movement in which there are reminders of Brucknerian chattering about inconsequential things. At the same time there are pages of true grandeur, pages that are apocalyptic in sweep of vision.

264

The performance was worthy of the work. Mr. Fiedler conducted with infinite gusto, as one rejoicing in the appointed task, knowing the glory of the symphony and wishing to turn others to his firm belief in the greatness of the composer. The orchestra seconded him in every way. The symphony engrossed the attention of the audience, and the applause that followed each movement was long-continued and sincere.

Mr. Warnke, for every 'cellist is anxious to perform a new work, looked about him anxiously. His choice fell on a new concerto by Hermann Graedener of Vienna, a highly respectable pedagogue and an innocuous composer of Vienna, who is now nearly 65 years old, old enough to know better than to write a concerto for the 'cello. This concerto, played in Boston for the first time, and probably for the first time in America, has little to commend it, with the exception of the short and pretty second section, with its song for the solo instrument and an agreeable accompaniment that shows taste in the instrumentation. The rest of the concerto is commonplace and uninteresting. Mr. Warnke played the Adagio section with breadth and fine quality of tone. In the other sections his performance was not up to his high standard.

The overture to "The Creatures of Prometheus," which has chiefly a historical interest, was last heard at these concerts in 1897. May it now rest on the shelf for another dozen years!

BRUCKNER'S SYMPHONY

NO. 8 FIRST TIME HEARD

By Louis C. Elson.

Record PROGRAMME. Mch. 13, 1909
Bruckner—Symphony No. 8.
Graedener—Violoncello Concerto.
Beethoven—"Prometheus" Overture.
Soloist, Mr. Heinrich Warnke.

The auditor must have had his fill of novelty at this concert, for every note of the two first works of the programme was new to Boston, not a single movement of either work having been heard here before. Mr. Fiedler has had the honor of giving Bruckner's largest work first, in America. It is prolix and difficult work that must have cost conductor and men many hours of tedious labor. Poor Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will soon be called a "Sinfonietta," for all of the recent symphonies given in our concerts have extended beyond the hour. Yet we may hasten to add that Bruckner's symphony towers above its two predecessors, not only in length but in power.

Graedener was much less lengthy. It may have been a logical sequence to go from Bruckner to Graedener for the latter succeeded the former in the chair of harmony and counterpoint at the Vienna conservatory. He does not seem to have the musical gifts of his father, Carl G. P. Graedener, whose songs deserve to be much better known than they are, particularly his "Werner's Lieder aus Welschland."

The concerto is a brand-new work and does not seem at all inspired. It seemed like "Eau Sucree" after the earnestness of the symphony. Its movements are joined together. Its slow movement is so constantly dreamy that one almost goes to sleep, in sympathy. Its rondo-like finale has a chief theme that is tuneful even to the whistling point, and comes back in a jolly treatment by diminution at the close. Its cadenza has some very long maunderings for the violoncello. It is altogether a rather pleasant, but by no means great, work.

A goodly procession marched out before the "Prometheus" overture. It is by no means the greatest of Beethoven's overtures and was probably chosen on account of its brevity. It was well enough played, but the Bruckner symphony dominated this programme altogether. If Bruckner had only known that brevity is sometimes the soul of music as well as of wit!

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Bruckner in a Novel Symphony, Graedener in a New Concerto for Violoncello and Beethoven in a Long Neglected Overture Make the Programme—The New Fashions in Writing for the 'Cello and Graedener's Example of Them—The Exhilaration and the Contrasts of Beethoven After Bruckner

Trans. — Mch. 13, 1909
Bruckner, Beethoven and—longo intervallo—Graedener made the programme at the Symphony Concert yesterday, but Bruckner, with the longest of his symphonies, nearly monopolized it. When Richter, twenty-six years ago in Vienna, played Bruckner's eighth symphony for the first time, it made the whole of his programme, and Hanslick, who looked skew-eyed upon all the composer's music and who must have looked skew-eyed at his watch on this particular occasion, declared the performance consumed an hour and thirty minutes. In that case, Richter's pace must have been slow or his pauses between the movements long, inasmuch as Mr. Fiedler brought the symphony into an hour and a little more and added two numbers, besides, to his programme—Graedener's new concerto for violoncello which gave Mr. Warnke his annual opportunity as a "soloist," and the overture to Beethoven's ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," unperformed here since Mr. Gericke played it with many of the dances as long as 1897. Graedener's concerto was one more instance of the fashion in which minor modern composers write for the instrument. Their elders were quite willing to give the 'cellist opportunity for his feats of difficult skill, and to set the 'cello capering through all sorts of "passage work" and all the opportunities of an elaborate cadenza. They had, of course, to write their songful passages for it, too, and in them they sought out its deepest tones.

The younger men set about the task from another point of view. They have discovered that the violoncello capering is no more lovery to the ear of today than to the eye is the 'cellist who is laboriously making it caper. They have realized as well that the dark, deep-toned, and, too often, sobbing song of the 'cello has become a time-worn convention to which the audience settles back when the performer passes to the slow movement. Accordingly, these new writers—and Graedener among them—have been wary of "passage work" and cadenzas, and they have made their concertos grateful to the 'cellist and grateful to his hearers, not because it sets him technical feats, but because it summons him to display the lighter and the more gracious qualities of the instrument and the finer and the more adroit qualities of his playing. They bid the violoncello charm, and when they set it to singing, as they must, they make its voice gentle, smooth, suave, a little melancholy—and no more. They would have it agreeable rather than "soulful." They take 'cello and 'cellist into the drawing-room and polish both accordingly. Graedener indeed has polished his music to rather a cloying suavity and sweetness, and Mr. Warnke played it as suavely, as exquisitely and as delicately as it was written. Graedener gave him little opportunity to disclose the larger traits of his instrument and of his own playing. The composer limited him often to prettiness; and then it was Mr. Warnke's distinction to transform that prettiness into elegance. Needless, almost to say Graedener found not an idea to put into his music, not a melody that had any other characteristic than prettiness, hardly a passage that disclosed more than amiable fancy. That is the wonder of these contemporary concerti for 'cello. When they are writing for orchestra our composers make their 'celli tell, set them vivid and significant measures; give them engrossing melodies. But face to face with a single violoncello they are dumb—and often dull.

Beethoven, even the minor Beethoven of this Promethean overture, was tonic after such a bath in Graedener's sweetness and after such long, sedulous and a little irritated attention as Bruckner exacted of his hearers. Even in this eighth symphony, which with all its length, seems the best-knit and generally the compactest of his music, his besetting infirmity of loose and fragmentary design persists, of meanderings here and meanderings there in pursuit of some poor fragment of a melody, or of some tempting variation of the instrumental color. Even when Bruckner is most impressive, as he is in the slow movement and the finale of this symphony, the listener never feels quite secure. In them, he holds—and he holds unusually—to his purpose and his design, but the hearer none the less wonders apprehensively how soon the composer's strength and concentration will fail. In more senses than one, alike in the pursuit of the melodies and in their pervading air of uncertainty, Bruckner's music gives the pleasure of the chase. By these tokens, the firm-handed, sure-striding Beethoven was good to hear. Trifle as this overture to a ballet is, he knew which he wished to accomplish in it and how he would accomplish it, and forthwith set about his work with his wonted vigor. The downright force of the sinccato chords at the beginning was bracing to the ear and the spirit after Graedener's prettiness and Bruckner's ecstatic dreaming and confused rush of many voices. Lightly, but surely ran the introduction, and then followed the rest of the overture, masculine music, high-spirited music, music that was warm and alive with the creating energy of the composer, that made its way forward unhesitatingly, that wrought itself spontaneously, that small thing as it is in the whole sum of Beethoven's work, had an individuality and a compulsion of its own. Even when he wrote trifles Beethoven's way was big—and lasting. Heard after twelve years the overture seemed like a new piece. Bruckner's was really novel—the first performance seemingly of this symphony in C minor in America. By that token understanding will be clearer and estimate truer after the repetition of tonight. H. T. P.

265

in F major, for ORGAN, THREE HORNS ORCHESTRA.

ime.)

C POEM from "The Redemption." ime.)

ist:

GOODRICH.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

XIX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 27, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

SCHUBERT,

UNFINISHED SYMPHONY in B minor.

I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante con moto.

BRAHMS,

VARIATIONS on a Theme of Josef Haydn, op. 56 A.

LISZT,

CONCERTO in E flat major, No. 1, for PIANOFORTE
AND ORCHESTRA.

ANDRÉ MAQUARRE,

OVERTURE, "On the Seacliffs" op. 6.
(First performance in America.)

Soloist:

Miss GERMAINE SCHNITZER.

The Pianoforte is a Baldwin.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

MISS SCHNITZER AND HER FIERY LISZT

Trans. — Mch. 27, 1909
Her Playing at the Symphony Concerts—

Gervase Elwes for a New English Singer
—A Tested Experiment in Berlin—The "Free People's Theatre" and Its Working —Beethoven's Choral Symphony to End
the Season Here—The Metropolitan Opera and Its Next Visit to Boston—
Miss Le Baron Engaged for the Castle Square—Henrietta Crosman in a New Play—Barrie and "Samson"—Mme. Sembrich in Europe—Mr. Safonoff's Farewell

Miss Schnitzer chose wisely when she picked Liszt's concerto in E-flat for her first appearances, on Friday and Saturday, with the Symphony Orchestra. The concerto, unless some rare pianist, like Mr. Joseffy, is able to give it an individual and curious cast of his own, ought to sound like a magnificent and sustained improvisation, creating itself out of itself. From the outset, it asks a nervous and exciting power of the pianist. The orchestra begins, and then he—or in this particular case she—declares her mastery in the first measures that fall to the solo instrument. They must stride, have their air of authority, bring their suggestion of force in reserve. The slow section is not reposeful. It is nervous musing, eager to set itself free. Then, with the tinkling triangle—and Mr. Ludwig played it with the delicacy that Liszt imagined—come the scherzo and release. Thereafter the concerto is the pianist's own. The music gathers strength, pace, brilliancy. The piano answers, persuades, leads, masters the orchestra, pauses for a moment, asserts itself anew, gains at every turn larger, freer, more impetuous and rhapsodic voice. A concerto, if you will, but a concerto that once the nervous prelude is done becomes a glowing rhapsody for the piano over, rather than with, the orchestra. No wonder pianists love it; no wonder that repetition does not lessen its nervous thrill. It has been exciting for fifty years.

Miss Schnitzer is young, and a little hard with the unconscious hardness of youth. It is by an effort of will and comprehension that she has summoned, in the music of her recitals here, moods of melancholy, of reflection, of sober and tender quiet, of romantic musing. She has been her freer, her natural self, when the music has called her to large power of tone, to rhythmic energy, to broad eloquence, to rhapsodic warmth of feeling, and to rich brilliancy of expression. Her tone has beauty, but at its best it is a full-bodied, full-blooded beauty that drives with its propulsive power and stirs by its nervous intensity. The large surety that is in all that Miss Schnitzer does, told when the piano declares that it is, and will be, the master at the start, of the concerto. She was beginning in eloquence that was no forced rhetoric. In the slow section the warmth and the body of her tone, the elastic play of it in light and shade served her and the music no less well. Thence onward, her whole playing was rhapsodic. She flung off the scherzo like momentary and glinting improvisation, showering itself about the triangle; and then, with larger and larger voice and fiery and more fiery intensity she advanced through the ardors of the finale. She gave it speed and sweep, splashed it with tonal color and brilliant ornament; she made its contrasts seem the impulse of the moment, and without a trace of calculation, drove the music in mounting glow and rising pace and freedom to the gathering climax. It was Liszt with his nervous energy, his rhapsodic thrill, his dazzle and his excitement.

As English singers used to come to us, they were oftener more commendable for the natural quality of their voices than for the intelligence, the artistry, and the sense of style with which they used them. Now some of them seem to be reversing this appeal. Their voice is—what it happens to be. In their use of it lie their interest and their merit. Mme. Blanche Marchesi, for example, is virtually an English singer, and it is the expressiveness of her tones and not their quality in pure song that makes her distinction. Mr. Gervase Elwes, the English tenor, who sang here for the first time in a recital at Steiner Hall on Saturday afternoon, is in still more unusual case. It is hard, indeed, to define the quality of his voice. He calls himself a tenor; but not a Latin from Calais to Palermo would count him one. His tones lack the penetrating, the vibrant, the peculiar carrying quality of a pure tenor. They have neither the silvery brightness of such a voice in its upper reaches nor the golden richness it sometimes gains as it approaches the range of a high baritone. Yet baritone quality is oftenest the salient characteristic of Mr. Elwes's voice, but even curiously veiled, shadowed, even hard. Under any name, it lacks sensuous beauty and sensuous appeal, giving pleasure by what it does rather than by what it is.

Even so, Mr. Elwes's tones command no very wide and no very intense range of emotion. He ended his recital, for example, with a group of familiar and unfamiliar songs by Brahms—"Botschaft," "Wir Wandelten," "Der Kuss," "An Die Tauben" and sundry others—songs of diversified and often deeply felt moods. Perhaps, Mr. Elwes accepts that strange standard of certain English musical prizes and pedants who fancy Brahms so "intellectual" that he must be stripped of all feeling; but the singer seems too intelligent for such a distorting notion. Yet there was a persistent lack of emotional, of com-communicating, of diversifying and discriminating quality in his singing of these eight songs. Not one of them wrought their mood unmistakably and absorbingly upon the hearer. Yet in them, as in the eighteenth-century pieces and in the folk songs of the rest of the programme, shone the virtues that are Mr. Elwes's best traits. He sings, whatever the language, with unusual clarity and precision of diction. He sings with intelligent sense of the melodic line and with an admirable fidelity of it. He directs his voice, technically, with practised and discerning skill. He is apt in his phrasing. He is just in his emphasis. He does all things in good taste, unforcedly, wholly sincerely. The refinements of vocal artistry, within the limitations of his tones, are at his command. It is the communicating spark, be it of voice or feeling, that is lacking to him.

Miss Katherine Lincoln, a young soprano, and Mrs. Olive Whitely-Hilton, the violinist, who has begun to make a place for herself here, gave a concert to a very friendly audience in Potter Hall on Saturday. It applauded the freshness of Miss Lincoln's voice, a high, clear, and elastic soprano, the brightness of her tones, and the agreeable lightness that she gave to some of her songs. It found no less pleasure in Mrs. Hilton's playing of her violin pieces, brilliant bits, for the most part, of light technical display.

H. T. P.

HONORS SHARED AT SYMPHONY

Journal — March 29, 1909
Miss Germaine Alice Schnitzer and Andre Maquarre shared the honors at the Symphony concert Saturday night. Miss Schnitzer, a young pianist from Paris, pounded magnificently through the Liszt concerto in E flat major, No. 1, and the audience pounded out much applause. There is nothing ethereal about this statuesque French girl's playing. It is substantial, straightforward, masculine in much more than the average degree. Only Paderewski this season has handled the piano so vigorously. The concerto is a showy piece, and Miss Schnitzer made no effort to extract any poetry from it.

Mr. Maquarre, the first flute, was represented by a new overture, called "On the Sea Cliffs." For all its suggestiveness, it might have been called almost anything else, from "At the Ball Game" to "Revising the Tariff." It was very lively music, with here and there a few measures of pleasant musing. It was the last number on the program, but the crowd waited to call the popular and much admired composer to the front.

The orchestral numbers were Schubert's unfinished symphony and the Brahms variations on a Haydn theme. Both were delightfully performed.

19TH CONCERT OF THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Miss Germaine Schnitzer Pianist—
Mr. Willy Hess Greeted.

Herald — March 28, 1909
By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, gave its 19th concert last night in Symphony Hall. Miss Germaine Schnitzer was the pianist. The program was as follows:

Unfinished Symphony, B minor.....Schubert
Variations on a theme of Haydn.....Brahms
Concerto in E flat No. 1, for piano.....Liszt
Overture, "On the Seacliffs".....Maquarre

This concert does not call for an extended notice. All but one of the compositions were familiar, and there were no forced readings. The proper tempo of the second theme of the first movement in Schubert's symphony has long been a subject of discussion. Mr. Fiedler took the lovely melody at a slower pace than we have been accustomed to and thus gave the melody a marked emotional character. The transition was a little abrupt, and sticklers for continuity of thought and general musical flow might take an exception; yet the contrast was effective. In spite of the beautiful and purely Schubertian second theme of the second movement, the reputation of the composer would be enhanced if only the first movement had been written. The second falls far below it.

The reading of Brahms' variations was contrapuntally lucid, and each set had its own appropriate character, with one exception—the charming variation marked "grazioso" might have been treated more classically, and it might have been played in a more tenderly romantic spirit.

Mr. Maquarre, the remarkable first flute of the orchestra, is known here as a composer of pieces that have been played at Pop concerts and of songs. The overture was performed for the first time in this country. It was composed about six years ago when Mr. Maquarre was spending a summer at a French seaside resort. The main body of the overture has little that is salient or distinguished, but in the second of the preceding slow movements there are passages that are picturesque and, indeed, imaginative. Mr. Maquarre has facility in the matter of instrumentation, and perhaps the overture would have made a stronger impression if it had been performed without cuts, which affected its structure. As it was, the composer was heartily applauded.

Miss Schnitzer first visited Boston in 1906, and she had then been engaged to play at a Symphony concert. Her arrival was delayed by reason of the death of her father, and the engagement was necessarily cancelled. She played here with the orchestra last night for the first time in this city. During the last two years she has gained in breadth and in sense of proportion without any loss of the peculiar brilliance that distinguished her when she first came. Her performance of Liszt's concerto was an admirable one in conception and in carrying out of the intention. Her technic rests on solid foundations and it is highly developed; but she has much more than a praiseworthy technic, much more than the brilliance that easily arouses applause.

She played with rare elegance in bravura passages; her melodic expression was tasteful and emotional in the Lisztian manner; and her purely virtuosic display was characterized by a verve that did not untrun clearness and respect for the phrase. She well deserved the applause that recalled her many times.

Mr. Willy Hess was warmly greeted by the sympathetic audience on his return to the duties of concert-master.

MUSICAL EVENTS

The soloist at Friday's and Saturday's Symphony concerts was Miss Germaine Schnitzer, the young pianist who has proven one of the season's most interesting artists.

Miss Schnitzer is remembered from her previous recital for the exquisite velvet lining which surrounds her pianissimo tones. They are distinct, as well, although they be hushed, and are beautifully joined in well formed phrases. This element of pianistic poetry is not always compatible with the well-nigh masculine animation and vigor which appears more properly to be a native trait of Miss Schnitzer's.

The other number of interest was the new overture, "On the Sea Cliff," by Mr. Maquarre, the admirable first flute of the orchestra. The work appears to be a highly-colored series of sketches, scenes or episodes. Doubtless the cuts which Mr. Fiedler observed emphasizes this impression. Mr. Maquarre has no elongated thematic stories to tell. With agile brush he paints a few bold strokes which to an imaginative mind ought to be salient and vivid.

The simple, serene, singing melodies which Schubert gives now to strings and now to the woodsy flutes, oboes, clarinets or horns in his "Unfinished Symphony" will always insure it appreciative listeners.

Even revelers in abstruse, problematic and psychological music must at times crave as refreshment for their jaded spirits moments of such tranquil beauty as may be found in the andante of this symphony. The consummate purity of tone and the intimate blending of the different choirs of our orchestra serve to refine upon its beauty the more. Of the Brahms variations, the tricky fifth with its nimble chatter of woodwind and violins and the spirited sixth with its crisp and rhythmic horns offered particular delight.

ARTHUR B. WILSON.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Post — March 27, 1909
By Olin Downes
The 19th public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra was held yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Miss Germaine Schnitzer, pianist, played the Liszt E flat concerto.

Mr. Fiedler gave a vigorous and straightforward reading of Schubert's unfinished symphony, but the feature of this concert was the uneven playing of the magnetic Miss Schnitzer and the superb performance of the Brahms variations.

Miss Schnitzer appeared nervous; was rhythmically unsteady; inclined to run away from the orchestra, and then unable to keep the pace she had set. But she injected her personality into every measure of the scintillating, rhapsodic music, and in spite of the deficiencies mentioned, it was a singularly engrossing and exciting achievement. The very nervousness enhanced the thrill of the rushing finale.

Mr. Maquarre's overture, flamboyant and picturesque, was composed in 1903, when the first flutist of the Symphony Orchestra was living at a seaside resort in France. It is written with enthusiasm, with engaging gusto. It is lavishly scored, as one who suspected that some day the thing would be whacked and tooted and fiddled by an orchestra of noble dimensions and nearly unlimited power. At the concerts of next week Mr. Gustav Strube's symphony in B minor will be performed for the first time.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Globe — March 28, 1909
Mr. Fiedler introduced another new work at last week's Symphony concert, an overture by Mr. Andre Maquarre of the orchestra, entitled "On the Sea Cliffs," which was played for the first time in America. Miss Germaine Schnitzer, the young pianist who has shown marked ability in her recitals here, was the soloist, playing Liszt's first piano concerto, and the other selections were Schubert's unfinished symphony and the Brahms variations on a theme by Haydn. Mr. Willy Hess was at his old post as concert master.

This seems to be an age of skilful young female pianists, for this season several have appeared in recitals and at the Symphony concerts and displayed artistic powers which would have been considered marvelous a few years ago. Miss Schnitzer, who is not yet 22 years old, has already won favor here by her sound musicianship, and that favor gained in recitals was increased by her performance of the Liszt piece, which, though familiar, is full of that tonal coloring so dear to the soloist and pleasing to the auditor when rightly set forth.

The slight figure of the artist gives little evidence of a physical vigor which is able to cope quite successfully with the many fortissimo passages running through the orchestral score; but Miss Schnitzer's finger and arm power are finely developed, and in this part of her work she generally maintained the proper relations between the solo instrument and the band.

Finger dexterity, clear in rapid runs, arpeggios and the different chord passages, she has seemingly sufficient for all demands. Her cantabile is sweet and in legato passages she displays a smooth and even touch. The famous "problem of the triangle" was worked out in splendid style, the brilliant figures and delicate rhythms being given with a dash and clean-cut enunciation suiting exactly the mood of the composer. The strenuous finale was played with such a gusto, if such a term may be applied to the work of a lady pianist, that the audience began to applaud before the concerto was finished. It was a brilliant performance throughout and Miss Schnitzer was well deserving the many recalls she received after she had ceased playing.

Mr Maquarre's overture is a pleasing little program piece, a meditative and poetic work in which one can readily find suggestions of moods and thoughts conjured up by idlers at the seashore. His treatment of the wood winds deserves special mention, the themes given them being arranged admirably.

Mr Fiedler's reading of Schubert's unfinished symphony was thoroughly sympathetic, though of course traditional, and all the plaintive harmonies were brought out in beautiful cadences, each section of the orchestra giving perfect utterances to the haunting melodies. Miss Schnitzer could not have found better orchestral association than was offered her in the concerto, and the variations on Haydn's theme were given with all due significance of intonations and instrumental combinations.

This week's program will include a new symphony by Gustav Strube of the orchestra, a work which is still in manuscript and will be played for the first time anywhere. Several of Mr Strube's compositions have appeared on the Symphony programs, though nothing so large as the new work, which the composer says is classical in form but entirely modern in treatment.

The rest of the program will be devoted to excerpts from music dramas by Richard Wagner. These will be the prelude to "Lohengrin," the "Bacchanale" from the Paris version of "Tannhauser," the funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods," and the "Ride of Valkyres" from "Die Walkure."

MR. FIEDLER MAKES A LIGHT PROGRAMME

Short, and with One Exception, Familiar Pieces—The Popular Brahms of the "St. Anthony" Variations—A Chance Contrast with Schubert—Mr. Maquarre's New Overture—Reger's Musical Joke at the Concert of the Hess-Schroeder Quartet and the Happy Result of It—Another

Surprise of the Evening

Trans. ————— Adv. ————— March 27, 1909
At the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, Mr. Fiedler relaxed the succession of long and usually novel symphonies that he has maintained for a month and more. Four pieces, each short in its kind, as the writing of music goes nowadays, made his programme, and three of them—Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, Brahms's "St. Anthony" Variations and Liszt's concerto for piano in E-flat have long been familiar. Then, for ending stood the new music of the day, an overture, "On the Sea Cliffs," by Mr. Maquarre, the first flutist of the orchestra, and it as well laid no stress upon the attention. Curiously, besides, two of the four items seem to be the best-liked orchestral pieces of the composers who wrote them. Schubert's symphony in C, the symphony that used to be of the heavenly length, may excel in the extent and the range of its beauties, the Unfinished Symphony, but it does not excel it in their quality and it hardly exerts so swift and so possessing a charm. An audience must hear the symphony in C with a little patience. It listens to the Unfinished Symphony in tireless gladness. Schubert's soft beauty can pall like all things that seem wrought so easily and that have their note of sweetness. There is not time for such mischance in the Unfinished Symphony. The detractors of Brahms will deny brusquely that he has ever written or ever could write a popular orchestral piece. Yet, as popularity goes in symphony concerts, the quick, warm and sustained applause that followed the "St. Anthony" Variations yesterday was significant. The new symphonies of the last month, except Bruckner's, have had less from their hearers on Friday afternoon.

This applause for the Variations and the eager and absorbed attention with which the audience followed them, had their meaning too. The professional "Brahmsite" and often the professional musician can find little interest in the piece outside the technical problems Brahms has set himself and the ingenuity with which he solves them. Doubtless, they preoccupied Brahms who like to propose himself such feats and, too often in some of his other pieces, labored obviously over them. They are interesting to study on paper, they are interesting to the technician and the musical scholar to hear. It is safe, however, to surmise that nineteen out of twenty of the listeners who found such pleasure in the Variations yesterday were unaware of the existence of this prowess, unless they chanced upon the enlightening paragraph in the all-knowing programme book. What charmed them in the music—again it is safe to surmise—was first Haydn's buxom melody in itself with its homely flavor and propulsive force and then the freedom and the warmth with which Brahms has wrought his variations upon it. They may be as full of calculation as technicians and the "Brahmsites," who, like all devotees, will set their idol in the worst light, would have us believe. None the less, Brahms to the hearer of average musical intelligence has disguised this problem-making and problem-solving far more persuasively than he has in other pieces where there should be no room for such exercises. The years go, the Variations pass and repass; and still they keep a freshness of mood, an elasticity of imagination, a cheerful glow of spirit that are unusual after all in the sum of Brahms's music. The official biographer wrenches his fancy to find a parallel for each variation in some episode in the life of St. Anthony. Brahms, like Haydn before him, took the saint, who in this case is only a title, by no means so seriously. What is really warm in him is the bonhomie that he could show to his intimates and the last flashes of the romantic sentiment that like every German he had in his youth. Technical problems or no technical problems, the Variations have often a frankness of melody that is unusual with him.

And the contrast was interesting, too, between this melody of Brahms and the melody of the Schubert of the Unfinished Symphony that had just preceded him. Mr. Fiedler is not of one of those restless souls among conductors who would roughen Schubert's euphony or who would mar his sustained song by quest for the newly emphasized phrase and a strange poignancy of accent. Rather, he went to the other extreme. As it seemed to us, his pace in the second movement of the Unfinished Symphony was unusually slow. It tended even to linked sweetness long drawn out. It made Schubert's music a little too soft, almost a little sultry. Instead of calm was languor. The fine undulation of the music, the sense of shimmering life in it were lacking. As Schubert was thus oversoftened, so the homely old Haydn of the theme and the robust Brahms of the variations came like a cool and tonic air blowing across Mr. Fiedler's Schubertian hothouse. He was only just to Brahms, playing the variations lucidly, warmly, with rich diversity of tone. He had been a little more than just to Schubert and Brahms seemed in the immediate contrast of a curiously sturdy and vigorous melody. The listener was half ready to believe that Schubert had sung too fluently, and that Brahms's comparative reticence and insistent sobriety were a grace.

Liszt and Miss Schnitzer, who will play better tonight when she is more at ease and in more intimate relation with the orchestra, but who was exciting enough in exciting music yesterday—Liszt and Miss Schnitzer bridged the way to Mr. Maquarre's new overture. Certainly the composer took joy of his orchestra, scattering instrumental color lavishly over his score and urging his instrumental voices sometimes to the utmost. Mr. Maquarre clearly loves sonority in his ears and the ascent or the descent of racing progressions. Certainly the overture is all eagerness for expression. The exuberance of the music is tireless; the quick transitions speak of ceaseless agitation. Mr. Maquarre is too impatient to worry a figure or sedulously to fit a tonal mosaic. But what are these tempestuous moods and what clue does the title—or for that matter, the music—itself give to them? "Sur les Falaises," Mr. Maquarre calls his overture; "On the Sea Cliffs," goes the translation. Presumably they are the great white cliffs that rise smoothly enough out of the Channel, that are carpeted with green turf, that sometimes stretch like plateaus inland, and that shine at the slightest provocation of sunlight. Of course the fierce Channel storms, the short, sharp Channel seas now and then lash them; but in softer weather they are the images of smooth, stolid, shining calm. Presumably the overture reflected moods of place, and certainly the moods of the music were as swift and changeful as the Channel seas, but little indeed did they reflect in tones the summer calm and the soft mists that now and then enwrap these cliffs. The overture sorely needs a programme or at least a footnote as well as a title. As it is, whichever Mr. Maquarre imagined, it is far too easy to take the overture as an energetic and expert exercise in instrumental color and contrast. H. T. P.

BRILLIANT LISZT WORK AT SYMPHONY CONCERT Adv. ————— March 27, 1909 MISS SCHNITZER PLAYS THE E FLAT CONCERTO

Schubert's Sweet Unfinished Symphony and an Overture by Andre Maquarre Also Given.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

"Unfinished Symphony".....Schubert
Variations on a Haydn Theme.....Brahms
Piano Concerto in E flat.....Liszt
Soloist, Miss Germaine Schnitzer.

Overture, "Sur les Falaises"....Andre Maquarre

Our orchestra has come back from its tour wearing its laurels modestly. It resumed business at the old stand, yesterday afternoon, with a programme which did not have an hour-and-a-half symphony on the list and which did not present a single puzzle to be solved. It is just as well to rinse our ears out with such music as Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" once in a while. This sweet work was written at a time when composers were allowed to write tunes and when beauty was held to be one of the canons of musical creation. Not that we would wish composers to write in just that way today. The composer of the future, however, will add, to such delicious melody as Schubert wrote, the wealth of tone-color of a Strauss, and the figure development of a Brahms. But it was a great relief to listen to the old and simple work, even with its repetitions and its formal symmetry. It was played with excellent taste and without any attempt to force grandeur into its artless prattle; the fault lay in the opposite direction. There was a tendency to pianissimo, and to retard languorously. There were, of course, no technical difficulties in the path, and the ensemble was exquisite.

It was pleasant, too, to hear the classical old guard in the audience applaud the work long and heartily. The charm of melody is perennial and Schubert's symphonies are but songs in disguise.

We sometimes doubt the old Latin saying—"Variatio delectat." At any rate we feel that when a skillful composer begins varying a theme he rarely knows where to stop. Beethoven, Brahms, Strauss, Noren, and a host of others have fallen under the sway of the variation demon. Given a clear theme with a few ear-marks (syncopations etc.) to recognize it by, and a man like Brahms could vary it almost forever. Fortunately, however, in this case, he does not squeeze the last drop out of his tonal lemon. The variations were the more interesting because comparatively brief. They were excellently contrasted and did not scorn melodic effects. It made an interesting display of the woodwind, horn and strings each in turn, and the final climax was a real culmination. The reading and performance were all that could be desired.

Liszt's E flat concerto belongs to the best style of modern musical spice. If we gauge by form and by balance of piano against orchestra it is not a concerto at all, but a very brilliant Fantasia. But it is inspiring and exciting, all the same, and it snaps its fingers in the face of the classicists. Its treatment of the chief figure of seven notes, which begins the work, "tutti," to which Liszt once playfully attached the words—"Dass versteh't ihr alle niche" ("That you ne'er can understand") is masterly, and the concerto never commits the crime of being dull even an instant.

The artist, too, was well suited to the work. If we have sometimes found Miss Germaine Schnitzer too exuberant, in this work all her abundant enthusiasm and scintillating technique had legitimate outlet and expression. Fire, energy and dash were the chief characteristics of the performance, and the climaxes were worked up with a breadth that was commendable. Her octave and chord playing was superb. Miss Schnitzer won, and deserved, an absolute triumph.

It was impossible to count the number of recalls to which she responded. No artist could have been more enthusiastically appreciated. And the work itself! It seems only now that Liszt is coming out of his own shadow as a great pianist.

Our orchestra is a hotbed of composers. In this programme we had our well known flautist, Andre Maquarre, bursting forth as a composer, and next week we are to have a symphony by another member of the band—Mr. Strube. "On the Cliffs" evidently does not go back to the time of the ancient cliff-dwellers, for the overture is modern in its general treatment. Not so modern as the symphonies we have lately lived through, and ("Deo Gratia") not so long, either. It begins with a fierce downward phrase, as if one of the inhabitants had fallen off the cliff.

There is much restlessness and agitation in the work, and many sharp contrasts, rather than any attempt at long-breathed melody.

There are radical progressions in the overture, but all the figure treatment is logical and coherent, while the final climax is finely worked up. Therefore "On the Seacliffs," as the English title runs, was a work that was made very welcome and the applause was persistent enough to cause the composer to acknowledge it. Mr. Andre Maquarre must feel convinced that a prophet is sometimes honored in his own country.

Symphony Concert

At the Symphony Concert of Friday afternoon, Mr. Fiedler relaxed the succession of long and usually novel symphonies that he has maintained for a month and more. Four pieces, each short in its kind, as the writing of music goes nowadays, made his programme, and three of them—Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, Brahms' "St. Anthony" Variations and Liszt's concerto for piano in E-flat have long been familiar. Then, for ending stood the new music of the day, an overture, "On the Sea Cliffs," by Mr. Maquarre, the first flautist of the orchestra, and it as well laid no stress upon the attention. Curiously, besides, two of the four items seem to be the best-liked orchestral pieces of the composers who wrote them. Schubert's symphony in C, the symphony that used to be of the heavenly length, may excel in the extent and the range of its beauties, the Unfinished Symphony, but it does not excel in their quality and it hardly exerts so swift and so possessing a charm. An audience must hear the symphony in C with a little patience. It listens to the Unfinished Symphony in tireless gladness. Schubert's soft beauty can pall like all things that seem wrought so easily and they have their note of sweetness. There is no time for such mischance in the Unfinished Symphony. The detractors of Brahms will deny brusquely that he has ever written or ever could write a popular orchestral piece. Yet, as popularity goes in symphony concerts, the quick, warm and sustained applause that followed the "St. Anthony" Variations was significant. The new symphonies of February, except Bruckner's, have had less from their hearers on Friday afternoon.

This applause for the Variations and the eager and absorbed attention with which the audience followed them, had their meaning too. The professional "Brahmsite" and often the professional musician can find little interest in the piece outside the technical problems Brahms has set himself and the ingenuity with which he solves them. Doubtless, they preoccupy Brahms who like to propose himself such feats and, too often in some of his other pieces, labored obviously over them. They are interesting to study on paper, they are interesting to the technician and the musical scholar to hear. It is safe, however, to surmise that nineteen out of twenty of the listeners who found such pleasure in the Variations were unaware of the existence of this prowess, unless they chanced upon the enlightening paragraph in the all-knowing programme book. What charmed them in the music—again it is safe to surmise—was first Haydn's buxom melody in itself with its homely flavor and propulsive force and then the freedom and the warmth with which Brahms has wrought his variations upon it. They may be as full of calculation as technicians and the "Brahmsites," who, like all devotees, will set their idol in the worst light, would have us believe. None the less, Brahms to the hearer of average musical intelligence has disguised this problem-making and problem-solving far more persuasively than he has in other pieces where there should be no room for such exercises. The years go, the Variations pass and repass; and still they keep a freshness of mood, an elasticity of imagination, a cheerful glow of spirit that are unusual after all in the sum of Brahms's music. The official biographer wrenches his fancy to find a parallel for each variation in some episode in the life of St. Anthony. Brahms, like Haydn before him, took the saint, who in this case is only a title, by no means so seriously. What is really warm in him is the bonhomie that he could show to his intimates and the last flashes of the romantic sentiment that like every German he had in his youth. Technical problems or no technical problems, the Variations have often a frankness of melody that is unusual with him.

And the contrast was interesting, too, between this melody of Brahms and the melody of the Schubert of the Unfinished Symphony that had just preceded him. Mr. Fiedler is not of one of those restless souls among conductors who would roughen Schubert's euphony or who would mar his sustained song by quest for the newly emphasized phrase and a strange poignancy of accent. Rather, he went to the other extreme. As it seemed to us, his pace in the second movement of the Unfinished Symphony was unusually slow. It tended even to linked sweetness long drawn out. It made Schubert's music a little too soft, almost a little sultry. Instead of calm was languor. The fine undulation of the music, the sense of shimmering life in it were lacking. As Schubert was thus oversoftened, so the homely old Haydn of the theme and the robust Brahms of the variations came like a cool and tonic air blowing across Mr. Fiedler's Schubertian hothouse. He was only just to Brahms, playing the variations lucidly, warmly, with rich diversity of tone. He had been a little more than just to Schubert and Brahms seemed in the immediate contrast of a curiously sturdy and vigorous melody. The listener was half ready to believe that Schubert had sung too fluently, and that Brahms's comparative reticence and insistent sobriety were a grace.

Liszt and Miss Schnitzer bridged the way to Mr. Maquarre's new overture. Certainly the composer took joy of his orchestra, scattering instrumental color lavishly over his score and urging his instrumental voices sometimes to the utmost. Mr. Maquarre clearly loves sonority in his ears and the ascent or the descent of racing progressions. Certainly the overture is all eagerness for expression. The exuberance of the music is tireless; the quick transitions speak of ceaseless agitation. Mr. Maquarre is too impatient to worry a figure or sedulously to fit a tonal mosaic. But what are these tempestuous moods and what clue does the title—or for that matter, the music—itsself give to them? "Sur les Falaises," Mr. Maquarre calls his overture; "On the Sea Cliffs," goes the translation. Presumably they are the great white cliffs that rise smoothly enough out of the Channel, that are carpeted with green turf, that sometimes stretch like plateaus inland, and that shine at the slightest provocation of sunlight. Of course the fierce Channel storms, the short, sharp Channel seas now and then lash them; but in softer weather they are the images of smooth, stolid, shining calm. Presumably the overture reflected moods of place, and certainly the moods of the music were as swift and changeable as the Channel seas, but little indeed did they reflect in tones the summer calm and the soft mists that now and then enwrap these cliffs. The overture sorely needs a programme or at least a footnote as well as a title. As it is, whichever Mr. Maquarre imagined, it is far too easy to take the overture as an energetic and expert exercise in instrumental color and contrast. H. T. P.

in B flat major, No. 4.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

XX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 3, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

STRUBE,

SYMPHONY in B minor (MS.)

I. Andante; Allegro comodo.

II. Adagio ma non troppo.

III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace.

IV. Allegro energico.

Conducted by the Composer.

(First performance.)

WAGNER,

PRELUDE to "Lohengrin."

WAGNER,

BACCHANALE from "Tannhäuser."

WAGNER,

FUNERAL MARCH from "Dusk of the Gods."

WAGNER,

"RIDE OF THE VALKYRIES."

STRUBE'S NEW SYMPHONY BY THE ORCHESTRA

Adm. ———— Apr 2.09
ORIGINALITY SHOWN
AND UNDENIABLE SKILL

Remainder of the Programme Devoted to Wagner and Played Con Amore.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Symphony in B minor.....Strube
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner
Siegfried's Funeral Music.....Wagner
"Good Friday's Spell" from "Parsifal".....Wagner
"Ride of the Valkyries".....Wagner

Altogether a noble programme and excellently carried out. Mr. Strube conducted his own symphony. He was greeted with cordial applause when he appeared on the conductor's stand and the most friendly interest was manifested in his new work. The symphony began well, its introduction being expressive and the succeeding first movement coherent and intelligible as well as ingenious. There is good figure treatment in the work and many derivations and subtleties. There is a vein of sadness running through it that makes Strube a sort of German Debussy, but this is not meant in any sense of plagiarism, for there is originality enough in the first movement and its introduction.

The Adagio leans heavily towards the reed instruments and all through the work there is much prominence given to the oboe and the French horn. As the gloom, or pensiveness, of the first movement is carried still further in the Adagio, one feels like paraphrasing Emerson's question—"Why so sour, my little man?" The effect thus far, both because of the instrumentation and the subject matter, is rather monochromatic. It is a plaintive school with which we are not much in sympathy, but the work is a strong one in this school.

The Coda of the Adagio, with its beautiful horn phrases, is a true climax, full of poetry and of originality.

The Scherzo is very free. At times it is almost like an Oriental dance. It is quaint and bizarre rather than playful. The predominant reed color is here contrasted with the baleful tones of muted horns and trumpets. There is much jugglery of figures here and undeniable skill is displayed in almost every phrase.

The Finale is worked up well. There is some transference of figures, some dialogue of oboe and flute, some dancing of nymphs and dryads in a sylvan forest (although there is no "programme" to the work), but the symphony still leans towards "cerebral music," the music that one must think about rather than revel in. We note "Tannhaeuser" pass by in a most recognizable manner, in this procession. There is broad final treatment; in fact, all through the work, Mr. Strube works up his climaxes well.

Summing up, we can say that this symphony is modern without being a puzzle. It is a distinct advance on Mr. Strube's preceding orchestral works. It was worth playing and hearing and the composer-conductor deserved the three recalls which he received. A little more of brightness, more diversity of style, and a little more melody, would make Mr. Strube a strong factor in American music.

After this the remainder of the concert was by a composer named Wagner. This composer really has some good musical thoughts. He uses a modern orchestra, but he does not employ it for noise. He manages to put some meaning into even the smallest of his figures, and he does manage to convey what he means to the auditor without any perceptible straining.

People do not write this kind of music at present for at least 17 different reasons. The first of these reasons is—they can't! Perhaps it is unnecessary to give the others.

The glory of the Wagner part of the programme was indescribable. Mr. Fiedler took some of the tempo slower than we have been accustomed to, but matters only gained by this. The great climax in the "Lohengrin" Prelude was magnificently worked up and the final celestial ending, on four violins in harmonics, was most delicately shaded. The Bacchanale was sumptuous, sensuous, and a musical orgy of intense power.

The Funeral Music, it ought not to be called a Funeral March, of Siegfried, was as broad and dignified as we have ever heard it. One could defy any of our prolix modern composers to say as much in a page as is said in the first three chords of this great number. Mr. Fiedler gave more accent to the ever-recurring Death-figure than we are accustomed to, but we found the effect warranted by the result.

The tender promise of release from both Winter and Sorrow, that is breathed in the "Good Friday's Spell," was deliciously in contrast. One revelled in every measure.

Then came the whinneying of the steeds, the gallop of the Valkyrie. There are many gallops in orchestral music. There is a ghostly gentleman who gallops in the Lenore symphony. Frau Holle gallops in the "Im Walde" symphony. Berlioz causes Faust to have a very disagreeable broncho ride at the end of "Faust," but none of these are able to present such a stable as is here displayed.

In the Musical Horse Show Wagner is entitled to the blue ribbon. And Mr. Fiedler played the works, each and all, as if he loved them. It was a pure and unalloyed musical pleasure, that last half of the concert, and the orchestra played as if inspired. Bravi! Mr. Fiedler and orchestra. Bravi! and thanks; not even Hammerstein and all his starry warblers can dim your glory!

STRUBE'S NEW SYMPHONY.

Trans. — Apr. 4, 1909
An interesting Composition Played for the First Time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There was a special interest in the Symphony program of last week, for not only had conductor Fiedler scheduled another "first time" symphony, but the composer was one whose association with the orchestra had made him a familiar figure, and whose abilities had long been recognized as being of a high order, both as composer and conductor. Gustav Strube's works cover a good deal of musical ground and at least a half dozen of them have appeared on the Symphony programs since he joined the first violin group in the orchestra about 17 years ago. The new B minor symphony, which is in four parts, is his largest work, and has been in hand for two years. He calls it "absolute music," and there are no tone pictures or definite program outlined. While classical in form the treatment is modern.

Mr. Fiedler retired temporarily from the conductor's desk and Mr. Strube directed the performance of his work. Primarily the symphony seems to be notable in the manner in which a plethora of melodic material is utilized and apportioned in changing rhythms and among the different choirs without producing a lot of cross harmonies. The various subjects are worked out with skill, for Mr. Strube appears to know not only the resources of an instrument but also its harmonic, or if need be, the inharmonic, relation to its orchestral neighbor, and many of his combinations fall very pleasantly upon the ear.

In his melodic ideas he is modern, but not ultramodern, and so, although the first movement may sound vague to some auditors, the gentle and somewhat soothing second part and the odd phrasing of vivacious and puzzling dance themes in the scherzo are of a nature to please the general public. The finale of the first movement and the theme allotted the trumpets near the close of the second part are admirably worked up, as is also the beginning of the finale in which the horns and trumpets figure prominently.

The last movement is lively, more defined in character than the preceding ones, and contains hints of plaintive themes which have been carried through from one part to another, making the four divisions sections of a whole and not unrelated movements. In this Mr. Strube has done capital work, for the symphony holds together well. Rapturous applause greeted the composer-conductor after each movement, and at the close he was recalled many times, fellow-players joining the audience in the testimonies of appreciation.

After the symphony Mr. Fiedler conducted the second division of the program, which, being entirely Wagnerian, would not have suited Dr. Muck, but which found great favor with the audience. There were five excerpts from the music dramas—familiar bits played with splendid effect and applauded vigorously.

Beginning with the prelude to "Lohengrin," the feature of which was the exquisite work of the lighter string contingents, the "Tannhauser" bacchanale followed, making a fine contrast to the dainty forerunner, Mr. Fiedler working up a musical orgie of great brilliancy and verve. It was a perfect tone picture of Venusberg minus the stage figurantes. In the Siegfried funeral march from "The Dusk of the Gods" the various motifs were voiced with all due resonance, the heavier instruments having their turn to show up grandly in the fortissimo passages. The "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" each motif and figure was significantly and tenderly expressed and the ride of the Valkyries went with a dash and vigorous swirl of instrumentation that brought forth the heartiest applause.

The rehearsal this week will take place Thursday afternoon on account of the regular date falling upon Good Friday. There will be two works, new to Symphony patrons.

The first is a theme, variations and fugue for organ and orchestra by Geo. W. Chadwick. This work is still in manuscript and while it has been played at one of the conservatory concerts, the performance by the Boston Symphony orchestra may properly be called its first. The other novelty is by the Russian, Glazounoff, and is a musical picture, entitled "Spring." The symphony will be Tschalkowsky's fifth.

Mr. Strube's New Symphony

Trans. — Apr. 1, 1909
Mr. Strube's new symphony to be played for the first time, with the composer conducting at the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and of Saturday, is frankly "absolute music." No literary or pictorial source suggested it; no "programme" orders its course; and the feelings that animate it were the indefinable creative emotions of the composer as he wrote. It is "absolute music," Mr. Strube explains, but clothed in modern and individual harmonic and instrumental dress. He follows the classical "symphonic form," as have almost all the new symphonies of the winter, but his treatment of his musical thoughts within it is altogether his own. The symphony, scored for full modern orchestra, but without any unusual additions to the instrumental forces, begins with a tranquil introduction (Andante) in B minor, that leads into the first movement (Allegro con Moto) free and supple of tonality in the modern fashion, but "worked out" in the classic fashion, first and second subjects, subsidiary themes, and all the rest of the traditional material. The slow movement (Adagio ma non Troppo) follows—music of gentle and contemplative rather than of poignant mood. The ensuing Scherzo is elaborate as Scherzi go nowadays and lightly fanciful. A reminiscence of the Scherzo—the whole symphony is closely knit—leads into the finale, which Mr. Strube has written warmly, spiritedly and richly. The men of the orchestra are keen critics and often just of the music upon which they are at work. Through the rehearsals of the week they have praised Mr. Strube's symphony, and Mr. Fiedler, who has listened too is like-minded.

MR. STRUBE'S SYMPHONY FOR THE FIRST TIME

Trans. — Apr. 3, 1909
The Ablest and Most Imaginative and Individual Work Thus Far of the Composer—Its Harmonic and Instrumental Beauty, Suggestion and Daring—Mr. Fiedler and His Fragments of Wagner—A Conservatory Concert with Two Novel Pieces

Mr. Strube's symphony made this the major interest of the concert. In form, especially in the dry specifications of print, it seems conventional enough. A slow introduction leads in the opening allegro; and adagio and a scherzo follow in the normal course; a brief slow introduction again leads into the allegro of the finale. Those loyal souls that show to the sonata form as to a sacred thing may trace it throughout the symphony. Those who love clearly defined melodic thoughts will find Mr. Strube's, at least in his first statements of them, readily recognizable. They are oftenest full-bodied and salient musical ideas, but, with one exception, their full virtue only appears in his treatment of them. All of them have individual mood and accent, and the dominating subject of the show movement, as it rises into sustained song, has clear beauty of its own and brings as clear and swift emotional response. Elsewhere those themes are distinctly serviceable themes to wear the harmonic dress, to stand against the harmonic background, or to wear the instrumental lines that Mr. Strube has bestowed upon them. Moreover, zealous as he is for free and individual development of his musical thoughts, and devoted as he is to their harmonic and instrumental vesture, he has, for these days, one conspicuous virtue. He does worry his melodies, shaking and reshaping them, twisting and turning them until he has wrung the last drop of development or of suggestion out of them. No more—to continue these canine analogies—does he chew his themes into bits, and then make endless play with the fragments. His is no symphony of dovetailed scraps, no ingenuously fitted tonal mosaic. It is an organic, closely wrought whole. Each movement moves steadily forward in its development with clear creative force. The symphony is plentiful in subtly accomplished delicately adjusted and assiduously polished detail. Yet Mr. Strube never loses his air of spontaneity, and of a more vigorous creative energy than has been apparent in any other of his pieces. Nowhere does it suggest the rather languorous and sweetish dawdling that has clouded some of his more recent minor pieces. A genuine impulse to create seems to have prompted the symphony, and Mr. Strube has plied with the rejoicing energy of a man who has at last touched his prime, who feels and in his heart knows his powers.

The distinction and the individuality of these powers lie in the harmonic dress and the instrumental coloring of the symphony. Not that Mr. Strube's is music all color. Each movement and each elastic division of each movement has a frame and body of its own, and is substantial music. But the imagination and resource that have anointed and clothed this body, and that have given the music fascination to the fancy and appeal to emotions, are primarily a rare power of harmonic and instrumental coloring. Mr. Strube, sitting in his place in the orchestra these many years, has heard much that the composers of our generation have ventured and wrought in these things. Yet when he comes to the test of a symphony of his own, he keeps his own individuality. There is not a suggestion of imitation in the music and hardly a suggestion—and that altogether trivial—of any remembered thing. Mr. Strube has reflected deeply upon harmonic possibilities, and with imagination he has vitalized his thoughts. No American composer has gone further and more imaginatively into harmonic venture and daring than has he in this symphony. Similarly, Mr. Strube thinks in terms of instruments. He is no composer merely "scoring" for orchestra ideas that have come to expression and amplification in another medium. To him the orchestra is an endlessly varied palette of instrumental color, whence he may choose and assort, blend and contrast, his tonal tints. He has an instrumental imagination; his creative emotion expresses itself spontaneously and communicatively in terms of tonal color. Again in his instrumentation has he greatly dared and subtly imagined. (Fortunate he that a band of virtuosos were playing his music yesterday.)

The justification of these things, the everlasting justification of all ventures and experiments, is as old as their beginnings: Do they kindle the listening imagination, bring answering emotions, engross the hearer in the music, proceed to beauty and move with ordered power? Of the imagination that fills Mr. Strube's harmonies and instrumental coloring, of their luminous brightness or their shadowy glow, of their emotional incisiveness of their poetic suggestion, of the iridescent and endlessly fascinating web into which they wove his music, there could be little doubt in those that head yesterday with engrossed and sympathetic ear. The end, and notably in the scherzo, with its seconds, and in the adagio, had justified the means. They had justified as well, and as never before, Mr. Strube as a composer of rare imagination.

H. T. P.

SYMPHONY TICKET FOR SALE

A ticket for the last six Rehearsals, about half-way back, centre, on the floor. Price $12. Apply between 10 and 12, at 27 State St., Room 66. (A):

FOR SALE—SYMPHONY REHEARSAL season tickets, 2 together on floor, row H, for $55 each. Also 1 central, floor, $55. Address V.S.O., Boston Transcript. 6t(A): d7

SYMPHONY GIVES ITS 20TH CONCERT

Strube's Composition in B Minor

Heard with Interest.

Herald — Apr. 4, 1909

Symphony orchestra, 20th concert, with the following program:

Strube.....Symphony in B minor (MS.)
(First performance.)
Wagner.....Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Wagner.....Bacchanale from "Tannhauser"
Wagner.....Funeral March from "Dusk of the Gods"
Wagner....."Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal"
Wagner.....Ride of the Valkyries

Mr. Strube, one of the first violins of the orchestra, stepped out of the path that he has followed for the last four or five years, that of the symphonic poem, and produced at this concert his symphony in B minor. This work in four movements is one of interest throughout. The composer has followed the strict sonata form, but he has colored and intensified it with his own individuality and given it the modern emotional speech.

Mr. Strube has scored his symphony for a large orchestra, has made special use of the tender and pathetic tone of the English horn, the dark coloring of the bass clarinet, the deep and sustaining quality of the tuba, the sparkling glitter of certain harp arpeggi, and the light and sharp color of the glockenspiel. From long and practical acquaintance with the varied timbres of the orchestra, Mr. Strube has learned the art of opposing and of blending the qualities of the different choirs, and his orchestration shows not only individuality of tone color but sureness in the handling of it.

The first movement, Allegro comodo, opens with an introduction that has a distinct poetic feeling of quiet meditative beauty. The first movement opens with the announcement of the initial subject by flutes and clarinets. In themes of quiet nature Mr. Strube seems to have been introspective at the time of writing, and to have intimately conceived music with a poignant sense of longing. There is no sentimental gloom or tragic despair, but a plaintive yearning that is of the wholesome, meditative kind.

The slow movement, adagio ma non troppo, is the portion of this symphony that will undoubtedly appeal to the largest number of hearers. This movement is really a song for the plaintive voices of the orchestra. The sustained melodic outlines, veiled now and then with a cry as of some strong emotion, have that same character of intense and ecstatic longing that has just been mentioned. Combined with the yearning quality of the themes Mr. Strube has added now and then a sharp and sudden tinge of dissonance that brings for the moment a more intense feeling of yearning, but with no touch of melodramatic or tragic sorrow. The scoring of this movement is of interesting workmanship to the student of orchestration and is, to use the phrase of the painter, in tone with the emotional speech of the music.

From the character of the scherzo a hearer might easily be led to believe that the composer had in mind, when writing, the gambols of fairies, nymphs, fauns and satyrs. The movement is bright, light, playful and evasive.

A peculiar use of the intervals of the second and the minor second in this movement gives a glittering edge of charmingly fresh character to certain parts of the music.

The fourth movement, allegro energico, opens with a martial atmosphere of trumpets calling out a theme of rather pagan character, accompanied by a boisterous chattering of other voices of the orchestra.

A quieter episode of legato nature breathes of peace as though amid luxuriant gardens and of rest after victory.

Mr. Strube evidently wrote this symphony with a spirit of love and ardor. There is no halting of the musical thought, no tiresome spinning out of thematic material nor padding in the passages of development.

With all his command of counterpoint, Mr. Strube has not indulged in any attempt to make an exhibition of his technique at the expense of interest. From the beginning to end is shown continuity of thought, seriousness, sureness of aim and stirring vitality. There is no slowing down or failing of strength, for the last movement makes as strong, if not stronger impression than any one of the preceding.

This composition is undoubtedly Mr. Strube's best work.

The composer conducted his own work, and the orchestra responded nobly to his leadership and played the difficult music in a splendid manner.

The familiar Wagner numbers were enthusiastically applauded.

Symphony Rehearsal Calls Out Many

Strube's Symphony in B
Minor Is Played for
First Time.

Journal — Apr. 3, 1909

At the Symphony rehearsal yesterday a large crowd heard Strube's symphony in B minor, conducted by the composer, a member of the orchestra, and for the first time. He was roundly applauded on entering, and by the full orchestra as well. Seated in the front was Max Fiedler, the orchestra conductor, who showed much appreciation. With him was Mrs. Fiedler, a regal-looking woman and well gowned. The rest of the program was devoted to

Wagner.

In the crush I noted Mrs. Roger Wolcott, Mrs. J. L. Gardner, wearing mode velvet and sables; Mrs. William P. Fay, Mrs. William Humphrey, Mrs. F. R. Comee, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Mrs. Frederick Warren, Mrs. Bradford, T. Adamowski, Mr. Grew, Miss Alison Haughton, Mrs. Benjamin F. Pitman, in purple satin, long velvet coat and hat with violets; Juliet and Barbara Higginson, "Betty" Porter, in dark blue and yellow straw hat trimmed with black; Mrs. William Tudor, in heliotrope cloth; Mrs. William Ames, Mrs. Robert Stow Bradley and daughter Leslie, very pretty in her new spring hat of black, covered with pink roses; Miss Hattie Batchelder, Mrs. Nathan Matthews, Mrs. A. Forbes Conant and sister, Miss MacNichol, Alice Stackpole, ex-Governor and Mrs. Long, Mrs. George Shattuck, Mrs. William Gaston, Mrs. Aline Scott, Mrs. Charles Dowse, Mrs. J. Reed Whipple, Adelaide Jackson and several other Vincent Club members.

Gustav Strube, composer and conductor.

Mr. Gustav Strube's Symphony in B minor, which will be played for the first time at the Symphony concerts this week, is anticipated with interest. Mr. Strube is well known here as a composer of unusually individual music. In former years he came much under the influence of the modern French school, but with the production of his symphonic poem, "Longing," for viola and orchestra, in 1904, and the violin concerto in 1905, it became evident that he had turned to a more simple, direct and transparent style. The symphony in B minor, which is Mr. Strube's second work in that form, bears out this statement. It is in four movements and strictly classical in construction. Mr. Strube has made himself prominent here as a conductor and he will conduct at the Worcester festival next fall. Post Mar. 28, 1909

Strube's Work Delights Symphony Audience

Gustav Strube appeared in a triple capacity, conductor, composer and player, at the twentieth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday night. His symphony in B minor was performed for the first time and every movement was applauded with enthusiasm by an audience which taxed the capacity of the hall. While the auditors were disposed to be severely critical at the start, Mr. Strube won them before the final movement and at the conclusion of the performance of his work he was called to the desk seven times, but refused to repeat the allegro, the players applauding with the others.

While the first movement, the andante, is perhaps ambiguous, it is painted in brilliant tones of orchestral color.

The third movement, the scherzo, shows genius and a boldness in disregarding tradition not expected of a composer who has trained so long with an organization like the Boston Symphony. The whole work was brilliantly colored and the instrumentation modern to a delightfully startling degree. At periods during the performance one would be led to wonder what it meant, what it was about, yet enjoy the exquisite setting.

As a whole Strube's B minor symphony is a most welcome contribution to orchestral literature.

Mr. Fiedler conducted the second half of the program, a Wagner section, with characteristic enthusiasm and closed a notable concert with the "Ride of the Valkyries."

Here in Boston

A little bunch of lilies of the valley was sent to Symphony Hall, on Saturday, with a note unsigned and requesting that they be laid in the seat—in the second row of the first balcony on the right near the stage—that the late Mr. Lang had occupied for many years at the evening concerts. The request was fulfilled, the flowers remained on the seat through the evening, and they were then sent with a word of explanation, to Mr. Lang's family.

in Boston.)

C POEM, "Les Preludes."

B. J. LANG.

285

SYMPHONY HALL BOSTON
SUNDAY EVENING, APRIL 4, 1909, at 8

CONCERT
BY THE
BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

IN AID OF ITS
PENSION FUND

MISCHA ELMAN, Soloist

Programme

BEETHOVEN	Overture, "Leonore III."
BEETHOVEN	Concerto for Violin in D major MISCHA ELMAN
BERLIOZ	Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"
SAINT-SAËNS	Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso for Violin and Orchestra MISCHA ELMAN
LISZT	Rhapsody No. 1

Tickets, $2.00, $1.50, and $1.00. On sale at Symphony Hall.

B J. LANG.

284
285
SYMPHONY HALL BOSTON
SUNDAY EVENING, APRIL 4, 1909, at 8

CONCERT
BY THE
BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor

IN AID OF ITS

PENSION FUND

MISCHA ELMAN, Soloist

Programme

BEETHOVEN Overture, "Leonore III."

BEETHOVEN Concerto for Violin in D major
MISCHA ELMAN

BERLIOZ Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"

SAINT-SAËNS Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso for Violin and Orchestra
MISCHA ELMAN

LISZT Rhapsody No. 1

Tickets, $2.00, $1.50, and $1.00. On sale at Symphony Hall.

MISCHA ELMAN
AT SYMPHONY CONCERTS

PLAUDITS FOR ELMAN

Crabbe — Apr. 5, 1909
Young Violinist Stirs a Large Audience.

Symphony Pension Fund Concert One of Great Merit.

The third benefit concert by the Symphony orchestra this season, to swell its pension fund, was given last evening in Symphony hall and proved a memorable one, owing largely to the participation of Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, whose offer to play for the pension fund was mainly responsible for the third benefit being given this year, instead of but two, as has been the custom in past years.

The hall was practically filled with music lovers, some of whom were devotees of fashion in the matter of apparel. Many artists were to be seen in the hall and Mrs John L. Gardner was in her accustomed place in the balcony.

About half the evening's program was given by young Elman, whose selections were of a contrasting character, namely, Beethoven's concerto in D major and Saint-Saens' introduction and rondo capriccioso, the soloist having the accompaniment of the full orchestra in both pieces.

Young Elman fairly electrified his audience in each case, receiving eight recalls after the Beethoven number and more than that after the other, the calls in the last instance apparently having been insistently intended as an encore. But none was given, very likely for the reason that orchestral scores had been provided only for the solos that were on the program.

The audience apparently had a fine time, showing its enthusiasm by means of vigorous hand clappings. To a large extent the members of the orchestra themselves clapped as heartily as the auditors, and they gave other indications of the liveliest admiration for the boyish looking genius who has made such a conquest in the American musical world during the last few months.

Max Fiedler, conductor of the orchestra, and of course a volunteer, like young Elman, came in for the heartiest kind of plaudits, also, after each of the numbers on the program. It was a graceful act on his part, that in each case he had the entire orchestra stand and participate with him in the responsive salutation given in recognition of the applause.

The performance was as successful from a financial standpoint as it was artistically, the resulting addition to the pension fund, it is said, amounting to not much less than $3000.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

Herald — Apr. 5, 1909
Remarkable Enthusiasm Over
Mischa Elman's Playing.

Last night's extra concert of the Symphony Orchestra in aid of its pension fund was made notable by a program of special strength and beauty and by the enthusiasm displayed over the playing of Mischa Elman, the young violinist. The audience filled the hall.

The program consisted of Beethoven's overture "Leonore III," Beethoven's concerto for violin in D major, Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Saint-Saens' introduction and rondo capriccioso for violin and orchestra and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1.

Mr. Fiedler conducted, and both he and the musicians seemed moved to strive for unusual heights of fervor, inspiration and interpretative finesse. That the heights were reached was evident early in the "Leonore" overture, and the audience was made emotionally ready for what Elman was to do with the Beethoven concerto. The orchestra with the utmost sympathy fell into the mood of the young player, particularly in the intense appeal of the larghetto. At the close of the piece Mr. Elman was called out repeatedly by insistent applause that was unusually vigorous for a Symphony throng.

This demonstration was mild, however, compared with that which followed the young man's remarkable work with the Saint-Saens piece. His hearers seemed determined that he should play again and refused to be satisfied with repeated appearances and bows. It looked for a time as if the affair would be turned into one of the nominating convention variety, but the youthful artist was firm and his admirers finally tired themselves out.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Journal — Apr. 5, 1909
Despite the fact that Boston is engaging in its annual round of operatic dissipation, there will be a very large audience at the extra Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which is to be given in Symphony Hall tomorrow night. Mischa Elman's hold on the Boston public seems to show no signs of diminishing and the opportunity to hear him again with orchestra is awakening the keenest interest among all interested in music. It will be in a certain sense an Elman concert, because the most important works to be presented will be played by him. As already announced he will play the Beethoven concerto in D major, and Saint-Saens' charming introduction and Rondo Capriccioso. He has yet to be heard in Boston in Beethoven's master-work, and although he has played the Saint-Saens work at one of his recitals with piano accompaniment, he has never played it here with orchestra.

The other numbers on the program will be Beethoven's overture "Leonore III," Berlioz's overture "Benvenuto Cellini" and Liszt's first rhapsody.

PENSION FUND CONCERT OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

To give a pension fund concert in the midst of an opera season and on the same night as an operatic concert, was not the wisest thing in the world, but we suppose the chance of securing the cooperation of Mischa Elman was the cause of it. After all the audience was larger than could have been expected and the performance, of course, was full of delight.

Mischa Elman was the bright particular star of the occasion and won innumerable recalls. But the chief point of his work at this concert, and the highest point he has reached in Boston thus far, was the interpretation of Beethoven's great violin concerto. This work can only be given by masters of the violin; it is the touch-stone of the highest technique and interpretative power. It demands a breadth that very few can satisfy.

To say that young Elman met these requirements is to place him among the elect of violinists. He has a wonderful bow-arm for one so young. In his broad sweeps in phrasing he reminds of Kreisler. The first movement, with its strong four-noted figure, was especially successful and it was properly majestic rather than merely vehement. The finale is much weaker than this first movement, but Elman's dash made the Rondo interesting and effective.

The orchestra gave good support in the Concerto and also played the great "Leonora, No. III" and the "Benvenuto Cellini" overtures famously. The concert ended with Liszt's First Rhapsody, transcribed for the orchestra, a dashing and brilliant ending to a successful concert.

ELMAN SCORES BIG TRIUMPH

Traveler — Apr. 5, 1909

Symphony Hall was crowded last evening at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in aid of its pension fund. The programme was a notable one and included the name of Mischa Elman, the young violinist, who evoked the enthusiasm of the large audience again and again, and finally received a demonstration for his execution of Saint-Saens' "Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso" for violin and orchestra.

Mr. Fiedler conducted and both he and the players seemed bent on reaching the topmost heights of fervor and finish.

The program consisted of Beethoven's overture "Leonore III," Beethoven's concerto for violin in D major, Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Saint-Saens' Introduction and rondo capriccioso for the violin and orchestra and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1.

PENSION FUND CONCERT OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

To give a pension fund concert in the midst of an opera season and on the same night as an operatic concert, was not the wisest thing in the world, but we suppose the chance of securing the cooperation of Mischa Elman was the cause of it. After all the audience was larger than could have been expected and the performance, of course, was full of delight.

Mischa Elman was the bright particular star of the occasion and won innumerable recalls. But the chief point of his work at this concert, and the highest point he has reached in Boston thus far, was the interpretation of Beethoven's great violin concerto. This work can only be given by masters of the violin; it is the touch-stone of the highest technique and interpretative power. It demands a breadth that very few can satisfy.

To say that young Elman met these requirements is to place him among the elect of violinists. He has a wonderful bow-arm for one so young. In his broad sweeps in phrasing he reminds of Kreisler. The first movement, with its strong four-noted figure, was especially successful and it was properly majestic rather than merely vehement. The finale is much weaker than this first movement, but Elman's dash made the Rondo interesting and effective.

The orchestra gave good support in the Concerto and also played the great "Leonora, No. III" and the "Benvenuto Cellini" overtures famously. The concert ended with Liszt's First Rhapsody, transcribed for the orchestra, a dashing and brilliant ending to a successful concert.

ELMAN SOLOIST AT PENSION CONCERT

Symphony Orchestra Furnishes Treat to Patrons
at Sunday Affair.

Journal — Apr. 5, 1909

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in aid of its pension fund, held at Symphony Hall last night, was a great success, and music lovers who were fortunate in being present enjoyed a treat.

Mischa Elman, violin, was the soloist. An overture and concerto by Beethoven for the first part and three other selections by Berlioz, Saint-Saens and Liszt were on the program.

The solos by Elman were played with the perfection expected and received the applause which was due from the audience. Mr. Fiedler conducted.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

XXI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 10, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

MOZART,

MASONIC FUNERAL MUSIC.
IN MEMORIAM B. J. LANG.

CHADWICK,

THEME, VARIATIONS, and FUGUE for ORGAN
and ORCHESTRA.
(First time at these concerts.)

TSCHAIKOWSKY,

SYMPHONY, No. 5, in E minor, op. 64.
I. Andante; Allegro con anima.
II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
III. Valse: Allegro moderato.
IV. Finale: Andante maestoso; Allegro vivace.

GLAZOUNOFF,

"Spring," MUSICAL PICTURE for ORCHESTRA,
op. 34.
(First time in Boston.)

LISZT,

"The Preludes," SYMPHONIC POEM, No. 3.

Soloist:

Mr. WALLACE GOODRICH.

adv. apr. 5, 1909
PENSION FUND CONCERT
 OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

To give a pension fund concert in the midst of an opera season and on the same night as an operatic concert, was not the wisest thing in the world, but we suppose the chance of securing the cooperation of Mischa Elman was the cause of it. After all the audience was larger than could have been expected and the performance, of course, was full of delight.

Mischa Elman was the bright particular star of the occasion and won innumerable recalls. But the chief point of his work at this concert, and the highest point he has reached in Boston thus far, was the interpretation of Beethoven's great violin concerto. This work can only be given by masters of the violin; it is the touch-stone of the highest technique and interpretative power. It demands a breadth that very few can satisfy.

To say that young Elman met these requirements is to place him among the elect of violinists. He has a wonderful bow-arm for one so young. In his broad sweeps in phrasing he reminds of Kreisler. The first movement, with its strong four-noted figure, was especially successful and it was properly majestic rather than merely vehement. The finale is much weaker than this first movement, but Elman's dash made the Rondo interesting and effective.

The orchestra gave good support in the Concerto and also played the great "Leonora, No. III" and the "Benvenuto Cellini" overtures famously. The concert ended with Liszt's First Rhapsody, transcribed for the orchestra, a dashing and brilliant ending to a successful concert.

Traveler ———— Apr. 5, 1909
ELMAN SCORES BIG TRIUMPH

Symphony Hall was crowded last evening at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in aid of its pension fund. The programme was a notable one and included the name of Mischa Elman, the young violinist, who evoked the enthusiasm of the large audience again and again, and finally received a demonstration for his execution of Saint-Saens' "Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso" for violin and orchestra.

Mr. Fiedler conducted and both he and the players seemed bent on reaching the topmost heights of fervor and finish.

The program consisted of Beethoven's overture "Leonore III," Beethoven's concerto for violin in D major, Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Saint-Saens' introduction and rondo capriccioso for the violin and orchestra and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1.

adv. apr. 5, 1909
PENSION FUND CONCERT
 OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

To give a pension fund concert in the midst of an opera season and on the same night as an operatic concert, was not the wisest thing in the world, but we suppose the chance of securing the cooperation of Mischa Elman was the cause of it. After all the audience was larger than could have been expected and the performance, of course, was full of delight.

Mischa Elman was the bright particular star of the occasion and won innumerable recalls. But the chief point of his work at this concert, and the highest point he has reached in Boston thus far, was the interpretation of Beethoven's great violin concerto. This work can only be given by masters of the violin; it is the touch-stone of the highest technique and interpretative power. It demands a breadth that very few can satisfy.

To say that young Elman met these requirements is to place him among the elect of violinists. He has a wonderful bow-arm for one so young. In his broad sweeps in phrasing he reminds of Kreisler. The first movement, with its strong four-noted figure, was especially successful and it was properly majestic rather than merely vehement. The finale is much weaker than this first movement, but Elman's dash made the Rondo interesting and effective.

The orchestra gave good support in the Concerto and also played the great "Leonora, No. III" and the "Benvenuto Cellini" overtures famously. The concert ended with Liszt's First Rhapsody, transcribed for the orchestra, a dashing and brilliant ending to a successful concert.

ELMAN SOLOIST AT PENSION CONCERT

Symphony Orchestra Furnishes Treat to Patrons
 at Sunday Affair.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in aid of its pension fund, held at Symphony Hall last night, was a great success, and music lovers who were fortunate in being present enjoyed a treat.

Mischa Elman, violin, was the soloist. An overture and concerto by Beethoven for the first part and three other selections by Berlioz, Saint-Saens and Liszt were on the program.

The solos by Elman were played with the perfection expected and received the applause which was due from the audience. Mr. Fiedler conducted.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

XXI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 10, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

MOZART,

MASONIC FUNERAL MUSIC.
 IN MEMORIAM B. J. LANG.

CHADWICK,

THEME, VARIATIONS, and FUGUE for ORGAN
 and ORCHESTRA.
 (First time at these concerts.)

TSCHAIKOWSKY,

SYMPHONY, No. 5, in E minor, op. 64.
 I. Andante; Allegro con anima.
 II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
 III. Valse: Allegro moderato.
 IV. Finale: Andante maestoso; Allegro vivace.

GLAZOUNOFF,

"Spring," MUSICAL PICTURE for ORCHESTRA,
 op. 34.
 (First time in Boston.)

LISZT,

"The Preludes," SYMPHONIC POEM, No. 3.

Soloist:

Mr. WALLACE GOODRICH.

Schelling Aids Symphony Fund.

Mr Ernest Schelling, the pianist and composer whose "Fantastic Suite" was played several times during the past season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, has made a graceful acknowledgment of the satisfaction he derived from the performances by sending to the pension fund of the orchestra a check for a substantial amount inclosed in the following letter to Mr Fiedler, the conductor:

Hotel Savoy, New York,
April 3, 1909.

Dear Mr Fiedler—The magnificent performance of my suite and the splendid manner in which the gentlemen of the orchestra followed my intentions with such complete success have given me such great pleasure that I want to show my gratitude in some way. Therefore, I beg you to accept this check to be given to the pension fund as a slight token of my feeling.

I remain, Sir,

Yours most sincerely,
Ernest Schelling.

Globe
Apr. 11, 1909

SYMPHONY'S 21ST CONCERT OF SEASON

Herald — Apr. 11, 1909

Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony
Makes Deep Impression on Audience Because of Its Dramatic Intensity.

MR. CHADWICK PLAYS NEW WORK ON ORGAN

BY PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, gave its 21st concert last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Masonic funeral music, Mozart; Theme, Variations and Fugue for organ and orchestra, Chadwick; Symphony No. 5, E minor, Tschaikowsky; "Spring," musical picture, Glazunoff; symphonic poem, "The Preludes," Liszt.

Opera has been admirably performed at the Boston Theatre for two weeks by the Manhattan Grand Opera Company. We have had the pleasure of hearing operas familiar and unfamiliar, operas of various schools. There have been uncommonly strong dramatic performances by Miss Garden, Miss Ger-ville-Reache, Messrs Zanatello, Renaud, Gillbert and others. The orchestra led by Mr. Campanini was dramatically eloquent.

Yet to some Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony last night had more dramatic intensity than any of the operas performed. Listening to the music of the operas and seeing the dramatic action of the lyric tragedians, the hearer was moved by the sight of others suffering, by the sight of this man or that woman dreading a weird. Listening to Tschaikowsky's music each sensitive or imaginative hearer was moved by the thought aroused in his own mind.

Tschaikowsky himself related the program of his fourth symphony, and we know that he had a program for his "Pathetic," although he was not persuaded to disclose it before his death. He was singularly reticent in his letters concerning the fifth, but who can refrain from thinking with Ernest Newman that this symphony was written to a program; that the work "embodies an emotional sequence of some kind"? There is the tread of inexorable fate; this tread disturbs the beauty of the andante; it checks the forced gayety of the dancers in the waltz; and is the triumphant spirit in the finale something more than a heroic defiance of the inevitable, a brave stand before the approach of death?

We are interested in the woe of Canio or of the Navarraise; we are moved by the infinite sadness of Melisande; we understand the tragedy in the humble home on Montmartre and the agony of Rigoletto. We endure the spectacle of the anguish of these men and women on the stage, applaud and go comfortably to bed. Tschaikowsky's music awakens in the breast the haunting, unanswerable questions of life and death that concern us directly and personally. For the most important person to each one is one's self.

I have pried through the strata and analyzed to a hair,
And counselled with doctors and calculated close and found no sweeter fat than sticks to my own bones.

Mr. Chadwick's variations and Fugue for organ and orchestra were composed last summer and played at a New England Conservatory concert last November. His idea in writing them was to see whether the modern organ and the orchestra are necessarily antagonistic, or at least unsympathetic. It might be said that the modern organ is not the organ that Berlioz had in mind when he uttered his famous dictum. To some the modern organ has little of the true and peculiar quality of the instrument known to Buxtehude, Bach and even to Rheinberger and Merkel. The glory of the instrument is in its diapason tone and quality; not in an infinite variety of stops that bring it into futile rivalry with an orchestra.

Mr. Chadwick has skilfully constructed agreeable variations on a flowing and pretty theme. When the foundation stops were used, and when soft stops of true organ quality are employed, especially in the sustaining of chords, there is a blend of timbres and there is no thought of rival and warring forces. There are passages, however, in which the organ loses its impressive characteristics and then ceases to have value as a special instrument. Mr. Goodrich played with taste, and the work and the performance were evidently much enjoyed by the audience.

Mr. Chadwick's experiment is much more successful than those made by certain predecessors, nevertheless the organ is not a concert instrument. Its proper place is in the church. Its true literature is music written for it with appreciation of the inherent character and limitations of the instrument. The organ is best heard with an orchestra, when it has the modest duty of sustaining chords, and has few florid passages and only discreetly conceived melodic measures of a solo nature.

Glazunoff's "Spring" is prettily scored, and while the contents are not of marked importance they suggest Spring, the Spring of the poets and of some other lands, not the Spring of New England.

The concert began with a performance of Mozart's Masonic Music, which was played in memory of Mr. Lang.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Globe Apr. 11, 09
Novelties Played by
Symphony Orchestra.

"Redemption" to be Sung Tonight--Hess-Schroeder Quartet.

Miss Gerville-Reache and Mr Gilibert in Recital.

Tribute to the memory of the late B. J. Lang was paid by the Boston Symphony orchestra last week, which began its program with Mozart's "Masonic Funeral Music," whose grave, noble themes were received, of course, in absolute silence. It was an observance, not an entertainment. This number was followed with a "Theme, Variations and Fugue," for organ and orchestra, by George W. Chadwick, with Mr Wallace Goodrich at the organ. The work is admirably scored for the purpose of showing the possibilities of tone-coloring and contrasts between organ and orchestra.

The wood-wind tones carry their delicate contrasts with the full rotund organ notes, and the dry, thrilling song of the strings steal across the music of the great instrument like a ray of sunlight through a wood. It was splendidly played by Mr Goodrich, and was given a reading by Mr Fiedler that preserved all the beauties in most fastidious balance.

The symphony was Tschalkowsky's fifth, which is called his nearest approach to full symphonic form. It has been played here some half dozen times in the 20 years of its life, the last time being directed by Carl Wendling during an indisposition of Dr Muck. Mr Fiedler's conducting of the work called forth tremendous applause; he was compelled to return twice to the platform to bow his acknowledgments.

He made of importance the Russian's insistence on the central theme of the symphony, the theme of foreboding which appears again and again, even in the graceful waltz movement; he emphasized the separate themes, almost making them melodramatic, and he took the whole work at a tempo higher than it was played at the last previous performance. The effect was of a soul tortured rather than one in melancholy.

Next came the "first time in Boston number, another Russian composition, by Alexander Constantinovitch Glazounoff, a "musical picture" for orchestra entitled "Spring." And a tremulous, dainty spring, thrilling with life, bubbling with flute notes of joy, trilling constantly as from bounding vitality, it is.

It is a spring of tender greens, of wayward breezes, of vagrant birds. The flutes begin, and the string accompaniment is open and light—everything is free air and young life. Rather short, with clearly defined themes, it is wholly in the modern method, and the development never finds a resolution. But it is eddily—and gratifyingly—free from mysterious fog, as so much of the modern French composition is not. The work was published in 1892.

And the program closed with the massive harmonies and stately rhythms of Liszt's "The Preludes," the symphonic poem that winds up into the shouting of the brass in the majestic march, with its sudden changes and its seemingly unfinished sentences of music.

This week there will be another novelty by a Boston composer, a new suite for string orchestra in E major, opus 63, by Arthur Foote. It is some years since Mr Foote's name has appeared on a Symphony program, and the performance of this new suite will be awaited with interest. Mr Charles Martin Loeffler will also be represented by his "La Villanelle du Diable." The first number will be Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus," the symphony will be Dvorak's tuneful "From the New World."

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Post By Olin Downes Apr. 9, 1909

Yesterday afternoon, in Symphony Hall, the programme of the 21st Symphony rehearsal of the season commenced with Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music, in memory of the late B. J. Lang. The music fell on reverent ears and there was no applause.

George Chadwick's "Theme, Variations, and Fugue," for organ and orchestra, were played for the first time at these concerts. The composition had its origin in a desire on the part of M. Chadwick "to show the possibilities of combining and contrasting a modern organ, modern in scheme and in mechanical facilities, with the orchestra."

Such attempts have been few. There are a few organ concertos and a number of orchestral works with an organ partially employed. Always the instrument or the band dominates. Pheiberger, perhaps, has come nearest the balance in his organ concerto, but he uses only horns and strings in the orchestra, entirely dispensing with the wood wind choir.

Mr. Chadwick has striven to show that the modern organ and the modern orchestra are not inimical to each other, and to the reviewer with no technical knowledge of the organ, he has gained very distinctive results. He has eliminated the sense of sudden and illogical transition from one tone color to another which is a constant danger in a composition of the sort. Often a group of instruments combine to give the effect of certain registration on the organ; often the organ seems to possess the vibrancy and the richness of quality that are a birthright of the other instruments.

One of the things by which Mr. Fiedler will be remembered here is his reading of Tschalkowsky's Fifth Symphony yesterday. The symphony is a personal, deeply felt utterance, but in this instance the composer breaks with tremendously communicative fervor of a theme that makes all men akin, the fate that dogs the footsteps, that man grapples with to his dying day. Much of the music is over-emotional, hysterical, though in the finale Tschalkowsky is a splendid optimist.

This finale burst out yesterday in unexpected splendor. Such was Mr. Fiedler's ardor, and the nature of his conception, that for the instant the movement was not a whit less noble than the finale of Beethoven's great "Fifth"—not a whit less stirring and exalting. At this time it is only possible to remark that the entire performance was not less of a revelation, and that Mr. Fiedler was thrice recalled at its conclusion. The third time the orchestra arose and bowed with him.

The novelty of Glazounoff, "Spring," a musical picture for orchestra, is a pretty and innocuous bit of pleasant scoring that is now an old, old tale. It would fittingly accompany a pastoral scene. By itself it has no significance. Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes," brought the concert to an end.

NEW PIECES AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans. Apr. 9, 1909
Mr. Chadwick's Theme and Variations for Organ and Orchestra—A Fresh Trifle by Glazounoff—Tschalkowsky and Liszt for the Rest of the Programme.

In conformity with the usual custom in Holy Week, the twenty-first rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon. To the programme previously announced was appropriately and justly added Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music as a tribute to the memory of Mr. B. J. Lang. Mr. Chadwick's Theme Variations and Fugue for organ and orchestra was the most engrossing novelty on the programme. Berlioz's famous dictum concerning the combination of organ and orchestra may have had a repressive effect upon composers; it certainly has proved amply true within no very distant memory. But Mr. Chadwick has had the courage of his convictions to take up the problem afresh. In this work he certainly demonstrates positively that this combination is not only grateful, but not incompatible with realizations of effective and beautiful contrasts of timbre. To be sure, one is still a little in the dark as to whether there is a real and fundamental affinity between the two, or whether it is the conspicuous skill of the treatment that causes the illusion. The probable solution is simply that the underlying principles have not been thoroughly understood before, but the success of Mr. Chadwick's solution is unequivocal. These variations were first played by Mr. Goodrich at a Conservatory Concert under the composer's direction. A second hearing only reaffirms the first favorable impression. Mr. Chadwick, it is true, has written music of greater substance, deeper imagination and emotional eloquence. It seems as if this piece had been written primarily with the thought of tonal contrast and assimilation. Yet the effect of the whole is so genial in invention, so clear-cut and ingenious at every turn that it is difficult to recall a work in which Mr. Chadwick has seemed so unostentatiously in command of his forces. To characterize Mr. Goodrich as an organist is surely superfluous: he has assuredly been long recognized as hors concours. His performance of the organ part in Mr. Chadwick's variations was marked by his usual rhythmic solidity, dexterous manipulation of registration and tonal balance with the orchestra; in short the unostentatious mastery of true virtuosity.

There was more than ordinary curiosity to hear Mr. Fiedler's interpretation of Tschalkowsky's Fifth Symphony, especially after the acknowledged impression which he made with the same composer's "Pathetic" symphony. Mr. Fiedler gave a performance that was alike brilliant, full of appreciation of the true sentiment of Tschalkowsky, without exaggeration and undue rhetorical emphasis on the whole. There were some details which might proffer legitimate excuse for question, such as the inordinately slow tempo of the introduction of the first movement, as well as the first announcement of the first theme of the main body of the movement. But even these questions may be idle, in the face of an interpretation which was worthy to stand beside that of the sixth symphony. Incidentally this E minor symphony seems to resist the advance of time; furthermore the indisputably orthodox character of its technical development should refute with some warmth the assertions of those who would see therein merely a suite.

The tableau musical by Glazounoff, "Spring," is quite obviously an occasional composition. It is written with the impeccable, nay almost irritating, technical skill characteristic of its composer. One would like to see Glazounoff struggle under the weight of a musical utterance which taxed his technical resources! This piece is not without a certain charm; it has seductive color, a pleasing melodic vein, but its individual conviction is not overpowering. It was distinctly worth while to have heard this "Spring," but there are several others of the same sort among Glazounoff's works which do not demand a hearing. On the other hand it would be interesting to hear Glazounoff's pretty and ingenious ballet suite, a la Watteau, "Ruses d'Amour," or even the somewhat meteorological "Seasons." It is unfortunate that

Mrs. Newmarch did not specify the works in which Glazounoff has been influenced by Brahms; it would seem as if he had listened to Wagner to more purpose, although he is far too skilful to plagiarize.

The concert ended with an exceedingly brilliant performance of the familiar Liszt "Preludes" in which Mr. Fiedler showed his admirable technical and interpretive grasp.

E. B. H.

SYMPHONY TRIBUTE TO LANG

Record Apr. 9, 1909
From Louis C. Elson's criticism in the Morning Advertiser.

PROGRAMME.

Mozart—Masonic Funeral Music. (In memory of B. J. Lang.)
Chadwick—Theme, Variations and Fugue, for Organ and Orchestra.
Tschalkowsky—Symphony, No. 5, E minor.
Glazounoff—"Spring." Musical Tableau.
Liszt—"Les Preludes." Symphonic Poem.

It was fitting for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to pay a tribute to the memory of Benjamin Johnson Lang, for there has scarcely been another who has woven his influence so thoroughly into the warp and woof of Boston's musical advance. The Masonic Funeral Music is not, in itself, very interesting save for the fact that Mozart used a Bosset horn in the score—not present, we believe, on this occasion.

Mr. Chadwick's Theme and Variations for Organ and Orchestra is an important work. Of all the American composers we consider Mr. Chadwick the one man who has most thoroughly combined great contrapuntal skill with poetic inspiration and melodic beauty. His learning has never made him pedantic. Let one study the fugal treatment in his "Judith" and this fact will be made clearly manifest. Something of this admirable quality shines forth in the present composition. The fugue is well developed and interesting.

The organ is excellently combined with the orchestral forces throughout the composition, as one might expect from a man who is himself a skillful organist and an orchestral conductor. The theme is melodic and well suited to treatment. The work is not prolix, as almost all modern variations are. The variations are well contrasted and work up to a fine climax. After the fugue there is a most majestic ending. It is legitimate, clear and masterly music, and Boston may be proud to possess such a composer.

Mr. Wallace Goodrich played the solo part in a most artistic manner. There was well-deserved enthusiasm at the close and Mr. Chadwick was called upon to receive the homage of the audience. This composition ought at once to become standard, for there are very few works that combine organ and orchestra successfully, and this may stand as a model of what such a work ought to be.

Delightful Novelties On Symphony Program

Two enjoyable novelties were presented for the first time at the twenty-first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Saturday night. One was "Theme variations and fugue for organ and orchestra," by George W. Chadwick. Wallace Goodrich was at the organ. The work was so well received Mr. Chadwick had to bow his acknowledgment from the floor. The other novelty was Glazounoff's "Spring," a dainty musical picture for orchestra.

The program opened with Mozart's "Masonic Funeral Music," a memorial tribute to B. J. Lang, and as is usual, was received without applause. Mr. Fiedler gave real pleasure and aroused enthusiasm by his superb reading of Tschalkowsky's Fifth Symphony. The concert closed with a spirited performance of Liszt's "The Preludes."

Next week's program will include A. Foote's suite for string orchestra for first time; C. M. Loeffler's "Villanelle du Diable," and Dvorak's New World Symphony. Journal Apr. 12, 1909

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S TRIBUTE TO B. J. LANG

Adv. Apr. 9, 1909
PROGRAMME INCLUDES

MASONIC FUNERAL MARCH

New Work by Chadwick Won Instant Favor, and It Should Become a Standard.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Mozart—Masonic Funeral Music. (In memory of B. J. Lang.)
Chadwick—Theme, Variations and Fugue, for Organ and Orchestra.
Tschalkowsky—Symphony, No. 5, E minor.
Glazounoff—"Spring." Musical Tableau.
Liszt—"Les Preludes." Symphonic Poem.

It was fitting for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to pay a tribute to the memory of Benjamin Johnson Lang, for there has scarcely been another who has woven his influence so thoroughly into the warp and woof of Boston's musical advance. He made the Apollo club the leading male chorus of America; he founded the Cecelia and brought many new works to us in its concerts; he introduced Wagner's "Parsifal," Bach's B minor Mass, Brahms' Requiem, Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust" and his requiem, and many other important works, in Boston; he was long the organist and for a time conductor of the Handel and Haydn society; he was one of the most influential teachers that Boston ever possessed. Arthur Foote, Ethelbert Nevin, Frank Lynes, Helen Hood, Margaret Ruthven Lang, and many other prominent American musicians were his pupils. His influence was very great in shaping Boston's musical advance, and it was eminently fitting that our representative musical organization should honor him. To many it is a puzzle that Mozart, a devout Catholic, should also have been an enthusiastic Mason, but it must be remembered that the church had not, in the 18th century, taken the determined stand against Masonry that it maintains at present. The Masonic Funeral Music is not, in itself, very interesting save for the fact that Mozart used a Bosset horn in the score—not present, we believe, on this occasion.

Mr. Chadwick's Theme and Variations for Organ and Orchestra is an important work. Of all the American composers we consider Mr. Chadwick the one man who has most thoroughly combined great contrapuntal skill with poetic inspiration and melodic beauty. His learning has never made him pedantic. Let one study the fugal treatment in his "Judith" and this fact will be made clearly manifest. Something of this admirable quality shines forth in the present composition. The fugue is well developed and interesting.

The organ is excellently combined with the orchestral forces throughout the composition, as one might expect from a man who is himself a skillful organist and an orchestral conductor. The theme is melodic and well suited to treatment. The work is not prolix, as almost all modern variations are. The variations are well contrasted and work up to a fine climax. After the fugue there is a most majestic ending. It is legitimate, clear and masterly music, and Boston may be proud to possess such a composer.

Mr. Wallace Goodrich played the solo part in a most artistic manner. There was well-deserved enthusiasm at the close and Mr. Chadwick was called upon to receive the homage of the audience. This composition ought at once to become standard, for there are very few works that combine organ and orchestra successfully, and this may stand as a model of what such a work ought to be.

Tschalkowsky's "Pathetic Symphony" has, with the public, overshadowed all his other symphonic works. This is especially unjust in the case of the E minor symphony, for this work is as characteristic, almost as finely wrought out, as full of ingenious and effective combinations of tone-color as the succeeding work. For once that the fifth symphony is given the "Pathétique" receives a half-dozen performances. It was a keen delight, therefore, to study this less known work and to compare it with its more famous sister. It is Russian to the backbone and is a reproof to those young "Para Demol" Russians who accused Tschalkowsky of being but German in disguise, of not being sufficiently national.

The performance was one to be long remembered. The bassoons deserve mention for their work in the prominent theme of the first movement. There was plenty of Muscovite brooding in this and also some of the barbaric impatience of the Slav. The wind instruments were often sent into the depths, in the manner of Tschalkowsky. The horn solo of the slow movement was beautifully played. But the waltz still seems to us the weakest part of the symphony. This dance movement does not seem ever to attain to the epic style necessary to a symphony.

The Finale received a magnificent reading. There may be a few bits of tinsel in its barbaric splendor, but these suit well enough to the general character of the movement. The chorale-like theme of triumph was given with so much fervor that a marvelous degree of enthusiasm was shown at the close. The conductor was thrice recalled and the orchestra was obliged to rise in response to the continuous applause. Mr. Fiedler and his men here added another leaf to their laurel wreath.

Glazounoff's "Spring" was a delightful pastoral picture. It was largely in the 6-8 rhythm that suits so well to rustic happiness. It contained bird warblings galore. Even the Wagnerian bird from "Siegfried" was among the poultry. In fact one might say that the work was a combination of "Waldesweber" and the "Good Friday Spell" translated into Russian, but that made it no less enjoyable. Glockenspiel, flute warblings, and other bits of tonal sugar, sweetened the score, but it did not become cloying.

It did not have enough contrast to suggest Spring to a New Englander. When our Spring tone-poem is written we shall have violins in highest harmonics—thermometer up; contrabasses in the depths, thermometer down; blasts on bass tuba, wind rising; delicate flute passages suggesting light flannels; clashes on kettle-drums and cymbals, violent sneezes; bassoon solos, a severe cold in the head; there are many possibilities in such a tone-picture adapted to our climate. Glazounoff fortunately needed none of these effects and his pretty "tableau" was delicate and successful.

Liszt's "Les Preludes" is a noble composition. Even today the world has not fully waked up to the full greatness of Liszt as a composer, but he is gradually emerging from the shadow of Liszt, the pianist, and from the penumbra of his friend Wagner. In this work we have coherency, brilliancy of scoring, splendidly worked-up climaxes and the loftiest musical thoughts. Of all the "Poemes Symphoniques" we regard "Les Preludes" as the best. Its performance was a most brilliant one.

Mr. Fiedler is gradually coming to be recognized as most powerful in the mod-

296
which mere drillmaster-ship could never impart.

Perhaps it might be as well to remind the more brutal of the New York critics of this. There were some who insulted all his work at the beginning. They predicted that our orchestra would sink to the level of a beer-garden band if they were long under Mr. Fiedler's control. It has been long under Mr. Fiedler's control, and is likely to remain so for a while longer, ern school and he has evidently imbued the musicians of the orchestra with some of his own enthusiasm. Not an iota of the technique and routine work of the orchestra has been lost, yet there is an abandon and fire in such a work as this but the organization still seems to maintain that technique and ensemble which makes it the first orchestra of the world today. The especially successful and brilliant concert of yesterday may stand as a good proof of the foregoing statements.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

XXII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 17, AT 8, P.M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN,

OVERTURE to Collin's Tragedy, "Coriolanus,"
op. 62.

A. FOOTE,

SUITE in E major, op. 63, for STRING ORCHESTRA.
I. Prelude.
II. Pizzicato and Adagietto.
III. Fugue.
(First performance.)

PAUL DUKAS,

SCHERZO, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," (after a ballad by Goethe.)

DVOŘÁK,

SYMPHONY, No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World," op. 95.
I. Adagio: Allegro molto
II. Largo.
III. Scherzo.
IV. Allegro con fuoco.

which mere drillmastership could never impart.

Perhaps it might be as well to remind the more brutal of the New York critics of this. There were some who insulted all his work at the beginning. They predicted that our orchestra would sink to the level of a beer-garden band if they were long under Mr. Fiedler's control. It has been long under Mr. Fiedler's control, and is likely to remain so for a while longer.

ern school and he has evidently imbued the musicians of the orchestra with some of his own enthusiasm. Not an iota of the technique and routine work of the orchestra has been lost, yet there is an abandon and fire in such a work as this but the organization still seems to maintain that technique and ensemble which makes it the first orchestra of the world today. The especially successful and brilliant concert of yesterday may stand as a good proof of the foregoing statements.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

XXII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 17, AT 8, P.M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN,

OVERTURE to Collin's Tragedy, "Coriolanus,"
op. 62.

A. FOOTE,

SUITE in E major, op. 63, for STRING ORCHESTRA.
I. Prelude.
II. Pizzicato and Adagietto.
III. Fugue.
(First performance.)

PAUL DUKAS,

SCHERZO, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," (after a ballad by Goethe.)

DVOŘÁK,

SYMPHONY, No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World," op. 95.
I. Adagio: Allegro molto
II. Largo.
III. Scherzo.
IV. Allegro con fuoco.

FINE NEW SUITE BY ARTHUR FOOTE PLAYED

FOLLOWED "CORIOLANUS"
AND STOOD THE TEST

Symphony Programme This Week
Wholly Orchestral—Two Works
by Dvorak Included.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven—"Coriolanus," Overture.
Arthur Foote—Suite in E, for String Orchestra.
Dukas. Scherzo—"The Sorcerer's Apprentice."
Dvorak—"From the New World" Symphony.

A programme wholly orchestral, but none the less interesting on that account. Our orchestra plays grandly enough, and the programmes are brilliant enough, to stand without the aid of vocalist, pianist or violinist. For ourselves we would be glad to see the experiment tried of giving many more purely orchestral concerts.

In the midst of all the strivings and strainings of new schools, of scintillating tone-colors, of unheard-of progressions, how like a rock stands Beethoven! Dignity and power were in every phrase of the "Coriolanus" overture, and no modern contrasts, however sharply drawn, could excel the contrast here between the chief and the subordinate theme, the masculine and the feminine, Coriolanus and his wife and mother. We can say of it, as Beethoven himself said of Handel,—"Das ist das Wahre!"

It was no mean test to come after such a lofty work, but Arthur Foote bore this test famously. His suite is not so ambitious as the orchestral suite in D minor, but it has some great points nevertheless.

The first movement was fluent and beautiful, and the surety with which the voices were led spoke of reserve power that was inspiring to the auditor. The second movement, a "Pizzicato and Adagietto," we scarcely cared for as much, but the audience evidently prized it more, and it was abundantly applauded. It gives a good contrast between a bright pizzicato and a mournful Adagietto, the latter being played with bow on muted instruments. Then comes an abbreviated return of the first (pizzicato) part, giving a shortened form of Scherzo with Trio. The beauties here are of a slightly more conventional type than in the other two movements.

But it was the finale that awakened our heartiest recognition. Seldom have we heard so well-constructed a modern fugue. The subject was workable, clear, and not too long. The four-voiced exposition was an excellent one and ushered in a set of strettos and episodes that were most masterly. An effective organ-point, with brilliant counterpoint above it, led up to a coda that was a true climax. And with all this skill and learning there was not a dull moment in the work. It is certainly one of the best of Mr. Foote's compositions and we were glad to see the audience so responsive to it. At the end the composer was twice obliged to bow from his seat in the audience, to acknowledge the unceasing applause. Never was tribute better deserved.

Dukas' Scherzo, which pictures the sorcerer's apprentice turning a broomstick into a water-carrier and then being unable to stop his bringing of endless buckets of H₂O, is more than a mere jest, it is H₂O, a very brilliant score, and contains some graphic melody. It is full of bassoon work, and these instruments deserve high praise for the manner in which their part was carried out. The reading and the performance were most praiseworthy.

Dvorak's "New World" symphony wears well. It is useless for critics to argue that it is not American and that there are no real American melodies on the plantation. That Dvorak built upon the foundation of plantation music is not only proved by Mr. Krehbiel, but by some of the chamber-music which he created at the same time, which is even suggestive of the banjo. That the Southern tunes are African, and not American, is also untrue, for the negro would not have brought forth such melodies if he had lived in Africa a thousand years; they are the outcome of plantation-life and of that alone.

There are other composers who are turning to the American field for inspiration. Only recently the present reviewer received, through a third party, a request from Puccini as to information regarding the folk-music of America in the forties and fifties, for use in his setting of "The Girl of the Golden West." He has already used the "Star-Spangled Banner" (not an American tune by birth) in his "Madame Butterfly."

It was charming to see how well Mr. Fiedler caught up the lilt of the American themes. It may be conceded at once that these bits of tune are not transcriptions of any Southern melodies, but, and this is the more remarkable, they are themes and phrases evolved by Dvorak after studying this music. All folk-music has some elements in common. We can find the "Scotch Snap" in Norway and Russia as well as in Scotland, for example. It is therefore natural enough that some Czech commentators should fondly claim our folk-music for their own.

The Largo is to our mind the best movement, even if it is the least distinctly national. We found this a trifle over-refined in the performance and the English horn solo somewhat too subdued. But the melancholy and quiet brooding of the movement suit excellently to this instrument, which, with the Viola, is the true representative of pensive sadness.

The transference of figures from the preceding movements into the finale is finely done. Beethoven was the father of this kind of transplanting, and Brahms was its culminator, but many composers fail to make their flowers grow in the new soil of an alien movement. Dvorak fits them in perfectly and the symphony is all the more homogeneous because of these touches. American audiences ought to hear this work oftener.

300

There was one great shadow over this concert in the hearts of many auditors. The Assistant Manager, Mr. Fred R. Comee, who died suddenly yesterday, was almost a personal friend to every regular attendant on these concerts. Everyone knew his pleasant face, almost everyone had had a pleasant word from him at one time or another. It was a great pain to know that he had gone forever from the post that he had filled so genially and well. Orchestra and audience alike must have felt the shadow of Azrael clouding the sunshine of some of the music.

MUSICAL EVENTS

Programme of the twenty-second symphony rehearsal and concert:
Beethoven—Overture to Collins' Tragedy, "Coriolanus," Op. 62.
Foote—Suite in E major, Op. 63, for string orchestra, first performance.
Dukas—Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" (after a ballad by Goethe).
Dvorak—Symphony No. 5 in E minor, "From the New World," Op. 95.

Naturally the interest centered in Mr. Foote's new work. It is ingenuous and beautifully melodic throughout. The prelude introduces a tuneful phrase which is repeated with much insistence and adroit invention by the different voices of the string choir.

The second movement, called and played Pizzicato, would have been more intelligible in a concert hall as its glinting, gossamer web is a bit too fine a texture for display in the larger auditorium, but its nimble caprices and delicate beauty were pleasing. However, it was the Adagietto played with the bow upon muted strings, into which it led directly, that found the greatest favor. The singularly fluent, spontaneous and beautiful melody sung for the most part by the upper voices, with an effective counter subject at times in the cellos, the wealth of harmonic color through which the composer led it, and with all the clear and direct appeal to even the untutored ear, made the second movement a rare delight, and called forth continued applause from the audience, to which Mr. Foote twice responded. A fugue built upon a terse positive subject with a clear, spirited and forceful development concludes the work.

Dukas' richly fantastic and whimsical sketch served well to illustrate Mr. Fiedler's versatility and the splendid virtuosity of the band. It was well-nigh tonal photography. The blithe theme of the improvised sprite impressed as water-carrier becomes sinister upon vaunted trumpets and precipitates an orchestral torrent which well portrays that incorrigible's deluge of the room with water, as goes the fanciful story. Mr. Fiedler read this kaleidoscopic work with subtle appreciation of its rich drolleries and with tremendous virility in the stressful climaxes with which it abounds.

It is little wonder that the New World Symphony provoked derogatory comment at its appearance for it contains themes which possess an unescapably tawdry flavor, but the coherent picturesque development which Dvorak has given them, together with the refreshing clearness and variety of color, would enable phrases without particular individual appeal in themselves. The largo affords a peculiarly apt and expressive use of the English horn, and is the more beautiful because of the tender, pathetic theme which that instrument sings.

ARTHUR B. WILSON.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Foot BY OLIN DOWNES April 1909

The Symphony rehearsal of yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall presented an uncommonly interesting programme: "Coriolanus" Overture, Beethoven; Suite for strings, in E major (first performance), Foote; Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," Dukas; Symphony, "From the New World," Dvorak.

The "Coriolanus" overture is exceptionally strong and concise in its workmanship, noble and dramatic in content and it is a modern masterpiece. Within the short period of time consumed in its performance one beholds, as it were, the unfoldment of an entire drama. How wisely Beethoven moulded his themes to his purpose, chiselled them in conformance with the demands of musical structure! How masterly his treatment of the sonata form, his altering of laws laid down by himself, for the sake of dramatic verity! Mr. Fiedler felt the heroism, the consuming fire which originated that overture and he conveyed his appreciation.

Mr. Foote's suite, as it now stands, was written in the years 1907 and '08. It is sane and pleasant music, well constructed, and the fact that its idiom is rather conventional does not trouble us. The second movement, a rapid, fanciful pizzicato with a contrasting passage for the muted strings, is a charming moment; but strongest of all is the final fugue, a warm, vigorous bit of writing. At the conclusion of the performance Mr. Foote, who was present, received an ovation.

Mr. Fiedler, we think, was far from Dukas when he led a crackling performance of one of the cleverest, wittiest pieces in modern music. Dukas unites the brilliancy of the Hebrew with the Frenchman's lightness of touch. He employs Strauss' orchestra, expurgated. Clearness, ingenuity, an exceedingly snappy, graphic style are his characteristics. His worst thunder is sharp and vibrant without heaviness, his utmost climax glitters and refracts tone as pure ice refracts the rays of the sun. Mr. Fiedler made a tremendous effect, but he handled the pointed and polished remarks of Paul Dukas without gloves, with an athletic directness not entirely in place. Recalling Dr. Muck's finished, debonaire treatment of this "bon mot," the contrast is very apparent.

After this electric, but rather hollow entertainment of the "New World" symphony was fairly ravishing. We are not concerned with the theories that gave rise to the work. Thank heaven we are not at this time obliged to discuss the merits of Indian and Greaser melodies as available for serious musical treatment. The programme book mentions only one melody, the second theme of the first movement, as a direct derivation from an American folk-song. But the symphony is a tissue of folk-melodies. In the first movement these melodies happen to be more Scotch, and for the rest of the work more Bohemian than American. What interests us, what absorbed the audience yesterday is the fact that it was listening to glorious, absolute music and nothing else. Certainly this is a greeting to the "new world," an explosion of nature, brought about by the contact of a new, thrilling land with an impressionable melodist, one of the greatest who ever lived. Dvorak was a son of the soil. He was imbued with its savor, and he sang, as the bird sings, of the freshness, the beauty, the poetry of unsullied nature. So his work, a strange conglomeration of classic and modern methods, was doubly in season, doubly calculated to get into the bones. Mr. Fiedler caught all its vigor and buoyancy and he did ample justice to the brilliant orchestration. He was especially successful—or was the music especially successful?—in the scherzo and the largo, which was interpreted as the romance of the primeval forests that it is.

The Symphony Concert April 23 1909

If orchestral concerts may be classified even as are plays, Mr. Fiedler made a "pleasant" programme for the Symphony Concert of Friday afternoon. It began with Beethoven's overture, "Coriolanus"—a tone-picture, as we might say nowadays, of the hero, a prelude to Shakspeare's august tragedy, what one will except theatre music to the mediocre play by Collin for which the composer really wrote it. The overture was the one piece of the afternoon that asked exacting attention and stirred to grave response. Then followed, for a first performance in any concert, Mr. Foote's new suite for strings, and the audience justly took such joy of it that it twice called the composer to his feet from his modest place in the hall. The applause was deserved return for the pleasure the fine-spirited and finely written music had given; but it seemed no less as deserved recognition of the honorable and diligent place Mr. Foote has occupied these many years, and still holds, in the musical life of Boston. It is long since a new piece by him has been played at the Symphony Concerts, and the audience was quick to seize the opportunity to compliment the composer. Next came Dukas's orchestral setting of Goethe's ballad of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," as vivid and brilliant a piece of instrumental narrative and delineation as has been written in our time, a tour de force of keen imagination and resourceful executive skill that sustain themselves to the end. Finally, for the first time in nearly five years, the audience heard Dvorak's symphony "From the New World." What a vogue it had in its time in the nineties here in the America that some fondly fancied had inspired it! How they and many another held excited debate of its use of Negro and folk-song melodies! The discussion subsided; audiences began to hear the symphony for its own intrinsic qualities and seemingly were less and less impressed by it. The score passed gradually to the shelf; Mr. Gericke took it down and dusted it when he had need to arrange a memorial programme for the dead Dvorak in the autumn of 1904. Since then it has gathered dust again until Mr. Fiedler put it on his rack. The audience listened with interest and applauded cordially, but some of the elder and more reflective hearers must have wondered if this were really the symphony about which they were so excited in those distant nineties. Today, it justifies poorly enough any sort of tumult over it.

301

The day was one of Mr. Fiedler's good days, and in all the music, except Dukas's scherzo, his abilities as a conductor shone clear. The heroic voice, the large stride, the ample and incisive accent of Beethoven's overture sorted with his strenuous ways and, now and again, with his men to aid, the music gained the eloquent sonorities that rightly or wrongly do link Beethoven's Coriolanus to the Coriolanus of Shakspeare. Mr. Fiedler loves the emphasizing contrast, and he had it, and achieved it, in the play of the music that suggests the proud and self-absorbed Roman over against the softer women and the softer circumstance that surround and sap him. Mr. Fiedler loves, too, the rhetorical pause, and there is fit room for it in this overture to "Coriolanus." He "nurses" melody and phrase gladly, and the music that Wagner thought significant of the Roman's mother will bear such "nursing," even thought its dignity now and then fell away into something too like long-drawn sweetness. In the main, however, Mr. Fiedler made the overture speak with its high eloquence and its noble power, and he and it were good to hear. He and the string choir, quite as much, were as fortunate in Mr. Foote's suite. The little prelude went in graceful melodic outline and clear brightness of tone; the pizzicato was all light and shimmering elasticity; the adagietto had its richness of soberer tonal coloring; and Mr. Fiedler brought the supple and the cumulative energy to the fugue that is the true means to make all the fugues in the world—and how many there must be!—really "sound." Mr. Fiedler was vividly delineative in Dukas's scherzo, and his orchestra clearly told the tale. There were the voices of mystery that bring its atmosphere; there was the diligent broom trotting to and fro to the well; came the bewilderment, the alarm, the terror of the apprentice, the advent of the potent and overwhelming sorcerer, and the subdued broom slinking away to its corner again. Mr. Fiedler was very diligent and conscientious with the music. He duly imparted its contents as a faithful conductor should. Yet somehow his fidelity—his literalness—almost—rather dimmed Dukas's brilliance, and he seemed to forget that the scherzo is an instrumental jeu d'esprit as well as an orchestral narrative. Dukas was smiling, even winking, as he wrote. With Dvorak's symphony, Mr. Fiedler was on more congenial ground. He could yield himself to its rhythmical turbulence, its changefulness of mood, its high instrumental coloring (as such coloring went in Dvorak's time). He could catch the snapping vivacity of its scherzo, the languorous sentimentality of its slow movement, the leaps and whirl of its finale. Probably he did not make Dvorak's music sound as only the Czechs—they say—can do; but he played it as though he believed in it and would have his hearers believe with him; as though it were really alive.

"The times change, and we change with them," and Dvorak's symphony, heard again in the spring of 1909, was not exactly what some thought it when we first knew and debated it in the winter of 1895, as Boston and New York listened to it four times within a month. Nowadays the point is not whether and how Dvorak used Negro folk melodies and their suggestion in the music. "Some will undoubtedly continue to insist," writes the learned "programmist" truly, "that the symphony 'From the New World' is based, for the most part, on Negro themes, and that the future of American music rests on the use of Congo, North American Indian, Creole, Greaser and cowboy ditties, whinnings, yawps and whoopings." And forthwith he proves at length that to Dvorak's family, to his friends, and to those in general, "from the highest to the humblest," who have heard it in Bohemia, the symphony seems wholly Czech, wholly of the peculiar traits of the composer, and has no apparent or plausible connection with his miserable stay in America, except as it may bear the impress of his loneliness here, of his longing for his own country, of his quailing withdrawal into himself from the turbulent life of a city and a land that were strange and distasteful to him. From the beginning to the end of his life, Dvorak was a Bohemian peasant, and an unusually simple-minded one, who happened to have the gift to write music. And circumstance, wanton and unkind, shifted him to New York in the nineties, for advertising purposes and into what pass for "musical circles" there. No wonder he pined dolefully and shut himself bitterly within his own spirit.

Nowadays, however, all this is neither here nor there. Few of us that heard the symphony Friday cared a pin whether Negro or any other folk-tunes suggested much or little of the music, or whether the impressions that Dvorak received from "the new world," whence he dated it, stimulated or dulled his imagination. The debates over the symphony are closed. American and Bohemian opinions of it gather the dust side by side. The weary babble about folk-song in general goes tediously onward and will probably to the end of musical time; but composers yesterday, today, and forever, will still "look to their hearts and write" when they would set their fingers to music-paper. The question, the only question, for us who listened on Friday was whether the symphony interested our minds, touched our imaginations, stirred responsive emotions and gladdened the ear, now by its melodies and their adornments, and now by the richness, the warmth and the variety of the instrumental coloring. The scherzo unmistakably accomplishes most of these things. It keeps its rhythmic vivacity, its adroit contrasts, its bright tonal tints, and its freshness and ardor of spirit. The Czech snap, which is much more important than the "Scotch snap" of the folk-lore, animates it.

Dvorak's orchestral coloring, rich and brilliant, diverse and apt, as it seemed in those days of the nineties, has paled under the ampler, more deeply tinted, and subtler palettes of a new musical generation. It has left him behind there; it has left him behind, too, in all the arts and imaginings of harmony and modulation. And his music has not the substance of melodic idea, the depth and the vigor of emotion, the variety and the largeness of imagination, the amplitude of design, the splendor of beauty or the eloquence of power that make the music of the masters survive every "advance" and every change in the fashions and the methods of their art. Dvorak was only a Bohemian peasant who had the gift to write music that at its best was unconsciously instinct with the spirit of his race. The gift rose not to genius, or something close to it, as it does once and again in Bruckner. For want of substance of thought and idea, of large grasp and large design, his music thins. For want of deep and kindling emotion to more highly organized imaginations and temperaments than his, it has begun to sound tame. Dvorak's music is more than out of the fashion. It is dying a natural death. It is perilous to revive his symphonies nowadays to another musical generation. The star of the more substantial, of the finer, Smetana rises; the star of Dvorak sets.

Mr. Foote's suite provoked no such melancholy reflections. It is a little piece, if the listener, like the composer, chooses so to call it; and it continues only for a short and varied twenty minutes. It asks only a string choir, and Mr. Foote makes light play with its natural but duly changeful timbres. A short prelude runs in clear and graceful melody, ingeniously distributed and imitated through the different groups of instruments—runs charmingly, playfully, with the happy air of surety of design, surety of fancy, and surety of resource all taking their seeming pastime. There is pause, and an insistent pizzicato follows, a little and beguiling exercise, so to say, in the varied timbres and in the fanciful touches that the composer may draw from diverse strings so plucked. The titillating voices subside, and the music passes into a soberly songful adagietto, all shadowed tonal coloring, the little passing cloud of pensive musing—it is hardly melancholy—upon the brightness of the whole suite. The choir echoes the pizzicato, and there is pause again. Then lustily, the strings swing away into the final fugue. Now a fugue may be the dullest and the prosiest thing in all music, as any one knows who has ever happened to read examination papers in harmony and counterpoint. It may also be as exhilarating, as thrilling even, an exercise for the musical mind and delight to the musical ear as was Reger's in the concerts of last year. Mr. Foote's fugue is never dull and never prosy. It has the energy of imagination, of contrast, of advance and recession, of execution for creation's sake that is much more than half the secret of successful fugue-making. And in keeping with the rest of the suite, and by a true and lively touch of imagination, it is energy at play. Trifle in a sense though the suite is, the music has the imagination, the resource, the spontaneity, the sense of style and the nice adaptation of means to ends that make it an admirable, even a distinguished trifle. And it is one of the maxims of a sincere and sensitive artistry that a little thing, well and truly done, is more to be desired than a large thing clouded and bungled. Moreover in the music, Mr. Foote, wise as he is in execution, is young again of spirit. And he counts his fifties.

H. T. P.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Program — Apr 17, 09

DVORAK FOR REVIVAL AND FOOTE FOR NOVELTY

The Bohemian's Symphony, "From the New World," for the First Time in Nearly Five Years—The Decline of Dvorak's Music and the Fashion in Which the Symphony Exemplifies It—Some Curious Contrasts—The Fresh, Keen Pleasure of Mr. Foote's New Suite—Youthful Spirit and Mature Workmanship Join Hands In It—Beethoven and Dukas for the Rest of the Programme—Mr. Fiedler's Good Day

If orchestral concerts may be classified even as are plays, Mr. Fiedler made a "pleasant" programme for the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon. It began with Beethoven's overture, "Coriolanus"—a tone-picture, as we might say nowadays, of the hero, a prelude to Shakspeare's august tragedy, what one will except theatre music to the mediocre play by Collin for which the composer really wrote it. The overture was the one piece of the afternoon that asked exacting attention and stirred to grave response. Then followed, for a first performance in any concert, Mr. Foote's new suite for strings, and the audience justly took such joy of it that it twice called the composer to his feet from his modest place in the hall. The applause was deserved return for the pleasure the fine-spirited and finely written music had given; but it seemed no less as deserved recognition of the honorable and diligent place Mr. Foote has occupied these many years, and still holds, in the musical life of Boston. It is long since a new piece by him has been played at the Symphony Concerts, and the audience was quick to seize the opportunity to compliment the composer. Next came Dukas's orchestral setting of Goethe's ballad of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," as vivid and brilliant a piece of instrumental narrative and delineation as has been written in our time, a tour de force of keen imagination and resourceful executive skill that sustain themselves to the end. Finally, for the first time in nearly five years, the audience heard Dvorak's symphony "From the New World." What a vogue it had in its time in the nineties here in the America that some fondly fancied had inspired it! How they and many another held excited debate of its use of Negro and folk-song melodies! The discussion subsided; audiences began to hear the symphony for its own intrinsic qualities and seemingly were less and less impressed by it. The score passed gradually to the shelf; Mr. Gericke took it down and dusted it when he had need to arrange a memorial programme for the dead Dvorak in the autumn of 1904. Since then it has gathered dust again until Mr. Fiedler put it on his rack yesterday. The audience listened with interest and applauded cordially, but some of the elder and more reflective hearers must have wondered if this were really the symphony about which they were so excited in those distant nineties. Today, it justifies poorly enough any sort of tumult over it.

The day was one of Mr. Fiedler's good days, and in all the music, except Dukas's scherzo, his abilities as a conductor shone clear. The heroic voice, the large stride, the ample and incisive accent of Beethoven's overture sorted with his strenuous ways and, now and again, with his men to aid, the music gained the eloquent sonorities that rightly or wrongly do link Beethoven's Coriolanus to the Coriolanus of Shakspeare. Mr. Fiedler loves the emphasizing contrast, and he had it, and achieved it, in the play of the music that suggests the proud and self-absorbed Roman over against the softer women and the softer circumstance that surround and sap him. Mr. Fiedler loves, too, the rhetorical pause, and there is fit room for it in this overture to "Coriolanus." He "nurses" melody and phrase gladly, and the music that Wagner thought significant of the Roman's mother will bear such "nursing," even thought its dignity now and then fell away yesterday into something too like long-drawn sweetness. In the main, however, Mr. Fiedler made the overture speak with its high eloquence and its noble power, and he and it were good to hear. He and the string choir, quite as much, were as fortunate in Mr. Foote's suite. The little prelude went in graceful melodic outline and clear brightness of tone; the pizzicato was all light and shimmering elasticity; the adagietto had its richness of soberer tonal coloring; and Mr. Fiedler brought the supple and the cumulative energy to the fugue that is the true means to make all the fugues in the world—and how many there must be!—really "sound." Mr. Fiedler was vividly delineative in Dukas's scherzo, and his orchestra clearly told the tale. There were the voices of mystery that bring its atmosphere; there was the diligent broom trotting to and fro to the well; came the bewilderment, the alarm, the terror of the apprentice, the advent of the potent and overwhelming sorcerer, and the subdued broom slinking away to its corner again. Mr. Fiedler was very diligent and conscientious with the music. He duly imparted its contents as a faithful conductor should. Yet somehow his fidelity—his literalness almost—rather dimmed Dukas's brilliance, and he seemed to forget that the scherzo is an instrumental jeu d'esprit as well as an orchestral narrative. Dukas was smiling, even winking, as he wrote. With Dvorak's symphony, Mr. Fiedler was on more congenial ground. He could yield himself to its rhythmical turbulence, its changefulness of mood, its high instrumental coloring (as such coloring went in Dvorak's time). He could catch the snapping vivacity of its scherzo, the languorous sentimentality of its slow movement, the leaps and whirl of its finale. Probably he did not make Dvorak's music sound as only the Czechs—they say—can do; but he played it as though he believed in it and would have his hearers believe with him; as though it were really alive.

"The times change, and we change with them," and Dvorak's symphony, heard again in the spring of 1909, was not exactly what some thought it when we first knew and debated it in the winter of 1895, as Boston and New York listened to it four times within a month. Nowadays the point is not whether and how Dvorak used Negro folk melodies and their suggestion in the music. "Some will undoubtedly continue to insist," writes the learned "programmist" truly, "that the symphony 'From the New World' is based, for the most part, on Negro themes, and that the future of American music rests on the use of Congo, North American Indian, Creole, Greaser and cowboy ditties, whinnings, yawps and whoopings." And forthwith he proves at length that to Dvorak's family, to his friends, and to those in general, "from the highest to the humblest," who have heard it in Bohemia, the symphony seems wholly Czech, wholly of the peculiar traits of the composer, and has no apparent or plausible connection with his miserable stay in America, except as it may bear the impress of his loneliness here, of his longing for his own country, of his quailing withdrawal into himself from the turbulent life of a city and a land that were strange and distasteful to him. From the beginning to the end of his life, Dvorak was a Bohemian peasant, and an unusually simple-minded one, who happened to have the gift to write music. And circumstance, wanton and unkind, shifted him to New York in the nineties, for advertising purposes and into what pass for "musical circles" there. No wonder he pined dolefully and shut himself bitterly within his own spirit.

Nowadays, however, all this is neither here nor there. Few of us that heard the symphony yesterday cared a pin whether Negro or any other folk-tunes suggested much or little of the music, or whether the impressions that Dvorak received from "the new world," whence he dated it, stimulated or dulled his imagination. The debates over the symphony are closed. American and Bohemian opinions of it gather the dust side by side. The weary babble about folk-song in general goes tediously onward and will probably to the end of musical time;

but composers yesterday, today, and forever, will still "look to their hearts and write" when they would set their fingers to music-paper. The question, the only question, for us who listened on Friday was whether the symphony interested our minds, touched our imaginations, stirred responsive emotions and gladdened the ear, now by its melodies and their adornments, and now by the richness, the warmth and the variety of the instrumental coloring. The scherzo unmistakably accomplishes most of these things. It keeps its rhythmic vivacity, its adroit contrasts, its bright tonal tints, and its freshness and ardor of spirit. The Czech snap, which is much more important than the "Scotch snap" of the folk-lorists, animates it. The music is sprightly and alive, exhilarating to hear. The finale, too, has its energy of mood and voice still, its tingling transitions, its fiery contrasts, its long cumulative progressions, its primitive vigor. Perhaps Dvorak heard the confused and turbulent voices of that strange America in it, or perhaps he felt himself "strong and free," as the old ballad says, on the native heaths of his own Bohemia. Be that as it may, the finale has a springing energy that keeps it vital. But how has the Largo faded, with its insistent melody for the English horn that Mr. Feldler took at rather a droning pace yesterday! Some of us used to hear in it, when we were under the first spell of the symphony—and the debate that it quickened—the rising and fading, the advancing and receding, the mysterious and potent voice of the forests of old legend, when winds stir in them and lonely and wandering men listen tremulous to the sound. And yesterday there was but a well-imagined melody for the English horn, singing itself insistently, languously over the soft strings, and turning shallower and shallower at each repetition. Mere surface, too simple, emotion, as it seemed. And what was the first movement but spirited and contrasting play with instrumental colors and short-breathed and impulsive melodic thought and development—thin and unsatisfying music, again, with all its restless glitter?

Dvorak's orchestral coloring, rich and brilliant, diverse and apt, as it seemed in those days of the nineties, has paled under the ampler, more deeply tinted, and subtler palettes of a new musical generation. It has left him behind there; it has left him behind, too, in all the arts and imaginings of harmony and modulation. And his music has not the substance of melodic idea, the depth and the vigor of emotion, the variety and the largeness of imagination, the amplitude of design, the splendor of beauty or the eloquence of power that make the music of the masters survive every "advance" and every change in the fashions and the methods of their art. Dvorak was only a Bohemian peasant who had the gift to write music that at its best was unconsciously instinct with the spirit of his race. The gift rose not to genius, or something close to it, as it does once and again in Bruckner. For want of substance of thought and idea, of large grasp and large design, his music thins. For want of deep and kindling emotion to more highly organized imaginations and temperaments than his, it has begun to sound tame. Dvorak's music is more than out of the fashion. It is dying a natural death. It is perilous to revive his symphonies nowadays to another musical generation. The star of the more substantial, of the finer, Smetana rises; the star of Dvorak sets.

Mr. Foote's suite provoked no such melancholy reflections. It is a little piece, if the listener, like the composer, chooses so to call it; and it continues only for a short and varied twenty minutes. It asks only a string choir, and Mr. Foote makes light play with its natural but duly changeful timbres. A short prelude runs in clear and graceful melody, ingeniously distributed and imitated through the different groups of instruments—runs charmingly, playfully, with the happy air of surety of design, surety of fancy, and surety of resource all taking their seeming pastime. There is pause, and an insistent pizzicato follows, a little and beguiling exercise, so to say, in the varied timbres and in the fanciful touches that the composer may draw from diverse strings so plucked. The titillating voices subside, and the music passes into a soberly songful adagietto, all shadowed tonal coloring, the little passing cloud of pensive musing—it is hardly melancholy—upon the brightness of the whole suite. The choir echoes the pizzicato, and there is pause again. Then lustily, the strings swing away into the final fugue. Now a fugue may be the dullest and the prosiest thing in all music, as any one knows who has ever happened to read examination papers in harmony and counterpoint. It may also be as exhilarating, as thrilling even, an exercise for the musical mind and delight to the musical ear as was Reger's in the concerts of last year. Mr. Foote's fugue is never dull and never prosy. It has the energy of imagination, of contrast, of advance and recession, of execution for creation's sake that is much more than half the secret of successful fugue-making. And in keeping with the rest of the suite, and by a true and lively touch of imagination, it is energy at play. Trifle in a sense though the suite is, the music has the imagination, the resource, the spontaneity, the sense of style and the nice adaptation of means to ends that make it an admirable, even a distinguished trifle. And it is one of the maxims of a sincere and sensitive artistry that a little thing, well and truly done, is more to be desired than a large thing clouded and bungled. Moreover in the music, Mr. Foote, wise as he is in execution, is young again of spirit. And he counts his fifties.

H. T. P.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Foote's New Suite, the Symphony Novelty.

Another Season of the "Pops" to Begin May 3.

Recitals of the Closing Season—Gossip.

Globe — Apr. 18, 1909

Arthur Foote's suite in E major, for string orchestra, was the novelty number at the Symphony concerts last week, being given its first performance in public at the Friday afternoon rehearsal. The "Coriolanus" overture by Beethoven, the Dukas scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and Dvorak's "New World" symphony were the other selections.

In bringing forward Mr. Foote's melodic little suite Mr. Fiedler continued his good work in giving practical encouragement to resident musicians by performance of those compositions which seem to him worth while. Mac-have successively figured on the last four programs, and in no case has Mr. Fiedler's judgment been at fault regarding the quality of the works performed.

The three parts of the suite Mr. Foote has divided into a prelude, an interrupted pizzicato and a fugue. The work is very brief and is scored for a string orchestra. Taking a simple short theme for a foundation it finds repetition in a dozen or more forms in the different groups of instruments. The treatment is largely of the legato character and the harmony glides from one choir to another in the most amiable way, concluding with long sustained notes in the higher fingering of the violin tapering to a whispered diminuendo.

Opening with a lively pizzicato of an elaborate nature the second part closes in a similar way, an interruption by bowed instruments making a strangely contrasted connecting link between the two. The pizzicato is cleverly managed, with tonal colorings distributed through all the string sections. The fugue begins in canonical measures, the original subject being stated briefly and succinctly and the answering themes introduced skilfully and without abrupt transitions in tempo and phrasing. The performance gave evident pleasure, for at its close the composer was forced to bow his acknowledgments in recognition of the applause.

The "Coriolanus" overture deserves to be credited with the proper "pomp and circumstance" that gives musical illustration of grim episodes in the career of the hero. Beethoven's pictures were presented in vivid colors by Mr. Fiedler's forces.

"The Sorcerer's Apprentice" went along in the jolliest way, with its comical and diabolical utterances of wood-winds, especially in the bassoons, its sharp trumpet blasts and other jumping-jack quirks of orchestration. The program closed with the "New World" symphony which shows Dvorak's undeniable talent in treating negro melodies in symphonic style. Praise is due the orchestra whatever one may think about the merit of the work itself.

Bruckner's eighth symphony, which was received with conflicting opinions as to its importance when played at the 18th pair of concerts, will be repeated this week. The "Siegfried Idyll" will make up the second part of the program.

For the closing program next week Mr. Fiedler announces the ninth symphony, by Beethoven, which has not appeared on a Symphony program since Symphony hall was built and has been given only once in the last 10 years, then at a Pension Fund concert under Mr. Gerike. For the choral movement of the symphony the orchestra will have the assistance of the Cecilia society and a quartet number of prominent singers, whose names will be announced in due time.

Mr. Foote's new suite for string orchestra had a second performance at the Symphony Concert of last Saturday night, and again the audience received the music and the composer very heartily. At the end of the second movement, it called Mr. Foote, who was sitting in a corner of the balcony, twice to his feet, and at the end of the whole piece, it renewed its applause as eagerly. It is long since a new composition by Mr. Foote has found such immediate favor here.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

XXIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 24, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN,

FUNERAL MARCH from SYMPHONY, No. 3,
"Eroica."

IN MEMORIAM FREDERIC R. COMEE.

BRUCKNER,

SYMPHONY, No. 8, C minor.

- I. Allegro moderato.
- II. Scherzo: (Allegro moderato—Andante—Allegro moderato.)
- III. Adagio.
- IV. Solemnly (not fast.)
(Repeated by Request.)

WAGNER,

"A Siegfried Idyl."

quarre, Strube, Chadwick and Foote have successively figured on the last four programs, and in no case has Mr Fiedler's judgment been at fault regarding the quality of the works performed.

The three parts of the suite Mr Foote has divided into a prelude, an interrupted pizzicato and a fugue. The work is very brief and is scored for a string orchestra. Taking a simple short theme for a foundation it finds repetition in a dozen or more forms in the different groups of instruments. The treatment is largely of the legato character and the harmony glides from one choir to another in the most amiable way, concluding with long sustained notes in the higher fingering of the violin tapering to a whispered diminuendo.

Opening with a lively pizzicato of an elaborate nature the second part closes in a similar way, an interruption by bowed instruments making a strangely contrasted connecting link between the two. The pizzicato is cleverly managed, with tonal colorings distributed through all the string sections. The fugue begins in canonical measures, the original subject being stated briefly and succinctly and the answering themes introduced skilfully and without abrupt transitions in tempo and phrasing. The performance gave evident pleasure, for at its close the composer was forced to bow his acknowledgments in recognition of the applause.

The "Coriolanus" overture deserves to be credited with the proper "pomp and circumstance" that gives musical illustration of grim episodes in the career of the hero. Beethoven's pictures were presented in vivid colors by Mr Fiedler's forces.

"The Sorcerer's Apprentice" went along in the jolliest way, with its comical and diabolical utterances of wood-winds, especially in the bassoons, its sharp trumpet blasts and other jumping-jack quirks of orchestration. The program closed with the "New World" symphony which shows Dvorak's undeniable talent in treating negro melodies in symphonic style. Praise is due the orchestra whatever one may think about the merit of the work itself.

Bruckner's eighth symphony, which was received with conflicting opinions as to its importance when played at the 18th pair of concerts, will be repeated this week. The "Siegfried Idyll" will make up the second part of the program.

For the closing program next week Mr Fiedler announces the ninth symphony, by Beethoven, which has not appeared on a Symphony program since Symphony hall was built and has been given only once in the last 10 years, then at a Pension Fund concert under Mr Gericke. For the choral movement of the symphony the orchestra will have the assistance of the Cecilia society and a quartet number of prominent singers, whose names will be announced in due time.

Mr. Foote's new suite for string orchestra had a second performance at the Symphony Concert of last Saturday night, and again the audience received the music and the composer very heartily. At the end of the second movement, it called Mr. Foote, who was sitting in a corner of the balcony, twice to his feet, and at the end of the whole piece, it renewed its applause as eagerly. It is long since a new composition by Mr. Foote has found such immediate favor here.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

XXIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 24, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN,

FUNERAL MARCH from SYMPHONY, No. 3,
"Eroica."

IN MEMORIAM FREDERIC R. COMEE.

BRUCKNER,

SYMPHONY, No. 8, C minor.

I. Allegro moderato.

II. Scherzo: (Allegro moderato—Andante—Allegro moderato.)

III. Adagio.

IV. Solemnly (not fast.)

(Repeated by Request.)

WAGNER,

"A Siegfried Idyl."

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

An Intimate Memorial Rite—Bruckner's Eighth Symphony Again and to a Prepared and Expectant Audience—A Suggested "Programme"—Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" for Spring Music

Trans. — Apr. 24, 1909

The Symphony Concert began yesterday afternoon in the intimacy that befits a long-standing public which has come to know those that minister to its pleasure week by week and year by year, to hold them in individual regard and to miss and to regret them when death or separation takes them away. It so knew the late Frederic Comee, for twenty-three years the assistant manager of the orchestra; and it so understood the untiring and unselfish loyalty with which he had served it. The Symphony Orchestra, at its concerts, has this very year honored the memory of a departed scholar who cultivated the arts, the late Professor Norton, and a departed musician who made music fertile in Boston, the late Mr. Lang. The one was a distinguished figure in the whole community of Boston and of Cambridge; the other had followed the Symphony Concerts from their beginnings a quarter of a century ago. The orchestra paid public tribute to both. Yesterday, when it played the "funeral march" from Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony to the memory of Mr. Comee, it was paying more intimate honor to one who had been of its own ranks, whom it had long known, and whom it lamented sincerely. The audience understood as sensitively and listened as whole-heartedly. Not often, happily, has the Symphony Orchestra had occasion for such intimate rites, but in them and in the mood of the audience toward them was proof of the fine and close tie that has come to bind the public of the concerts to the men that give and direct them. Like all such bonds, it is not a thing to be discussed or to be paraded, but when the rare moment comes to disclose it, as it did yesterday, it is at once clear, firm, touching and significant. The pity of such moments is the lack of diversified and adaptable memorial music. Siegfried's apotheosis in "Götterdämmerung" may serve only for the mighty dead. The funeral march orchestrated from Chopin's sonata is too poignant for memorial dignity. Mozart's "Trauer-Musik" has its place; but the ultimate resort is the slow movement or the whole of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, and they that hear fashion it to the mood that the occasion has stirred in them. Yet there must be other pieces as fitting—the adagios of some of Bruckner's symphonies, for example—if conductors would only seek them out and custom come to hallow them.

Coincidentally one of these symphonies, and the one with the most moving adagio of them all, happened to follow the memorial music. Evidently, Mr. Fiedler regards Bruckner's symphony in C minor as the most important new piece of the year, and, following the precedent that Dr. Muck set with novel music by Strauss, Debussy and Bischoff, he willingly complied with requests for a repetition. Six weeks ago, when the conductor and his men played the symphony for the first times, it clearly interested and stirred the audience more deeply than had any other of Bruckner's music, and long as it is, irritating as it is at moments, and disappointing as it is at others, it kindles as eager listening and as responsive feeling yesterday. Thus, at last, and at least with the symphony that is his masterpiece, has Bruckner come into a just esteem here. Mr. Gericke played his symphonies on occasion because they were music that the public of the concerts should know; Dr. Muck played one in each year of his stay because he believed in the underlying beauty of Bruckner's voice and in the unique qualities of his imagination and would lead his hearers into them. Mr. Fiedler, in turn, has played this eighth symphony as one who held it in glowing admiration, who had searched out the secrets of its exaltation and intensity, and who would impart them in like ardor and elevation of spirit. He has accomplished nothing the year through, not even "Ein Heldenleben," with such sustained and diversified power, with such largeness and depth of imagination, with such fineness of feeling and such apt and varied eloquence of impartment. An orchestra like ours may easily attain the glow and the richness or the ethereal and the poignant quality of Bruckner's instrumental coloring. Not every conductor, though his will be the best in the world, can enter as deeply as has Mr. Fiedler into the passionate aspiration and exaltation of spirit in the pure-hearted and simple-minded old man (who was a composer most of all by the grace of God) of which this instrumental coloring is the moving voice.

Moreover, as with every other composer of distinct individuality, familiarity with Bruckner's peculiar idiom only leads to the clearer appreciation of all that it would express and attain, and to the fuller emotional response to it. At a first hearing of any of Bruckner's symphonies, it is easy for the listener to occupy herself overmuch with the mechanics and the methods of the composer—to dwell upon his alternation of ascending and descending progressions, to grow impatient over his halts for mere schoolmaster's counterpoint, to light upon the moments when invention and imagination flags and confusion clouds; to note each reminiscence of Wagner; to pounce upon Bruckner's limitations and shortcomings. There is a like state of mind—Tschalkowsky's "Pathetic" symphony nowadays provokes it—when listeners have become too familiar with a particular piece.

Yesterday, with the repetition of Bruckner's symphony in C minor, the audience was at the golden mean. It knew Bruckner's ways sufficiently to be unconcerned about them, and it recalled enough of the beauty and the power, the aspiration and the exaltation of the music to be attuned to emotional response to it. In such mood Bruckner's long and mounting progressions and his surging climaxes lift the hearts of his hearers, as well as the instrumental voices that are achieving them. In such mood the beauty of the adagio becomes as luminous, as ethereal, as celestial as the light that St. John of the Revelation saw streaming from heaven, and the voice of the music is as the voice that said: "And there shall be no more death; neither sorrow nor crying; nor shall there be any more pain." Equally, with an audience so prepared to response, does the ceaseless striving and struggle and choked lament of the first movement and the interval of merely human happiness that the scherzo affords, become part of a large, imaginative and emotional design, that for once Bruckner accomplished, leading into the compassion and peace of the adagio—"and He shall wipe all tears from their eyes"—and into the solemn and triumphal exaltation of the finale. "And I saw the seven angels . . . and to them were given seven trumpets . . . and there were great voices in heaven." Bruckner disclosed no "programmes" for any of his symphonies; probably he had none. But he knew and believed in the Book of the Revelation. Ingenious minds have tried to adapt this eighth symphony to the myth of Prometheus. Rather, in the last two movements, it is music of the Apocalypse.

It is hard to "round off" a concert after such rarefied spirit and ennobled voice, and this time Mr. Fiedler took refuge in a piece that should be all contrast—the "Siegfried Idyl" that Wagner spun a little too lengthily and too tenuously for Cosima's birthday at their villa by Lucerne in the first happiness of their life together. That birthday happened to be Dec. 24, but it is quite possible to hear the piece as music of the spring, wherein by all precedent from Theocritus even to Swinburne all idyls belong. Siegfried's horn blows through the music and its voice surely is of the woods; birds trill as well; there is longing in the piece, and the warmth and the brightness of gentle, eager happiness. It is music of the spring quite as much as the spell of Good Friday or the forest voices of "Siegfried." To come out from it into the last drops and the breaking clouds of a spring rain seemed only the inevitable thing.

H. T. P.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

BY OLIN DOWNES

The last Symphony rehearsal but one this season took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. In memory of the late Fred R. Comee, the lamented assistant manager of the Symphony Orchestra, the concert opened with the funeral march from Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

One could do the memory of Mr. Comee no greater justice than to quote a few lines of the eulogy published in the programme book: "His knowledge of human nature, his amiable disposition, his tolerance, his marked sense of humor turned business acquaintance into friendship, and all who had to do with him respected his ability and were fond of the man himself. He was scrupulously honest, industrious, never discouraged, quick and ready in an emergency, always of good cheer. His pride was in the organization of which he was a member. His devotion to the interests of the orchestra was untiring and unselfish. The loyalty that bound him to many friends with hoops of steel distinguished him in his office."

Bruckner's eighth symphony, performed in Boston for the first time two or three weeks ago, was repeated by general request, and it made less of an impression than on the previous occasion. This was chiefly due to the performance, which revealed more detail and less of the prodigious vitality of the music than at the first reading. It was one of those psychological moments when every man in the orchestra appeared sick unto death of the work (evidently the weather had accumulated in the instruments, especially the brass) and Fiedler, in his desire to impress every measure upon those who listened, became guilty of over-elaboration, which is a very unsafe proceeding, even with the strongest of the symphonies of Anton Bruckner. Again the slow moment made a deep impression. The finale seemed for the most part doddering and imbecile, save toward the last.

The concert came to an end with Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl."

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Last but One of the Symphony Concerts.

Twice this month a Symphony program has been introduced by an appropriate selection in memory of the dead. Some two weeks ago Mr. E. J. Lang's death was so recognized, and at the concerts last week a similar tribute was paid to the late assistant manager of the orchestra, Mr. F. R. Comee, by an impressive performance of the funeral march from Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. The other selections were the request" repetition of Bruckner's eighth symphony, which was first played six weeks ago, and "A Siegfried Idyl," which lost some of its effectiveness by following the turbulent symphony, for Wagner was in a gentle mood when he composed the Idyl.

Bruckner's colossal symphony is notable for its almost innumerable developments of themes in each one of the four movements. And in each is there storm and stress in orchestration, as if the eccentric composer had wrought in forms more or less musical the vivid contrasts in his own life. Melody that seemingly promises something pleasing to the ear is abruptly shunted here and there and becomes lost in the labyrinth of counter themes that interrupt the flow of harmony. And generally the brass choir has a chance in fortissimo to help out in passage work.

The second movement is less fragmentary than the preceding one and has a sort of rhythmic swing in portions that gives relief to the suggestion of the ponderous, which runs through most of the work. A mysterious figuration given the violins makes a fine contrast to the stolid humor of the heavier strings; but this is transitory, for the horns, trumpets and other heavy-weights take up the theme and work it out strenuously. Later there is a bit of beautiful, warm harmony calling for horn and harp, though the juggling in tonality cuts short its serene progress. The movement, like the first, closes with a dreamy pianissimo measure.

The adagio, which is unusually long, is a wonderful exposition of contrasting moods divided, at first, among the violins, the woodwinds and organ and lighter strings. A charming second theme is heard in the cellos and after an elaborate and complex working out of old and new material, especially in the brass contingent, there comes a quiet finale of a peculiar nature given out by the tubas.

The closing movement is massive, perhaps noisy, in the main, as if there was a conflict of all the thematic material, and all the instruments were enlisted at times in powerful opposition. As an illustration of skill in orchestration, this finale is even more pronounced than in the third movement, and it almost defies analysis. All in all, there is no question about the magnitude of the work, and the interpretation was masterly, even better than at the previous concerts. There was mild appreciation expressed at the close of the performance.

The program, which opened with a tribute to the dead, closed with Wagner's joyous idyl in honor of the birth of his son, Siegfried. And beautifully it was played, Mr. Fiedler bringing out in splendid relief each "motive" and theme. The many florid passages by the flutes, clarinets and other woodwinds were given with exquisite effect and deserve special mention.

For the first time since the orchestra has been giving its concerts in Symphony hall Beethoven's immortal ninth symphony will be performed this week.

Six years ago Mr. Gerlicke gave it at a pension fund concert, but so far as the patrons of the Symphony concerts go it is so long since it has been played that it will appear almost as a novelty. In the performance of the symphony the orchestra will have the assistance of a quartet of distinguished singers whose names will be announced later and the chorus of the Cecilia society. Mr. Fiedler will conduct.

There will be only two numbers on the program. The first will be Mozart's symphony in D major, which has appeared only once on a Symphony program, and then 23 years ago, and Beethoven's ninth symphony.

BRUCKNER'S EIGHTH SYMPHONY REPEATED

Frederic R. Comee Is Honored at Orchestra's 23d Concert.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, gave its 23d concert last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Funeral march from "Eroica" symphony, Beethoven
Symphony, C minor, No. 8.....Bruckner
"A Siegfried Idyl".....Wagner

The funeral march was played in memory of Frederic R. Comee, who died early on the morning of the 16th. The program book contained the following note:

"Frederic Robbins Comee was assistant manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra for 23 years. The duties and responsibilities constantly increased. His business life was one of infinite and vexing detail. He mastered this detail so that quiet, unostentatious administration was as a second nature to him. In the discharge of his duties he was brought into close relationship with the conductor and members of the orchestra, with audiences in various cities, with merchants, railroad men, inn keepers. This enforced relationship might easily have led to friction. His knowledge of human nature, his amiable disposition, his tolerance, his marked sense of humor turned business acquaintance into friendship, and all that had to do with him respected his ability and were fond of the man himself. He was scrupulously honest, industrious, never discouraged, quick and ready in an emergency, always of good cheer. His pride was in the organization of which he was a valued member. His devotion to the interests of the orchestra was untiring and unselfish. The loyalty that bound him to many friends with hoops of steel distinguished him in his office. His one dominating thought was for the welfare of the Boston Symphony orchestra."

The public tribute of the funeral and memorial march was eminently deserved. It was an eloquent expression of the affection and respect in which Mr. Comee was held by his associates. Composers and public men have thus been honored at concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was a pleasure to see long-continued, faithful and intelligent service, recognized in like manner.

Bruckner's titanic symphony was played for the first time in this country by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall the 13th of last month. Last night it was repeated "by request."

The repetition was welcome, and may there be many repetitions in future, for the work is one of the most important that have been produced here in recent years, and it is not extravagant to say that it is one of the great symphonies of the world. The first performance was so recent that it is not now necessary to discuss at length the character of the music. After a second hearing the work seems still more stupendous in its plan, still more noble and beautiful in its lofty thought and expression. There are pages that remind one of the visions seen by John on the isle of Patmos. "And I heard, as it were, the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunderings."

There are also pages of ravishing beauty, as those of the trio in the Scherzo, as those devoted to the exposition of the first and second themes of the Adagio, as those of the second theme in the Finale. The Scherzo with rough humor and its episode of rare melodic beauty finely orchestrated, are of this earth, but the other movements leave the earth behind in a sustained and fearless flight. This is especially true of the first movement and the Adagio.

In the finale there is here and there a drooping of the wings, but the opening measures of this finale and the close are towering and exultant. There was no feeling of incongruity when the first measures of the symphony followed immediately Beethoven's sublime march, and there could have been no severer test. The performance of the symphony was masterly, and Mr. Fiedler led as one deeply imbued with the spirit of the composer.

The wonder is that Bruckner, the long ignored, poor, humble school teacher, grotesque in appearance, a peasant in speech and action, should have had apocalyptic visions and spoken musically with the tongues of angels. The sentence with which Dr. Louis, his biographer, sums up Bruckner's career, contains the answer to this question asked of other men: "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven."

The concert might well have closed with the symphony.

The quartet that will assist in the performance of Beethoven's ninth symphony this week is made up of Miss Laura Combs, Mme. Gertrude Stein, Theodore Van Yox and Myron W. Whitney, Jr.

"HEROIC" SYMPHONY HEARD ONCE AGAIN

PLAYED IN MEMORY

OF FRED R. COMEE

Bruckner's Great Symphony Is Worth Studying—Fascinating
Changes of Harmony.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven—Funeral March from "Heroic Symphony."

In Memoriam, Frederic R. Comee.

Bruckner—Symphony, No. 8, in C minor. By request.

Wagner—"Siegfried Idyll."

There was no soloist in this concert, nor was one wanted, for the orchestral music was absorbing from beginning to end. Yet the programme was badly arranged and lacked balance. To give over an hour and a half of music before the intermission and only fifteen minutes after it, proves the latter part of the above assertion, while the "Siegfried Idyll" coming after the Bruckner Symphony sounded tame. The grandiose coda of the symphony would have made an admirable end of the programme, while the whispered cadences of the Idyll (the Melody of Peace and the "Siegfried, Refuge of the World," motive, in augmentation,) made but a lame and impotent conclusion.

It was eminently fitting to pay tribute to the memory of the Symphony Orchestra's loyal servant, Mr. Comee, and there is no doubt that many a personal remembrance blended with the music, for "Fred Comee" was a friend to hundreds. Possibly one ought not to say a word about the music here, but we think that Mr. Fiedler would make the movement still more impressive by quickening it a little.

The Bruckner symphony is great music. If any auditor in the concert tonight finds it over-long the fault is in him, not in the music. It is something worth studying. The first and second movements have a constant tendency to sequence work, but everything is logical and tangible, and there are moments of absolute greatness in both. Bruckner knows what to do with his figures. Like Wagner he can repeat very frequently without the risk of becoming tedious. The changes of harmony are fascinating.

The Scherzo is sturdy enough and its chief figure of four notes in upward progression is given over and over again, and then it is put in contrary motion and played downwards and given a few hundred times more; yet never is there a moment of tedium for the trained auditor. The Trio is in strong contrast and one thinks occasionally of the Wagner of "Tristan and Isolde" both here and in the Adagio, but the treatment is Brucknerian and is properly symphonie.

Again we found the Adagio lofty in the highest degree. Its climaxes are worked up with an indescribable dignity. Certain parts suggested the beautiful "Rhine Journey" in "Goetterdammerung" and there was something gloriously Wagnerian in the use of the brass. Only Bruckner seems to have caught the true Wagnerian spirit in his modulations. He has a very different style from the Beethoven and Brahms schools. All the instruments played well, but the horns superlatively so. The end of the Adagio, with its horn passages, is as lofty as anything the present reviewer can recall in modern music. This is the very apex of the symphony. The finale falls off a trifle. There is a forcible beginning, some blaring trombone work, several striking organ points, especially on the kettle-drums, and some well-written counterpoint, but the greatness of the Adagio is not attained.

This symphony would stand a test that would cause much modern music to shrivel up; it would sound well in a piano arrangement; it would make a very effective piano duet. It is not carried to success by mere tricks of tone-coloring; in fact sometimes the scoring could be improved; but the ideas and their development could not.

We were glad to see Mr. Fiedler recalled at the end of the symphony. His intelligent and loving work have borne excellent fruit in this case, and the orchestra deserves homage also. But if he ever gives this programme in any other city we would counsel his placing the Siegfried Idyll at the beginning, or else leaving it out altogether and making the Bruckner symphony the entire programme.

The "Siegfried Idyll" is one of the best examples of "family music." Wagner wrote it as a birthday present to his wife, Mendelssohn in a similar way, composed "Son and Stranger" (opera) for his parents as a surprise upon their silver wedding. Both these works were not written with thoughts of music publishers and public performances. It was quite another branch of family music when Strauss celebrated his wife and baby, and uncles, aunts and relatives, with a view to large sales and quick profits.

The fact above stated about the original privacy of "The Idyll" makes the scoring of this work much lighter than was Wagner's wont. This added to its unfitness as a concert finale and a succession to Bruckner's ponderous ending. Nevertheless, even with this defect, the concert of yesterday was thoroughly worth while.

and the CHORUS of

FREDERIC R. COMEE
Assistant Manager of Symphony
Orchestra Dies Suddenly of Typhoid Fever

Frederic R. Comee, for twenty-three years assistant manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died suddenly this morning at his home, 1390 Beacon street, Brookline, of typhoid fever. Mr. Comee was taken ill on Sunday, and yesterday his physicians recognized that his condition was critical. He rallied, apparently, toward midnight, but a sudden relapse brought the end at 12.40 o'clock this morning.

Mr. Comee has been well known to Boston music-lovers for a quarter of a century, and will be widely mourned. He was born in Fitchburg, Jan. 2, 1854. He was graduated in literature in Harvard University in 1875, and took up the study of music. A few years later he became connected with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and in 1886 became assistant manager, holding this position until his death. He was a member of the University Club of Boston, the Harvard Club of New York and the University Club of Philadelphia. He is survived by a widow, who was Miss Clara Galloup of Boston.

Tribute to Comee Paid at Symphony

Tribute to the memory of Frederic R. Comee, assistant manager of the orchestra, was paid at the Symphony concert Saturday night, with a special performance of the funeral march from Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Just and eloquent tribute was also paid in the program. "His pride," it was said, "was in the organization, of which he was a valued member." It was not until the orchestra poured forth Beethoven's noble lamentation that the realization of the loss the orchestra had met seemed actual and complete.

After this impressive little memorial service, the orchestra undertook the big work of the night, the performance, by request, of Bruckner's Eighth symphony, which had its first hearing in the United States at the Symphony concert on March 13 last. The symphony is a strange mixture of grandeur and simplicity, of crisp melody and prolix "workings-out." On the whole, it made this time, as before, a profound and favorable impression. Mr. Fiedler was at his best. The other number on the program was Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll."

The quartet of soloists for this week's performance of Beethoven's Ninth symphony has been selected as follows: Soprano, Laura Combs; contralto, Gertrude May Stein; tenor, Theodore Van Yox; bass, Myron W. Whitney, Jr.

WILL BE BURIED TODAY.

George Apr. 17, 1909
Funeral Services for Fred R. Comee to Be Held at Mt Auburn Chapel
This Afternoon.

Funeral services for Fred R. Comee, for 23 years assistant manager of the Symphony orchestra, and also of old Music hall, and later Symphony hall, will be held at 4 p m today at the chapel in Mt Auburn cemetery.

FREDERICK R. COMEE.

The death of few Boston men would cause more sincere sorrow locally than will that of Fred Comee, whose acquaintance among musical artists and devotees of the art was remarkably wide.

An enthusiastic Harvard alumnus, of the class of 1875, he did much to encourage college and university musical organizations and was responsible for the popular concerts given by such bodies annually in Symphony hall.

He was born 55 years ago in Fitchburg. His wife, who survives, was Miss Clara Galloup.

FREDERICK R. COMEE.

Herald Apr. 16, 1909
Musicians and Friends Attend Funeral at Mt. Auburn.

The funeral of Frederic R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, took place yesterday afternoon at 4 o'clock in Mt. Auburn Chapel. The service included the reading of passages from the scriptures, a prayer and an address by the Rev. Dr. Van Ness of the Second

Church, and a short address in behalf of the class of '75 of Harvard by the Rev. Reuben Kidner of Trinity Church, who was a classmate of Mr. Comee, not only in Harvard but in the Boston Latin school.

Particularly impressive was the music. Wallace Goodrich, for many years a close friend of Mr. Comee, was at the organ, and in the gallery of the chapel was the brass choir of the Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Gustav Strube. At the close of the address a dirge for brass instruments by Strube, entitled "A Hymn of Mourning," was played, and as the casket was taken away the choir played a beautiful Bach chorale.

The chapel was crowded, despite the short notice given of the services. All the members of the Boston Symphony orchestra were there, including Mr. Fiedler, all of Mr. Comee's business associates, a delegation from Harvard, '75, and many of the prominent musical people of Boston attended. The casket was fairly buried in flowers sent by Mr. Comee's friends. The pall-bearers were Charles A. Ellis, Arthur Robinson, George H. Ellis, William H. Brennan, Louis H. Mudgett and W. E. Walter. The body was placed for the time being in the receiving vault at Mt. Auburn.

Andover—Napoleon and Caesar.
Andover—Napoleon and Caesar.

Andover—Napoleon and Caesar.
Andover—Napoleon and Caesar.

—Was Born in Fitchburg.

Frederic R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died suddenly at 12:40 o'clock this morning at his home at 1390 Beacon st, Brookline.

Mr Comee was taken ill Sunday and suffered from a severe attack of typhoid fever. He became gradually worse, and during the day yesterday it became evident to the attending physicians that his condition was critical.

At midnight he seemed to be brighter and hopes for his recovery were entertained, when suddenly he suffered an ill turn, and the end quickly followed. Mr Comee leaves a wife.

Mr Comee has been well known and of much influence for good among musicians and music lovers for a quarter of a century. He was born in Fitchburg Jan. 2, 1854.

He was graduated in literature from Harvard university in 1875 and at once became interested in music. A few years later he became identified with the Boston Symphony orchestra, and after four years he was promoted to the position of assistant manager.

He filled this position for 23 years. His wife was Miss Clara Galloup of Boston.

BRUCKNER AND THE SYMPHONY.

Post Apr. 15, 1909
I was eating a piece of strawberry cake, reflecting the meanwhile, ruminating, as it were, upon the vastness and the incomparable splendor of Anton Bruckner's Eighth Symphony, which, thanks to Mr. Fiedler, we shall hear again next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. I was thinking of that enormous wealth of inspiration, of the gigantic frescoes, the magnitude of which is hardly grasped before another fills the ear. Ever since the voices of Wagner and Liszt and the rest of the young fellows were heard in the land there have been a majority to make sport of the "antiquated" symphony form. But Schubert finished at least one colossal and immortal work, in which he contented himself with pouring his inexhaustible ideas into a mould previously prepared. Schumann found very personal expression in a manner outwardly, if not inwardly, that of a symphonist; Brahms stood on the shoulders of Beethoven and created a 10th symphony in C minor, then developed until, in his fourth symphony, he achieved music that is as pure, absolute, alembicated, as music can be.

We are liable to forget the basic, universal nature, the fundamental principles of the symphony. Every great composer has altered the form to give full and characteristic expression to his ideas. Every great composer will—and great composers flourish today, as encouragingly as they did 100 years ago. No two men will stretch a glove to exactly the same size and shape, but many men will continue to wear different gloves for some time to come. The comparison is not an absolute parallel of course, but it points the moral.

In all likelihood each generation for years to come will furnish one and probably more than one symphonist who will write living music. The symphony was not made and ordained by an individual, though Haydn and Beethoven did perhaps the most toward its present supremacy as a musical structure. It owes its being to the conspicuous and inconspicuous lives and labors of musicians since the days of Philip Emmanuel Bach, and before him. It has its origin in primal laws of beauty and proportion and its tenets spring from man's highest desire, the need of a perfection that we do not find in the world about us, the voicing of aspiration toward the pure ideal, which, something whispers, exists beyond.

Since the days of Brahms and Bruckner—two tremendous B's—great symphonies have continued to appear. Jean Sibelius, for one, of today, has produced at least two big canvases, and there are no weighty indications of the death symphonic in the immediate future.

While everyone with something to say will modify the structure as proves necessary to give plastic expression to his ideas, and while some will steer as clear as they can from anything that resembles a symphony, the prime essentials will continue to exist and underly creative activities.

Bruckner, himself a frank and child-like soul, was filled to madness with admiration of Wagner and Beethoven. The programmatist of the Symphony concerts quotes his speech to a friend after a performance of the "Eroica": "I think that if Mr. Beethoven were alive and I should go to him with my seventh symphony" (this symphony was the first work of Bruckner's to be heard here), "and say, 'Here, Mr. Van Beethoven, this is not so bad, this seventh, as certain gentlemen would make out,' . . . I think he would take me by the hand and say, 'My dear Bruckner, never mind, I had no better luck; and the same men who hold me up against you even now do not understand my last quartets, although they act as if they understand them.' Then I'd say to him, 'Excuse me, Mr. Van Beethoven, that I have gone beyond you in freedom of form, but I think a true artist should make his own forms for his own works and stick by them.'"

But Bruckner was a born symphonist who followed faithfully, though often in a horrible and grotesquely extended manner, the precepts of Beethoven.

Six of Bruckner's symphonies have been played in Boston, the 3d, 4th, 5th, 7th, 8th, 9th. Of these the third is the weakest. The fourth ("Romantic") approaches nearest the 8th in finish and conciseness of workmanship, and in beauty of material. The fifth is one of the most fantastic. I have heard it but once, but I shall never forget the adagio, with its impressive opening, a peculiar pizzicato passage for the strings over which the other instruments soon commence strange songs. The 7th, in E major, is a very rich work, and its slow movement is known to be or supposed to be a dirge for Richard Wagner, to whose friendship and encouragement Bruckner owed so much. It was the ninth symphony of which Bruckner said: "I undertook a stiff task. I should not have done it at my age and in my weak condition. If I never finish it, then my Te Deum may be used as a finale. I have nearly finished three movements. This work belongs to my Lord God." And this last symphony, in which sublime thoughts struggle with halting speech for utterance, has been cited as a pathetically appropriate monument to the life and the genius of Anton Bruckner.

Several causes are responsible for the verbosity and the twaddle that so obscure the inherent greatness of all of the later symphonies. Bruckner won his musical learning by the hardest struggle with poverty, and he was not a well-versed musician until about his 40th year. Sechter, his chief teacher, was himself too much of a contrapuntist and a splitter of hairs. He encouraged, instead of pruned, Bruckner's tendency toward over-elaboration. It may be said here

WILL BE BURIED TODAY.

Globe — Apr. 17, 1909
Funeral Services for Fred R. Comee
to Be Held at Mt Auburn Chapel
This Afternoon.

Funeral services for Fred R. Comee, for 23 years assistant manager of the Symphony orchestra, and also of old Music hall, and later Symphony hall, will be held at 4 p m today at the chapel in Mt Auburn cemetery.

FREDERICK R. COMEE.

The death of few Boston men would cause more sincere sorrow locally than will that of Fred Comee, whose acquaintance among musical artists and devotees of the art was remarkably wide.

An enthusiastic Harvard alumnus, of the class of 1875, he did much to encourage college and university musical organizations and was responsible for the popular concerts given by such bodies annually in Symphony hall.

He was born 55 years ago in Fitchburg. His wife, who survives, was Miss Clara Galloup.

FREDERICK R. COMEE.

Herald — Apr. 16, 1909
Musicians and Friends Attend Funeral at Mt. Auburn.

The funeral of Frederic R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, took place yesterday afternoon at 4 o'clock in Mt. Auburn Chapel. The service included the reading of passages from the scriptures, a prayer and an address by the Rev. Dr. Van Ness of the Second

Church, and a short address in behalf of the class of '75 of Harvard by the Rev. Reuben Kidner of Trinity Church, who was a classmate of Mr. Comee, not only in Harvard but in the Boston Latin school.

Particularly impressive was the music. Wallace Goodrich, for many years a close friend of Mr. Comee, was at the organ, and in the gallery of the chapel was the brass choir of the Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Gustav Strube. At the close of the address a dirge for brass instruments by Strube, entitled "A Hymn of Mourning," was played, and as the casket was taken away the choir played a beautiful Bach chorale.

The chapel was crowded, despite the short notice given of the services. All the members of the Boston Symphony orchestra were there, including Mr. Fiedler, all of Mr. Comee's business associates, a delegation from Harvard, '75, and many of the prominent musical people of Boston attended. The casket was fairly buried in flowers sent by Mr. Comee's friends. The pall-bearers were Charles A. Ellis, Arthur Robinson, George A. Ellis,

F. R. COMEE DEAD.

Globe — Apr. 16, 1909
Assistant Manager of
Symphony Orchestra.

Filled Position More Than 20 Years
—Was Born in Fitchburg.

Frederic R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died suddenly at 12:40 o'clock this morning at his home at 1390 Beacon st., Brookline.

Mr. Comee was taken ill Sunday and suffered from a severe attack of typhoid fever. He became gradually worse, and during the day yesterday it became evident to the attending physicians that his condition was critical.

At midnight he seemed to be brighter and hopes for his recovery were entertained, when suddenly he suffered an ill turn, and the end quickly followed. Mr. Comee leaves a wife.

Mr. Comee has been well known and of much influence for good among musicians and music lovers for a quarter of a century. He was born in Fitchburg Jan. 2, 1854.

He was graduated in literature from Harvard university in 1875 and at once became interested in music. A few years later he became identified with the Boston Symphony orchestra, and after four years he was promoted to the position of assistant manager.

He filled this position for 23 years. His wife was Miss Clara Galloup of Boston.

BRUCKNER AND THE SYMPHONY

Post — Apr. 15, 1909
I was eating a piece of strawberry cake, reflecting the meanwhile, ruminating, as it were, upon the vastness and the incomparable splendor of Anton Bruckner's Eighth Symphony, which, thanks to Mr. Fiedler, we shall hear again next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. I was thinking of that enormous wealth of inspiration, of the gigantic frescoes, the magnitude of which is hardly grasped before another fills the ear. Ever since the voices of Wagner and Liszt and the rest of the young fellows were heard in the land there have been a majority to make sport of the "antiquated" symphony form. But Schubert finished at least one colossal and immortal work, in which he contented himself with pouring his inexhaustible ideas into a mould previously prepared. Schumann found very personal expression in a manner outwardly, if not inwardly, that of a symphonist; Brahms stood on the shoulders of Beethoven and created a 10th symphony in C minor, then developed until, in his fourth symphony, he achieved music that is as pure, absolute, alembicated, as music can be.

We are liable to forget the basic, universal nature, the fundamental principles of the symphony. Every great composer has altered the form to give full and characteristic expression to his ideas. Every great composer will—and great composers flourish today, as encouragingly as they did 100 years ago. No two men will stretch a glove to exactly the same size and shape, but many men will continue to wear different gloves for some time to come. The comparison is not an absolute parallel of course, but it points the moral.

In all likelihood each generation for years to come will furnish one and probably more than one symphonist who will write living music. The symphony was not made and ordained by an individual, though Haydn and Beethoven did perhaps the most toward its present supremacy as a musical structure. It owes its being to the conspicuous and inconspicuous lives and labors of musicians since the days of Philip Emmanuel Bach, and before him. It has its origin in primal laws of beauty and proportion and its tenets spring from man's highest desire, the need of a perfection that we do not find in the world about us, the voicing of aspiration toward the pure ideal, which, something whispers, exists beyond.

Since the days of Brahms and Bruckner—two tremendous B's—great symphonies have continued to appear. Jean Sibelius, for one, of today, has produced at least two big canvases, and there are no weighty indications of the death symphonic in the immediate future.

While everyone with something to say will modify the structure as proves necessary to give plastic expression to his ideas, and while some will steer as clear as they can from anything that resembles a symphony, the prime essentials will continue to exist and underly creative activities.

Bruckner, himself a frank and child-like soul, was filled to madness with admiration of Wagner and Beethoven. The programmatist of the Symphony concerts quotes his speech to a friend after a performance of the "Eroica": "I think that if Mr. Beethoven were alive and I should go to him with my seventh symphony" (this symphony was the first work of Bruckner's to be heard here), "and say, 'Here, Mr. Van Beethoven, this is not so bad, this seventh, as certain gentlemen would make out,' . . . I think he would take me by the hand and say, 'My dear Bruckner, never mind, I had no better luck; and the same men who hold me up against you even now do not understand my last quartets, although they act as if they understand them.' Then I'd say to him, 'Excuse me, Mr. Van Beethoven, that I have gone beyond you in freedom of form, but I think a true artist should make his own forms for his own works and stick by them.' " But Bruckner was a born symphonist who followed faithfully, though often in a horrible and grotesquely extended manner, the precepts of Beethoven.

Six of Bruckner's symphonies have been played in Boston, the 3d, 4th, 5th, 7th, 8th, 9th. Of these the third is the weakest. The fourth ("Romantic") approaches nearest the 8th in finish and conciseness of workmanship, and in beauty of material. The fifth is one of the most fantastic. I have heard it but once, but I shall never forget the adagio, with its impressive opening, a peculiar pizzicato passage for the strings over which the other instruments soon commence strange songs. The 7th, in E major, is a very rich work, and its slow movement is known to be or supposed to be a dirge for Richard Wagner, to whose friendship and encouragement Bruckner owed so much. It was the ninth symphony of which Bruckner said: "I undertook a stiff task. I should not have done it at my age and in my weak condition. If I never finish it, then my Te Deum may be used as a finale. I have nearly finished three movements. This work belongs to my Lord God." And this last symphony, in which sublime thoughts struggle with halting speech for utterance, has been cited as a pathetically appropriate monument to the life and the genius of Anton Bruckner.

Several causes are responsible for the verbosity and the twaddle that so obscure the inherent greatness of all of the later symphonies. Bruckner won his musical learning by the hardest struggle with poverty, and he was not a well-versed musician until about his 40th year. Sechter, his chief teacher, was himself too much of a contrapuntist and a splitter of hairs. He encouraged, instead of pruned, Bruckner's tendency toward over-elaboration. It may be said here that when Bruckner did graduate from apprenticeship he was a supreme master of the artifices of composition. We know how, when examined for an organist's position in Vienna, he improvised upon a given theme until his examiners themselves were confounded in following him. He waited until late in life to hear the performance of one of his symphonies, and his career was arduous. The man who spent 10 hours a day at the piano and three at the organ regarded music as his supreme solace, and he was fearless, like a child, in putting his thoughts upon paper. One can fancy him sitting down full of glee—the pudgy figure, the little, round head, a high forehead and small, almost cunning eyes, to put his thronging thoughts on paper. If he had heard his works more frequently he would probably have observed their defects. He did materially alter one symphony, after personally conducting its performance. But he could not restrain his love of putting notes on paper, his glory in his ideas and his contrapuntal prowess. And his ideas, revolved in silence, grew inward instead of outward, often losing their force and cogency.

The eighth symphony, however, escapes these faults almost entirely, and at the 18th concert this season it won such a triumph as seldom comes to so new and pretentious an orchestral composition.

What did Hanslick have to say of this symphony after the first performance at Vienna, 1892?

"Like all the Bruckner symphonies that I chance to know, this one interested one in parts, but was amazing, indeed repellant, upon the whole. To say it in a few words, the peculiarity of the work consists in the transfer of Wagner's dramatic style into the symphony. Bruckner falls not only every moment into Wagnerianisms, turns, effects, reminiscences; he even seems to have chosen certain Wagner pieces as models for his architectural construction, especially the 'Tristan and Isolde' prelude.

Characteristic of this symphony, Bruckner's latest is the immediate juxtaposition of dry contrapuntal school wisdom and immoderate exaltation. Thrown about between intoxication and vacuity, one is left, at last, without any definite impression; one arrives at no artistic enjoyment. Everything passes by one in a high-handed manner, forbidding survey, without order, stretching out into horrible extension. Each of the four movements, most often the first, charms by some interesting figure—a flash of genius. Oh, if the rest could be omitted! It is possible that this Katzenjammer style, with its confusion of dreams, belongs to the music of the future—a future that we do not envy. But for the time being we hope that the symphony and chamber music will be kept unsold by a style that is in its rightful place only as an illustrative means in definite dramatic situations."

Bruckner, too, had his troubles with admirers. The symphony was programmed: "The author of this programme is not named, but we may easily guess the rogue—who is hated least of all by his master." The opening of the first movement was dubbed "the form of the Eschylean Prometheus." "An especially tiresome part of this movement has been given the beautifying name of the greatest loneliness and silence." And the scherzo, which does, in truth, smell of the sod, had the caption of the 'German Michael,' after 'Michel,' a rough fellow. In the adagio we are given to behold no less than 'The all-loving Father of mankind in His entire and boundless wealth of mercy.' As this adagio lasts 28 minutes, pretty nearly as long as a whole Beethoven symphony, sufficient time is thus given the listener to contemplate the unusual spectacle. The finale, at last, with its baroque themes, confused construction and inhuman noise, appearing to us to be nothing more than a model of bad taste, is, so the programme says, 'heroism in the service of the divine.' The trumpet calls that are blown in all directions are the 'annunciators of everlasting salvation, heralds of the divine idea.'

No wonder that Bruckner, when royalty asked him to name a wish, desired that he be freed from the criticisms of Eduard Hanslick. And how was the symphony received? Tumultuous jubilee, handkerchiefs waved in the air, countless calls for the composer, etc.

Arthur Foote will conduct a musical program, with Henry L. Gideon, organist and choirmaster of temple Israel, at the organ, on the evening of April 30, at temple Israel. Mr Foote's own composition, which was written for the synagogue will be rendered by the full choir, and a Hebrew lullaby by Mr Gideon will be given by a quartet of women's voices.

MUSIC LOVERS WILL PAY LAST TRIBUTE

To Attend Funeral of Assistant Manager of Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge.

Music lovers of this city will pay their last tribute to the late F. R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for years, at 4 o'clock this afternoon, when funeral services will be held in Mount Auburn Chapel, Cambridge.

The news of Mr. Comee's death came as a shock to his friends throughout the country, for few of them knew of his illness. His many years of service with the Symphony Orchestra gave him the widest acquaintance among musical people, who sincerely mourn his loss.

Mr. Comee became assistant manager of the orchestra in 1886 and has seen it grow from a comparatively modest organization to its present position of the premier orchestra of the world.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

XXII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 17, AT 8, P.M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN,

OVERTURE to Collin's Tragedy, "Coriolanus,"
op. 62.

A. FOOTE,

SUITE in E major, op. 63, for STRING ORCHESTRA.
I. Prelude.
II. Pizzicato and Adagietto.
III. Fugue.
(First performance.)

PAUL DUKAS,

SCHERZO, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," (after a ballad by Goethe.)

DVOŘÁK,

SYMPHONY, No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World," op. 95.
I. Adagio: Allegro molto
II. Largo.
III. Scherzo.
IV. Allegro con fuoco.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1908-09.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER, Conductor.

XXIV. CONCERT.

(Last of the Season.)

SATURDAY, MAY 1, AT 8, P.M.

Programme.

MOZART,

SYMPHONY in D major, (Köchel 385).

- I. Allegro con spirito.
- II. Andante.
- III. Menuetto.
- IV. Finale: Presto.

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY, in D minor, No. 9, with Final Chorus on Schiller's "Ode to Joy," op. 125.

- I. Allegro ma non troppo, un poco maestoso.
- II. Molto vivace: Presto.
- III. Adagio molto e contabile.
- IV. Presto. Allegro assai. Presto.
- BARITONE RECITATIVE.
- QUARTET and CHORUS: Allegro assai.
- TENOR SOLO and CHORUS: Allegro assai vivace, alla marcia.
- CHORUS: Allegro assai.
- CHORUS: Andante maestoso. Adagio ma non troppo, ma divoto. Allegro energico, sempre ben marcato.
- QUARTET and CHORUS: Allegro ma non tanto. Prestissimo.

Soloists:

Miss LAURA COMBS, Soprano.

Mme. GERTRUDE MAY STEIN, Contralto.

Mr. THEODORE VAN YORX, Tenor.

Mr. MYRON W. WHITNEY, Jr., Baritone.

The CHORUS of the CECILIA SOCIETY.

Trans. Symphony Concert April 9

Two conductors and a piece and a group of pieces, that were widely distinct, divided the last Symphony Concert. The first conductor was Mr. Gustav Strube, of the first violins of the orchestra, of the leader's platform at the "Pop" and other concerts and of various compositions that have brought him just praise. The piece in which he conducted was his own symphony in B minor, written last year and the year preceding, and performed Friday for the first time at any concert. It proved the ablest, the most individual, and the most engrossing accomplishment of Mr. Strube in his progress as a composer. It was "absolute music", in the sense that it had no programme and no specified emotional design. It was often classical in the technical sense in its adhesion to the traditional symphonic form. Its modernity—for it makes another in Mr. Fiedler's long and remarkable line of new modern symphonies—and its individuality lay in its harmonic and instrumental treatment of its melodic ideas. Therein Mr. Strube's imagination and resource had freest and eagerest play, and thereby he most quickened interest and stirred the emotion. Certainly no symphony and no tone-poem that has yet been written in America has been so daring and insistent in harmonic research and accomplishment and none has attained to such unusual and impressive instrumental coloring. By these signs, Mr. Strube's symphony is a piece for connoisseurs. It is little less, in the feeling that comes to expression by these means, a piece for the average audience. Proof thereof came yesterday in the applause that answered each movement and in the final recalls of the composer-conductor to the stage.

Then, after the intermission, Mr. Fiedler took his accustomed place, and there followed sundry orchestral excerpts from Wagner's operas—the prelude to "Lohengrin," the music of Venus's cavern from "Tannhäuser," the apotheosis of Siegfried from "Götterdämmerung," the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" and "The Ride of the Valkyrs" from "Die Walküre." There was no mistaking the pleasure of the audience in these fragments. It rejoices indeed whenever Mr. Fiedler, following the custom of all his predecessors except Dr. Muck, puts them on his programme. Dr. Muck and a few others are only lonesome and maybe pedantic purists when they insist that the place—the only fit place—for all these excerpts, except the prelude to "Lohengrin," is the opera house. They occur at particular moments in the action of the music-dramas in which they stand. Sometimes, as with the so-called "funeral march" from "Götterdämmerung," they are the climax of a long and mounting course of music and action. Again, like the "Good Friday Spell" and the Valkyrs' ride, they are music that is closely related to the scenic background. The Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser" indeed directly accompanies pantomimic action that Wagner minutely specified. Every one of the chosen pieces except the prelude to "Lohengrin" gains not a little of its significance and emotion from the visible action that it enhances or illuminates. To tear these excerpts from their place in the theatre is to weaken them. There really remain only the tonal splendor, the vague emotional power, the nervous thrill, the singing force, or the purely sensuous voice of Wagner's music. These things sufficed for the audience of Friday, as in human nature they will suffice until perhaps, at some distant day Wagner will become as familiar in our opera house as he is in the opera houses of many another city. Moreover, it was in this concert fashion, so to say, that Mr. Fiedler read the fragments. He has never been an operatic conductor, the peculiar orchestral ways of the theatre are unfamiliar to him. The momentary significance of a particular phase or musical paragraph, the nervous thrill in a modification of pace here or a passing emphasis there escape him, the sense of the music as music of dramatic action and scenic surroundings and the diversity of tonal coloring that they suggest do not occur to him. He conducted in these fragments Friday for the large impressions, the vague emotions, the abstract tonal beauty of the concert-room. Often he gained his ends; but there have been times in which the strings have wrought a more shimmering beauty into the prelude of "Lohengrin," the wood winds have given a softer air to the meadows of Good Friday; and when the whole orchestra has glorified Siegfried with a more massive and mounting sonority.

Mr. Strube's symphony made this the major interest of the concert. In form, especially in the dry specifications of print, it seems conventional enough. A slow introduction leads in the opening allegro; and adagio and a scherzo follow in the normal course; a brief slow introduction again leads into the allegro of the finale. Those loyal souls that stir to the sonata form as to a sacred thing may trace it throughout the symphony. Those who love clearly defined melodic thoughts will find Mr. Strube's, at least in his first statements of them, readily recognizable. They are oftenest full-bodied and salient musical ideas, but, with one exception, their full virtue only appears in his treatment of them. All of them have individual mood and accent, and the dominating subject of the slow movement, as it rises into sustained song, has clear beauty of its own and brings as clear and swift emotional response. Elsewhere these themes are distinctly serviceable themes to wear the harmonic dress, to stand against the harmonic background, or to wear the instrumental hues that Mr. Strube has bestowed upon them. Moreover, zealous as he is for free and individual development of his musical thoughts, and devoted as he is to their harmonic and instrumental vesture, he has, for these days, one conspicuous virtue. He does not worry his melodies, shaking and reshaking them, twisting and turning them until he has wrung the last drop of development or of suggestion out of them. No more—to continue these canine analogies—does he chew his themes into bits, and then make endless play with the fragments. His is no symphony of dovetailed scraps, no ingeniously fitted tonal mosaic. It is an organic, closely wrought whole. Each movement moves steadily forward in its development with clear creative force. The symphony is plentiful in subtly accomplished, delicately adjusted and assiduously polished detail. Yet Mr. Strube never loses his air of spontaneity, and of a more vigorous creative energy than has been apparent in any other of his pieces. Nowhere does it suggest the rather languorous and sweetish dawdling that has clouded some of his more recent minor pieces. A genuine impulse to create seems to have prompted the symphony, and Mr. Strube has plied it with the rejoicing energy of a man who has at last touched his prime, who feels and in his heart knows his powers.

The distinction and the individuality of these powers lie in the harmonic dress and the instrumental coloring of the symphony. Not that Mr. Strube's is music all color. Each movement and each elastic division of each movement has a frame and body of its own, and is substantial music. But the imagination and resource that have animated and clothed this body, and that have given the music fascination to the fancy and appeal to the emotions, are primarily a rare power of harmonic and instrumental coloring. Mr. Strube, sitting in his place in the orchestra these many years, has heard much that the composers of our generation have ventured and wrought in these things. Yet when he comes to the test of a symphony of his own, he keeps his own individuality. There is not a suggestion of imitation in the music and hardly a suggestion—and that altogether trivial—of any remembered thing. Mr. Strube has reflected deeply upon harmonic possibilities, and with imagination he has vitalized his thoughts. No American composer has gone further and more imaginatively into harmonic venture and daring than has he in this symphony. Similarly, Mr. Strube thinks in terms of instruments. He is no composer merely "scoring" for orchestra ideas that have come to expression and amplification in another medium. To him the orchestra is an endlessly varied palette of instrumental color, whence he may choose and assort, blend and contrast, his tonal tints. He has an instrumental imagination; his creative emotion expresses itself spontaneously and communicatively in terms of tonal color. Again in his instrumentation has he greatly dared and subtly imagined. (Fortunate he that a band of virtuosi were playing his music.)

The justification of these things, the everlasting justification of all ventures and experiments, is as old as their beginnings: Do they kindle the listening imagination, bring answering emotions, engross the hearer in the music, proceed to beauty and move with ordered power? Of the imagination that fills Mr. Strube's harmonies and instrumental coloring, of their luminous brightness or their shadowy glow, of their emotional incisiveness, of their poetic suggestion, of the iridescent and endlessly fascinating web into which they wove his music, there could be little doubt in those that heard yesterday with engrossed and sympathetic ear. The end, and notably in the scherzo, with its seconds, and in the adagio, had justified the means. They had justified as well, and as never before, Mr. Strube as a composer of rare imagination.

H. T. P.

SYMPHONY SEASON ENDS IN GRANDEUR

BEETHOVEN'S NINTH

SUPERBLY PERFORMED

Mozart's D Major Symphony Also on the Programme—Cecilia Society Assists.

By Louis C. Elson.
PROGRAMME.

Mozart—Symphony in D major.
Beethoven—Ninth Symphony. For Solo Quartette, Chorus and Orchestra.

We could not quite make out the idea of the conductor in giving one of the less famous of the Mozart Symphonies (Koechel's Catalogue, No. 385) in connection with Beethoven's ninth, unless it was to show that Mozart's symphonies do not wear very well. It may be very heterodox to state it, but we prefer the unaffected simplicity of Haydn's symphonies to the more ambitious symphonic efforts of Mozart.

There is no sense in denying that Mozart has faded during the 118 years that have passed since his death. His string quartettes hold their own best; the piano sonatas have still their charm; the operas are unmitigated bores on the theatrical stage, but are beautiful when served up piece-meal as concert selections; the symphonies have fared worse, for they have not the simple charm of Haydn, nor the power of Beethoven. There are many parts of them that we could spare from concert performance today.

When, however, Mozart chooses the simplest vein, as in his G minor symphony, he is forever beautiful. We hold the G minor above the "Jupiter," above the "Clarinet" symphony, and above this D major selection which was given on this occasion. Yet some parts (as some parts of the curate's egg) were excellent. The first movement was strong in its introduction, its development and its Coda. Mr. Fiedler wisely omitted the repeat of the exposition, which made this movement acceptably brief. The slow movement was rather weaker, and the minuet and the finale only accented the statement with which we began. Yet there was much applause at each movement. We believe however, that this was intended for Mr. Fiedler chiefly. The entire concert, in fact, was made an ovation to Mr. Fiedler who was recalled again and again. Since we have been heterodox in the beginning of this review, we may as well continue iconoclastic to the bitter end. We do not think Beethoven's Ninth symphony the greatest of his symphonic works. It is sometimes Titanic, sometimes fragmentary. His using variations for the voice in the Finale is unvocal and the treatment of the variations is yet more unvocal. Probably the first movement, especially in its great Coda, overtops some of his other sonata-allegros, but even this is not greater than the first movement of the Heroic or of the Seventh Symphony.

The Scherzo is a wonderful movement and it was gloriously played. The slow movement is not comparable to the Allegretto of the Seventh symphony. The Finale is a gathering of deliriously great ideas impractically expressed. We enthusiastically recognize the great points of this vast work, but we object to its always being cited as the queen of the nine. Some of its sisters are far more comfortable.

From the very beginning Mr. Fiedler read the work most nobly. In the introduction, which dallies between two or three keys before it flashes out in D minor, he made the empty fifth on the horns more prominent than the lambic figure upon the strings, and it made quite a new effect by this change of balance. At the end of the development and in the return of the chief theme there was glorious vigor, and both here and in the Scherzo the director gave "carte blanche" to the kettledrummer, who certainly earned his salary on this occasion.

The great Coda with its chromatic figure of strings and bassoons was made into a royal climax.

But the Scherzo was the most effective movement of all. Here the dactylic figure was given with a swing that swept everything before it. The movement was almost a revelation in its resistless power. The dialogue between the full orchestra and the kettledrums was bizarre enough to rank with the most modern bits of tone coloring.

In fact in this and the opening movement Beethoven seems to have had visions of the "Symphonic Poem" of the present day. There is a fullness of treatment and a freedom that suggest what Richard Strauss and Bruckner have culminated. The applause was most spontaneous and long-continued after this movement, and the Scherzo never made a better impression.

But the slow movement dawdled somewhat and seemed less remarkable than the rest of the symphony. The ingenuity of the variations of the two themes may be taken for granted, but we have often spoken of the dangerous seductiveness of the variation-form to the composer. In this case we would doubt the Latin—"Variatio Delectat." A word ought to be spoken especially of the excellence of the horn-playing. All through the symphony their difficult work was splendidly done.

The beginning of the Finale sounded unfamiliar to our ears. The fierce dissonances were in some manner softened. This was not a merit, for those dissonant outcries picture the suffering, wretchedness and sinfulness of the entire world—a fitting prelude to a song of the Millennium, a celebration of universal brotherhood.

The chorus sang with much vigor in the finale with its frenzies of joy. To sing with finesse in this unvocal movement (or set of variations) is impossible. The theme itself has been the subject of much debate. It certainly bears a close relationship to our most rollicking national tune, and Robert C. Winthrop was quite right, when, a half century ago, he characterized the Finale as "Glorified 'Yankee Doodle!'" Extremes meet; in this case the utmost Dionysiac rapture is evolved from a melody which is considered the reverse of classic.

The ingenuity with which Beethoven leads over to the voices, through employment of the contra-basses in a vocal recitative style, is remarkable. The contra-basses played their passages (the greatest ever written for the instrument) with much unity and expression, and the outcries of the orchestra contrasted with these passages effectively. This dialogue between the orchestra and the contrabasses is grand and dramatic enough to make amends for all the subsequent vocal brutalities. It is the loftiest conversation in instrumental music; it suggests a Redeemer speaking to an impatient world.

The soloists sang their impossible quartette in a manner that made it almost musical. The singers were Miss Laura Combs, Mme. Gertrude May Stein, Mr. Theodore van Yox and Mr. Myron W. Whitney jr. The chorus was the Cecilia Society, and they "embraced the millions" and gave "a kiss to all the world" in the very highest register, without becoming utter shriekers, which is the highest praise one can give to this movement, which must have been written in aid of throat doctors.

Auditors who attended this concert may be assured that they will never in Boston hear a better performance, as a whole, of the ninth symphony. The ending was a veritable "jamboree," which Beethoven intended it to be. It almost convinced one that the English conservatory pupil was two-thirds right, who, on being asked—"How many symphonies did Beethoven write?" replied: "Three. The 'Heroic,' the 'Pastoral' and the 'Ninth.'"

We were glad to see the cordial manner in which the audience tried to convince Mr. Fiedler that they appreciated his work. The tribute was deserved, for not only in this concert, but all through the season he has shown himself able, painstaking and a conductor of very high rank.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

BY OLIN DOWNES

The last Symphony rehearsal but one this season took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. In memory of the late Fred R. Comee, the lamented assistant manager of the Symphony Orchestra, the concert opened with the funeral march from Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

One could do the memory of Mr. Comee no greater justice than to quote a few lines of the eulogy published in the programme book: "His knowledge of human nature, his amiable disposition, his tolerance, his marked sense of humor turned business acquaintance into friendship, and all who had to do with him respected his ability and were fond of the man himself. He was scrupulously honest, industrious, never discouraged, quick and ready in an emergency, always of good cheer. His pride in his organization of which he was a member. His devotion to the interests of the orchestra was untiring and unselfish. The loyalty that bound him to many friends with hoops of steel distinguished him in his office."

Bruckner's eighth symphony, performed in Boston for the first time two or three weeks ago, was repeated by general request, and it made less of an impression than on the previous occasion. This was chiefly due to the performance, which revealed more detail and less of the prodigious vitality of the music than at the first reading. It was one of those psychological moments when every man in the orchestra appeared sick unto death of the work (evidently the weather had accumulated in the instruments, especially the brass) and Fiedler, in his desire to impress every measure upon those who listened, became guilty of over-elaboration, which is a very unsafe proceeding, even with the strongest of the symphonies of Anton Bruckner. Again the slow moment made a deep impression. The finale seemed for the most part doddering and imbecile, save toward the last.

The concert came to an end with Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl."

The quartet to sing in the performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony, at the Symphony Concerts this week, comprises Mesdames Laura Coombs and Gertrude Stein and Messrs. Theodore van Yox and Myron Whitney, Jr. Miss Coombs is a new singer to our public; Mme. Stein has sung here often, and as it happens, in the last preceding performance of the Choral Symphony at the Symphony Concerts, nine years ago; Mr. van Yox took the tenor part in it when it made the chief item in a concert for the Pension Fund in 1904; and Mr. Whitney is measurably familiar by his own recitals here.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

MINOR MATTERS OF AN ENDING

From SEASON May 3.09

The Final Symphony Concert and a Warm Leave-Taking for Mr. Fiedler—A "Saturday Reviewer" at the Metropolitan—Some Anglo-American Comparisons—A Notable New Play of Humble Life in London—Mr. Walkley's Impressions of It—Miss Genée's Departure—Prices at the New Theatre—Guitry's American Tour—Local Theatrical News—A New Overture at the "Pops"—Mme. Tetrazzini and Mr. Hammerstein—Other Musical News

Mr. Fiedler took leave of his audience at the evening series of Symphony Concerts, on Saturday, to as hearty applause as that which he had received from the other public of Friday afternoons on the preceding day. As usual for the final concert, the conductor's music-stand was trimmed with greenery and a bouquet tied with the American colors fastened to a corner of it. When Mr. Fiedler came first to his place, the whole audience applauded long and loudly, renewing its clapping until the conductor had three or four times acknowledged it. The plaudits were as quick and warm at every pause in the two symphonies of the evening, and at the end of the concert the audience held Mr. Fiedler for two or three minutes in his place. Then, according to his custom, he turned to bid the orchestra and the singers for Beethoven's Choral Symphony share in his reward, but most of them had vanished to leave the conductor alone to the pleasure of it. Little by little the clapping subsided, and Mr. Fiedler went off the stage as elastically and as energetically as he had first come to it, six months and more ago.

As for the concert itself, the Choral Symphony, in the final movement, went even better than it had gone on Friday afternoon, and the choir of the Cecilia performed prodigies of vocal valor in the singing of Beethoven's exacting music. The choristers sang it not only truly, precisely, and with sensuous quality and beauty of tone, but with quick understanding and clear imparting of its changeful moods and emotional purport. And they did not reserve themselves for the final frenzy of jubilation; rather, the quality and the intensity of their singing shone even more in the passages of more devout and quiet exaltation that precede it. The solo singers, except Miss Combs, hardly matched the chorus and the orchestra; but at the end of the season, when city after city, from Springfield even to Saskatchewan, is holding its annual "music festival," concert singers of the first rank are hard to obtain, while the operatic singers have already left the country. Mr. Fiedler conducted with the largeness, the energy, the impassioned power and the heroic accent that distinguished the performance of Friday; but in the three purely orchestral movements of the Ninth Symphony, and especially in Mozart's little symphony that preceded it, the orchestra, nervous, perhaps, under the excitement of the occasion, seconded him a little less well than it did on Friday. There was an unforgettable concert under Dr. Muck when the orchestra tried to do far too much with a symphony by Mozart, and sadly thickened, coarsened and roughened it. The players seemed in almost similar case with the little piece in D major of Saturday, and nervous excess of zeal was apparently again the cause. H. T. P.

The End of the Season—The Final Symphony Concerts—

The twenty-fourth and last pair of Symphony Concerts for the year fall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next at Symphony Hall. Two symphonies, moreover, make the programme. The first is Mozart's in D major, No. 35, one of those that are seldom performed nowadays and actually unheard here for nearly twenty-five years. It is short, light and interesting, and it is good to find Mr. Fiedler departing from the Mozartean routine that would limit his symphonies in the modern concert room to the three that he wrote in 1788, almost at the end of his life. They are surely the finest of the many that came from his hand, but they are also the most hackneyed. The other and the major symphony is Beethoven's ninth in D minor—the symphony that ends with a setting of Schiller's "Hymn to Joy," and enlists a solo quartet and a chorus. Rather strangely, nine years have passed since it was performed at a regular pair of Symphony Concerts. Nine years ago, this spring, it made the final item of the final concert in the old Music Hall. Some years later Mr. Gericke put it on the programme of a concert for the Pension Fund of the orchestra. Now, at last, Mr. Fiedler has restored it to the Symphony Concerts proper. Next week the Cecilia will provide the chorus, and in equal force at both concerts, while the four solo singers will be announced soon. In another column an article describes some of the "editing" and amplification that the Choral Symphony, always tempting matter for such experiments, has lately undergone in New York. Trans. Apr. 24, 1909.

Mr. Strube of the first violins of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Kautzenbach of the cellos, and Mr. Maquarre, the first flute, are to be the conductors at the "Pop" concerts through May and June. Mr. Maquarre will be new to the work, while Mr. Kautzenbach made his beginning only last year.

MR. FIEDLER'S CHANGES IN THE CHORAL SYMPHONY

Trans. Apr. 30, 1909
A Note from the Conductor About His Modest "Editing"—

As almost all conductors do, and in most instances with reason, Mr. Fiedler has slightly retouched in a few inevitable places the score of Beethoven's ninth symphony to be played at the Symphony Concerts of this afternoon and tomorrow evening. His "editing" has been very modest, and here in substance is his own account of it: "In my opinion, it is absolutely necessary to make some (and of course careful) additions and changes in order to bring out Beethoven's meaning. Unless one does so, one sees the music—at several places—all right on paper, but one does not hear it sound properly. We must not forget that Beethoven was quite deaf when he composed the symphony and that at the first performance of it he could not hear a note. For the first and the second movements, I have largely followed Wagner's advice and method, as he published them in his essay on the Ninth Symphony. Then I sometimes give the higher octave to the flutes, which Beethoven in all probability would have done, could the passages have been played on the flutes of his time, and I have made similar changes in the horn parts. At the big climax of the first movement, I make the trombones hold the chord, because all the other instruments are too weak to fight against the tremendous tremolo of the kettle-drum, which, on the other hand, cannot possibly be softened, as these bars must sound like a sort of Last Judgment. In the scherzo, again, nobody could clearly hear a certain passage unless, as Wagner suggested, the horns were added to the wood-winds to offset the double forte of the whole string orchestra, which is absolutely necessary. Here I have followed Wagner's suggestion. In the slow movement, I have made no additions or significant changes. At the beginning of the finale, I have also followed Wagner in the making of some changes in the horn and the trumpet parts, that seem to 'light up' the scenery. In the fugue, too, I have filled in some 'melody-notes,' which Beethoven seems to have contemplated, but which could not be played under the orchestral conditions of his time."

ENGAGED BY SYMPHONY.

MANCHESTER, N. H., Feb. 13—Gus Battles, a native of Concord and son of Gen. Battles, has been engaged as one of the flutes for the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr. Battles during the last three seasons has been a member of the Philadelphia Symphony orchestra. Herald Feb. 14, 1909.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Last of the Season's Symphony Concerts.

Interesting Program for the Opening of the "Pops."

Contest by College Glee Clubs---Gossip.

Gossip May 2, 1909
The 28th season of the Boston symphony orchestra closed last evening. Mr Fiedler's final program containing only two numbers, Mozart's D major symphony and Beethoven's immortal ninth. In the latter the orchestra was assisted by the chorus of the Cecilia society and the following soloists: Miss Laura Coombs soprano, Mme Gertrude May Stein contralto, Mr Theodore van York tenor, and Mr Myron W. Whitney Jr baritone. Miss Coombs appeared for the first time here. Mme Stein, in 1899 and 1900, and Messrs York and Whitney, in 1904, sang the Beethoven score with the orchestra.

Mozart's dainty work may sound trivial to the ultra modern musician, but its medodic beauties, its directness of purpose and its simplicity entitles it to more frequent performance than seems to be its fate. In the opening allegro movement the principal theme is disclosed at once by the violins, and then without cross harmonics to interrupt this motif is developed regularly, the joyous mood being retained through all the upbuilding.

How well Mozart understood the violin, and how fond he was of its utterances continues to be shown in the cantabel form of the second part, and also in the succeeding menuetto. The first, a charming little song, which the violins gave with exquisite effect; the latter a bit more playful in style, given with prominent assistance in the wood winds, and closing with the humorous and abrupt group of staccato notes. The bright finale again brought the violins to the fore in long, sustained figurations in the upper register, played with clarity, rapidity and unanimity of execution that displayed the high order of their ensemble work. Beethoven's choral symphony is the last of his immortal group and the most difficult of performance. The vocal finale for quartet and chorus is so tremendously difficult that it is frequently omitted and only the three instrumental parts performed at a concert. To some people the finale is wearisome, to others it is a masterpiece, that is if well sung. Then there is a divergence of opinions about portions of the score, and there have been many revisions made by musical experts, who have changed the instrumentation when they thought it could be improved, the resources of the modern orchestra justifying this "vandalism" when done judiciously. Mr Fiedler has made a few changes that he considered proper, mainly in some fortissimo passages in the first movement and later in some of the brass parts, to make the measures more sonorous.

An Enthusiastic Audience.

The audience was very liberal in applause, Mr Fiedler being greeted with unusual warmth, which shows that his good work here is appreciated. And he gave a lucid and stirring reading of the great symphony, this marvellous combination of the tenderest emotions, grand climaxes and tonal grandeur.

The complex themes, some eight in number, the big crescendos of the full orchestra, the opposing parts which finally harmonize and the suggestion of melancholy that runs through the first section were potently expressed. And the peculiar drum beats were not made unnecessarily vigorous.

The oddly syncopated rhythms in the scherzo were splendidly "dotted" by the violins, a musical bit which Sullivan copied in the conjurer's song in "The Sorcerer." The wind instruments deserve mention for the manner the second theme was intoned. The horns did nobly in the subsequent theme and the finale went as merrily as need be.

Very beautiful was the whole performance of the adagio, a picture of serenity, a hymn of joy and peace. The first theme was played delightfully by the strings and interluding horns and clarinets. The lesser theme also was adequately set forth by the second violins and other groups.

The choral movement enters with vehemence, a controversy taking place between all the instruments, ending with a titanic outburst, all of which was duly emphasized by Mr Fiedler.

The Choral Finale.

Mr Whitney, who had to make his vocal entrance after the instrumental fusillade, delivered his recitative with good effect, which is difficult to do under the conditions imposed upon the baritone. Miss Coombs has a sweet, high soprano, and carried her part in the quartet well. Mme Stein, the excellent contralto, and Mr York, who is a pleasing tenor, were individually satisfactory. Mr Whitney's fine baritone completed a good quartet which managed to accomplish good results in a formidable task.

On account of the strength of the third movement the choral finale comes as a sort of anti-climax unless there is a large body of singers to make it impressive. The hundred or more from the Cecilia society responded admirably to all demands and were able to cope quite successfully with the strenuous association of the orchestral forces. And the quartet, chorus and orchestra worked in commendable unity.

In the past season 95 selections have been played, Wagner leading with 15, Beethoven coming next with nine and Schubert R. Straus and Tschalkowsky credited with six each. Eleven works were performed for the first time in America and 16 had their first local performance.

The soloists numbered 18, of which six were pianists and seven vocalists. Messrs Hess and Warnke. If the orchestra were among the number, and Messrs Strube and Maquarre were represented on the program as composers, the first by a symphony, which he conducted, the second by an overture. Conductor Fiedler played piano accompaniments for the vocalists, Mmes Rapold, Destinn and Morena, and the eighth Bruckner symphony was repeated by request. The 29th season will open with the rehearsal Friday afternoon, Oct 8.

"Pop" Concerts in Symphony Hall Begin Tomorrow Evening.

Tomorrow night brings the first of the "Pop" concerts, and whatever the weather may be, warm or cold, this is accepted as a final sign that we are on the edge of summer. For seven months Symphony hall has been devoted to music in its higher and severer aspects, but with the last notes of Beethoven's ninth symphony last night the season proper came to an end and in place of the tonal riddles of the moderns will be heard the graceful tunes of the men who have written waltzes, marches and the like, for only rag-time is tabooed.

It will be the 24th season of these concerts, which are popular in fact as well as in name. The first were given in old Music hall in the spring of 1885 and with the exception of one year they have been continued every spring since then.

To many of the patrons it will seem strange not to see Mr Comee about during the concerts, for since they were moved uptown he had practically entire charge of them and his unexpected death will leave a gap not easy to fill. The season will run from next Monday night to Saturday night, July 3, or nine weeks.

It has been generally the custom to have more than one conductor during a season and that will be followed this year. The 55 men from the Symphony orchestra will be under the direction of Gustav Strube, Arthur Kautzenbach and Andre Maquarre. Mr Strube, who begins the season tomorrow evening, is an old-time favorite with "Pop" audiences.

Mr Kautzenbach took the baton last season for the first time. He is one of the cellists of the orchestra, and in the three weeks when he was the head of the band he became very popular. Mr Maquarre has never conducted at these concerts. He is the first flute of the orchestra. Like Mr Strube he is a composer of great promise, who this year had a work on a Symphony program.

As usual there will be special nights. "Tech" night this year will be one of more than ordinary glory, for this spring the new president of the institute is to be inducted into office, and an unusual number of alumni will be present to help in the celebration. Harvard night will come as usual toward the end of the season, and there will doubtless be a Dartmouth night on the eve of the Harvard-Dartmouth ball game.

As in years past light refreshments, including beers and light wines, may be had during the concerts, and the prices will be the same as in the past, 25 cents admission, 50 cents reserved seats in the balcony, and 75 cents reserved seats at tables on the floor within the enclosure. There will be a limited number of tables outside of the enclosure on the floor, which the admission price allows one to occupy. The concerts will begin at 8 and last until 11 o'clock.

The program tomorrow evening is as follows:

Marche Militaire.....	Schubert
(First time.)
Overture, Sakuntala.....	Goldmark
Menuet.....	Lully
(First time.)
Waltz, Burgerweisen.....	Strauss
(First time.)
Selection, I Pagliacci.....	Leoncavallo
A Fairy Tale, for string orchestra and harp.....	Strube
(First time.)
Indian Dance from suite No. 2.....	MacDowell
Overture, Le Baruffe Chiozzotte.....	Sinigaglia
Overture, The Bronze Horse.....	Auber
Selection, Little Nemo.....	Herbert
(First time.)
Dollar Waltz.....	Fall
(First time.)
March, Nechledil.....	Lehar

MUSICAL EVENTS

Mr. Fiedler has been induced by the many requests that have been sent in to him to repeat Bruckner's Eighth Symphony, which was played with so much success at the 18th concert, and he has placed it on the 23d programme for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. That will make the first part of the programme. The second part of the programme will be Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll."

Patrons of the orchestra will be interested to know that the feature of the 24th and last programme to be played on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 30 and May 1, respectively, will be Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which has not appeared on a Symphony programme since Symphony Hall was built, and has been given only once in the last 10 years, then at a pension fund concert under Mr. Gericke.

Preparations are making in Symphony Hall for the 24th season of the Pops, which will begin on Monday evening, May 3, and continue for nine weeks, the last concert being given on Saturday evening, July 3. The concerts will be given every evening except Sundays, at 8 o'clock. The conductors for the season will be Gustav Strube, Arthur Kautzenbach and Andre Maquarre.

Next autumn, the afternoon series of Symphony Concerts will begin on Friday, Oct. 8, and the evening series on Saturday, Oct. 9. The final concerts will fall on Friday, April 29, and Saturday, April 30, 1910.

THE CHORAL SYMPHONY

BEETHOVEN'S TONE-POEM TO BE PLAYED AGAIN

Trans. — Apr. 24, 1909

The Revival Next Week for the First Time in Nine Years at the Regular Symphony Concerts—The Temptation in the Music to "Editing" and Experiment—Mr. Damrosch's Recent Double Performance of the Symphony in New York—The Other Innovations That He Attempted—The Debated Question of Pause or No Pause Before the Finale

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, for the first times in nine years, Beethoven's choral symphony is to be performed at a pair of regular Symphony Concerts. In the spring of 1900, it was the last piece that the Symphony Orchestra, then under Mr. Gericke, played in the old Music Hall. Once at a concert for the Pension Fund of the orchestra he undertook it, five years ago, in Symphony Hall. Now Mr. Fiedler has once more restored it to the regular concerts and set himself to the preparation of it with his familiar energy. The Choral Symphony, besides, has been much the fashion this season at orchestral concerts. Mr. Mahler undertook it not long ago in New York with the orchestra of the Philharmonic Society and carried it to a performance that was eloquent in the more "dramatic" portions of the music, and that attempted none of the innovations for which the symphony offers peculiar temptation. Three weeks before, however, Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra had been plentiful with them. He performed the symphony twice in a single concert; he assembled a group of singers for the solo parts; here and there he amplified and "edited" the score as Beethoven left it; and once he made and once he omitted the debated pause before the beginning of the last—the choral—movement. Experiments of many sorts are an old story since Bülow's time with the ninth symphony. Many a conductor cannot resist the temptation to "write in" what he fancies Beethoven would have written, had he not been deaf, or had he had modern instruments and modern instrumental skill in his orchestra. With each renewal of such experiments comes fresh debate of them and of the editing of the choral symphony in general. It was plentiful in New York a month ago, and below follow two instances of it.

A mere record of the last of the Symphony Society's concerts of Beethoven's music might suffice if it had been a duplicate of the corresponding concert last season. But the concert was something very different, wrote Mr. Krehbiel in the Tribune. It was, indeed, different from any other concert which Mr. Walter Damrosch has conducted in New York, or the forces under his control, have ever given. The programme consisted of a single number, and this was performed twice. The number was the Choral Symphony. The scheme of a double performance of the symphony smacked a good deal of sensationalism in the announcement. Von Bülow tried the experiment once in Germany, but much could be forgiven the erratic doctor which could scarcely be pardoned in another. But Mr. Damrosch seemed not only willing to endure the comments which he must have known would be called out by his proceeding, but to invite others. He not only repeated the symphony after a brief intermission, but he essayed an experiment, without precedent so far as we know, and gave the solo parts into the keeping of a small chorus of thirteen voices—three sopranos, three contraltos, four tenors and three basses. He also called together a chorus, unusual in its composition, at least of three hundred voices. Moreover—and herein lay the feature of the performance which was most fruitful of results—he subjected the great work to a careful study and made such changes in the score as he believed would bring it closer than usual to the appreciation of the listeners. They were all of a character sanctioned by the approval of some of the best men of the musical world. It is enough to say that much of what Wagner and von Bülow did to bring to notice the melodic ideas which have sometimes been blurred, or hidden by the shortcomings of the instruments in use in Beethoven's day, and the want of skill in the players, was repeated by Mr. Damrosch.

Three features, however, were striking enough to assert the attention of every amateur. The first has been mentioned: Instead of a quartet, a small chorus sang all the solo music except the opening proclamation in the vocal finale and the tenor solo. The effect of this change was striking, too striking to be disposed of at the time. There was a loss in contrast—there was a gain in homogeneity. There was less gasping for breath, less evidence of a struggle with the cruel difficulty of the music, but also less color. The second feature was one which Mr. Damrosch submitted to a trial. At the repetition of the symphony he separated the slow movement and the finale by a very brief pause. He did what no conductor has done before in New York, except Mr. Weingartner at a Philharmonic Society concert some five years ago. At that time the proceeding was enthusiastically commended by The Tribune's music reviewer. Last night's experiment confirmed him in his opinion that it was thus that Beethoven intended that the work should be performed. It is, indeed, not only highly illuminative of the composer's poetical purpose, if that purpose was a celebration of humanity's struggle for joy, it is essential to a clear expression of that purpose. Let a hurried argument be attempted.

The last movement of the symphony

Symphony Hall.

Twenty-Ninth Season, 1909-1910.

Boston

Symphony

Orchestra

Max Fiedler, Conductor.

Opening Concert

Saturday Evening, October 9, 1909.

THE CHORAL SYMPHONY

BEETHOVEN'S TONE-POEM TO BE PLAYED AGAIN

Trans. Apr. 24, 1909
The Revival Next Week for the First Time in Nine Years at the Regular Symphony Concerts—The Temptation in the Music to "Editing" and Experiment—Mr. Dam-rosch's Recent Double Performance of the Symphony in New York—The Other Innovations That He Attempted—The Debated Question of Pause or No Pause Before the Finale

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, for the first times in nine years, Beethoven's choral symphony is to be performed at a pair of regular Symphony Concerts. In the spring of 1900, it was the last piece that the Symphony Orchestra, then under Mr. Gericke, played in the old Music Hall. Once at a concert for the Pension Fund of the orchestra he undertook it, five years ago, in Symphony Hall. Now Mr. Fiedler has once more restored it to the regular concerts and set himself to the preparation of it with his familiar energy. The Choral Symphony, besides, has been much the fashion this season at orchestral concerts. Mr. Mahler undertook it not long ago in New York with the orchestra of the Philharmonic Society and carried it to a performance that was eloquent in the more "dramatic" portions of the music, and that attempted none of the innovations for which the symphony offers peculiar temptation. Three weeks before, however, Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra had been plentiful with them. He performed the symphony twice in a single concert; he assembled a group of singers for the solo parts; here and there he amplified and "edited" the score as Beethoven left it; and once he made and once he omitted the debated pause before the beginning of the last—the choral—movement. Experiments of many sorts are an old story since Bülow's time with the ninth symphony. Many a conductor cannot resist the temptation to "write in" what he fancies Beethoven would have written, had he not been deaf, or had he had modern instruments and modern instrumental skill in his orchestra. With each renewal of such experiments comes fresh debate of them and of the editing of the choral symphony in general. It was plentiful in New York a month ago, and below follow two instances of it.

A mere record of the last of the Symphony Society's concerts of Beethoven's music might suffice if it had been a duplicate of the corresponding concert last season. But the concert was something very different, wrote Mr. Krehbiel in the Tribune. It was, indeed, different from any other concert which Mr. Walter Damrosch has conducted in New York, or the forces under his control, have ever given. The programme consisted of a single number, and this was performed twice. The number was the Choral Symphony. The scheme of a double performance of the symphony smacked a good deal of sensationalism in the announcement. Von Bülow tried the experiment once in Germany, but much could be forgiven the erratic doctor which could scarcely be pardoned in another. But Mr. Damrosch seemed not only willing to endure the comments which he must have known would be called out by his proceeding, but to invite others. He not only repeated the symphony after a brief intermission, but he essayed an experiment, without precedent so far as we know, and gave the solo parts into the keeping of a small chorus of thirteen voices—three sopranos, three contraltos, four tenors and three basses. He also called together a chorus, unusual in its composition, at least of three hundred voices. Moreover—and herein lay the feature of the performance which was most fruitful of results—he subjected the great work to a careful study and made such changes in the score as he believed would bring it closer than usual to the appreciation of the listeners. They were all of a character sanctioned by the approval of some of the best men of the musical world. It is enough to say that much of what Wagner and von Bülow did to bring to notice the melodic ideas which have sometimes been blurred, or hidden by the shortcomings of the instruments in use in Beethoven's day, and the want of skill in the players, was repeated by Mr. Damrosch.

Three features, however, were striking enough to assert the attention of every amateur. The first has been mentioned: Instead of a quartet, a small chorus sang all the solo music except the opening proclamation in the vocal finale and the tenor solo. The effect of this change was striking, too striking to be disposed of at the time. There was a loss in contrast—there was a gain in homogeneity. There was less gasping for breath, less evidence of a struggle with the cruel difficulty of the music, but also less color. The second feature was one which Mr. Damrosch submitted to a trial. At the repetition of the symphony he separated the slow movement and the finale by a very brief pause. He did what no conductor has done before in New York, except Mr. Weingartner at a Philharmonic Society concert some five years ago. At that time the proceeding was enthusiastically commended by The Tribune's music reviewer. Last night's experiment confirmed him in his opinion that it was thus that Beethoven intended that the work should be performed. It is, indeed, not only highly illuminative of the composer's poetical purpose, if that purpose was a celebration of humanity's struggle for joy, it is essential to a clear expression of that purpose. Let a hurried argument be attempted.

The last movement of the symphony

Symphony Hall.

Twenty-Ninth Season, 1909-1910.

Boston

Symphony Orchestra

Max Fiedler, Conductor.

Opening Concert

Saturday Evening, October 9, 1909.

330
opens with a turbulent presto of the wind instruments, a mad and despairing shriek, which is interrupted by the famous recitative of the basses; then the discordant fanfare is repeated with angry emphasis, and again comes an expostulation from the instruments, which seem to be trying to adopt the human form of speech. Now, in succession, come brief reminiscences from the three preceding movements, separated from each other by declamatory passages in differing moods from the basses. After the three movements have thus been passed in review the wood-wind instruments suggest the melody which later we find associated with Schiller's "Ode to Joy," and the bass instruments express their satisfaction with the tune as plainly as inanimate instruments can. Now they act on the gracious suggestion of the wood-winds, sing the melody to the end in unison, and then deliver it to the orchestra, which puts it through a series of variations. These are running out into a complacent ritornello when the horrid opening din is heard again louder and more rasping than before, for now the strings, too, add their voices to the clamor. As before, there comes an interruption, but this time the expostulation comes from human lips and is clothed with articulate speech. The sole baritone addresses the instruments: "O friends, not these tones. Rather let us unite in more pleasant ones, and more joyous." Then, like the bass instruments before him, he sings the joy melody to Schiller's words to the end and transfers it to the chorus. Vocal variations supported by the orchestra take the place of the instrumental, which had gone before. The poet-composer's desire for that definiteness of expression which could come only from the word has been achieved. A perfect apparatus composed of many parts, each efficient in a degree but endowed with a higher efficiency through coöperation, hymns the praise of joy.

If Beethoven had wanted the finale to succeed the slow movement without a pause, it is easily said, he might have omitted the customary double bar between the two movements or written "attacca" over it. He did neither of these things. But note this, that he omitted the hold which is found in the score at the conclusion of the first and second movements. The dissonant orchestral screech which begins the last movement is like a conjunction in grammar—an and, if, but or not. It ought not to be regarded as a beginning but as a continuation of the discourse. Again, there is a double bar and a renumeration and alignment of the forces; but now no one would think for a moment that a pause was permissible; everything is pushing eagerly toward the solution; a new attempt is made, and, because articulate speech is brought in to help, success is attained.

Last night's public had an opportunity to hear the effect of the customary pause between the third and fourth movements, and also the effect of the device which we believe was in Beethoven's mind. A full demonstration was spoiled by a burst of applause which followed the slow movement on the second performance; but there remained enough of the effect to appeal to the discerning. The symphony benefits from the device.

Many musicians of the present time, added Mr. Henderson in the Sun, have felt that Beethoven needed editing, a great deal according to one or two of them. There used to be in this city a musician who said that he would like to study orchestration for two or three years with Richard Strauss and then reorchestrate Beethoven's fifth symphony. Doubtless he would have begun by extending the list of instruments employed, for Strauss himself could best reorchestrate this composition with the apparatus found in his own scores. There is no doubt whatever that new and extraordinary sonority could be imparted to the entrance of the finale. Suppose that instead of being scored for Beethoven's elementary orchestra it were written out anew for the usual body of strings, three flutes, two oboes, English horn, two bassoons, contra bassoon, four clarinets, bass clarinet, double bass clarinet, eight horns, six trumpets, bass trumpet, three trombones, contra bass trombone, tuba and —à la Wagner—six harps. It would sound very different, would it not? There might also be a heckelphone and a sarussophone, with megaphones for the solo quartet. It would doubtless be tremendously imposing, but the real question is, would it sound any longer like Beethoven?

Now that is precisely the one question which has to be answered whenever anyone undertakes to edit any of Beethoven's orchestral scores. It is not regarded as reverential to meddle with those scores at all. Beethoven knew what he wished and he wrote it. Without doubt this is true in the majority of cases; but long before Mr. Damrosch this question was raised: Are there not places in the score of the ninth symphony which show that the composer was constrained to write as he did either by the state of orchestral technic in his day or the possibilities of the instruments that were at his command? Mr. Damrosch's more technical departures from custom consisted in the carrying of the violins and the flutes up to what seemed the logical conclusion of certain melodic phrases; in the "filling out" of the rests in the trumpet parts and in the trombone parts in the finale, and in other reinforcements of the wood-winds in that movement. They did not in any way change the instrumental color of Beethoven. They did not reconstruct either his melodic scheme or his balance of tone. They did fill out certain passages, but in a manner not boldly pronounced.

Mr. Damrosch's devotion to the ideas of his one-time teacher in the art of conducting, von Bülow, led him to do things much more reprehensible than the editing of the phrases alluded to in the foregoing cursory comments. At the end of the first movement of the symphony, for instance, Bülow has filled out the last three measures of the tympani part in quite indefensible manner. This piece of editing cannot offer as its excuse the plea that Beethoven would have done the same thing if he could. Beethoven unquestionably wrote the passage as he wished it to sound. There is another spot in the ninth symphony where Bülow went even further, for he interpolated parts for seven tympani, doubling the successive notes of a melodic phrase. Beethoven never dreamed of such an effect, and it is utterly foreign to the entire character of his music. Therefore Bülow's impudent editing should be relegated to the museum of musical curiosities. Mr. Damrosch, though he used the passage at the end of the first movement, had not the hardihood to introduce the seven against Beethoven.

MINOR MATTERS OF AN ENDING SEASON

Trans. — May 3, 1909
The Final Symphony Concert and a Warm Leave-Taking for Mr. Fiedler—A "Saturday Reviewer" at the Metropolitan—

Mr. Fiedler took leave of his audience at the evening series of Symphony Concerts, on Saturday, to as hearty applause as that which he had received from the other public of Friday afternoons on the preceding day. As usual for the final concert, the conductor's music-stand was trimmed with greenery and a bouquet tied with the American colors fastened to a corner of it. When Mr. Fiedler came first to his place, the whole audience applauded long and loudly, renewing its clapping until the conductor had three or four times acknowledged it. The plaudits were as quick and warm at every pause in the two symphonies of the evening, and at the end of the concert the audience held Mr. Fiedler for two or three minutes in his place. Then, according to his custom, he turned to bid the orchestra and the singers for Beethoven's Choral Symphony share in his reward, but most of them had vanished to leave the conductor alone to the pleasure of it. Little by little the clapping subsided, and Mr. Fiedler went off the stage as elastically and as energetically as he had first come to it, six months and more ago.

As for the concert itself, the Choral Symphony, in the final movement, went even better than it had gone on Friday afternoon, and the choir of the Cecilia performed prodigies of vocal valor in the singing of Beethoven's exacting music. The choristers sang it not only truly, precisely, and with sensuous quality and beauty of tone, but with quick understanding and clear imparting of its changeful moods and emotional purport. And they did not reserve themselves for the final frenzy of jubilation;

337
rather, the quality and the intensity of their singing shone even more in the passages of more devout and quiet exaltation that preceded it. The solo singers, except Miss Combs, hardly matched the chorus and the orchestra; but at the end of the season, when city after city, from Springfield even to Saskatchewan, is holding its annual "music festival," concert singers of the first rank are hard to obtain, while the operatic singers have already left the country. Mr. Fiedler conducted with the largeness, the energy, the impassioned power and the heroic accent that distinguished the performance of Friday; but in the three purely orchestral movements of the Ninth Symphony, and especially in Mozart's little symphony that preceded it, the orchestra, nervous, perhaps, under the excitement of the occasion, seconded him a little less well than it did on Friday. There was an unforgettable concert under Dr. Muck when the orchestra tried to do far too much with a symphony by Mozart, and sadly thickened, coarsened and roughened it. The players seemed in almost similar case with the little piece in D major of Saturday, and nervous excess of zeal was apparently again the cause. H. T. P.

Close of Symphony Season Post — May 2, 1909 Mr. Fiedler as He Has Revealed Himself to His Audiences

Mr. Fiedler concluded his first season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Symphony Hall. The concert has already been reviewed. The chorus of the Cecilia gave a good performance of difficult and ungrateful music. Moreover, they showed an attention to the text and an appreciation of its significance, which is the exception and not the rule when choruses pay their respects to this symphony. The words "Vor Gott," for instance, made a memorable moment, back of which one felt Mr. Fiedler. And there were other praiseworthy passages. The solo quartet, Miss Laura Combs, soprano; Mme. Gertrude Stein, contralto; Theodore Van Jorx, tenor; Myron Whitney, Jr., baritone, was not entirely successful. Mr. Whitney (this refers to the preliminary concert of Friday afternoon) was in far from his best vocal condition, and more than once there was poor intonation. The performance as a whole, however, bore further evidence to the earnestness and depth of feeling which are among the most prominent and gratifying of Mr. Fiedler's characteristics.

Few conductors have come to Boston with so little flourishing of trumpets as Mr. Fiedler, and few have made their way so quickly and surely into the affections of their audiences. There is more than one cause for this, but the priceless quality which lies at the root of it all cannot be too heartily extolled: the whole-hearted sincerity of the man, which is the basis of his life and his art.

Mr. Gerike was a faithful student, a gifted conductor, a musician of the highest ideals. Dr. Muck, to continue the parallel, was a man of astonishing mental alacrity and breadth of horizon, exceptionally objective as a conductor and a citizen of the world. His magnetic and striking personality rarely came to the fore on the platform or in any save the most intimate surroundings. Mr. Fiedler is never objective in the sense just defined. The man who walks up Westland avenue to his modest apartments is identical with the man who mounts the rostrum with uncalculated mien, urges his men with every ounce and fibre of his being to do their utmost in behalf of a composer, and glows with human satisfaction when heartfelt applause rewards an especially successful effort.

No music that this conductor undertakes, one feels, could possibly be a matter of personal indifference to him. Heart and soul, for the instant, are absorbed in that score. Certainly the most painstaking preparation has gone before, but now there is the personal—not the egotistical—ring in every note. The writer once asked Mr. Fiedler whether he had not, at the second performance of a certain work, altered his tempi in several important places. The reply was: "I don't know. It is very possible. When I take up my baton, I proceed as the music strikes me." That is the man in a nutshell.

Dr. Muck sat in his tower of ivory and led a superb performance of Strauss' Domestic Symphony, music of which, according to his own statement, he disapproves. With all Mr. Fiedler's catholicity, such a thing is hardly possible for him. He could not reduce a performance to notes viewed through a magnifying glass, and we do not want him to.

Mr. Fiedler is essentially a modern. He glories in the wonderful music that is being written today, nor can he avoid observing and emphasizing the modern qualities of the classics. He has given ample space to the older school in his programmes, but in his treatment of these masterpieces he has often trod on the toes of those most at home in them. At the risk of many letters, anonymous and otherwise, I dare to whisper that the performance of the fifth symphony of Beethoven, for instance, gave me pleasure, and that I appreciated the "Eroica" more than I ever had before. And am I the only heretic in Symphony Hall?

Another strong element in Mr. Fiedler's success has been his programmes, not less modern than Dr. Muck's, but far more varied and agreeably diversified. Then, Mr. Fiedler is an enthusiastic admirer of Strauss, and for long years we have craved and lacked a sufficiency of Strauss. What is the use of talking? Strauss has come to stay. He is mother's milk to the young generation, and they will have him.

Forty-two composers, from Haydn to Debussy, have contributed to the symphony programme this season. Eleven works have been performed for the first time in America. The most important of these were Bruckner's colossal symphony in C minor, and, as far as reputation goes, Paderewski's in B minor. Sixteen works have been given for the first time in Boston. Mr. Strube, whose interesting symphony was played for the first time on the third of April, and Mr. Maquarre, whose overture, "On the Sea Cliffs," was first heard March 27, are two prominent members of the orchestra. American composers have had hearing. A set of variations for organ and orchestra by George Chadwick, a suite for string orchestra by Arthur Foote and MacDowell's early tone-poem, "Lamia," have figured on Mr. Fiedler's lists. Four of the Strauss tone-poems have been given, and the modern composers received increasing attention as the season progressed and Mr. Fiedler ascertained the tastes of his audience.

The most successful of the novelties were the Bruckner Eighth Symphony, of Debussy, when a chorus of women's voices from the New England Conservatory of Music assisted; Mr. Strube's symphony; two pieces of Sibelius, "Finlandia" and "A Song of Spring"; Scheinplug's "Overture to a Comedy of Shakspeare"; the works by Foote and Gretry (Three Dance Pieces from the Ballet, "Cephalus and Procris.")

The performances of the symphonies by Paderewski and Elgar were instigated by the reputation of the composers, and neither work proved worthy of the labor wasted upon it. This may also be remarked of the innocuous concerto that Emil Sauer produced and performed early in the season. There were also works of Gradener, Schillings, Glazounoff, that took the booby prize; but this is a small number, when one remembers certain other symphony seasons. The soloists have in almost every case been artists of uncommon ability. Among them one immediately recalls the notable appearances of Mischa Elman, the violinist; Paderewski, Gabrilowitsch, Lhevinne, Germaine, Arnaud, Destinn of the Metropolitan Opera House and Alwin Schroeder, the veteran cellist.

Mr. Fiedler has made his personality strongly felt in the course of a season. He has maintained the pleasantest relations with his men and his audiences. As a conductor he has less finesse and less of craving for sheer beauty of tone, for its own sake, that the two leaders who preceded him. Like Whitman, he could say "I am moved, not by the volumes of sound merely, but by their exquisite meanings." So in the modern music, that will embrace the philosophy of the earth and the heavens in its measures, in such flights of genius as "Also Sprach Zarathustra," "Ein Leben," the Bruckner symphony, the Noren variations, he has left his auditors with memories that will not die, and with warm anticipations of his second season.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Post BY OLIN DOWNES May 1/09

At the Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Mr. Fiedler made his final appearance this season before his Friday afternoon audience. The programme offered a little known symphony by Mozart in D major (K 385) and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony—a fitting conclusion of a rarely interesting series of concerts. In spite of the weather the hall was entirely filled, and a number of those who had waited for the cheaper seats on the steps outside in the pouring rain were turned away when the upper balcony filled to its capacity.

The Mozart symphony, which had not been played at these concerts since 1885, is chiefly interesting in its uncommonly vigorous opening movement. This is a splendidly virile allegro, with a strong principal theme and a gratifying absence of red tape in its development. The instrumentation is unusually brilliant. The harmonies, in more than one instance, are surprisingly modern.

The pretty andante is charming in its faded sentimentality, and a little tiresome. The scherzo resembles a round dozen of other scherzos by Mozart, and the finale is trivial. The players, both in this symphony and in Beethoven's, did their utmost in behalf of the leader, who has made himself so well liked here in the course of a season.

Mr. Fiedler "edited" the instrumental parts of the ninth symphony a little, reinforcing the instruments in passages that plainly and unmistakably merit such a proceeding. These innovations were not far-fetched or obtrusive. It was Beethoven that we heard and nothing else.

This symphony, of course, represents the greatest aspiration of a mighty spirit. The instrumental portions, the titanic opening section, the scherzo that is as the universe set a-dancing, the celestial adagio—these movements speak for themselves, and Mr. Fiedler interpreted them with unlimited fervor and conviction. They set words to shame, for that is Beethoven, the symphonist, the hewer of immortal monuments, the prophet who endowed the granitic structures with living fire.

It is, perhaps, unbecoming to approach so stupendous a work in a spirit of criticism, yet honesty compels the statement that, to the writer, the grandiose finale is neither perfectly congruous nor entirely on the white heights with the rest of the work. Possibly the human voice is more expressive than any instruments, though there are ample grounds for contesting that vainglorious statement. Certainly, to humanity at large, the voice is the most communicative and easily understood of musical machines.

Of course it was with this in mind that Beethoven, in his altruism that approaches the divine, designed his choral climax, but on sheerly artistic grounds the proceeding serves to destroy what might have been indivisible unity, to project an element into the fabric which is an intrusion to one who has been listening and absorbed in what has gone before. Oh, for the instrumental conclusion that only Beethoven could have written!

SYMPHONY'S LAST CONCERT OF SEASON

Beethoven's Gigantic Ninth
Given with Aid of the Cecilia Chorus, Whose Singing Is Feature of the Finale.

UNFAMILIAR WORK BY MOZART REVIVED

Herald May 2, 1909
By PHILIP HALE.

The 24th and last concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The orchestra was assisted by the chorus of the Cecilia Society and by Miss Laura Combs, soprano; Mme. Stein, contralto; Theodore Van Yox, tenor, and Myron W. Whitney, Jr., baritone. The program was as follows:

Symphony in D major (K. 385)....Mozart
Symphony in D minor, No. 9....Beethoven

The symphony by Mozart had not been played here since 1885. It was written originally in serenade form, with a march and a second minuet, which were afterwards cut out, for some festivity at the house of Hafner, merchant and burgomaster at Salzburg. Mozart had already composed a serenade for wedding at this house. When he wrote the symphony at his father's request, he was living in Vienna, busied with the first performances of an opera and with his courtship of Constanze Weber. He wrote the symphony in great haste, and sent the movements as he completed them to his father. When Mozart received the work for performance at one of his own concerts in Vienna, he was surprised to find the music as good as it was.

The music is in turn lively and pretty. There are hints, both in melodic line and in harmonic and orchestral color, of passages in "The Marriage of Figaro," which was produced three years later.

The symphony would be still more effective were it to be played by a small orchestra in a small hall.

Much has been written about the Ninth Symphony, a symphony that has been and is a stumbling block to certain conductors and hearers. It is easy to smile at such books as "Le Livre de la Genese la IX. Symphonie de Beethoven" by Riccetto Canudo, with its fantastical theories and titles given to the leading themes, but the comments of more ordinary mortals have led conductors into singular experiments. Some have rewritten passages. Some, fearing the inherent difficulties in the finale, have transposed this finale a tone lower. There are hearers who, knowing the theory of Wagner—that the Ninth Symphony was the logical end of purely instrumental music and Beethoven introduced singers in the finale to show his impatience with the orchestra as a medium of full expression—look on the symphony as a polemical work, and in turn decry all absolute music written after Beethoven's death.

We know, however, that while Beethoven was at work on the symphony, he was meditating another. One with a purely instrumental finale was for the Philharmonic Society of London. The other with the introduction of a chorus at the end was to be entitled, the "German" Symphony. We also know that the idea of introducing a chorus in the ninth came to him only after he had begun composition, for there are sketches of a purely instrumental finale made in 1823, although Schiller's "Ode to Joy," which furnished the text for this finale as it stands, tempted him to music as early as 1792.

On the other hand Beethoven in a notebook containing a few sketches for the 10th symphony wrote: "This symphony could be characterized by the entrance of voices in the finale, or even earlier in the Adagio." Is it not probable that Beethoven simply wished to use all possible resources in the expression of his thoughts?

The music remains, in spite of the commentators and the too anxious conductors. The instrumental movements are among the proudest achievements of man. Mr. Canudo may begin his "explanation" of the opening Allegro by saying: "In the beginning was space; and all possibilities were in space; and life was space"; he may find in a certain page the "religious affirmation of Creation"; he may entitle the first theme of the Adagio "The rhythm of the blessed cosmic night" and thus take his pleasure.

The music of the first three movements is not the less sublime or beautiful because it has no program, because it has no text for singers. With the exception of a few stupendous passages in the finale, where Beethoven is among the stars, the finale falls below the movements that precede it. The "theme of Joy" is not in itself one of Beethoven's most fortunate inventions, and there are pages both for singers and for orchestra that disconcert even if they do not seem to the hearer abnormal and impotent. The answer made by some is that if an ideal performance could be attained the grandeur of the thought would then be overwhelming. Unfortunately, human voices have their limitations.

Yet, if the first three movements are performed alone, there is a sense of incompleteness. If the finale is transposed, the effect is diminished. And so, the ninth symphony as a whole is still a stumbling block to many.

The performance last night of the first movement was impressive, and the passion of the composer found in Mr. Fiedler a sympathetic interpreter. The rhythm of the scherzo was strongly marked and there were many fine dynamic contrasts. It was a pity that the drums lacked tone. There was noise rather than sound in their famous passages. The adagio is music incomparable by reason of its deep emotion and supernatural beauty. It might have been played with more poetic feeling, in a more imaginative spirit, and at the same time with more finesse.

The difficulties attending a performance of the finale are so great that any hearer acquainted with them and having a practical knowledge of what singers can and cannot do is always charitable and ready to praise the endeavor. The Cecilia Chorus, which, I am told, was prepared for this concert by its conductor, Mr. Wallace Goodrich, did admirable work, and its singing was the feature of the finale. The solo and quartet music has been sung here more effectively than it was last night. Even when the quartet is composed of extraordinary singers, there are measures which suggest only a wild scramble.

Thus ended the 28th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra and the first season with Mr. Fiedler as conductor. The audience welcomed Mr. Fiedler most heartily, and, in the course of the concert, gave many demonstrations of the respect and the affection in which it holds him.

The first concert of the 29th season, Mr. Fiedler conductor, will take place on Saturday evening, Oct. 9.

BRILLIANT CLOSE OF 28TH SEASON

Journal May 3.09

Max Fiedler Says Au Revoir to Symphony Players and Patrons—Year's Record.

Max Fiedler ended his first season as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra Saturday night with a rousing presentation of Beethoven's colossal ninth symphony. The audience applauded Mr. Fiedler enthusiastically when he came out to lead the first number on the program, the Mozart symphony in D major, which had not been heard here since its performance by the Symphony Orchestra back in 1885. Considering its style, spirit and brevity, it served as an admirable foil and introduction for the monumental work that followed it.

The orchestra was assisted in the Beethoven number by the Cecilia Society and the following soloists: Soprano, Miss Laura Combs; contralto, Mme. Gertrude May Stein; tenor, Theodore Van Yox; barytone, Myron Whitney, Jr. The chorus sang splendidly, and part of the credit for this belongs to the Cecilia's regular conductor, Wallace Goodrich, who trained it for this performance. The soloists went through their well-nigh thankless tasks with generally indifferent success, though Miss Combs, for one, sang both bravely and artistically. The orchestral movements were the best of all, and after each there was a great outburst of applause. At the end of the symphony—which, by the way, took an hour and 10 minutes to perform thus giving Beethoven the time record previously shared during the season by Paderewski and Bruckner—the big crowd lingered to bid Mr. Fiedler an applaudive au revoir. The first concert of next season takes place Saturday night, Oct. 9.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Last of the Season's
Symphony Concerts.

Interesting Program for the Opening of the "Pops."

Contest by College Glee Clubs---Gossip.

The 28th season of the Boston symphony orchestra closed last evening. Mr. Fiedler's final program containing only two numbers, Mozart's D major symphony and Beethoven's immortal ninth. In the latter the orchestra was assisted by the chorus of the Cecilia society and the following soloists: Miss Laura Combs soprano, Mme Gertrude May Stein contralto, Mr Theodore van Yox tenor, and Mr Myron W. Whitney Jr baritone. Miss Combs appeared for the first time here. Mme Stein, in 1899 and 1900, and Messrs Yox and Whitney, in 1904, sang the Beethoven score with the orchestra.

Mozart's dainty work may sound trivial to the ultra modern musician, but its medodic beauties, its directness of purpose and its simplicity entitles it to more frequent performance than seems to be its fate. In the opening allegro movement the principal theme is disclosed at once by the violins, and then without cross harmonics to interrupt this motif is developed regularly, the joyous mood being retained through all the upbuilding.

How well Mozart understood the violin, and how fond he was of its utterances continues to be shown in the cantabel form of the second part, and also in the succeeding menuetto. The first, a charming little song, which the violins gave with exquisite effect; the latter a bit more playful in style, given with prominent assistance in the wood winds, and closing with the humorous and abrupt group of staccato notes. The bright finale again brought the violins to the fore in long, sustained figurations in the upper register, played with clarity, rapidity and unanimity of execution that displayed the high order of their ensemble work.

Beethoven's choral symphony is the last of his immortal group and the most difficult of performance. The vocal finale for quartet and chorus is so tremendously difficult that it is frequently omitted and only the three instrumental parts performed at a concert. To some people the finale is wearisome, to others it is a masterpiece, that is if well sung. Then there is a divergence of opinions about portions of the score, and there have been many revisions made by musical experts, who have changed the instrumentation when they thought it could be improved, the resources of the modern orchestra justifying this "vandalism" when done judiciously. Mr Fiedler has made a few changes that he considered proper, mainly in some fortissimo passages in the first movement and later in some of the brass parts, to make the measures more sonorous.

An Enthusiastic Audience.

The audience was very liberal in applause, Mr Fiedler being greeted with unusual warmth, which shows that his good work here is appreciated. And he gave a lucid and stirring reading of the great symphony, this marvellous combination of the tenderest emotions, grand climaxes and tonal grandeur.

The complex themes, some eight in number, the big crescendos of the full orchestra, the opposing parts which finally harmonize and the suggestion of melancholy that runs through the first section were potently expressed.

3340
And the peculiar drum beats were not made unnecessarily vigorous.

The oddly syncopated rhythms in the scherzo were splendidly "dotted" by the violins, a musical bit which Sullivan copied in the conjurer's song in "The Sorcerer." The wind instruments deserve mention for the manner the second theme was intoned. The horns did nobly in the subsequent theme and the finale went as merrily as need be.

Very beautiful was the whole performance of the adagio, a picture of serenity, a hymn of joy and peace. The first theme was played delightfully by the strings and interluding horns and clarinets. The lesser theme also was adequately set forth by the second violins and other groups.

The choral movement enters with venemence, a controversy taking place between all the instruments, ending with a titanic outburst, all of which was duly emphasized by Mr Fiedler.

The Choral Finale.

Mr Whitney, who had to make his vocal entrance after the instrumental fusillade, delivered his recitative with good effect, which is difficult to do under the conditions imposed upon the baritone. Miss Coombs has a sweet, high soprano, and carried her part in the quartet well. Mme Stein, the excellent contralto, and Mr Yorx, who is a pleasing tenor, were individually satisfactory. Mr Whitney's fine baritone completed a good quartet which managed to accomplish good results in a formidable task.

On account of the strength of the third movement the choral finale comes as a sort of anti-climax unless there is a large body of singers to make it impressive. The hundred or more from the Cecilia society responded admirably to all demands and were able to cope quite successfully with the strenuous association of the orchestral forces. And the quartet, chorus and orchestra worked in commendable unity.

In the past season 95 selections have been played, Wagner leading with 15, Beethoven coming next with nine and Schubert R. Straus and Tschalkowsky credited with six each. Eleven works were performed for the first time in America and 16 had their first local performance.

The soloists numbered 18, of which six were pianists and seven vocalists. Messrs Hess and Warnke, if the orchestra were among the number, and Messrs Strube and Maquarre were represented on the program as composers, the first by a symphony, which he conducted, the second by an overture. Conductor Fiedler played piano accompaniments for the vocalists, Mmes Rapold, Destinn and Morena, and the eighth Bruckner symphony was repeated by request. The 29th season will open with the rehearsal Friday afternoon, Oct 3.

Mr. Fiedler, who has engagements to keep and children to see again in Germany, will not linger in Boston when his work is done. As his present plans go, he will sail from New York on Tuesday, May 4, and go directly to Hamburg.

MR. FIEDLER'S CHANGES IN THE CHORAL SYMPHONY

Transl. — Apr 20. 09
A Note from the Conductor About His Modest "Editing"—Mr. Clapp's Surprising Tone-Poem as the Symphony Orchestra Played It in Cambridge Last Night—Mr. Gabrilowitsch Talks of Liszt, Strauss and Mahler—Some Examples of the London Reviewers' Praise of Rose Stahl in "The Chorus Lady"—Francis Wilson Appears at Last in a Play of His Own—The Spring Plays of the Harvard Dramatic Club—New Booking Arrangements for Mr. Belasco and Mr. Fiske—Another Play by Shaw—Minor Musical News

As almost all conductors do, and in most instances with reason, Mr. Fiedler has slightly retouched in a few inevitable places the score of Beethoven's ninth symphony to be played at the Symphony Concerts of this afternoon and tomorrow evening. His "editing" has been very modest, and here in substance is his own account of it: "In my opinion, it is absolutely necessary to make some (and of course careful) additions and changes in order to bring out Beethoven's meaning. Unless one does so, one sees the music—at several places—all right on paper, but one does not hear it sound properly. We must not forget that Beethoven was quite deaf when he composed the symphony and that at the first performance of it he could not hear a note. For the first and the second movements, I have largely followed Wagner's advice and method, as he published them in his essay on the Ninth Symphony. Then I sometimes give the higher octave to the flutes, which Beethoven in all probability would have done, could the passages have been played on the flutes of his time, and I have made similar changes in the horn parts. At the big climax of the first movement, I make the trombones hold the chord, because all the other instruments are too weak to fight against the tremendous tremolo of the kettle-drum, which, on the other hand, cannot possibly be softened, as these bars must sound like a sort of Last Judgment. In the scherzo, again, nobody could clearly hear a certain passage unless, as Wagner suggested, the horns were added to the wood-winds to offset the double forte of the whole string orchestra, which is absolutely necessary. Here I have followed Wagner's suggestion. In the slow movement, I have made no additions or significant changes. At the beginning of the finale, I have also followed Wagner in the making of some changes in the horn and the trumpet parts, that seem to 'light up' the scenery. In the fugue, too, I have filled in some 'melody-notes,' which Beethoven seems to have contemplated, but which could not be played under the orchestral conditions of his time."

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

May 1. — 1909
THE FINAL AFTERNOON OF THE YEAR (Transl.)

The Warm Applause of the Audience for Mr. Fiedler—A Pretty Little Symphony by Mozart for a Beginning, and Beethoven's Choral Symphony for a Memorable Ending—A Very Powerful and Impressive Performance of the Music—Mr. Fiedler's Share in It—Chorus and Solo Singers—The Modern Quality That Makes the Ninth Symphony What It Is—The Influence of It

Weather or no weather, spring or no spring, the audience filled Symphony Hall yesterday to the last place for the final Symphony Concert of the afternoon series. A performance of Beethoven's ninth symphony, unheard at a regular Symphony Concert for nine years, with its chorus and its solo singers, presumably helped to swell the numbers of the audience as it changed the aspect of the stage, with the orchestra more closely clustered than usual, Mr. Fiedler on a high, railed stand, the white ranks of the women singers, and the black-coated men trooping to their places before the symphony began. It was the final concert in the afternoon series for the year, and sometimes, as a cynic said yesterday, our public seems as eager to end it, after six months, as it was to begin. It was, moreover, the last opportunity for the present, to testify to the liking of the public of the concerts, and especially of the afternoon auditors, for Mr. Fiedler, and to their satisfaction in his programmes and his conducting. The house applauded him long and heartily when he came first to his place. It renewed its applause at the end of the little symphony by Mozart with which the programme began; it redoubled the plaudits at each pause in the Choral Symphony, and at the end of the whole concert, it had the conductor back two or three times to the stage and quite by himself. It was general, spontaneous and honest applause. By every token it was sincere in what it implied. Mr. Fiedler acknowledged it with his accustomed warmth, and he had much and just reason for his sincere pleasure in it.

Did Mr. Fiedler discover at the very end of the season that he had played not a piece by Mozart, except the "Masonic Funeral Music" in tribute to Mr. Lang, and make speed to repair the omission and place one of the composer's symphonies on his final programme? Happily, from one point of view, he chose none of the three rather hackneyed symphonies of Mozart's final years. Unhappily, from another, he preferred a little symphony in D major, that has not been played here for twenty-four years, and that Mozart wrote under pressure as the merest hack writing, a routine pièce d'occasion, to make a paradox, of the sort that he "turned off" many times in the course of his crowded and straitened life. An allegro, with pleasant little flashes of tonal fire; an andante that is simple and agreeable song; a rather ordinary minuet and a lively rondo make it. Except in the slow movement, moreover, almost any of the more skilful and fanciful composers of the time might have signed it creditably. Before and after the song, it is merely pretty eighteenth-century music, but in the slow movement enters, however carelessly, the spontaneous and characteristic Mozartean voice. The melody has the familiar sweetness, the familiar plaintiveness, the familiar "stringy quality, the lightly penetrating accent that make so many of Mozart's andantes the forerunners of the more poignant slow movements of later music. The curve of the melody, simple, elastic, fluent is Mozartean; so, too, are the little shadowy ripples of ornament, and most of all the faint voice of gentle melancholy that runs through it. For this andante, the symphony deserved performance, and the more because throughout, the finesse, the euphony, the light and elegant voices that the strings and the woodwinds can still summon at need, had delicate and dexterous play. It was one of Mr. Fiedler's good days with the classics, and he was content to let the music flow as simply and as aimlessly as Mozart seemingly wrote it.

337

Mr. Fiedler shone, too, in the performance of the Choral Symphony, and the reason is not far to seek. Beethoven's music in matter, in spirit and often in manner is intrinsically modern music. As surely as in his final quartets, he was preparing the way for Franck and d'Indy and other "modernists" in chamber music, so in the ninth symphony he is opening the future to the writers of the freer and the dramatic symphonies, and the makers of the tone-poems, of our time. Recall, for example, the two melodies that sing the passion and the beauty of the slow movement. They are musically independent of each other; Beethoven merely places them side by side or employs them in alternation—the ultra-modern juxtaposition of unrelated melodies. Recall the departure from classical form in the opening allegro—the continuous melodic development period by period, the very fashion of the modern tone-poem. Note the technical feat of the orchestral and the choral variations that make the finale, the "brutality," as some like to call it, of Beethoven's writing for the voice parts; his firm belief and practice that the singers were there to utter his imaginings and not he to consult their convenience—the modern point of view, the modern spirit, the modern execution. Recall again the magnificent passages of delineative music with which the finale begins: the outcries of the orchestra, the quotations from the previous movements, the answers of the double-basses, the quick catching at the theme of the "Hymn to Joy," the eloquent transition to it—modern strokes, modern imaginings surely, or at least the high heralding of them. Listen to the thundering drums at the climax of the first movement—and Mr. Fiedler's shares Mahler's zeal for these instruments in the ninth symphony—or hear them again beat out the scherzo quite by themselves; hear many a detail in the horns, the wood, winds, the singing and the mounting strings; note even the uncertainty of tonality and the hollow fifth of the very beginning—modern instrumentation again and to the core.

Still more modern are the exalted moods, the passionate pitch, the constant pursuit and attainment of heroic and puissant eloquence that fill the symphony. Years ago some one said that Florestan's outburst, "O Namenlose Freude!" in the prison in "Fidelio" was Beethoven's signal for the emotional and musical riotings and frenzies of the Wagnerian and other modern operatic heroes. No less is the wild whirl, orchestral and choral, of the end of the ninth symphony, his signal for much of the clamorous turbulence, the superhuman transports, the furious jubilation of similar symphonic music today. Beethoven was stretching his means to the utmost with his own titanic power; he was commanding his hearers to hear and feel with him; he would have them beside themselves as he was above himself. No wonder that after his achievement two and three composing generations have sought to do likewise in their kind. The ninth symphony from beginning to end is magnificently eloquent; throughout it has heroic accent. Strauss and Wagner might not disdain the mighty march of the first movement toward its mightier climax that tosses the listening emotions even as their music may not. The vigor of the scherzo is thrilling in its fiery energy—not one Siegfried, but a whole wilderness of Siegfrieds at lusty play to those rhythms that are modern in their swift transition. The passionate intensity of the more soulful melody of the slow movement gives it modern voice, lifting it from the depths to the heights of exaltation. The moodiness of the other melody is a truly modern reaction from such ardors of feeling and expression. And, so above all, with the Titanic voices, the universal passion, the sheer immensity of feeling and expression and of means and ends in the finale, the summoning of voices—a flood of voices—when instruments could no farther go. Here is our modern passion for almost superhuman intensity and eloquence, for overwhelming amplitude and power in our music. And here, most remarkably of all, is Beethoven, gigantically achieving his ends. Many an ambitious modern merely labors feebly beside the sustained might of this choral symphony.

Thus, indeed, is Beethoven's symphony music after Mr. Fiedler's own mind and spirit and music that stirs his best powers and gives room for their ample and eloquent play. The symphony, as some of the pedantic purists contend, may be too thoroughly modern to be wholly characteristic of Beethoven, but by so much did it offer Mr. Fiedler the richer opportunity. As he explained in this place yesterday, he has done his own modest and unobtrusive "editing" of the score—oftenest the mere discreet and necessary "fillings-out" of parts that modern conditions of performance enjoin. Only the searching student could have much heeded them yesterday. He has his own idiosyncrasy with the symphony—his own and Mahler's the other day in New York—the smiting of the kettle-drums in the first movement and in the scherzo, as within memory they have not been smitten here before. Mr. Fiedler's rightly is full of Wagner's ideal of the heroic voice, the might and the majesty of the music; he knows Beethoven's passion for his reverberant drums; and smitten as they were yesterday they accorded with the superhuman exaltation and eloquence that Mr. Fiedler and Wagner would give to the whole symphony. The drums clamored, but it was clamor to high heaven. So, too, with all the instrumental voices; for the conductor would have his orchestra as tremendous and stupendous as are the design, the purely musical eloquence, and the whole underlying passion of the symphony.

Not often, the season through, has the conductor so imposed not only his will, but the whole ardor that fills him, upon his men and caught them into it. His playing of the first and the second movements—the allegro and the scherzo—matched even his conducting of "Eln Heldenleben" in majestic stride, in might of eloquence, in intensity of accent, in richness of instrumental color. The music was resistless, overwhelming. The conductor and his men vanished in it. The listeners were whirled along the sweeping and splendid tide of impassioned sound. Perhaps Mr. Fiedler yielded a little to the slowness of pace that he loves in his adagios and that sometimes softens and sentimentalizes them. Yesterday the quality of the music almost withstood such peril, and the third movement held on its course of passionate, exalting and absorbing eloquence. It began, it ended, as heroic song. No conductor, as it seems, can quite match Weingartner at the beginning of the finale in the dramatizing force and the fiery accent of the clamoring and contending instrumental voices; but Mr. Fiedler made their outcries thrilling. He carried his orchestra nobly through the declamatory passages that finally embark him, it, his choristers and his solo singers, upon the finale. Thereafter he carried the music and them from pitch to pitch of excited and then frenzied jubilation. He held his forces well in hand; he kept each in his place; he led them from point to point shrewdly; but above all else he filled them with his flood of power, with his own passion to give the music still more clamorous and exultant voice. His choir obeyed him and absorbed him well. Here indeed might the brightness, the clarity, the soaring power of the women singers of the Cecilia tell. Here might its basses and tenors give the mounting tone weight and substance. Mr. Whitney, of the solo singers, declaimed his recitatives broadly and clearly. Miss Combs actually sang the soprano music, if music, even in these modern days, it can be called, and sent its excited shrieks and shouts mounting above and through the choral mass. The end was indeed Beethoven's frenzied climax, his riot of the Bacchantes of joy. H. T. P.

MR. FIEDLER'S FIRST YEAR

HIS PROGRAMMES, CONDUCTING AND TEMPERAMENT

Trans. — May 1, 1909
The General Liking of His Audiences for Him—The Satisfaction with His Shrewdly-Made Programmes—The Music That He Has Restored to Them—The Conductor's Tireless Energy and His Wish to Please—His Obvious Preference for Romantic, Modern and Ultra-Modern Music—The Temperamental Causes of His Success with It—His Shortcomings in the Classics—The Memorable Performances of the Year—The Work of the Orchestra and the Gradual Change in It

Half the public of the Symphony Concerts—the public of Friday afternoons—look leave of Mr. Fiedler yesterday. At every opportunity—at the beginning and the end of the concert and at each pause in Beethoven's Choral Symphony—the audience applauded him long, heartily and spontaneously. There was no mistaking its liking for him, its general satisfaction with his work for the year, or the expectation with which it will welcome his return next October. Applaudive as the listeners of Friday afternoons have been this season—by way of departure from their old and accustomed reticence—the house of Saturday night is sure to be as warm toward the conductor, and he may depart to Germany next Tuesday with the comfortable assurance that under the test of fifty concerts he has pleased his most important and considerable public in America. It liked him at the start surprisingly well, and the applause of the first concerts last autumn was unique, according to old frequenters of them, in the reception of a new conductor. Then ensued an interval in which Mr. Fiedler seemed to mistrust his own powers, and his audiences to mistrust their satisfaction. Such performances as he gave of Strauss's "Eln Heldenleben" and "Zarathustra" and a few other salient pieces reestablished his and their confidence again. Followed the inevitable period in a long series of concerts, in which the conductor and his audiences take each other for granted; while last came the fresher and the heartier applause that has pervaded the concerts of the past six weeks. Mr. Fiedler is hardly a conductor for connoisseurs; he is a conductor to please a general public. It has testified to its pleasure here in Boston; it has testified even more warmly in the smaller cities in New England that the orchestra visits on occasion; and it has come more and more to like him in New York and in the other cities of the monthly "trips." Thus Mr. Fiedler may rejoice at least in a deserved and duly earned popularity.

The conductor's programmes have surely contributed much to this general liking. He has restored the overtures and fragments of Wagner's operas to them that Dr. Muck reserved for the concerts of the Pension Fund or withheld altogether because, as he believed, they were of the theatre, and not of the concert-room. Strauss, of whose tone-poems Dr. Muck was wary, has regained his just place on the lists. Unlike either of his predecessors, Mr. Fiedler has believed that ballet-music was proper to the Symphony Concerts and Grétry and Tchaikowsky have had their dances on the programmes. There have been other light pieces as well; but the real cause of the satisfaction of the public with Mr. Fiedler's programmes has been less because of what they included than because of the way in which he arranged the music of his choice. Sometimes he has had to wrestle with the custom that assumes that a concert should continue for only an hour and a half though his audiences have shown no impatience when he has lengthened it by fifteen or twenty minutes. Sometimes he has been hampered by the unusual length of one of the chosen pieces, like that of Paderewski's or Bruckner's symphony. The "unified programme" that Dr. Muck liked to design out of the music of a particular race, or out of pieces that had a general kinship of matter and manner, has its theoretical advantages. Practically no less, it commended itself to many an intent and responsive listener, as it did to Dr. Muck. As truly, the average public of the Symphony Concerts mistrusted and disliked such arrangements. It prefers the highly diversified programmes of Mr. Fiedler, with their weekly variety and with their sharp contrasts in their several items. Moreover, to make such programmes, as Mr. Fiedler may shrewdly suspect, is to smooth the conductor's own way. The season through, he has chosen as much modern and ultra-modern music as did Dr. Muck. In the second half of the year, when he had learned his orchestra, he has been more sparing of the classics than even was his predecessor. Yet his audiences, plentiful in complaint last year, have not repined. Mr. Fiedler has brought much new or unfamiliar music to hearing in the course of the season, and it has been often of ultra-modern cast. Yet, again, there have been no hints of superabundant "novelties." Thus ingeniously has Mr. Fiedler distributed his new music and his innovating music through his twenty-four programmes, and few of his hearers from week to week have suspected how much of it they have heard.

Two other qualities that have commended Mr. Fiedler to his audiences have been his tireless energy and his frank desire to please. Forty-eight Symphony Concerts between the middle of October and the end of April are enough for most of us. Yet only the other day at the end of a season of a hundred—to count those in other cities—Mr. Fiedler was regretting that there were not more here because he had so much music that he wished to play. At the earlier concerts of last autumn, he seemed the most energetic and the most exuberant conductor physically and visibly that the orchestra and the public had known in years. He conducted with such vehemence of arm, with such vigor of body, with such suggestion of pose, with such guidance by the head. Little by little he modified this exuberance and subdued it to the custom of the concerts and to the likings of many of his auditors. He has remained, none the less, a conductor of large and sweeping and graphic beat, of energy of body, of forceful transference of mood and purpose wholly and ardently engrossed in his work and eager to achieve "effects" that sometimes he has made as visible to the eye as they were audible to the ear. Mr. Fiedler, marshalling a long climax until at last it breaks, is still a figure of high and vivid vehemence. And in all this energy, as his audiences long ago discovered, there is not a trace of pose. It springs from the wholly sincere, elastic and seemingly tireless ardor of a conductor, entirely absorbed in his task, entirely bent on the compelling of the results that he seeks. Mr. Fiedler is a conductor who seems to command rather than to persuade his men, to sway them visibly and vigorously rather than by any subtle and psychological influence, and to make his audience a partner in his own zeal. Yet with all his absorption in his work, no conductor of the orchestra in recent years has seemed more sensitive to applause or shown more pleasure in the acknowledging of it. By many a chance token, Mr. Fiedler has wished to please his hearers, and, however well his work has been done, to know on the instant that he has given pleasure to his audience. Plainly, he is of expansive temperament. Applause has signified more to him and has encouraged him more than it has to other conductors of less frank expression of their moods and of less underlying simplicity of spirit.

In another respect, the cast of Mr. Fiedler's temperament has curiously affected the quality of his performances and the general and the particular results that he has accomplished. He believes, for example, that Bruckner's symphony in C minor, which he played at two pairs of concerts, is truly a masterpiece; he responds instinctively, instantly and deeply to the emotional quality of the music; it stirred him through and through; and he brought it to masterly and to profoundly moving performance. Mr. Fiedler, again, is a fervent admirer of the music of Richard Strauss; he responds as warmly to it, enters as deeply into its spirit, grasps as fully its substance and its structure. So stirred himself, he gave illuminating, absorbing and kindling performances of "Ein Heldenleben," of "Zarathustra" and of "Death and Transfiguration." He was keenly interested, again, in Elgar's symphony, in Paderewski's, and in Noren's set of variations, "The Kaleidoscope." He was mentally and emotionally at one with them; and he gave them vivid and characterizing voice. Intrinsically romantic music, like Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" or Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony or Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" appeals warmly and graphically to him, and he made it as warmly and vividly impressive to his hearers. Mr. Fiedler happened to be discovering Debussy this year, as he had never been able to study his music in work in Germany, and he plied all his zeal in the performance of the Nocturnes and "The Afternoon of a Faun." If he was not as successful with them as he was with the other pieces just noted, the cause lay in limitations of temperament and idiosyncrasies of execution rather than in any lack of desire or appreciation. In a word, the more the chosen music has interested and stirred Mr. Fiedler individually, the more interesting and stirring has been his performance of it. He has not the chameleon-like faculty of a few rare conductors that adapts them to the music that they have in hand, whatever its nature, and makes them its characteristic voice. The exception, seemingly, to all this deductive reasoning, is the music of Wagner. Mr. Fiedler admires it intensely; it awakens him to responsive emotion. Yet his playing of the overtures and the operatic fragments that he has put so often on his programmes, has not been among his best achievements. Again, perhaps, the reason is not far to seek. Unlike Mr. Gericke, unlike Dr. Muck, Mr. Fiedler has never been an operatic conductor. His experience is solely of the concert room. Now, Wagner wrote music that is at once highly dramatic and highly theatrical, and it requires a theatrical accent, a kind of stage effect, that as a rule only the operatic conductor may give.

By every sign that his conducting has given, the classics appeal far less to Mr. Fiedler than do modern, ultra-modern, and romantic music. No doubt, he tries to persuade himself, as any conscientious conductor would, that he brings the same zeal to Beethoven and to Brahms, Schumann and Schubert, Haydn and Mozart, that he does to Strauss and Bruckner, Debussy and Elgar, Berlioz and Tchaikowsky. No doubt, he plies his energy as sedulously upon them. He puts their music dutifully upon his programmes; he chooses it shrewdly; he does it not the smallest of conscious slights. Yet to judge by the results that he has oftenest gained with it, his spontaneous mental and emotional response to it is not so keen as it is to romantic and to modern music, and time again, especially with Beethoven's pieces, he has tried, almost unconsciously perhaps, to make it sound modern. In his heart—there is more than one reason to surmise—Mr. Fiedler would rather be playing the music of the moderns and the romantics than all the classics, alive, dead or moribund, that there are in this world. Curiously, moreover, as the season has advanced, and Mr. Fiedler has become surer of himself, his band, and his public here, he has put fewer and fewer classics on his programmes.

Now, it is an old truism that when a man of warm temperament is conscientiously bending all his energies to a task to which his mind and spirit do not spontaneously respond, he is apt to overdo his efforts and to fall into the vices which are the excess of his virtues. The faults of Mr. Fiedler's conducting have oftenest been faults of exaggeration, and they have been most conspicuous in his performances of the classics, especially through the first half of the season. Properly Mr. Fiedler would give melodies and phrases clear and salient profile, but he has been prone in his classics to mould them over-much and over-calculatingly. Properly he would take his slow movements or his songful melodies at an expressive pace, but at moments in his classics and once and again in his modern pieces, he has happened to retard them overmuch and then to quicken proportionately the contrasting passages. Properly, again, Mr. Fiedler would have these classic symphonies flow in a full stream of rich and colorful tone, but in his zeal, he has sometimes thickened the stream and smeared the colors. Furthermore, he loves sonority, he courts the salient contrast and the vivid stroke; he does many things emphatically; and all these impulses and idiosyncrasies have had their play in his performances of the classics. In spite of himself, and yet because of himself, Mr. Fiedler has tried to make such music "sound modern." It does not, except at certain moments in Beethoven; it will not and it cannot. It has its own reticences, its own continence, its own balance and euphony, its own peculiar beauty and emotion—and its own perverse pitfalls. One of these is the temptation to make it sound as much as possible as though it were written today. Mr. Fiedler has brought all his powers to it and stretched them to the utmost. But the more he stretched them, the clearer it has been that their true field lay oftenest in romantic and modern music, in music that was more highly colored, that sought freer voice, and that was or would be more intensely expressive.

Thus has Mr. Fiedler done his duty by the classics, as became a faithful conductor of a long series of Symphony concerts, vowed equally to the perpetuation of the old and the encouragement of the new. They came, and, with rare exceptions, they went. What lingers in recollection, more praises Mr. Fiedler, and justifies his place among eminent conductors and with our orchestra, is his performance of various modern pieces. To recall the ecstatic beauty of tone and the exaltation of spirit to which he carried the slow movement in particular and indeed the whole of Bruckner's symphony, or the magnificence of stride and color, the architectural and the heroic quality that he gave to Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben," or the emotional sweep and the tonal splendor with which he clothed "Death and Transfiguration," or the elasticity, the vividness and the varied power of his performance of "Zarathustra," or the romantic glow that he shed about Paderewski's symphony, or the cohesive power and the masculine voice with which he carried Elgar's, or the colorful richness of his playing of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," or of Noren's "Kaleidoscope," or the mighty panorama that he unrolled in Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony, or the fire and the poignancy of his readings of Tchaikowsky—to recall all these and other similar memories is to summon anew the pleasures and the glories of the season, recite Mr. Fiedler's finest achievements and name his clearest titles, outside his programme-making, to the public favor that he enjoys. He has proved himself a conductor of large and luminous power, of large and passionate imagination, of vitalizing energy, of vivid contrast and telling strokes, of sonorous and plangent orchestral tone, of rich and deeply tinted instrumental color, of ample stride and intense accent.

The orchestra has served Mr. Fiedler well. Conductors come and conductors go; but it remains the band of virtuosos into which Mr. Gericke first wrought it. Never, probably, will it return to the meticulous perfection which was one of his means to that end. If it did, it is almost safe to say that its audiences would count it tame. Succeeding conductors have asked other qualities of it and have exercised it in them. A rising generation of listeners even puts it to other tests. The new fire that Dr. Muck infused into it Mr. Fiedler has continued and fostered, even if it be not quite so nervous a flame. He has similarly swelled and intensified the new power with which Dr.

much clothed it. Now and again, in such music as Mozart's little symphony of yesterday and in some of the dance pieces of the winter, the orchestra has proved easily that it can summon at need its long-standing finesse, its exquisiteness of tone, its felicity of shading, its delicate euphony of blended and balanced voices. It keeps, of course, all its old technical aptitude. The new qualities in its playing, the qualities that Dr. Muck brought to it and that Mr. Fiedler has maintained in it, are a breadth of utterance, an intensity of accent, a tonal splendor, a dramatizing and a characterizing power, a glowing richness of instrumental color, a nervous energy of rhythm and stride, a pervading opulence and eloquence in all that it does. They have made it less perhaps a perfect and polished instrument, but more a commanding, searching, kindling and deeply thrilling voice. Such an orchestra for many a purpose of expression remains the most potent instrument that the art and the imagination of man have yet devised. No wonder that it remains a sure and a chief glory of Boston to those that know it and the art that it serves. And it is the labor of the ninety-eight men who make it, as well as of the conductor who leads it, that keep it so.

H. T. P.

Musical News

Mr. Fiedler is returning at once to Germany. He will leave Boston today, embark tomorrow at New York, and if all goes well, be at his house in Hamburg within the next ten days.

The new overture by Sinigaglia that stands on the programme of the "Pop" concert tonight, "for the first time in Boston," has gone the round of orchestral concerts in Germany and in Italy this season, and in America was played last December by the Chicago orchestra. It is a lively prelude to Goldoni's folk-comedy, "Le Baruffe Chiozzotte," best paraphrased as "the quarrels of the people of Chiozza"—the fishing town near Venice. In the play, the women babble on the beach in a score of different fashions about a score of different things. Out of too much gossiping springs playful quarrelling; then sharp recrimination and finally noisy wrangling. The fishermen make speed to take the part of their respective wives and daughters; the pair of lovers, whose little idyl has run through the chatter, take opposite sides; there is need of the tactful and good-humored little syndicate of Chiozza to make peace. When it is restored again, the play ends merrily. Sinigaglia's overture suggests rather than follows the comedy, babbling with the women, sighing with the lovers, quarrelling like the best of the disputants and ending in the gay mood of the play. It is free, spirited, melodious, pictorial, warmly-colored music of the sort that Sinigaglia's chamber pieces, already played here, readily suggest.

December 23, 1905 Musical America

MAX FIEDLER LEADS PHILHARMONIC

HAMBURG CONDUCTOR MAKES FAVORABLE IMPRESSION AT CARNEGIE HALL.

Paintaking and Careful, Follows Beaten Paths Well—New York Critics Unanimous in Praising His Leadership.

Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, conducted the public rehearsal of the third concert of the Philharmonic Society in Carnegie Hall, New York, on the afternoon of December 15, and the concert on the evening of December 16. Mr. Fiedler made a very good impression, and according to the generally expressed opinion, is a careful and conscientious director, who conducts on well-established lines, and does so most thoroughly and with considerable ability. He made no attempt to stray from beaten paths, but confined himself to getting the best there was in the splendid Philharmonic Orchestra.

The programme consisted of Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger"; Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Mme. Galski was the soloist and sang an air from Carl Eckert's opera, "William of Orange," and the recitative and air "Abscheulicher," from Beethoven's "Fidelio."

Press comment:

New York Evening Post: "Fiedler had a remarkably firm grip on his players, compelling them, though they had never seen him till about a week ago, to do his very bidding, to play with remarkable precision, and follow his nuances with promptness."

New York Tribune: "A masterful, a wise, a keenly analytical, a lucid, an inspiring conductor is Mr. Fiedler. His technical methods are admirably intelligible, his devotion to the work in hand complete."

New York Times: "He is not a poet, either in appearance or in manner, nor does he see visions of unattainable things. He is not a revolutionary, and is not bent upon finding what none have found before him in the music he plays. Still less is he concerned with the exploitation of himself. Mr. Fiedler's demonstrations are all for the benefit of the orchestra and not at all for the audience."

THE SYMPHONY YEAR.

Of the 95 composers from whose works Max Fiedler has built the programs of the 28th Symphony season, he has perhaps shown the most liking for Berlioz and Strauss. The music of certain other composers of Debussy for one, has pleased him; the Symphony No. 1 of Brahms with which he opened his season was read memorably well; Bruckner's Eighth was interpreted with a zest that moved those influential in concert affairs to ask for its repetition; then, too the works of Tchaikowsky have always fared well at his hands. The summary of the year's work which is given in the 24th program-book shows that there have been performed more works of Wagner than of any other composer and next to him stands Beethoven; but the final concert aside, Mr. Fiedler has gathered few laurels from his conducting the music of either of these composers, whom his predecessors in symphony leadership used as a kind of standard. True enough Mr. Fiedler subdued the "Tannhauser" overture to a new mood and a better than that to which conductors usually bring it and he gave the "Tristan" music its coloring as only one who knew how to avail himself of the utmost breath of his woodwind players could do. But Beethoven, speaking his best thoughts through form, and Wagner speaking his through color, were secondary figures in the general concert scheme. Mr. Fiedler came to Boston to advocate the modern symphony, wherein largeness and wholeness of expression are more important than logic of structure or detail of instrumentation. Consequently the fantastic symphony of Berlioz and the tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," of Strauss, symphonies written according to a detailed literary program, symphonies which it is fairly impossible to make illustrate that program, but which challenge the strength of a stalwart musician to interpret them, these have been the works to call out Mr. Fiedler's powers. The most modern symphony in date of composition, that of Paderewski, would perhaps have got more attention if it had been conceived in any spirit of unity; but being disjointed and incomplete and having no single, express, mastering thought, it was the one large thing which in performance failed to count as an important achievement for Mr. Fiedler.

MR. FIEDLER

The signs have not failed, and Mr. Fiedler is to be the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra for another year. As conditions go, there was little other choice, and none probably would have been wiser. Almost every conductor of note has his partisans here in Boston, but not all of those who advise and suggest and judge know or weigh the conditions that must determine the selection. A conductor of the Symphony Orchestra must have the great abilities and the high reputation that such a post demands; he must be available at the time in which the orchestra has need of him; and he must be suitable to the conditions under which it works and flourishes. He should be, for example, a conductor that "wears well," since he must give fifty concerts each year in Boston and as many in other cities. He should bring the same zest to his work when the concerts of the orchestra take him to Newark or to Waterbury as when he is playing important new music "for the first time in America" in Boston or in New York. He must have the strength and elasticity of body, will and spirit that will carry him unspent through seven months of as hard work as any symphony orchestra, the world over, imposes on its leader. He must be catholic-minded in the choice of the pieces he plays, persuasive in the ordering of them upon his programmes, and alert and open to new music, new ideas and new composers. He must attract and hold the energy and the goodwill of his men. He must impress himself on his public alike as an able leader and as an interesting personality. The range, the force, the fineness and the individuality of his talents must justify him as the conductor of one of the preëminent orchestras of the world, with its place won, its traditions established, its standards fixed. At the least he must maintain them. At the fullest he must raise them. Moreover, the ablest conductor alive—if the world could only agree upon such a one—is useless to the orchestra, if he is not free to come to it, when the invitation calls.

Mr. Fiedler, and after nearly six months, has met these tests well. He comes to his work in March with the same diligence and alacrity with which he began it in October. He has commended himself alike to the public of the Symphony Concerts here, to the public that the orchestra visits monthly in the larger cities to the southward, and to the audiences of the towns that hear it only on occasion. He has the respect and the good will of his men—and Muck clothed it. Now and again, in such music as Mozart's little symphony of yesterday and in some of the dance pieces of the winter, the orchestra has proved easily that it can summon at need its long-standing finesse, its exquisiteness of tone, its felicity of shading, its delicate euphony of blended and balanced voices. It keeps, of course, all its old technical aptitude. The new qualities in its playing, the qualities that Dr. Muck brought to it and that Mr. Fiedler has maintained in it, are a breadth of utterance, an intensity of accent, a tonal splendor, a dramatizing and a characterizing power, a glowing richness of instrumental color, a nervous energy of rhythm and stride, a pervading opulence and eloquence in all that it does. They have made it less perhaps a perfect and polished instrument, but more a commanding, searching, kindling and deeply thrilling voice. Such an orchestra for many a purpose of expression remains the most potent instrument that the art and the imagination of man have yet devised. No wonder that it remains a sure and a chief glory of Boston to those that know it and the art that it serves. And it is the labor of the ninety-eight men who make it, as well as of the conductor who leads it, that keep it so.

H. T. P.

Musical News

Mr. Fiedler is returning at once to Germany. He will leave Boston today, embark tomorrow at New York, and if all goes well, be at his house in Hamburg within the next ten days.

The new overture by Sinigaglia that stands on the programme of the "Pop" concert tonight, "for the first time in Boston," has gone the round of orchestral concerts in Germany and in Italy this season, and in America was played last December by the Chicago orchestra. It is a lively prelude to Goldoni's folk-comedy, "Le Baruffe Chiozzotte," best paraphrased as "the quarrels of the people of Chiozza"—the fishing town near Venice. In the play, the women babble on the beach in a score of different fashions about a score of different things. Out of too much gossiping springs playful quarrelling; then sharp reprimand and finally noisy wrangling. The fishermen make speed to take the part of their respective wives and daughters; the pair of lovers, whose little idyl has run through the chatter, take opposite sides; there is need of the tactful and good-humored little syndie of Chiozza to make peace. When it is restored again, the play ends merrily. Sinigaglia's overture suggests rather than follows the comedy, babbling with the women, sighing with the lovers, quarrelling like the best of the disputants and ending in the gay mood of the play. It is free, spirited, melodious, pictorial, warmly-colored music of the sort that Sinigaglia's chamber pieces, already played here, readily suggest.

December 23, 1905 Musical American

MAX FIEDLER LEADS PHILHARMONIC

HAMBURG CONDUCTOR MAKES FAVORABLE IMPRESSION AT CARNEGIE HALL.

Paintaking and Careful, Follows Beaten Paths Well—New York Critics Unanimous in Praising His Leadership.

Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, conducted the public rehearsal of the third concert of the Philharmonic Society in Carnegie Hall, New York, on the afternoon of December 15, and the concert on the evening of December 16. Mr. Fiedler made a very good impression, and according to the generally expressed opinion, is a careful and conscientious director, who conducts on well-established lines, and does so most thoroughly and with considerable ability. He made no attempt to stray from beaten paths, but confined himself to getting the best there was in the splendid Philharmonic Orchestra.

The programme consisted of Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger"; Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Mme. Gadske was the soloist and sang an air from Carl Eckert's opera, "William of Orange," and the recitative and air "Abscheulicher," from Beethoven's "Fidelio."

Press comment:

New York Evening Post: "Fiedler had a remarkably firm grip on his players, compelling them, though they had never seen him till about a week ago, to do his very bidding, to play with remarkable precision, and follow his nuances with promptness."

New York Tribune: "A masterful, a wise, a keenly analytical, a lucid, an inspiring conductor is Mr. Fiedler. His technical methods are admirably intelligible, his devotion to the work in hand complete."

New York Times: "He is not a poet, either in appearance or in manner, nor does he see visions of unattainable things. He is not a revolutionary, and is not bent upon finding what none have found before him in the music he plays. Still less is he concerned with the exploitation of himself. Mr. Fiedler's demonstrations are all for the benefit of the orchestra and not at all for the audience."

THE SYMPHONY YEAR.

Of the 95 composers from whose works Max Fiedler has built the programs of the 28th Symphony season, he has perhaps shown the most liking for Berlioz and Strauss. The music of certain other composers of Debussy for one, has pleased him; the Symphony No. 1 of Brahms with which he opened his season was read memorably well; Bruckner's Eighth was interpreted with a zest that moved those influential in concert affairs to ask for its repetition; then, too the works of Tchaikowsky have always fared well at his hands. The summary of the year's work which is given in the 24th program-book shows that there have been performed more works of Wagner than of any other composer and next to him stands Beethoven; but the final concert aside, Mr. Fiedler has gathered few laurels from his conducting the music of either of these composers, whom his predecessors in symphony leadership used as a kind of standard. True enough Mr. Fiedler subdued the "Tannhauser" overture to a new mood and a better than that to which conductors usually bring it and he gave the "Tristan" music its coloring as only one who knew how to avail himself of the utmost breath of his woodwind players could do. But Beethoven, speaking his best thoughts through form, and Wagner speaking his through color, were secondary figures in the general concert scheme. Mr. Fiedler came to Boston to advocate the modern symphony, wherein largeness and wholeness of expression are more important than logic of structure or detail of instrumentation. Consequently the fantastic symphony of Berlioz and the tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," of Strauss, symphonies written according to a detailed literary program, symphonies which it is fairly impossible to make illustrate that program, but which challenge the strength of a stalwart musician to interpret them, these have been the works to call out Mr. Fiedler's powers. The most modern symphony in date of composition, that of Paderewski, would perhaps have got more attention if it had been conceived in any spirit of unity; but being disjointed and incomplete and having no single, express, mastering thought, it was the one large thing which in performance failed to count as an important achievement for Mr. Fiedler.

Trans. MR. FIEDLER Dec. 13, 1905

The signs have not failed, and Mr. Fiedler is to be the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra for another year. As conditions go, there was little other choice, and none probably would have been wiser. Almost every conductor of note has his partisans here in Boston, but not all of those who advise and suggest and judge know or weigh the conditions that must determine the selection. A conductor of the Symphony Orchestra must have the great abilities and the high reputation that such a post demands; he must be available at the time in which the orchestra has need of him; and he must be suitable to the conditions under which it works and flourishes. He should be, for example, a conductor that "wears well," since he must give fifty concerts each year in Boston and as many in other cities. He should bring the same zest to his work when the concerts of the orchestra take him to Newark or to Waterbury as when he is playing important new music "for the first time in America" in Boston or in New York. He must have the strength and elasticity of body, will and spirit that will carry him unspent through seven months of as hard work as any symphony orchestra, the world over, imposes on its leader. He must be catholic-minded in the choice of the pieces he plays, persuasive in the ordering of them upon his programmes, and alert and open to new music, new ideas and new composers. He must attract and hold the energy and the goodwill of his men. He must impress himself on his public alike as an able leader and as an interesting personality. The range, the force, the fineness and the individuality of his talents must justify him as the conductor of one of the preëminent orchestras of the world, with its place won, its traditions established, its standards fixed. At the least he must maintain them. At the fullest he must raise them. Moreover, the ablest conductor alive—if the world could only agree upon such a one—is useless to the orchestra, if he is not free to come to it, when the invitation calls.

Mr. Fiedler, and after nearly six months, has met these tests well. He comes to his work in March with the same diligence and alacrity with which he began it in October. He has commended himself alike to the public of the Symphony Concerts here, to the public that the orchestra visits monthly in the larger cities to the southward, and to the audiences of the towns that hear it only on occasion. He has the respect and the good will of his men—and they judge their leaders shrewdly—they work for him with their best talents and they are readily responsive to his bidding. The public of the concerts welcomed him very warmly; then cooled a little, when the first impressions of his coming had become familiar; and now for many weeks has warmed again into the comfortable and assured satisfaction of better understanding and fuller appreciation. His programmes have praised him as have those of no other conductor at Symphony Hall within memory. Each has been interesting and diversified in itself, and the whole series has ranged widely, kept just balance between classical and modern music and maintained the catholicity that is one of the best distinctions of the Symphony Concerts. Mr. Fiedler has striven no less to uphold the executive standards of the band, and it remains now, as it was when he took it, unique in America in the quality of its performances. Some indeed, like those of Strauss's tone-poems, of Elgar's, Schumann's, Bruckner's and Tschalkowsky's symphonies, of Noren's "Kaleidoscope," and of Wagner's overtures have been remarkable in their kind. They have brought the music to life; they have stirred those that heard; and they have justified Mr. Fiedler as a conductor of rich understanding, intense feeling, communicating energy and vitalizing power. Other performances have given other and appropriate pleasures. All have been worthy of the orchestra and the concerts that are now his for another year.

MR. FIEDLER RE-ENGAGED

The Conductor to Continue at the Head of the Symphony Orchestra for Another Year—His Plans for the Summer and the Autumn

The expected has happened and Mr. Fiedler, who has been the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra during the current musical year, was today engaged for another season. He has obtained an additional leave of absence from his former post in Hamburg, and he will now continue at the head of the Symphony Orchestra until May of 1910. Tomorrow Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra start on their last journey of the season to New York and to the other cities that they regularly visit. Then they return for the six final concerts of the season here, ending on Saturday, May 1. Mr. Fiedler will then go to Germany for the summer, and take up his work in Boston again at the beginning of October.

ANOTHER YEAR OF FIEDLER

Record ————— Melv. 13. 1909
Renews Contract as Symphony Leader

Dr. Max Fiedler, who has delighted Boston music lovers with his splendid conducting at the Symphony concerts, as well as by his great ability in programme making, will swing the baton of the greatest of orchestras next season.

MAX FIEDLER.

Dr. Fiedler's contract has been received and signed this morning.

The symphony Orchestra gave its final concert in New York for the winter on Saturday afternoon, and at the end of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," which began the programme, Mr. Fiedler received a big wreath as a token of the admiration in which the subscribers to the concerts hold him. To receive it plainly surprised, stirred and pleased him—the more because it was wholly unexpected. Mr. Aldrich spoke for those that gave it and for the whole public of the concerts in New York, when he wrote in yesterday's Times. "Mr. Fiedler's conducting has given pleasure; there has been, indeed, more satisfaction derived from it by the New York admirers of the Boston Orchestra than many of them expected after his first appearance at its head last November." The Tribune, in turn, does no less justice to the orchestra: "The Boston organization is a shining exemplar of what an orchestra should be in clarity and virtuosity, and it is safe to say that the supremely expert presentation of the 'Fantastic' Symphony yesterday would have pleased Berlioz even more than it did the fine audience. The gaunt themes beloved of the romantic Frenchman were sounded with a proud nobility of utterance by the violins and the heavier strings; the English horn and the oboe lent to the colloquy 'in the fields' a delicate yet piercing beauty, giving the precise suggestion of remoteness and inconsequence intended, while the peals of thunder that rolled from the drums, at the close of this third division of the symphony, came and went with consummate skill. The full flavor of the Walpurgis Night music of the final movement was achieved by means of the splendid responsiveness of the players in every choir to the requirements of the score and to the directions of the conductor. Mr. Fiedler did his share, and the result will remain among the season's many delightful memories." Trans. Mel. 22. 1909

RECEPTION TO MAX FIEDLER.

Honored, with Mrs. Fiedler, by the Musical Arts Club.

Herald _____ Apr. 14, 1909
Max Fiedler and Mrs. Fiedler were guests of honor at a reception given by the Musical Arts Club in the Hotel Tuileries yesterday afternoon. Both Mr. and Mrs. Fiedler are honorary members of the society, and the other members, with their friends, attended the affair in large numbers.

In the receiving line were Mr. and Mrs. Fiedler, and Miss Bertha Schoff, president of the club. Tea was served in the ballroom adjoining the reception room. The pourers were Miss Helen M. Ranney, Mrs. Henry L. Mason, Mrs. Charles L. Scudder, Mrs. Oliver Crockett Stevens, Mrs. Robert D. Evans, Mrs. Henry M. Rogers, Mrs. S. Henry Hooper, Mrs. William L. Whitney, Mrs. George A. Stoddard, Mrs. Samuel J. Mixter, Mrs. Philip Hale, Mrs. Nathan Matthews, Jr.

SUCCESS OF THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S LEADER

Journal — Nov. 15, 1909

An important question in the artistic life of Boston has been settled by the engagement of Max Fiedler to conduct the Symphony Orchestra for another season. When Mr. Fiedler came to Boston from Hamburg last October he was a stranger in every sense of the term, but he was warmly welcomed, nevertheless, and the good impression that he made at the beginning of his term has gradually been strengthened. This applies not to Boston alone, but to the other cities visited by the orchestra from time to time. To put it briefly, popularly—Mr. Fiedler has made good.

This fortunate outcome of Mr. Fiedler's engagement means that the Symphony Orchestra has maintained its high position in the musical world. It is today what it has been ever since its foundation, Boston's most valuable musical asset, a source of rare pleasure and intellectual stimulation. Its service in behalf of the general culture is as much a matter of programs as of performances, and in both directions Mr. Fiedler has labored with signal success. His talent and his enthusiasm have earned for him the reputation of being one of the most respected conductors the orchestra has ever had. The players and the people alike have come to hold him in admiration and affection, and no other conductor has done more, if as much, to have the people give the players their due.

Next season will be a particularly important one for the orchestra, but with Mr. Fiedler re-engaged the prospects may safely be regarded as bright.

DONOVAN DENIES O'NEIL APPEAL

for the six final concerts of the season here, ending on Saturday, May 1. Mr. Fiedler will then go to Germany for the summer, and take up his work in Boston again at the beginning of October.

they judge their leaders shrewdly—they work for him with their best talents and they are readily responsive to his bidding. The public of the concerts welcomed him very warmly; then cooled a little, when the first impressions of his coming had become familiar; and now for many weeks has warmed again into the comfortable and assured satisfaction of better understanding and fuller appreciation. His programmes have praised him as have those of no other conductor at Symphony Hall within memory. Each has been interesting and diversified in itself, and the whole series has ranged widely, kept just balance between classical and modern music and maintained the catholicity that is one of the best distinctions of the Symphony Concerts. Mr. Fiedler has striven no less to uphold the executive standards of the band, and it remains now, as it was when he took it, unique in America in the quality of its performances. Some indeed, like those of Strauss's tone-poems, of Elgar's, Schumann's, Bruckner's and Tschalkowsky's symphonies, of Noren's "Kaleidoscope," and of Wagner's overtures have been remarkable in their kind. They have brought the music to life; they have stirred those that heard; and they have justified Mr. Fiedler as a conductor of rich understanding, intense feeling, communicating energy and vitalizing power. Other performances have given other and appropriate pleasures. All have been worthy of the orchestra and the concerts that are now his for another year.

MR. FIEDLER RE-ENGAGED

The Conductor to Continue at the Head of the Symphony Orchestra for Another Year—His Plans for the Summer and the Autumn

Trans. — Mel. 13. 1909
The expected has happened and Mr. Fiedler, who has been the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra during the current musical year, was today engaged for another season. He has obtained an additional leave of absence from his former post in Hamburg, and he will now continue at the head of the Symphony Orchestra until May of 1910. Tomorrow Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra start on their last journey of the season to New York and to the other cities that they regularly visit. Then they return for the six final concerts of the season here, ending on Saturday, May 1. Mr. Fiedler will then go to Germany for the summer, and take up his work in Boston again at the beginning of October.

ANOTHER YEAR OF FIEDLER

Record — Mel. 13. 1909
Renews Contract as Symphony Leader

Dr. Max Fiedler, who has delighted Boston music lovers with his splendid conducting at the Symphony concerts, as well

MAX FIEDLER.

as by his great ability in programme making, will swing the baton of the greatest of orchestras next season.

Dr. Fiedler's contract has been received and signed this morning.

The symphony Orchestra gave its final concert in New York for the winter on Saturday afternoon, and at the end of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," which began the programme, Mr. Fiedler received a big wreath as a token of the admiration in which the subscribers to the concerts hold him. To receive it plainly surprised, stirred and pleased him—the more because it was wholly unexpected. Mr. Aldrich spoke for those that gave it and for the whole public of the concerts in New York, when he wrote in yesterday's Times. "Mr. Fiedler's conducting has given pleasure; there has been, indeed, more satisfaction derived from it by the New York admirers of the Boston Orchestra than many of them expected after his first appearance at its head last November." The Tribune, in turn, does no less justice to the orchestra: "The Boston organization is a shining exemplar of what an orchestra should be in clarity and virtuosity, and it is safe to say that the supremely expert presentation of the 'Fantastic' Symphony yesterday would have pleased Berlioz even more than it did the fine audience. The gaunt themes beloved of the romantic Frenchman were sounded with a proud nobility of utterance by the violins and the heavier strings; the English horn and the oboe lent to the colloquy 'in the fields' a delicate yet piercing beauty, giving the precise suggestion of remoteness and inconsequence intended, while the peals of thunder that rolled from the drums, at the close of this third division of the symphony, came and went with consummate skill. The full flavor of the Walpurgis Night music of the final movement was achieved by means of the splendid responsiveness of the players in every choir to the requirements of the score and to the directions of the conductor. Mr. Fiedler did his share, and the result will remain among the season's many delightful memories." Trans. Mel. 22. 1909

RECEPTION TO MAX FIEDLER.

Honored, with Mrs. Fiedler, by the Musical Arts Club.

Herald — Apr. 14. 1909
Max Fiedler and Mrs. Fiedler were guests of honor at a reception given by the Musical Arts Club in the Hotel Tulleries yesterday afternoon. Both Mr. and Mrs. Fiedler are honorary members of the society, and the other members, with their friends, attended the affair in large numbers.

In the receiving line were Mr. and Mrs. Fiedler, and Miss Bertha Schoff, president of the club. Tea was served in the ballroom adjoining the reception room. The pourers were Miss Helen M. Ranney, Mrs. Henry L. Mason, Mrs. Charles L. Scudder, Mrs. Oliver Crocker Stevens, Mrs. Robert D. Evans, Mrs. Henry M. Rogers, Mrs. S. Henry Hooper, Mrs. William L. Whitney, Mrs. George A. Stoddard, Mrs. Samuel J. Mixter, Mrs. Philip Hale, Mrs. Nathan Matthews, Jr.

SUCCESS OF THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S LEADER

Journal — Mel. 15. 1909

An important question in the artistic life of Boston has been settled by the engagement of Max Fiedler to conduct the Symphony Orchestra for another season. When Mr. Fiedler came to Boston from Hamburg last October he was a stranger in every sense of the term, but he was warmly welcomed, nevertheless, and the good impression that he made at the beginning of his term has gradually been strengthened. This applies not to Boston alone, but to the other cities visited by the orchestra from time to time. To put it briefly, popularly—Mr. Fiedler has made good.

This fortunate outcome of Mr. Fiedler's engagement means that the Symphony Orchestra has maintained its high position in the musical world. It is today what it has been ever since its foundation, Boston's most valuable musical asset, a source of rare pleasure and intellectual stimulation. Its service in behalf of the general culture is as much a matter of programs as of performances, and in both directions Mr. Fiedler has labored with signal success. His talent and his enthusiasm have earned for him the reputation of being one of the most respected conductors the orchestra has ever had. The players and the people alike

MR. FIEDLER RE-ENGAGED

The Conductor to Continue at the Head of the Symphony Orchestra for Another Year—His Plans for the Summer and the Autumn

Trans. — Mel. 13. 1909
The expected has happened and Mr. Fiedler, who has been the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra during the current musical year, was today engaged for another season. He has obtained an additional leave of absence from his former post in Hamburg, and he will now continue at the head of the Symphony Orchestra until May of 1910. Tomorrow Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra start on their last journey of the season to New York and to the other cities that they regularly visit. Then they return for the six final concerts of the season here, ending on Saturday, May 1. Mr. Fiedler will then go to Germany for the summer, and take up his work in Boston again at the beginning of October.

MUSICAL SEASON OF 1908-09 REVIEWED

Admirable Performances of the Manhattan Opera Company
Brilliant Feature—Miss Garden's Comment.

MR. FIEDLER'S SUCCESS AS SYMPHONY LEADER

Herald May 2, 1909

By PHILIP HALE.

The musical season is supposed to end with the 24th and last concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra. After this concert there may be recitals by belated singers and pianists, pupils' concerts, concerts for charity; but the season is over.

The season of 1908-09 was not one of great brilliance, if the admirable performances of the Manhattan grand opera company, Oscar Hammerstein, director, are left out of consideration. These performances are fresh in the memory, and it is not now necessary to speak again of the operas performed here for the first time, the singers, or the ability of the conductor, Mr. Campanini. Yet it may here be remarked that Miss Garden before sailing for Europe last week whispered to a reporter in New York that she believed the standard of acting in opera had been raised in the last several seasons chiefly through her own instrumentality. She had also made the school in Paris, which had developed some wonderful actors, including Maurice Renaud. Mr. Renaud, like Baptista Minola, is an affable and courteous gentleman, and he can afford to smile at this statement, for he was famous long before Miss Garden was ever on the stage.

The chief features of the last season were certain performances of the Boston Symphony orchestra—those of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," Grieg's three dance pieces, Noreen's "Kaleidoscope," Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," Elgar's symphony, Bruckner's symphony No. 8; and there was the production of symphonies by Paderewski and Strube; the concerts of the Flonzaley quartet, the production of "La Vita Nuova" by the Cecilia, the singing of Miss Destinn, Mme. Jomelli, Miss Gerville-Reache, Mme. Blanche Marchesi, Mme. Sembrich, Mrs. Hunt, Mr. Bonci and Dr. Wuellner in concert; the piano playing of Miss Arnaud, Miss Schnitzer, Messrs. Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhevinne, Copeland, Proctor, Gebhard; the violin playing of Mischa Elman; certain performances by the Longy Club, and at Mr. Dolmetsch's concerts. There was curiosity to see and hear Mme. Chaminade, and there were the usual "prima donna" concerts by Mme. Eames and Mme. Nordica. Mme. Melba sang only at one of Mrs. McAllister's musical mornings, and was not in good vocal condition.

Mr. Fiedler, who succeeded Dr. Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at once made friends as a conductor and as a man. He succeeded in pleasing the audience by his programs. The concerts as a rule have been interesting and there have been some performances of unusual excellence. There have been other performances that suffered from prosaic interpretation or from extravagance in tempi—as in the first movement of Tschalkowsky's fifth symphony—or in dynamic force. Mr. Fiedler has been more fortunate in his reading of the works of the modern German school than in those of the French composers and of Beethoven and Wagner. The orchestra lost a valuable cellist in the death of Eric Loeffler. The management and the public will long mourn the death of Frederic R. Comee.

There were many chamber concerts—too many for all of them to be heard by large audiences. The most interesting, beyond doubt and peradventure, for exquisite ensemble, wonderful euphony and poetic spirit were the three given by the Flonzaley quartet Jan. 7, Feb. 4, March 18. The programs of the Kneisel Quartet were not so interesting as in former seasons. The concerts were given in Fenway Court Nov. 10 (with the assistance of Courtland Palmer, pianist), Dec. 8 (Mr. Foote pianist), Jan. 5 (Mr. Gabrilowitsch pianist), Feb. 16 (Mr. Consolo pianist), March 16 (Mme. Goodson pianist). The Hess-Schroeder Quartet brought out one or two entertaining works. The concerts were given on Nov. 17, Dec. 22 (Mr. Schelling pianist), Jan. 19 (The Hoffmann Quartet assisting), March 26 (Mr. Gebhard pianist), and April 13 (Mr. Fiedler pianist). The Longy Club gave its concerts Nov. 23 (Mr. Fiedler, conductor, assisting), Dec. 21 (Mme. Sundellus soprano, Mr. Fox flute), Feb. 8 (Mr. Loeffler viola), Mr. Gebhard pianist, Mr. Kloeppel trumpet). The Hoffmann Quartet gave its concerts Nov. 16 (Mr. Anthony pianist), Dec. 14 (Mr. Platt pianist), Feb. 3 (Mr. Spry pianist). The Czerwonky Quartet gave concerts Dec. 9, Feb. 10 (Mr. Fox pianist, April 14 (Mr. Gebhard pianist). Mr. Dolmetsch gave concerts of ancient music Dec. 28, Feb. 9, March 10. The Adamowski Trio gave a concert for the Chopin monument at Warsaw Feb. 22.

Of the pianists, the following played here for the first time: Miss Adele Verne, Oct. 24, a woman of considerable mechanical proficiency, but with little charm; Mme. Chaminade, Dec. 12, who Chaminaded in an agreeable and soothing ing manner; Miss Germaine Arnaud, who made her first appearance at a Symphony concert Jan. 23 and played most brilliantly and delightfully—she afterward was heard in recital and confirmed the marked impression already made; Miss Edith Altemus, March 19, a pianist of very moderate ability.

SHOWTHROUGH

The genius of Mr. Elman was fully revealed at his first appearance with the Symphony orchestra, also at his first recital, Jan. 12. At his later recitals, Feb. 1, March 20, he showed the results of overwork. Mr. Hartmann gave a recital Oct. 26 and should have had a larger audience, but he has little magnetic force. Mr. Spalding made his first appearance in Boston Jan. 4, and was probably not in condition, for his intonation was often impure. Mr. Czerwonky gave three or four recitals.

The Handel and Haydn Society gave two performances of "The Messiah" Dec. 20-21, one of "Elijah," Feb. 7, and one of Gounod's "Redemption," April 11. The society lost by death the faithful services of Mr. Daniels, its president.

The Cecilia gave a performance of Parker's "Legend of St. Christopher" Dec. 9, a miscellaneous concert, Feb. 2, and it produced "La Vita Nuova," which is noted in the list of new works printed later. The Cecilia assisted in the performance of the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven.

The Apollo Club celebrated its 200th concert by engaging Miss Farrar as a soloist. Its season was a prosperous one. The People's Choral Union gave concerts Jan. 17 (Jordan's "Barbara Frietchie" and Gade's "Crusaders," and April 25 (Gounod's "St. Cecilia" mass, and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." Mr. Wodell was the conductor.

The Boston Singing Club gave two concerts.

Mr. Debuchy gave an orchestral concert in Symphony Hall with Mme. Calve as soloist Nov. 17. No orchestra visited the city. It is said that the Theodore Thomas orchestra of Chicago will give a concert in Boston next season. There were concerts by visiting bands.

Mme. Sembrich gave her annual recital; a farewell—but dry the starting tear! not a farewell forever, oh, no—Nov. 6. Mme. Melba was heard at one of Mrs. McAllister's concerts Dec. 29. Miss Farrar gave a concert here with orchestra Jan. 22, and showed that she has much to learn in purely lyric interpretation. Mme. Eames and Mr. de Gogorza gave a concert together Feb. 19, and even now their joint appearance has a sentimental interest. Mme. Nordica gave a concert on March 13 and sang in her customary concert manner, with heartiness, if not with aesthetic discrimination. Other recitals were given by Mr. Hamlin, Oct. 13; Mr. Meyn, Dec. 10; Mr. de Gogorza, Miss Anita Davis, Jan. 13; Mr. Townsend, whose concert with orchestra was one of unusual interest, Jan. 14; Miss Mary E. Williams, Feb. 4; Miss Clara Sexton, Feb. 23; Mrs. Hunt, March 1; Miss Bullard, March 23; Miss Katherine Lincoln, March 27; Mr. Elwes, an English tenor, with a voice that is not inherently emotional, sang on March 27 with considerable art.

Mme. Blanche Marchesi on Feb. 4 gave a recital that will long be remembered for fine and expressive diction and for the artistic use of a voice that is naturally without sensuous quality.

Dr. Wuellner's recitals, Nov. 16, Dec. 17, Jan. 28, 30, were distinguished by the dramatic intensity and the intellectual power of the interpreter. In purely lyrical measures, his lack of true vocal art was apparent. The accompaniments played for him by Mr. Bos should not pass unnoticed.

An event of the season was the sudden death of Mr. B. J. Lang, whose musical versatility, natural tact and shrewdness, indomitable energy, courage and enthusiasm had much to do with shaping the history of music in Boston and directing and raising the musical taste of the public.

This list does not pretend to be a complete one, and the list of first appearances and works performed here for the first time is doubtless incomplete. The abbreviations are as follows: B. S. O., Boston Symphony Orchestra; F., Flonzaley; K., Kneisel; H. S., Hess-Schroeder; L., Longy; H. & H., Handel and Haydn.

1908—Oct. 10. Max Fiedler conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.
Oct. 17. Sauer's piano concerto No. 1. The pianist was the composer.
Oct. 19. Adeline Genée, dancer, at the Colonial in a vulgar piece, "The Soul Kiss."
Oct. 24. Adele Verne of London, pianist.
Oct. 24. MacDowell's "Lamia" (B. S. O.). First performance anywhere.
Nov. 9. Harry Lauder at the Orpheum.
Nov. 9. Apollo Club gave its 200th concert.
Nov. 10. Courtland Palmer's piano quintet. Mr. Palmer, pianist. (K.)
Nov. 13. Chadwick. Theme variations and fugue for organ and orchestra. New England Conservatory of Music.
Nov. 14. Three dance pieces from Grieg's "Cephalus and Procris," arranged by Mottl. Mme. Marie Rappold, soprano. (B. S. O.)
Nov. 16. Dr. Ludwig Wuellner, interpreter of songs.
Nov. 16. Reger. Sonata in C for violin and piano. (H.) Messrs. Hoffmann and Anthony.
Nov. 17. Reger, overture to "Sigurd"; Erlanger, spinning chorus from "Kermaria"; Bruneau, suite from "L'Ataque du Moulin." (Debuchy's concert.)
Nov. 21. Sibelius, "Song of Spring" and "Finland." (B. S. O.)
Nov. 23. Falconi, sextet for piano and wind instruments (L.)
Nov. 24. William Wolstenholme, organist, of London.
Nov. 27. Isadora Duncan, dancer, in Jordan Hall.
Dec. 8. Grieg, allegro and scherzo from unfinished quartet; Foote, piano trio, B flat major, No. 2 (K.)
Dec. 9. Pogojeff, quartetino, op. 5; Kaun, quartet, C minor (C.)
Dec. 10. Reger, variations on a theme by Bach for piano. Mr. Anthony.
Dec. 12. Noreen, kaleidoscope for orchestra. Emmy Destinn, soprano. (B. S. O.)

Dec. 12. Cecile Chaminade, pianist and composer, in Symphony Hall.
 Dec. 14. Isadora Duncan danced Beethoven's 7th symphony in Symphony Hall.
 Dec. 14. Lina Cavalleri, soprano; Tina Lerner, pianist. (Mrs. McAllister's concert.)
 Dec. 20. Mrs. Caroline Mihr-Hardy, soprano (H. & H.)
 Dec. 21. Woollett, suite for piano and wind instruments (L.)
 Dec. 22. Schillings, andante and scherzo from quartet in E minor. Juon, trio caprice, op. 39 (H. S.)
 1909—Jan. 3. Mischa Elman, violinist. (B. S. O.)
 Jan. 4. Albert Spalding, violinist.
 Jan. 7. Leclair sonata for two violins and cello, op. 4, No. 1. (F.)
 Jan. 14. Perilhou fantasia for piano, organ and orchestra. Miss Hawkins, pianist. Hill, E. B., "Song and Music." (Mr. Townsend's concert.)
 Jan. 16. Schillings, "Harvest Festival," from "Moloch." (B. S. O.)
 Jan. 19. Sinigaglia, serenade, op. 33. (H. S.)
 Jan. 23. Schelnpflug, overture to a comedy of Shakespeare. Germaine Arnaud, French pianist. (B. S. O.)
 Feb. 2. Alexander Kubitzky, Russian tenor, at a Cecilia concert.
 Feb. 3. Tartini, sonata a quattro, D major. (H.)
 Feb. 4. Dohnanyi, quartet op. 15. (F.)
 Feb. 7. Mme. Jeanne Jomelli, soprano. (H. & H.)
 Feb. 8. Enesco symphony for wind instruments. (L.)
 Feb. 9. Mr. Bonci, tenor, first time in concert; Marianne Flahaut, contralto, first time. Symphony Hall.
 Feb. 10. Taneieff, quartet No. 6. (C.)
 Feb. 13. Paderewski's symphony in B minor. First performance. (B. S. O.)
 Feb. 16. Grieg, third and fourth movements of posthumous quartet. (K.) Ernesto Consolo, pianist, of Chicago. (K.)
 Feb. 27. Elgar, symphony in A flat major. (B. S. O.)
 Feb. 28. Schillings, music to Wildenbruch's poem, "Das Hexenlied." Dr. Wuellner, reciter. Pension fund concert.
 March 5. Chamber music by H. Woollett. Sonata for flute and piano, Dansez Palennes, etc. Mrs. R. J. Hull's concert.
 March 6. Berta Morena. First time in concert. (B. S. O.)
 March 11. American String quartet (female).
 March 13. Bruckner, Symphony No. 8. Graedener, cello concerto. (B. S. O.)
 March 16. Philippine Constabulary band.
 March 18. Boccherini, quartet A major, op. 33, No. 6. (F.)
 March 19. Miss Ethel Altemus, pianist, first time. Glen Hall, tenor, first time in recital.
 March 25. Wolf-Ferrari's "La Vita Nuova." Cecilia Society.
 March 26. Reger, four movements from suite op. 103 A, for violin and piano. (H. S.)
 March 27. Gervase Elwes, English tenor, in Steinert Hall. Maquarre, overture, "On the Sea Cliffs." (B. S. O.)
 March 29. Emma Tetrzzini, Mr. Polese (Ashton), in "Lucia." Mr. Hammerstein's first production in Boston.
 March 30. Massenet's "Thais." (Mary Garden, M. Renaud, Mr. Valles, Miss Trentini). First performance here.
 March 30. Concert of J. Howard Richardson's compositions.
 March 31. Mme. Tetrzzini, Mr. Sammarco (Germont), in "La Traviata."
 April 1. Debussy's "Pelleas and Melisande." (Miss Garden, Dalmores, Dufranne, Miss Gerville-Reache, Vieuille, Crabbe). First performance here.
 April 2. Offenbach's "Tales of Hoffmann." (Miss Zeppilli, Mme. Dorla). First performance here.
 April 3. Maria Labia in Puccini's "La Boheme."

April 3. Mme. Agostinelli (Aida), Mr. Zenatello (Radmes), Miss Gerville-Reache and Mr. Sammarco in "Aida."
 April 3. Strube's symphony in B minor. (B. S. O.)
 April 5. Charpentier's "Louise." First performance here. (Miss Garden, Mme. Dorla, Messrs. Dalmores, Glibert.)
 April 6. Mme. Tetrzzini and Maurice Renaud, in "Rigoletto."
 April 8. Miss Gerville-Reache in Massenet's "A Navarraise." Mr. Zenatello as Canio in "Pagliacci." Taccani tenor in "La Traviata."
 April 9. Massenet's "Our Lady's Jugler." First performance here. (Miss Garden, Messrs. Glibert, Dufranne, Crabbe, Valles, De Seguro, Veuille.)
 April 10. Glazounoff, "Spring," op. 34 (B. S. O.)
 April 13. Fiedler, sonata for 'cello and piano. (H. S.)
 April 13. Lazzari, movement from violin and piano sonata. Miss Collier and Mr. Anthony.
 April 15. Albany Ritchie, violinist.
 April 17. Foote, suite in E major for strings, op. 63. First performance. (B. S. O.)
 April 27. Glazounoff's theme and variations for piano. Miss Edith W. Bly, pianist.
 May 1. Miss Laura Combs, soprano, in Beethoven's 9th symphony.

MR. FIEDLER'S FIRST YEAR

HIS PROGRAMMES, CONDUCTING AND TEMPERAMENT

The General Liking of His Audiences for Him—The Satisfaction with His Shrewdly-Made Programmes—The Music That He Has Restored to Them—The Conductor's Tireless Energy and His Wish to Please—His Obvious Preference for Romantic, Modern and Ultra-Modern Music—The Temperamental Causes of His Success with It—His Shortcomings in the Classics—The Memorable Performances of the Year—The Work of the Orchestra and the Gradual Change in It

Half the public of the Symphony Concerts—the public of Friday afternoons—look leave of Mr. Fiedler yesterday. At every opportunity—at the beginning and the end of the concert and at each pause in Beethoven's Choral Symphony—the audience applauded him long, heartily and spontaneously. There was no mistaking its liking for him, its general satisfaction with his work for the year, or the expectation with which it will welcome his return next October. Applause as the listeners of Friday afternoons have been this season—by way of departure from their old and accustomed reticence—the house of Saturday night is sure to be as warm toward the conductor, and he may depart to Germany next Tuesday with the comfortable assurance that under the test of fifty concerts he has pleased his most important and considerable public in America. It liked him at the start surprisingly well, and the applause of the first concerts last autumn was unique, according to old frequenters of them, in the reception of a new conductor. Then ensued an interval in which Mr. Fiedler seemed to mistrust his own powers, and his audiences to mistrust their satisfaction. Such performances as he gave of Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben" and "Zarathustra" and a few other salient pieces reestablished his and their confidence again. Followed the inevitable period in a long series of concerts, in which the conductor and his audiences take each other for granted; while last came the fresher and the heartier applause that has pervaded the concerts of the past six weeks. Mr. Fiedler is hardly a conductor for connoisseurs; he is a conductor to please a general public. It has testified to its pleasure here in Boston; it has testified even more warmly in the smaller cities in New England that the orchestra visits on occasion; and it has come more and more to like him in New York and in the other cities of the monthly "trips." Thus Mr. Fiedler may rejoice at least in a deserved and duly earned popularity.

The conductor's programmes have surely contributed much to this general liking. He has restored the overtures and fragments of Wagner's operas to them that Dr. Muck reserved for the concerts of the Pension Fund or withheld altogether because, as he believed, they were of the theatre, and not of the concert-room. Strauss, of whose tone-poems Dr. Muck was wary, has regained his just place on the lists. Unlike either of his predecessors, Mr. Fiedler has believed that ballet-music was proper to the Symphony Concerts and Grétry and Tchaikowsky have had their dances on the programmes. There have been other light pieces as well; but the real cause of the satisfaction of the public with Mr. Fiedler's programmes has been less because of what they included than because of the way in which he arranged the music of his choice. Sometimes he has had to wrestle with the custom that assumes that a concert should continue for only an hour and a half though his audiences have shown no impatience when he has lengthened it by fifteen or twenty minutes. Sometimes he has been hampered by the unusual length of one of the chosen pieces, like that of Paderewski's or Bruckner's symphony. The "unified programme" that Dr. Muck liked to design out of the music of a particular period, or of composers of a particular race, or out of pieces that had a general kinship of matter and manner, has its theoretical advantages. Practically no less, it commended itself to many an intent and responsive listener, as it did to Dr. Muck. As truly, the average public of the Symphony Concerts mistrusted and disliked such arrangements. It prefers the highly diversified programmes of Mr. Fiedler, with their weekly variety and with their sharp contrasts in their several items. Moreover, to make such programmes, as Mr. Fiedler may shrewdly suspect, is to smooth the conductor's own way. The season through, he has chosen as much modern and ultra-modern music as did Dr. Muck. In the second half of the year, when he had learned his orchestra, he has been more sparing of the classics than even was his predecessor. Yet his audiences, plentiful in complaint last year, have not repined. Mr. Fiedler has brought much new or unfamiliar music to hearing in the course of the season, and it has been often of ultra-modern cast. Yet, again, there have been no hints of superabundant "novelties." Thus ingeniously has Mr. Fiedler distributed his new music and his innovating music through his twenty-four programmes, and few of his hearers from week to week have suspected how much of it they have heard.

Two other qualities that have commended Mr. Fiedler to his audiences have been his tireless energy and his frank desire to please. Forty-eight Symphony Concerts between the middle of October and the end of April are enough for most of us. Yet only the other day at the end of a season of a hundred—to count those in other cities—Mr. Fiedler was regretting that there were not more here because he had so much music that he wished to play. At the earlier concerts of last autumn, he seemed the most energetic and the most exuberant conductor physically and visibly that the orchestra and the public had known in years. He conducted with such vehemence of arm, with such vigor of body, with such suggestion of pose, with such guidance by the head. Little by little he modified this exuberance and subdued it to the custom of the concerts and to the likings of many of his auditors. He has remained, none the less, a conductor of large and sweeping and graphic beat, of energy of body, of forceful transference of mood and purpose wholly and ardently engrossed in his work and eager to achieve "effects" that sometimes he has made as visible to the eye as they were audible to the ear. Mr. Fiedler, marshalling a long climax until at last it breaks, is still a figure of high and vivid vehemence. And in all this energy, as his audiences long ago discovered, there is not a trace of pose. It springs from the wholly sincere, elastic and seemingly tireless ardor of a conductor, entirely absorbed in his task, entirely bent on the compelling of the results that he seeks. Mr. Fiedler is a conductor who seems to command rather than to persuade his men, to sway them visibly and vigorously rather than by any subtle and psychological influence, and to make his audience a partner in his own zeal. Yet with all his absorption in his work, no conductor of the orchestra in recent years has seemed more sensitive to applause or shown more pleasure in the acknowledging of it. By many a chance token, Mr. Fiedler has wished to please his hearers, and, however well his work has been done, to know on the instant that he has given pleasure to his audience. Plainly, he is of expansive temperament. Applause has signified more to him and has encouraged him more than it has to other conductors of less frank expression of their moods and of less underlying simplicity of spirit.

In another respect, the cast of Mr. Fiedler's temperament has curiously affected the quality of his performances and the general and the particular results that he has accomplished. He believes, for example, that Bruckner's symphony in C minor, which he played at two pairs of concerts, is truly a masterpiece; he responds instinctively, instantly and deeply to the emotional quality of the music; it stirred him through and through; and he brought it to masterly and to profoundly moving performance. Mr. Fiedler, again, is a fervent admirer of the music of Richard Strauss; he responds as warmly to it, enters as deeply into its spirit, grasps as fully its substance and its structure. So stirred himself, he gave illuminating, absorbing and kindling performances of "Ein Heldenleben," of "Zarathustra" and of "Death and Transfiguration." He was keenly interested, again, in Elgar's symphony, in Paderewski's, and in Noren's set of variations, "The Kaleidoscope;" he was mentally and emotionally at one with them; and he gave them vivid and characterizing voice. Intrinsically romantic music, like Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" or Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony or Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" appeals warmly and graphically to him, and he made it as warmly and vividly impressive to his hearers. Mr. Fiedler happened to be discovering Debussy this year, as he had never been able to study his music in work in Germany, and he plied all his zeal in the performance of the Nocturnes and "The Afternoon of a Faun." If he was not as successful with them as he was with the other pieces just noted, the cause lay in limitations of temperament and idiosyncrasies of execution rather than in any lack of desire or appreciation. In a word, the more the chosen music has interested and stirred Mr. Fiedler individually, the more interesting and stirring has been his performance of it. He has not the chameleon-like faculty of a few rare conductors that adapts them to the music that they have in hand, whatever its nature, and makes them its characteristic voice. The exception, seemingly, to all this deductive reasoning, is the music of Wagner. Mr. Fiedler admires it intensely; it awakens him to responsive emotion. Yet his playing of the overtures and the operatic fragments that he has put so often on his programmes, has not been among his best achievements. Again, perhaps, the reason is not far to seek. Unlike Mr. Gericke, unlike Dr. Muck, Mr. Fiedler has never been an operatic conductor. His experience is solely of the concert room. Now, Wagner wrote music that is at once highly dramatic and highly theatrical, and it requires a theatrical accent, a kind of stage effect, that as a rule only the operatic conductor may give.

By every sign that his conducting has given, the classics appeal far less to Mr. Fiedler than do modern, ultra-modern, and romantic music. No doubt, he tries to persuade himself, as any conscientious conductor would, that he brings the same zeal to Beethoven and to Brahms, Schumann and Schubert, Haydn and Mozart, that he does to Strauss and Bruckner, Debussy and Elgar, Berlioz and Tchaikowsky. No doubt, he plies his energy as sedulously upon them. He puts their music dutifully upon his programmes; he chooses it shrewdly; he does it not the smallest of conscious slights. Yet to judge by the results that he has oftenest gained with it, his spontaneous mental and emotional response to it is not so keen as it is to romantic and to modern music, and time again, especially with Beethoven's pieces, he has tried, almost unconsciously perhaps, to make it sound modern. In his heart—there is more than one reason to surmise—Mr. Fiedler would rather be playing the music of the moderns and the romantics than all the classics, alive, dead or moribund, that there are in this world. Curiously, moreover, as the season has advanced, and Mr. Fiedler has become surer of himself, his band, and his public here, he has put fewer and fewer classics on his programmes.

Now, it is an old truism that when a man of warm temperament is conscientiously bending all his energies to a task to which his mind and spirit do not spontaneously respond, he is apt to overdo his efforts and to fall into the vices which are the excess of his virtues. The faults of Mr. Fiedler's conducting have oftenest been faults of exaggeration, and they have been most conspicuous in his performances of the classics, especially through the first half of the season. Properly Mr. Fiedler would give melodies and phrases clear and salient profile, but he has been prone in his classics to mould them over-much and over-calculatingly. Properly he would take his slow movements or his songful melodies at an expressive pace, but at moments in his classics and once and again in his modern pieces, he has happened to retard them overmuch and then to quicken proportionately the contrasting passages. Properly, again, Mr. Fiedler would have these classic symphonies flow in a full stream of rich and colorful tone, but in his zeal, he has sometimes thickened the stream and smeared the colors. Furthermore, he loves sonority, he courts the salient contrast and the vivid stroke; he does many things emphatically; and all these impulses and idiosyncrasies have had their play in his performances of the classics. In spite of himself, and yet because of himself, Mr. Fiedler has tried to make such music "sound modern." It does not, except at certain moments in Beethoven; it will not and it cannot. It has its own reticences, its own continence, its own balance and euphony, its own peculiar beauty and emotion—and its own perverse pitfalls. One of these is the temptation to make it sound as much as possible as though it were written today. Mr. Fiedler has brought all his powers to it and stretched them to the utmost. But the more he stretched them, the clearer it has been that their true field lay oftenest in romantic and modern music, in music that was more highly colored, that sought freer voice, and that was or would be more intensely expressive.

Thus has Mr. Fiedler done his duty by the classics, as became a faithful conductor of a long series of Symphony concerts, vowed equally to the perpetuation of the old and the encouragement of the new. They came, and, with rare exceptions, they went. What lingers in recollection, more praises Mr. Fiedler, and justifies his place among eminent conductors and with our orchestra, is his performance of various modern pieces. To recall the ecstatic beauty of tone and the exaltation of spirit to which he carried the slow movement in particular and indeed the whole of Bruckner's symphony, or the magnificence of stride and color, the architectural and the heroic quality that he gave to Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben," or the emotional sweep and the tonal splendor with which he clothed "Death and Transfiguration," or the elasticity, the vividness and the varied power of his performance of "Zarathustra," or the romantic glow that he shed about Paderewski's symphony, or the cohesive power and the masculine voice with which he carried Elgar's, or the colorful richness of his playing of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," or of Noren's "Kaleidoscope," or the mighty panorama that he unrolled in Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony, or the fire and the poignancy of his readings of Tchaikowsky—to recall all these and other similar memories is to summon anew the pleasures and the glories of the season, recite Mr. Fiedler's finest achievements and name his clearest titles, outside his programme-making, to the public favor that he enjoys. He has proved himself a conductor of large and luminous power, of large and passionate imagination, of vitalizing energy, of vivid contrast and telling strokes, of sonorous and plangent orchestral tone, of rich and deeply tinted instrumental color, of ample stride and intense accent.

The orchestra has served Mr. Fiedler well. Conductors come and conductors go; but it remains the band of virtuosi into which Mr. Gericke first wrought it. Never, probably, will it return to the meticulous perfection which was one of his means to that end. If it did, it is almost safe to say that its audiences would count it tame. Succeeding conductors have asked other qualities of it and have exercised it in them. A rising generation of listeners even puts it to other tests. The new fire that Dr. Muck infused into it Mr. Fiedler has continued and fostered, even if it be not quite so nervous a flame. He has similarly swelled and intensified the new power with which Dr. Muck clothed it. Now and again, in such music as Mozart's little symphony of yesterday and in some of the dance pieces of the winter, the orchestra has proved easily that it can summon at need its long-standing finesse, its exquisiteness of tone, its felicity of shading, its delicate euphony of blended and balanced voices. It keeps, of course, all its old technical aptitude. The new qualities in its playing, the qualities that Dr. Muck brought to it and that Mr. Fiedler has maintained in it, are a breadth of utterance, an intensity of accent, a tonal splendor, a dramatizing and a characterizing power, a glowing richness of instrumental color, a nervous energy of rhythm and stride, a pervading opulence and eloquence in all that it does. They have made it less perhaps a perfect and polished instrument, but more a commanding, searching, kindling and deeply thrilling voice. Such an orchestra for many a purpose of expression remains the most potent instrument that the art and the imagination of man have yet devised. No wonder that it remains a sure and a chief glory of Boston to those that know it and the art that it serves. And it is the labor of the ninety-eight men who make it, as well as of the conductor who leads it, that keep it so.

H. T. P.

for VIOLIN.

C POEM, "Le Kremlin."
(ime.)

st:

E HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Conductor: [illegible]

PAUL TOWERS, Violin

Violin

Violin

Violin

Violin

Violin

Violin

Violin

Violin

Violin

Violin

Violin

CONTINUED ON NEXT REEL